Where death was more than mine own.

"The next can boast to lead in steaks flow—
A Spartan firmness with Athenian wit:"
Though yet in embryo these perfection shine,
CHORUS thy father's fame will soon be thine.
When learning, &c., &c. &c.

Domestic happiness will stamp thy fate,
Sacred to love, unclouded e'er by hate;
The world admire thee, and thy friends adore thee.
* Ambition's slave alone would toll for more.

Now last, and nearest of the social band,
See honest, open, generous Cleon stand;
With scarce one speck to cloud the pleasing scene,
No vice degrades that purest soul serene.
On the same day our stolid race begun,
On the same day our stolid race was run;
Thus side by side we pass'd our first career,
Thus side by side we strove for many a year;
At last concluded our scholastic life,
We neither conquer'd in the classic strife;
As speakers, each supports an equal name,
And crowds allow to both a partial fame:
To soothe a youthful rival's early pride,
Though Cleon's candor would the palm divide,
Yet candor's self compels me now to own
Justice awards it to my friend alone."

Oh! friends regretted, scenes for ever dear,
Remembrance hails you with her warmest tear.
Drooping, she bends o'er pensive Fancy's urn
To trace the hours which never can return;
§ Yet with the retrospection loves to dwell,
And soothe the sorrows of her last farewell.
Yet greeats the triumph of my boyish mind,
As infant laurels round my head were twined;
When Probus' praise repaid my lyric song,
Or placed me higher in the studious throng,
Or when my first brave Harangue received applause,
His sage instruction the primeval cause,
What gratitude to him my soul possess,
While hope of dawning honors fill'd my breast!

|| For all my humble fame, to him all;

† This alludes to the public speeches delivered at the school. In the earlier edition, the word was neither.

§ The six concluding lines of this passage were given as follows in the private volume:

"As speakers, each supports a rival name,
Though neither seeks to damn the other's fame.
Pompous sile, monopol to decide:
With youthful courser, we the palm diffuse;
Yet candor's self compels me now to own
Justice awards it to my friend alone."

"Yet in retrospection finds relief
And revives in the luxury of grief."—Private volume.

| From these to the end, the copy of the poem, as printed in the Hours of Idleness, differs entirely from that in the private volume which contains and elucidates this:

"When, yet a novice in the mimic art,
I follow'd the transports of a vengeful heart;
When as the Royal Slave I trod the stage,
To meet in flames more than mortal rage;
The praise of Probus made me feel more proud
Than all the pluralities of the faming crowd.
At 1 a vain endeavor to the childish strain
To soothe the woes of which I thee complaint.
What can avail the falsehood's too late time,
To measure sorrow in a jangling rhyme?
No awful advice from a friend is near,
And heartless strangers drop no feeling tear.
I seek not joy in woman's sparkling eye.
The smiles of beauty cannot check the sigh.
Ah! thou wouldst bear the popularity.
What is the falsehood's too late time,
To measure sorrow in a jangling rhyme?
No awful advice from a friend is near,
And heartless strangers drop no feeling tear.
I seek not joy in woman's sparkling eye.
The smiles of beauty cannot check the sigh.
Ah! thou wouldst bear the popularity.
What is the falsehood's too late time,
To measure sorrow in a jangling rhyme?
No awful advice from a friend is near,
And heartless strangers drop no feeling tear.
I seek not joy in woman's sparkling eye.
The smiles of beauty cannot check the sigh.
Ah! thou wouldst bear the popularity.
What is the falsehood's too late time,
To measure sorrow in a jangling rhyme?
No awful advice from a friend is near,
The praise is due, who made that fame my own.
And, amid stillness, does the song return?
Those young effusions of my early days,
Could I soar above these feeble lays?
The song might perish, but the theme must live.
Yet why for him the needless verse essay?
His honor'd name requires no vain display:
By every son of grateful Ida blest,
It finds an echo in each youthful breast;
A fame beyond the glories of the proud,
Or all the plaudits of the venal crowd.

Ida, not yet exhausted is the theme,
Nor closed the progress of my youthful dream.
How many a friend deserves the grateful strain,
What scenes of childhood still unsung remain,
Yet let me hush this echo of the past.
This parting song, the dearest and the last;
And brood in secret o'er those hours of joy,
To me a silent and a sweet employ,
While, future hope and fear alike unknown,
I think with pleasure on the past alone;
Yes, to the past alone my heart confine,
And chase the phantom of what once was mine.

IDA! still o'er thy hills in joy preside,
And proudly steer through time's eventful tide;
Still may thy blooming sons thy name reverre,
Smile in thy bower, but quit thee with a tear—
That tear perhaps the fondest which will flow
O'er their last scene of happiness below.
Tell me, why hoary few who glide along,
The feeble veterans of some former throng,
Whose friends, like autumn leaves by tempest
whirl'd,
Are swept for ever from this busy world;
Revolv.e the fleeting moments of your youth,
While Care as yet withheld her venom'd tooth,
Say if remembrance days like these endear
Beyond the rapture of succeeding years?
Say can ambition's fever'd dream bestow
So sweet a balm to soothe your hours of woe?
Can treasures, hoarded for some thankless son,
Can royal smiles, or wreaths by slaughter won,
Can stars or ermine, man's maturer toys,
(For glittering baubles are not left to boys,) Recall one scene so much beloved to view
As those where Youth her garland twined for you.

But not that mental sting which stings within,
The dark avenger of unpractis'd sin;
The silent shaft which goads the guilty wretch
Extended on a rack's maddening stretch;
Conscience that sting, that shall to him supplies—
His mind the rack from which he 'rives can die.
For me, who'er my folly or my fear,
One cheerful comfort still is cherish'd here:
No dread internal humour of his rest;
No dreams of injured benevolent labors;
Of hope, of peace, of almost all benes,
Conscience, my last but welcome guest is left.
Shudder's impassion'd breath may blast my name
Every delight in blight the track of fame:
Death may chill the current of my blood,
And froe extinguish'd warmth impress my soul;
Presaging horror darkly every wave—
Even here will consciente be my text defence.
My bosom feels no warm which never can die
(Not crimes I mourn, but happiness gone by,
Thus crawling on with many a reptile vile,
My heart to labor, though my cheek may gape,
No more with former lines my heart is glad;
Hope yielding, anguish, and my soul is out;
From fond regret no future joy can save,
Resurrection thunders only in the grave.

Ah, no! amid the gloomy calm of age
You turn with falttering hand life's varied page;
Peruse the record of your days on earth,
Unsullied only where it marks your birth;
Still lingering pause above each checker'd leaf,
And blot with tears the sable lines of grief;
Where Passion o'er the theme her mantle threw;
Or weeping Virtue sigh'd a faint alid;
But bless the scroll which fairer words adorn,
Traced by the rosy finger of the morn,
When Friendship bow'd before the shrine of truth,
And Love, without his pinion smiled on youth.

ANSWER TO A BEAUTIFUL POETRY.†

WRITTEN BY MONTGOMERY, AUTHOR OF "THE WANDERER IN SWITZERLAND," &C., &C., ENTITLED "THE COMMON LOT."†

MONTGOMERY! true, the common lot
Of mortals lies in Letha's wave:
Yet some shall never be forgot—
Some shall exist beyond the grave.

"Unknown the region of his birth;"
The hero rolls the tide of war;
"Yet not unknown his martial worth,
Which glares a meteor from afar.

His joy or grief, his weal or wo,
Perchance may 'scape the page of fame;
Yet nations now unborn will know
The record of his deathless name.

The patriot's and the poet's frame
Must share the common tomb of all;
Their glory will not sleep the same;
That will arise, though empires fall.

The lustre of a beauty's eye
Assumes the ghastly stare of death;
The fair, the brave, the good must die,
And sink the yawning grave beneath.

Once more the speaking eye revives,
Still beaming through the lover's strain;
For Petrarch's Laura still survives:
She died, but ne'er will die again.

The rolling seasons pass away,
And Time, unerring, waves his wing;
Whilst honor's laurels ne'er decay,
But bloom in fresh unfading spring.

All, all must sleep in grim repose,
Collected in the silent tomb;
The old and young, with friends and foes
Festering alike in shrouds, consume.

TO THE REV. J. T. BECHER.

Dear Becher, you tell me to mix with mankind:
I cannot deny such a precept is wise;
But retirement accords with the tone of my mind;
I will not descend to a world I despise.

Did the senate or camp my exertions require,
Ambition might prompt me, at once, to go forth;
When infancy's years of probation expire,
Perchance I may strive to distinguish my birth.

The fire in the cavern of Etna conceal'd,
Still mantles unseen in its secret recess;
At length in a volume terrific reveal'd,
No torrent can quench it, no bounds can repress.

Oh! thus, the desire in my bosom for fame
Bids me live but to hope for prosperity's praise.
Could I soar with the phoenix on pinions of flame,
With him I would wish to expire in the blaze.

For the life of a Fox, of a Chatham the death,
What censure, what danger, what would I brave?
Their lives did not end when they yielded their breath,
Their glory illuminates the gloom of their grave.

Yet why should I mingle in Fashion's full herd?
Why crouch to her leaders, or cringe to her rules?
Why bend to the proud, or applaud the absurd?
Why search for delight in the friendship of fools?

I have tasted the sweets and the bitters of love;
In friendship I early was taught to believe;
My passion the matrons of prudence reprove;
I have found that a friend may profess, yet deceive.

To me what is wealth? it may pass in an hour,
If tyrants prevail, or if Fortune should frown.
To me what is title?—the phantom of power;
To me is fashion—I seek but renown.

Deceit is a stranger as yet to my soul,
I still am unpractised to warnish the truth;
Then why should I live in a hateful control?
Why waste upon folly the days of my youth?*

THE DEATH OF CALMAR AND ORLA.*

An imitation of Macpherson's Ossian.

Dear are the days of youth! Age dwells on their remembrance through the mist of time.
In the twilight, he recalls the sunny hours of morn.
He lifts his spear with trembling hand. "Not thus feebly did I raise the steel before my fathers!"
Past is the race of heroes! but their fame rises on the harp; their souls ride on the wings of the wind;
they hear the sound through the sighs of the storm, and rejoice in their hall of clouds! Such is Calmar.
The gray stone marks his narrow house. He looks down from eddying tempests; he rolls his form in the whirlwind, and hovers on the blast of the mountain.

In Morven dwelt the chief; a beam of war to Fingal.
His steps in the field were marked in blood! Lochlin's sons had died before his angry spear; but mild was the eye of Calmar: soft was the flow of his yellow locks; they streamed like the meteor of the night. No maid was the sigh of his soul: his thoughts were given to friendship; to dark-haired Orla, destroyer of heroes! Equal were their swords in battle; but fierce was the pride of Orla: gentle alone to Calmar. Together they dwelt in the cave of Oithona.

* From Lochlin, Swaran bounded o'er the blue waves. Erin's sons fell beneath his might. Fingal roused his chiefs to combat. Their ships cover the ocean! Their hosts throng on the green hills. They come to the aid of Erin.

Night rose in clouds. Darkness veils the armies. But the blazing oaks gleam through the valley. The sons of Lochlin slept; their dreams were of blood. They lift the spear in thought, and Fingal flies.

Not so the host of Morven. To watch was the post of Orla. Calmar stood by his side. Their spears were in their hands. Fingal called his chiefs; they stood around. The king was in the midst. Gray were his locks, but strong was the arm of the king. Age withered not his powers. "Sons of Morven," said the hero, "tomorrow we meet the foe: but where is Cuthullin, the shield of Erin? He rests in the halls of Tara; he knows not of our coming. Who will speed through Lochlin to the hero, and call the chief to arms? The path is by the swords of foes, but many are my heroes. They are thunderbolts of war. Speak, ye chiefs! Who will arise?"

"Son of Trenmor! mine be the deed," said dark-haired Orla, "and mine alone. What is death to me? I love the sleep of the mighty, but little is the danger. The sons of Lochlin dream. I will seek Cuthullin. If I fall, raise the song of hards; and lay me by the stream of Lubar."—"And shalt thou fall alone?" said fair-haired Calmar. "Wilt thou leave thy friend afar? Chief of Oithona! not feeble is my arm in fight. Could I see thee die and not lift the spear? No, Orla! ours has been the chas of the roebuck, and the feast of shells. ours be the path of danger: ours has been the cave of Oithona; ours be the narrow dwelling on the..." banks of Lubar." "Calmar," said the chief of Oithona; "why should thy yellow locks be darkened in the dust of Erin? Leave me not alone. My father dwells in his hail of air: he will rejoice in his son; but the blue-eyed Mora spreads the feast for her son in Morven. She listens to the steps of the hunter on the heath, and thinks it is the tread of Calmar. Let him not say, 'Calmar has fallen by the steel of Lochlin: he died with gloomy Orla, the chief of the dark brow.' Why should tears dim the azure eye of Mora? Why should her voice curse Orla, the destroyer of Calmar? Live, Calmar! Live to raise my stone of moss; live to revenge me in the blood of Lochlin. Join the song of bards above my grave. Sweet will be the song of death to the Orla from the voice of Calmar. My ghost shall smile on the notes of praise." "Orla," said the son of Mora, "could I raise the song of death to my friend? Could I give his fame to the winds? No, my heart would speak in sighs. Paint and broken are the sounds of sorrow. Orla! our souls shall hear the song together. One cloud shall be ours on high. The bards will mingle the names of Orla and Calmar."

They quit the circle of the chiefs. Their steps were to the host of Lochlin. The dying blaze of oak dim twinkles through the night. The northern star points the path to Tura. Swaran, the king, rests on his lonely hill. Here the troops are mixed: they frown in sleep; their shields beneath their heads. Their swords gleam at distance in heaps. The fires are faint; their embers fall in smoke. All is hushed; but the gale sings on the rocks above. Lightly wheel the heroes through the slumbering band. Half the journey is past, when Mathon, resting on his shield, meets the eye of Orla. It rolls in flame, and glints through the shade. His spear is raised on high. "Why dost thou bend thy brow, chief of Oithona?" said fair-haired Calmar. "We are in the midst of foes. Is this a time for delay?" "It is a time for vengeance," said Orla of the gloomy brow. "Mathon of Lochlin sleeps: seest thou his spear? Its point is dim with the gore of my father. The blood of Mathon shall reek on mine; but shall I slay him, sleeping, son of Mora? No! he shall feel his wound: my fame shall not soar on the blood of slumber. Rise! Mathon! rise! the son of Conna calls; thy life is his; rise to combat." Mathon starts from sleep; but did he rise alone? No: the gathering chiefs bound on the plain. "Fly! Calmar! fly!" said dark-haired Orla. "Mathon is mine. I shall die in joy. But Lochlin crowds around. Fly through the shade of night." Orla turns. The helm of Mathon is cleft; his shield falls from his arm: he shudders in his blood. He rolls by the side of the blazing oak. Strumon sees him fall; his wrath rises: his weapon glitters on the head of Orla: but a spear pierced his eye. His brainッシュes through the wound, and foams on the spear of Calmar. As roll the waves of the ocean on two mighty barks of the north, so pour the men of Lochlin on the chiefs. As, breaking the surge in foam, proudly steer the barks of the north, so rise the chiefs of Morven on the scattered crests of Lochlin. The din of arms came to the ear of Fingal. He strikes his shield; his sons throng around; the people pour along the heath. Royal bounds in joy. Ossian stalks in his arms. Oscar shakes his spear. The eagle wing of Fillion floats on the wind. Dreadful is the clang of death! many are the widows of Lochlin. Morven prevails in his strength.

Morn glimmers on the hills; no living foe is seen, but the sleepers are many; grins they lie on Erin. The breeze of ocean lifts their locks; yet they do not awake. The hawks scream above their prey.

Whose yellow locks wave o'er the breast of a chief? Bright as the gold of the stranger, they mingle with the dark hair of his friend. "Tis Calmar: he lies on the bosom of Orla. Theirs is one stream of blood. Fierce is the look of the gloomy Orla. He breathes not; but his eye is still a flame. It glares in death unclosed. His hand is grasped in Calmar's; but Calmar lives! he lives, though low." "Rise," said the king, "rise, son of Mora: tis mine to heal the wounds of heroes. Calmar may yet bound on the hills of Morven.

"Never more shall Calmar chase the deer of Morven with Orla," said the hero. "What were the chase to me alone? Who would share the spoils of battle with Calmar? Orla is at rest! Rough was thy soul, Orla! yet soft to me as the dew of morn. It glared on others in lightning; to me a silver beam of night. Bear my sword to blue-eyed Mora: let it hang in my empty hall. It is not pure from blood: but it could not save Orla. Lay me with my friend. Raise the song when I am dark!"

They are laid by the stream of Lubar. Four gray stones mark the dwelling of Orla and Calmar.

When Swaran was bound, our sails rose on the blue waves. The winds gave our barks to Morven. The bards raised the song.

"What form rises on the roar of clouds? Who seest dark ghost gleams on the red streams of tempests? His voice rolls on the thunder. 'Tis Orla, the brown chief of Oithona. He was unmatched in war. Peace to thy soul, Orla! thy fame will not perish. Nor thine, Calmar! Lovely wast thou, son of blue-eyed Mora; but not harmless was thy sword. It hangs in thy cave. The ghosts of Lochlin shriek around its steel. Hear thy praise, Calmar! It dwells on the voice of the mighty. Thy name shines in the echoes of Morven. Then thy fair locks, son of Mora. Spread them on the arch of the rainbow; and smile through the tears of the storm."

TO E. N. L. ESQ.

"Nil ego consideror fuscus atque incognitus." —Hoc. I.

DEAR L——, in this sequester'd scene, While all around in slumber lie, The joyous days which ours have been Come rolling fresh on Fancy's eye; Thus if amid the gathering storm, While clouds the darken'd noon deform, You heaven assumes a varied glow, I hail the sky's celestial bow, Which spreads the sign of future peace, And bids the war of tempest cease.

*1 four lines of this edition has completely overthrown every hope but Marples'son's Ossian might prove the insulation of a series of poems once In this edition, while the language is discovered, the merits of the work remain undisputed, though not without faults—particularly, in some parts, purple and bombastic dictum. The present edition is undertaken as an attempt, however ill-starred which evinces an attachment to their favorite author.

*J First published in Hours of Idleness.
Ah! though the present brings but pain,
I think those days may come again;
Or if, in melancholy mood,
Some lurking envious fear intrude,
To check my bosom's fondest thought,
And interrupt the golden dream,
I press the fane with malice fraught;
And still indulge my wonted theme.

Although we ne'er again can trace
In Granta's vale, the pedant's lore,
Nor through the groves of Ida chase
Our raptured visions as before,
Though Youth has flown on rosy pinion,
And Manhood claims his stern dominion;
Age will not every hope destroy,
But yield some hours of sober joy.

Yes, I will hope that Time's broad wing
Will shed around some dews of Spring;
But if his scythe must sweep the flowers
Which bloom among the fairy bowers,
Where smiling Youth delights to dwell,
And hearts with early-rapture swell;
If frowning Age, with cold control,
Confines the current of the soul,
Congeals the tear of Pity's eye,
Or checks the sympathetic sigh,
Or hears unmoved Misfortune's groan,
And bids me feel for self alone;
Oh! may my bosom never learn
To soothe its wonted needless flow;
Still, still despise the censor stern,
But ne'er forget another's woe.
Yes, as you knew me in the days
O'er which remembrance yet delays,
Still may I rove, untutor'd, wild,
And even in age at heart a child.

Though now on airy visions borne,
To you my soul is still the same:
Oft has it been my fate to mourn,
And all my former joys are tame.
But, hence! ye hours of sable hue!
Your frowns are gone, my sorrows o'er;
By every bliss my childhood knew,
I'll think upon your shade no more.
Thus, when the whirlwind's rage is past,
And caves their sullen roar enclose,
We heed no more the wintry blast,
When lull'd by zephyr to repose.
Full often has my infant Muse
Attuned to love her languid lyre;
But now, without a theme to choose,
The strains in stolen sighs expire.
My youthful nymphs, alas! are flown;
E—— is a wife, and C—— a mother,
And Carolina sighs alone,
And Mary's given to another;
And Cora's eye, which rolled on me,
Can now no more my love recall;
In truth, dear L——, 'twas time to flee;
For Cora's eye will shine no more.
And though the sun, with genial rays,
His beams all like to all displays,
And every lady's eye a sun,
These last should be confined to one.
The soul's meridian don't become her
Whose sun displays a general summer!
Thus faint is every former flame,
And passion's self is now a name.
As, when the ebbing flames are low,
The aid which once improved their light,
And bade them burn with fiercer glow,
Now quenches all their sparks in night.
Thus has it been with passion's fires,
As many a boy and girl remembers,
With all the force of love expires,
Extinguish'd with the dying embers.
But now, dear L——, 'tis midnight's hush,
And clouds obscure the watery moon,
Whose beauties I shall not rehearse,
Described in every stripling's verse;
For why should I the path go o'er,
Which every bard has trod before?
Yet ere you silver lamp of night
Has thrice perform'd her stated round
Has thrice retraced her path of light,
And chased away the gloom profound,
I trust that we, my gentle friend,
Shall see her rolling orbit wend
Above the dear-loved peaceful seat
Which once contain'd our youth's retreat;
And then with those our childhood knew,
We'll mingle with the festive crew;
While many a tale of former day
Shall wing the laughing hours away,
And all the flow of souls shall pour
The sacred intellectual shower,
Nor cease till Luna's waning horn
Scare glimmers through the mist of morn.

TO——.

Oh! had my fate been join'd with thine,
As once this pledge appear'd a token,
These follies had not then been mine,
For then my peace had not been broken.

To thee these early faults I owe,
To thee, the wise and old reproving:
They know my sins, but do not know
'Twas thine to break the bonds of loving

For once my soul, like thine, was pure,
And all its rising fires could smother;
But now thy vows no more endure,
Bestow'd by thee upon another.

Perhaps his peace I could destroy,
And spoil the blisses that await him;
Yet let my rival smile in joy,
For thy dear sake I cannot hate him.

Ah! since thy angel form is gone,
My heart no more can rest with any,
But what is sought in thee alone,
Attempts, alas! to find in many.

Then fare thee well, deceitful maid,
'Twere vain and fruitless to regret thee;
Nor Hope, nor Memory, yield their aid,
But Pride may teach me to forget thee.
Yet all this giddy waste of years,
This tiresome round of palling pleasures;
These varied loves, these soul's fears, [here;
These thoughtless strains to Passion's meas-

It thou wert mine, had all been hush'd:
This cheek, now pale from early riot,
With Passion's hectic n'ere had flush'd,
But bloom'd in calm domestic quiet.

Yes, once this rural scene was sweet,
For nature seem'd to smile before thee,
And once my breast ahar'd deceit,
For then it beat but to adore thee.

But now I seek for other joys;
To think would drive my soul to madness;
In thoughtless thongs and empty noise
I conquer half my bosom's sadness.

Yet, even in these a thought will steal,
In spite of every vain endeavor;
And fiends might pity what I feel,
To know that thou art lost for ever.

STANZAS.*

I would I were a careless child,
Still dwelling in my Highland cave,
Or roaming through the dusky wild,
Or bounding o'er the dark-blue wave;
The cumbrous pomp of Saxon* pride
Accords not with the freeborn soul,
Which loves the mountain's craggy side,
And seeks the rocks where billows roll.

Fortune! take back these cultured lands,
Take back this name of splendid sound,
I hate the touch of servile hands,
I hate the slaves that cringe around.
Place me among the rocks I love,
Which sound to Ocean's wildest roar;
I ask but this—anew to rove
Through scenes my youth hath known before.

Few are my years, and yet I feel
The world was ne'er design'd for me:
Ah! why do dark'ning shades conceal
The hour when man must cease to be?
Once I beheld a splendid dream,
A visionary scene of bliss:
Truth!—wherefore did thy hated beam
Awake me to a world like this?

I loved—but those I loved are gone;
Had friends—my early friends are fled:
How cheerless feels the heart alone,
When all its former hopes are dead?
Though gay companions o'er the bowl
Dispel awhile the sense of ill;
Though pleasure stirs the maddening soul,
The heart—the heart is lonely still.

How dull! to hear the voice of those Whom rank or chance, whom wealth or power,

Have made, though neither friends not foes,
Associates of the festive hour.
Give me again a faithful few,
In years and feelings still the same,
And I will fly the midnight crew,
Where boist'rous joy is but a name.

And woman! lovely woman, thou,
My hope, my comforter, my all!
How cold must be my bosom now,
When e'en thy smiles begin to pall.
Without a sigh would I resign
This busy scene of splendif wo,
To make that calm contentment mine,
Which virtue knows, or seems to know.

Fain would I fly the haunts of men—
I seek to shun, not hate mankind;
My breast requires the sullen glen,
Whose gloom may suit a darken'd mind.
Oh! that to me the wings were given
Which bear the turtle to her nest!
Then would I cleave the vault of heaven,
To flee away, and be at rest.*

WRITTEN BENEATH AN ELM IN THE CHURCHYARD
OF HARROW ON THE HILL, SEPTEMBER 2, 1807.

Spot of my youth! whose hoary branches sigh,
Swept by the breeze that fans thy cloudless sky;
Where now alone I muse, who oft have trod,
With those I loved, thy soft and verdant sod;
With those who, scattered far, perchance deplore,
Like me, the happy scenes they knew before:
Oh! as I trace again thy winding hill,
Mine eyes admire, my heart adores thee still,
Then drooping Elm! beneath whose bow'ls I lay,
And frequent mused the twilight hours away;
Where, as they once were wont, my limbs recline,
But, ah! without the thoughts which then were mine.
How do thy branches, moaning to the blast,
Invite the bosom to recall the past,
And seem to whisper, as they gently swell,
"Take, while thou canst, a lingering, last farewell!"

When fate shall chill, at length, this fever'd breast,
And calm its cares and passions into rest.
Oft have I thought 'twould soothe my dying hour,
If aught may soothe when life resigns her power,
To know some hollower grave, some narrow cell,
Would hide my bosom where it loved to dwell:
With this fond dream methinks 'twere sweet to die—
And here it linger'd, here my heart might lie.
Here might I sleep where all my hopes arise,
Scene of my youth, and couch of my repose;
For ever stretch'd beneath this manly shade,
Press'd by the turf where once my childhood play'd,
Wreapt by the soil that veils the spot I loved.
Mix'd with the earth o'er which my footsteps moved;
Blest by the tongues that charm'd my youthful ear,
Mourn'd by the few my soul acknowledged here;
Deplored by those, in early days allied,
And unremember'd by the world beside.

CRITIQUE,

EXTRACTED FROM THE EDINBURGH REVIEW, FOR JANUARY 1808

The poesy of this young lord belongs to the class which neither gods nor men are said to permit. Indeed, we do not recollect to have seen a quantity of verse with so few deviations in either direction from that exact standard. His effusions are spread over a dead flat, and can no more get above or below the level, than if they were so much stagnant water. As an extenuation of this offence, the noble author is peculiarly forward in pleading minority. We have it in the titlepage, and on the very back of the volume; it follows his name like a favorite part of his style. Much stress is laid upon it in the preface; and the poems are connected with this general statement of his case, by particular dates, substantiating the age at which each was written. Now, the law upon the point of minority we hold to be perfectly clear. It is a plea available only to the defendant; no plaintiff can offer it as a supplementary ground of action. Thus, if any suit could be brought against Lord Byron, for the purpose of compelling him to put into court a certain quantity of poetry, and if judgment were given against him, it is highly probable that an exception would be taken, were he to deliver for poetry the contents of this volume. To this he might plead minority; but, as he now makes voluntary tender of the article, he hath no right to sue, on that ground, for the price in good current praise, should the goods be unmarketable. This is our view of the law on the point, and, we dare to say, so will it be ruled. Perhaps, however, in reality, all that he tells us about his youth is rather with a view to increase our wonder than to soften our censures. He possibly means to say, “See how a minor can write! This poem was actually composed by a young man of eighteen, and this by one of only sixteen!”—But, alas! we all remember the poetry of Cowley at ten, and Pope at twelve; and so far from hearing, with any degree of surprise, that very poor verses were written by a youth from his leaving school to his leaving college, inclusive, we really believe this to be the most common of all occurrences; that it happens in the life of nine men in ten who are educated in England; and that the tenth man writes better verse than Lord Byron.

His other plea of privilege our author rather brings forward in order to waive it. He certainly, however, does allude frequently to his famous ancestors—sometimes in poetry, sometimes in notes; and while giving up his claim on the score of rank, he takes care to remember us of Dr. Johnson’s saying, that when a nobleman appears as an author, his merit should be handsomely acknowledged. In truth, it is this consideration only that induces us to give Lord Byron’s poems a place in our review, beside our desire to counsel him, that he do forth with abandon poetry, and turn his talents, which are considerable, and his opportunities, which are great, to better account.

With this view, we must beg leave seriously to assure him, that the mere rhyming of the final syllable, even when accompanied by the presence of a certain number of feet,—nay, although (which does not always happen) those feet should scan regularly, and have been all counted accurately upon the fingers,—is not the whole art of poetry. We would entreat him to believe, that a certain portion of liveliness, somewhat of fancy, is necessary to constitute a poem, and that a poem in the present day, to be read, must contain as least one thought, either in a little degree different from the ideas of former writers, or differently expressed. We put it to his candor, whether there is any thing so deserving the name of poetry in verses like the following, written in 1806; and whether, if a yoist of eighteen could say any thing so uninteresting to his ancestors, a youth of nineteen should publish it

Shades of heroes, farewell! your heroes, art, departing
From the rest of his ancestors, his yea, his nay,
Abroad or at home, your remembrance lingering,
Now courage, he’ll think upon glory and you.

Though a tear dim his eye at this and separation,
To nature, not fear, that exists his regret;
But distant he goes, with the same emulation;
The fame of his father’s he never can forget.

That fame, and that memory, still will he cherish,
He vows that he never will disgrace your renown;
Like you will he live, or like you will be prou’d;
When done’t, may he mingle his dust with your own.

Now we positively do assert, that there is nothing better than these stanzas in the whole compass of the noble minor’s volume.

Lord Byron should also have a care of attempting what the greatest poets have done before him, for comparisons (as he must have had occasion to see at his writing-master’s) are odious.—Gray’s Ode on Eton College should really have kept out the ten hobbling stanzas “On a Distant View of the Village and School of Harrow.”
In like manner, the exquisite lines of Mr. Rogers, "On a Tear," might have warned the noble author of those premises, and spared us a whole dozen such stanzas as the following:

"What Chastity's glow,
To us mortals below,
Shows the soul from lustfully clear;
Compassion will melt
Where this virtue is felt,
And its dew is diffused in a Tear.
"The man doth not to read
With the blast of the gale,
Through hollows Atlantic to sound,
As he bends o'er the wave,
Which may soon be his grave,
The green spangles brighten with a Tear."

And so of instances in which former poets had failed. Thus, we do not think Lord Byron was made for translating, during his nonage, "Adrian's Address to his Soul," when Pope succeeded so indifferently in the attempt. If our readers, however, are of another opinion, they may look at it.

"Ah! gentle, free-bird, waving sprite,
Proud and saunterer of this day!
To what unknown region borne?
Wilt thou now wing thy distant flight?
No more with wonted honor fly,
But padd'll, chere'llis, and foreform."

However, be this as it may, we fear his translations and imitations are great favorites with Lord Byron. We have them of all kinds, from Anacreon to Ossian; and, viewing them as school exercises, they may pass. Only, why print them after they have had their day and served their turn? And why call the thing in p. 79* a translation, where two words (διόδημα λεγειν) of the original are expanded into four lines, and the other thing in p. 81,† where μεσοφωνία ποιτοι δωρείς is rendered by means of six hobbling verses? As to his Ossianic poetry, we are not very good judges, being, in truth, so moderately skilled in the species of composition, that we should, in all probability, be criticizing some bit of the genuine Macpherson itself, were we to express our opinion of Lord Byron's rhapsodies. If, then, the following beginning of a "Song of Bards" is by his his lordship, we venture to object to it, as far as we can comprehend it. "What form rises on the roar of clouds, whose dark ghost gleams on the red stream of tempests? His voice rolls on the thunder; 'tis Orila, the brown chief of Oithona. He was," &c. After detaining this "brown chief" some time, the bards conclude by giving him their advice to "raise his fair locks;" then to "spread them on the arch of the rainbow;" and "to smile through the tears of the storm." Of this kind of thing there are no less than nine pages; and we can so far venture an opinion in their favor, that they look very like Macpherson; and we are positive they are pretty nearly as stupid and tiresome.

It is a sort of privilege of poets to be egotists; but they should "use it as not abusing it;" and particularly one who piques himself (though indeed at the ripe age of nineteen) of being "an infant bard,"—"The artless Helicon I boast is youth ;—should either not know, or should seem not to know, so much about his own ancestry. Besides a poem above cited, on the family seat of the Byrons, we have another of eleven pages, on the self-same subject, introduced with an apology, "he certainly had no intention of inserting it," but really "the particular request of some friends," &c. &c. It concludes with five stanzas on himself, "the last and youngest of a noble line." There is a good deal also about his maternal ancestors, in a poem on Lachin y Gair, a mountain where he spent part of his youth, and might have learned that piroch is not a bagpipe, any more than duct means a fiddle.

As the author has dedicated so large a part of his volume to immortalize his employments at school and at college, we cannot possibly dismiss it without presenting the reader with a specimen of these ingenious effusions. In an ode with a Greek motto, called Granta, we have the following magnificent stanzas:

"There, in apartments small and damp,
The candidate for college prizes
Sits poring by the midnight lamp,
Goes late to bed, yet outstays them.
"Who reads false quantities in sole,
Or passes o'er the deep triangle,
Depriends of many a wholesome meal,
In barbarous Latins doomed to wrangle!
"Renouncing every pleasing page,
From authors of historic use,
Preferring to the better'd sage
The squibs of the lyceumian.
"Still harmless are these compositions,
That hast none but the hapless student,
Compared with other recreations,
Which bring together the important."

We are sorry to hear so bad an account of the college psalmody as is contained in the following Attic stanzas:

"Our choir would hardly be exceeded
Even as a band of raw beginners;
All mercy now must be refused
To such a set of crossing sinners.
"If David, when his folks were ended,
Had heard these blockheads sing before him,
To us his psalms had never descended:
In far better mood he would have said 'em!"

But whatever judgment may be passed on the poems of this noble minor, it seems we must take them as we find them, and be content; for they are the last we shall ever have from him. He is, at best, he says, but an intruder into the groves of Parnassus; he never lived in a garret, like thoroughbred poets; and "though he once roved a careless mountainier in the Highlands of Scotland," he has not of late enjoyed this advantage. Moreover, he expects no profit from his publication; and, whether it succeeds or not, "it is highly improbable, from his situation and pursuits hereafter," that he should again descend to become an author. Therefore, let us take what we get, and be thankful. What right have we poor devils to be nice? We are well off to have got so much from a man of this lord's station, who does not live in a garret, but has the away of Newstead Abbey. Again, we say, let us be thankful; and, with honest Sancho, bid God bless the giver, nor look the gift horse in the mouth.

ENGLISH BARDS

AND

SCOTCH REVIEWERS; *

A SATIRE.

* "I had rather be a kitten, and cry new!
    Than one of these same nasty bull-dog-greaves."
    SHAKESPEARE.

"Both absurdities we have; and yet 'tis true,
    There are as mad, abandon'd critics too."
    POPE.

A FIFTH edition of the "English Bards and Scotch Reviewers," in which Lord Byron introduced several alterations and corrections, was prepared in 1812, but was, at his desire, destroyed on the eve of publication. One copy of this edition alone escaped, from which the satire has been printed in the present volume. The Author re-perused the poem in the latter part of the summer in 1816, after his final departure from England. He at that time also corrected the text in several places, and added a few notes and observations in the margin, which the reader will find inserted. On the blank leaf preceding the title-page of the copy from which he read, Lord Byron has written: "The binding of this volume is considerably too valuable for the contents; and nothing but the consideration of its being the property of another prevents me from consigning this miserable record of misplaced anger and indiscriminate acrimony to the flames."

PREFACE.†

All my friends, learned and unlearned, have urged me not to publish this satire with my name. If I were to be "turned from the career of my humor by quibbles quick, and paper bullets of the brain," I should have complied with their counsel. But I am not to be terrified by abuse, or bullied by reviewers, with or without arms. I can safely say that I have attacked none personally who did not commence on the offensive. An author's works are public property; he who purchases may judge, and publish his opinion if he pleases; and the authors I have endeavored to commemorate may do by me as I have done by them: I dare say they will succeed better in condemning my scribblings than in mending their own. But my object is not to prove that I can write well, but, if possible, to make others write better.

As the poem has met with far more success than I expected, I have endeavored in this edition to make some additions and alterations, to render it more worthy of public perusal.

In the first edition of this satire, published anonymously, fourteen lines on the subject of Byron's Pope were written by, and inserted at the request of, an ingenious friend of mine, who has now in the press a volume of poetry. In the present edition they are erased, and some of my own substituted in their stead; my only reason for this being that which I conceive would operate with any other person in the same manner, a determination not to publish with my name any production which was not entirely and exclusively my own composition.

With regard to the real talents of many of the poetical persons whose performances are mentioned or alluded to in the following pages, it is presumed by the author that there can be little difference of opinion in the public at large; though, like other sectaries, each has his separate tabernacle of proselytes, by whom his abilities are overrated, his faults overlooked, and his metrical canons received without scruple and without consideration. But the unquestionable possession of considerable genius by several of the writers here censured renders their mental prostitution more to be regretted. Imbecility may be pitied, or, at worst, laughed at and forgotten; perverted powers demand the most decided reprehension. No one can wish more than the author: that some known and able writer had undertaken their exposure; but Mr. Gifford has devoted himself to Massinger, and, in the absence of the regular physician, a country practitioner may, in cases of absolute necessity, be allowed to prescribe his nostrum to prevent the extension of so deplorable an epidemic, provided there be no quackery in his treatment of the malady. A caustic is here offered, as it is to be feared nothing short of actual cautery can recover the numerous patients afflicted with the present prevalent and distressing rabies for rhyming.—As to the Edinburgh Reviewer—it would indeed require an Hercules to crush the Hydra; but if the author succeeds in merely "bruising one of the heads of the serpent," though his own hand should suffer in the encounter, he will be amply satisfied.

* In the original manuscript, the title was "THE BRITISH BARDS & SATIRE."
† This preface was written for the second edition, and printed with it. The noble author had left this country previous to the publication of that edition, and is not yet returned.—Note to the Fourth edition, 1811.

STILL must I hear?—shall hoarse Fitzgerald bawl!
His cracking couplets in a tavern hall,
And I not sing, lest, haply, Scotch reviews
Should dub me scribbler, and denounce my muse?
Prepare for rhyme?—I'll publish, right or wrong:
Fools are my theme, let satire be my song.

Oh! n'ature's noblest gift—my gray goose-quill!
Slave of my thoughts, obedient to my will,
Forn from thy parent bird to form a pen,
That mighty instrument of little men!
The pen foredoomed to aid the mental throes
Of brains that labor, big with verse or prose,
Though nymphs forsake, and critics may deride,
The lover's solace, and the author's pride.

What wits! what poets doth thou daily raise!
How frequent is thy use, how small thy praise!
Condemned at length to be forgotten quite,
With all the pages which 'twere thine to write.
But thou, at least, mine own especial pen!
Once laid aside, but now assumed again,
Our task complete, like Hamet's shall be free;
Though spurn'd by others, yet belov'd by me:
Then let us soar to-day; no common theme,
No eastern vision, no distemper'd dream.

---My Jove! Mr. Fitzgerald, too rough for me?
I hear the woe of youth with piteous awe.

IMITATION.

"Sperm ego author nonnam lyrics unparvum fereant,
Vexation timeis sed Theolidae cotit.

Mr. Fitzgerald, innocently tormented by Collett the "Small Beer Poet," inflicts his annual tribute of verse on the "Literary Panel;" not content with being a private person, in person, the company have bullied a reasonable quantity of lust, to enable them to sustain the operation.

Old Hamet Bossewell glances exasper to his pen in the last chapter of his Critoine. Oh! that our venomous gruity would follow the example of Old Hamet Bossewell.

"No scatae stetere, no distemper'd dream. —This must have been written in the spirit of prophecy—MS. note by Lord Byron.

"Inspirès—our path though full of thorns, is plain:
Smooth be the verse, and easy be the strain.

When Vice triumphant holds her sov'reign sway,
Obey'd by all who nought beside obey;
When Folly, frequent harbinger of crime,
Bedecks her cap with bells of every clime;
When knaves and fools combined o'er all prevail,
And weigh their justice in a golden scale;
'E'er then the boldest start from public snares.
Afraid of shame, unknown to other fears,
More darkly sin, by satire kept in awe.
And shrink from ridicule, though not from law

Such is the force of wit! but not belong
To me the arrows of satiric song;
The royal vices of our age demand
A keener weapon, and a mightier hand.
Still there are follies, 'en for me to chase,
And yield at least amusement in the race:
Laugh when I laugh, I seek no other fame.
The cry is up, and scribblers are my game.
Speed, Pegasus!—ye strains of great and small.
Ode, epic, elegy, have at you all!
I too can scrawl, and once upon a time
I pour'd along the town a flood of rhyme,
A schoolboy freak, unworthy praise or blame;
I printed—older children do the same.
'Tis pleasant, sure, to see one's name in print;
A book's a book, although there's nothing in't.
Not that a title's sounding charm can save
Or scrawl or scribbler from an equal grave:
This Lambe must own,—since his patron's name
Pail'd to preserve the spurious face from shame.
No matter, George continues still to write,
Though now the name is veiled from public sight.
Moved by the great example, I pursue
The self-same road, but make my own review:
Not seek great Jeffrey's, yet, like him, will be Self-constituted judge of poesy.

A man must serve his time to ev'ry trade
Save censure—critics all are ready made.
Take hackney'd jokes from Miller, got by rote,
With just enough of learning to misquote;
A mind and skill would to find or forge a fault;
A turn for punning, call it Attic salt;
To Jeffrey go, be silent and discreet,
His pay is just ten sterling pounds per sheet;
Fears not to lie, 'twill seem a sharper hit;
Shrink not from blasphemy, 'twill pass for wit;
Care not for feeling—pass your proper jest,
And stand a critic, hated yet caress'd.

And shall we own such judgment? no—amend.
Seek roses in December—ice in June;
Hope constancy in wind, or corn in chaff;
Believe a woman or an epitaph,
Or any other thing that's false, before
You trust in critics, who themselves a e r u e,
Or yield one single thought to be mi'r'd.
By Jeffrey's heart or Lambe's Boceian head.

---This Lambe must own. —He's a very good fellow, a f except his mother and sisters, the rest of the set, to my mind—MS. note by Lord Byron.

"The ingenious youth is mentioned more particularly, with his position, in another place.

5 By Jeffrey's heart or Lambe's Boceian head. —This was not but.
Neither the heart nor the head of these gentlemen are as what they are...
To these young tyrants, by themselves misplaced,
Combined usurpers on the throne of taste;
To those, when authors bend in humble awe,
And hail their voice as truth, their word as law—
While these are censors, 'twould be sin to spare;
While such are critics, why should I forbear?
But yet, so near all modern worthies run,
'Tis doubtful whom to seek, or whom to shun;
Nor know we when to spare, or where to strike,
Our bars and censors are so much alike.

†Then should you ask me, why I venture o'er
That path which Pope and Gifford trod before;
If not yet sicken'd, you can still proceed:
Go on; my rhyme will tell you as you read.
But hold! † exclaims a friend,—here's some neglect:
This—that—and 't other line seem incorrect.
What then? the self-same blunder Pope has got,
And careless Dryden—oh—but Fye has not,— Indeed!—'tis granted, faith!—but what care I?
Better to err with Pope, than shine with Fye.

Time was, ere yet in these degenerate days,
Ignoble themes obtain'd mistaken praise,
When sense and wit with poetry allied.
No fabled graces, flourish'd side by side;
From the same fount their inspiration drew,
And, rear'd by taste, bloom'd fairer as they grew.
Then, in this happy isle, a Pope's pure strain
Sought the rapt soul to charm, nor sought in vain;
A polish'd nation's praise aspired to claim,
And raised the people's, as the poet's fame.
Like him great Dryden pour'd the tide of song,
In stream less smooth, indeed, yet doubly strong.
Then Congreve's scenes could cheer, or Otway's melt—
For nature then an English audience felt.
But why these names, or greater still, retrace,
When all to feebler bards resign their place?
Yet to such times our lingering looks are cast,
When taste and reason with those times are past.
Now look around, and turn each tripping page,
Survey the precious works that please the age;
This truth at least let nature's self allow,
No dearth of bards can be complain'd of now:
The loaded press beneath her labor groans,
And printers' devils shake their weary bones;
While Sortheny's epics cram the creaking shelves,
And Little's lyrics shine in hot-presse'd twelves.

†Thus saith the preacher: † "Nought beneath the sun;
Is new," yet still from change to change we run:
What varied wonders tempt us as they pass?
The cow-pox, tractors, galvanism, and gas,

BYRON'S WORKS.

And think'st thou, Scott! by vain conceit per chance,
On public taste to fey ist thy stale romance,
Though Murray with his Miller may combine
To yield thy muse just half-a-crown per line?
No! when the sons of song descend to trade,
Their bays are, their former laurels fade.
Let such forgo the poet's sacred name,
Who rack their brains for hire, not for fame:
Still for stern Mammon may they toil in vain,
And sadly gaze on gold they cannot gain!
Such be their heed, such still the just reward
Of prostituted muse and hireling bard!
For this we spurn Apollo's venal son,
And bid a long "good night to Marmion."*

These are the themes that claim our plundrous now;
These are the bards to whom the muse must bow;
While Milton, Dryden, Pope, alike forgot,
Resign their hallow'd bays to Walter Scott.

The time has been, when yet the muse was young,
When Homer swept the lyre, and Maro sung,
An epic scarce ten centuries could claim,
While awe-struck nations hail'd the magic name!
The work of each immortal bard appears.
The single wonder of a thousand years.†
Empires have mouldered from the face of earth,
Tongues have expired with those who gave them birth.
Without the glory such a strain can give,
As even in ruin bids the language live.
Not so with us, though minor bards content,
On one great work a life of labor spent:
With eagle pinions soaring to the skies,
Behold the bard-magnet Southey rise!
To him let Camps, Milton, Tasso yield,
Whose annual strains, like armies, take the field.
First in the ranks see Joan of Arc advance,
The scourge of England and the boast of France!
Though burnt by wicked Bedford for a witch,
Behold her statue placed in glory's niche;
Her fetters burst, and just released from prison,
A virgin phrenia from her ashes risen.
Next see tremendous Thalaba come on,‡ Arabia's monstrous, wild and wondrous son;
Domdaniel's dread destroyer, who o'ертrew
More mad magicians than the world e'er knew.
Immortal hero! all thy foes o'ercome,
For ever reign—the rival of Tom Thumb!
Since startled metre fled before thy face,
Well worth thou doom'd the last of all thy race!
Well might triumphant genius bear thee hence,
Illustrious conqueror of common sense!
Now, last and greatest Madoc spreads his sails,
Cacique in Mexico and prince in Wales:
Tells us strange tales, as other travellers do,
More old than Mandeville's and not so true.

* "Good night to Marmion" — the pathetic and prophetic exclamation of Sydney Elmez, Episcopal, on the death of his brother, Marmion.
† As the Odyssey is so closely connected with the story of the Iliad, they may almost be classed as one great historical poem. In alluding to Milton and Tasso, we consider the "Paradise Lost," and "G iammon zum Liberno," as their standard efforts, since either the "Iliadem Compendium" of the Italian, or the "Paradise Regained" of the English, obtained a proportionate celebrity to their former poems. Quirky: Which of Mr. Southey's will survive?
‡ Thalaba, Mr. Brougham's second poem, is written in open defiance of precedent and poetry. Mr. B. wished to produce something novel, and succeeded in a miserable manner. The fact of Arc was marvellously enough, but Thalaba was one of those poems "which, in the words of Press, "will be read when Homer and Virgil" are forgotten, but "not till then."
The first page of the document contains a mixture of English and Latin text, as well as some handwritten notes. The text appears to be a review or evaluation of some work, possibly a book or a play, given the use of terms like "reviewer," "theatrical," and "Audare". The language is dense and complex, with references to various themes and characters, suggesting it might be a literary review or critical piece.

The text includes references to "The Plays of Mr. Shakespeare," "The Barbers of Venice," "As You Like It," and "Hamlet," among others. It also mentions "Barbauld," "Mr. Pope," and "Mr. Johnson." The reviewer seems to be discussing the merits of the works, possibly critiquing them or comparing them to other works.

The text is written in a formal and scholarly style, with references to literary figures and historical events. It appears to be a critical piece, possibly from a literary journal or a collection of reviews.

Overall, the document is a dense and intricate piece of writing, likely intended for an audience familiar with the works being reviewed and the literary conventions of the time.
BYRON'S WORKS.

Where all discoveries jumbled from the flood
Since first the leaky ark reposed in mud,
By more or less, are sung in every book,
From Captain Noah down to Captain Cook.
Nor this alone; but, passing on the road,
The bard sighs forth a gentle episode; *
And gravely tells—attend, each beantous miss!—
When first Madeira trembled to a kiss.
Bowles! in thy memory let this precept dwell,
Stick to thy sonnets, man! at least they sell.†
But to be some tow-born whim, or larger tribe,
Prompt thy crude brain, and clasp thee for a scriber.
If chance some bard, though once by dunces fear'd,
Now, prone in dust, can only be revered;
If Pope whose fame and genius from the first
Have foil'd the best of critics, needs the worst,
To do thou essay; each fault, each failing scan;
The first of poets was, alas! but man.
Rake from each ancient dunghill ev'ry pearl,
Consult Lord Fanny, and confide in Curl;‡
Let all the scandals of a former age
Perch on thy pen, and flutter o'er thy page;
Affect a candor which thou canst not feel,
Clothe envy in the garb of honest zeal;
Write, as if St. John's soul could still inspire,
And do for hate what Mallet did for hire.
Oh! hadst thou lived in that congenial time,
To rave with Dennis, and with Ralph to rhyme;¶
Throng'd with the rest around his living head,
Not raised thy hoof against the lion dead;
A meet reward would crown'd thy glorious gains,
And link'd thee to the Dunciad for thy pains.

† Another epic! Who infects again
More books of blank upon the sons of men?

* The episode above alluded to is the story of "Robert a Machin" and "Anne d'Arfret," a pair of constant lovers, who performed the kiss above mentioned, that startled the vapours of Medici.
† "Stick to thy sonnets, man!—at least they sell:
Or take the only path that open lies
For modern worthies who would hope to rise;
Fix on some well-known name, and, bit by bit,
Pore out the merits of his worth and wit;
On each alike employ the critic's whip,
And when a comment fails, prefix a lieu;
Hit certain failings, faults before unknown,
As Heaven forgives lines, and adds your own;
Let no objection, let no maidsfoot's scope,
And print, if hurriedly deformed, his shape:
Thus shall the world, quite undeserved at last,
Clear to their present wins, and quit their past:
Birds once revered no more with favor view,
But give the modern sonnetters their due:
Thus with the dead may living merit cope,
Thus Bowles may triumph o'er the shade of Pope."

‡ The first edition, the observations on Bowles ended with these lines, which were written by a friend of Lord Byron, and omitted when the entire work was published under the author's name. The following fifty-five verses, containing the conclusion of the passage on Bowles, and the notice of Cottle and Macready, were then printed for the first time.

¶ Curll is one of the heroes of the Dunciad, and was a bookseller. Lord Fanny is the poetical name of Lord Harvey, author of "Lines to the Inventor of the Horse."

†† Lord Bolingbroke hired Mallet to advance Pope after his decease, because the poet had received some copies of a work by Lord Bolingbroke, (the "Political" of which he spoliéed, his malignant genius, and ordered to be burnt."

††† The critic, and Ralph the rhymester.
"Silence, ye wolves! while Hallo to Cynthia howle, Making nightbies Silence, answer him, ye owle!"

 And link'd thee to the Dunciad for thy pains.—Too savage all this on Bowles.—MS. note by Lord Byron. 1816.

†††† See Bowles's 1st edition of Pope's works, for which he received three thousand pounds. The "Lyrical Sonnets" to each other is so profuse of repetitions of another ditty to elevate his own.

Hobhouse.

Boetian Cottle, rich Bristow's box,
Imports old stories from the Cambrian coast
And sends his goods to market—all alive!
Lines forty thousand, cantos twenty-five!
Fresh fish from Helicon! * who'll buy! who'll buy!
The precious bargain's cheap—in faith not I.
† Your turtle-feeder's verse must needs be flat,
Though Bristol bloat him with the verdant fat;
If Commerce fills the purse, she clogs the brain
And Amos Cottle strikes the lyre in vain.
In him an author's luckless lot beheld,
To make Condor's dream, to make the books which once he sold
Oh, Amos Cottle!—Phaebus! what a name
To fill the speaking trumpet of future fame!
Oh, Amos Cottle! for a moment think
What meagre profits spring from pen and ink.
When thus devoted to poetical dreams,
Who will peruse thy pampered reams?
Oh pen perverted! paper misappliced!
Had Cottle § still adorn'd the counter's side,
Bent o'er the desk, or, born to useful toils,
Been taught to make the paper which he soils,
Plough'd, delved, or plied the ear with lusty limb,
He had not sung of Wales, nor I of him.

As Siéyès against the infernal steep
Rolls the huge rock whose motions ne'er may sleep
So up thy hill, ambrosial Richmond, heaves
Dull Maurice § all his granite weight of leaves:
Smooth solid monuments of mental pain!
The petrifications of a plodding brain, again
That, ere they reach the top, fall lumbering back.

With broken lyre, and check serenely pale
Lo! said Alcimus wanders down the vale;
Though fair they rose, and might have bloom'd at last,
His hopes have perish'd by the northern blast:
Nipp'd in the bud by Caledonian gailes,
His blossoms wither as the blast prevails!
O'er his lost works let classic Sheffield weep!
May no rude hand disturb their early sleep!

Yet say! why should the bard at once resign
His claim to favor from the sacred nine?
For ever started by the mangled hew
Of northern wolves, that still in darkness prow;
A coward brood, which mangle as they prey,
By hellish instinct, all that cross their way;

* Fresh fish from Helicon! — "Helicon" is a mountain, and not a fishing-pond. It should have been "Hippocrene."—MS. note by Lord Byron, 1816.
† Your turtle-feeder's verse, &c.—This couplet was altered in the fifth edition. It originally stood:

"Too much o'er bowls of sack prolonging the night."

Mr. Cottle, Amos, Joseph, I don't know which, but one or both, once sellers of books they did not write, and now writers of books that do not sell, have published a pair of epics.

"Aldred," (poor Alfred I hope has been at him too) "Aldred," and the "Fall of Cambria."

§ He had not sung of Wales, nor I of him.—I saw some letters of this fellow (Joseph Cottle) to an unfortunate poet, whose productions, which the poor woman by no means thought vainly of, he attacked so mostily and bitterly, that I could hardly resist sending him, even were it unjust, which it is not, to the literary (or rather literary) and the theatrical (or rather theatrical) and the dramatic (or rather dramatic) and the musical (or rather musical) draughtsman, and the poet's adjournment.

§§ Poor Montgomery I thought praised by every English reviewer, has been bitterly reviled by every English reviewer, to whom he has expressed himself. He has experienced much or at least as much as many other authors who live.

aged or young, the living or the dead,
No mercy find—these harpies must be fled.
Why do he injured unresisting yield
The calm possession of their native field?
Why 'tame thus before their fangs retreat,
Nor hunt the bloodhounds back to Arthur's Seat?

Health to immortal Jeffrey! once, in name,
England could boast a judge almost the same;
In soul so like, so merciful, yet just,
Some think that Satan has resign'd his trust,
And given the spirit to the world again,
To sentence letters, as he sentenced men.
With hand less mighty, but with heart as black,
With voice as willing to decree the rack;
Bird in the courts betimes, though all that law
As yet hath taught him is to find a flaw;
Sirce well instructed in the patriot school
To rail at party, though a party tool,
Who knows, if chance his patrons should restore
Back to the sway they forfeited before,
His scribbling toils some recompense may meet,
And raise this Daniel to the judgment seat?
Let Jeffrey's shade indulge the pious hope,
And greeting thus, present him with a rope:
"Heer to my virtues! man of equal mind!
Skill'd to condemn as to traduce mankind,
This cord receive, for thee reserved with care,
To wield in judgment, and at length to wear."

Health to great Jeffrey! Heaven preserve his life,
To flourish on the fertile shores of Fife,
And guard it sacred in its future war;
Since authors sometimes seek the field of Mars.
Can none remember, that eventful day;
That ever glorious, almost fatal fray,
When Little's leadless pistol met his eye,
And Bow-street myrmidons stood laughing by?
Oh, day of disasters! on her firm-seat rock,
Dunedin's castle felt a secret shock:
Dark roll'd the sympathetic waves of Forth,
Loud rang'd the startled whirrwind of the north;
Tweed ruffled half his wave to form a tear,
The other half pursued its calm career;
Arthur's steep summit nodded to its base,
The surly Tolbooth scarcely kept her place.
The Tolbooth fell—for marble sometimes can,
On such occasions, feel as much as man—
The Tolbooth fell defrauded of its charms,
If Jeffery died, except within her arms!

Nay last, not least, on that portentous morn,
The sixteenth story, where himself was born,
His patrimonial garret, fell to ground,
And pale Edina shudder'd at the sound:
Strew'd were the streets around with milk-white Reams,
Flow'd were the Canongate with inky streams;
This of his canon seem'd the sable dew,
That of his valor show'd the bloodless hue;
And all with justice deem'd the two combined
The mingled emblems of his mighty mind.
But Caledonia's goddess hover'd o'er
The field, and save him from the wrath of Mor'd,
From either pistol snatch'd the verdant lead,
And straight restored it to her favorite's head:
That head, with greater than magentie pow'r,
Caught it, as Danae caught the golden shower,
And, though the thickening dross will scarce refine,
Augments its ore, and is itself a mine.
"My son," she cried, "ne'er thrust for gone again,
Resign the pistol, and resume the pen;
O'er politics and poesy preside,
Boast of thy country, and Britannia's guide?
For long as Albion's heedless sons submit
Or Scottish taste decides on English wit,
So long shall last thine un molested reign.
Nor any dare to take thy name in vain.
Behold, a chosen band shall aid thy plan,
And own thee chiefest of the critie clan.
First in the oat-fed phalanx shall be seen
The trusty four! Thane, Athienan Aberdeen.†
Herbert shall wield Thor's hammer, and sometimes
In gratitude, thou'lt praise his rugged rhymes
Smug Sydney, to thy bitter page shall seek,
And classic Hallam, so renown'd for Greek;
Scott may perchance his name and influence lend,
And paltry Pilians shall trade his friend;
While gay Thalia's luckless votary, Lambe,
Damn'd like the devil, devil-like will damn;†

Thy Holland's banquets shall each toll repay;

"Instead of money and rings, I was,
The hammer's blows were her lot,
Thus Old's son his hammer gave."
† The Rev. Sydney Smith, the reputed author of Peter Plymley's Lament, and snesty criticisms.
† Mr. Hallam reviewed Payne Knight's "Taste," and was exceedingly severe on some lines versus theirs: it was not discovered that the lines were Platon's all were removed & impossible to cancel the critique, which still stands an everlasting monument of Hallam's ingenuity.
"The said Hallam is licensed because he is falsely accused, seeing that he never diverts at Holland Houses. If this be true, I am sorry—not for having said so, but on his account, as I understand his lordship's fronts are preferable to his compositions."—He did not review Lord Holland's performances, I am chief, because it must have been painful to read, and Intimate to praise it.
I Mr. Hallam will tell me who did review it, the real name shall find a place in the text; provided, nevertheless, the said name of two other cronies musical celebrities, will come into the verse: till then, Hallam must stand for a better.
† Pilians is a tutor at Exton.
 The Rev. Mrs. Lambe reviewed "Beresford's Miscellany," and was accused of a force armed with much applause at the Broyer, Stannary, and damned with great expression at the last theatre, Corrin Gentilum. It was entitled, "The Deed," and in 4 editions before the fifth.
†† Damn'd like the devil, devil-like will damn.
The line stood, in 4 editions before the fifth,
"As he himself " wasn't damn'd shall try to damn."
Hallam's ingenuity.—The verse ended here in the first edition.
While grateful Britain yields the praise she owes
To Holland's heralds and to learning's foes.
Yet mark one caution, ere thy next Review
Spread its light wings of saffron and of blue,
Beware lest blundering Brougham destroy the sale,
Turn beef to bannocks, cauliflower to kail.
Thus having said, the kilted goddess ksat
Her sson, and vanished in a Scottish mist.†

Then prosper, Jeffrey!† pertest of the train
'Thom Scotland pampers with her fiery gain!
'Whate'ver blessing waits a genius Scot,
In double portion swells thy glorious lot;
For these Edina calls her evening sweets,
And showers their odors on thy candid sheaths,
Whose hue and fragrance to thy work adhere—
This scents its pages, and that gilds its rear.‡
Lo! blushing Ith, coy nymph, enam'rd grown,
Forsakes the rest, and cleaves to thee alone;
And, too unjust to other Pictish men,
Enjoys thy person, and inspires thy pen!
Illustrious Holland!‡ hard would be his lot,
His hirelings mention'd, and himself forgot!
Holland, with Henry Petty at his back,
The whiper-in and huntsman of the pack.
Blest are the banquet spread at Holland House,
Where Scottie men feed, and critics may carouse!
Long, long beneath that hospitable roof
Shall Grub street dine, while duns are kept aloof.

See honest Hallam lay aside his fork,
And, review his Lordship's work,
And, grateful for the dainties on his plate,
Declare his lordship can at least translate!‡
Dunedin! view thy children with delight,
They write for food—and feed because they write;
And lest, when heated with the unusual grape,
Some glowing thoughts should to the press escape,
And tinge with the female reader's cheek,
My lady skims the cream of each critique;

Breathe o'er the page her purity of soul,
Reforms each error, and refines the whole.‡
Now to the drama turn—oh! motley sight!
What precious scenes the wondering eyes invite!
Puns, and a prince within a barrel pent,†
And Dibdin's nonsense yield complete content.
Though now, thank Heaven! the Rosciomania's o'er,
And full-grown actors are endured once more;
Yet what avail their vain attempts to please,
While British critics suffer scenes like these?
While Reynolds vents his "dammes!" "poohs!" and "zounds!"†
And common-place and common sense confounds!
While Kenny's "World"—ah! where is Kenny's wit?
Tires the sad gallery, lulls the listless pit; §
And Beaumont's pilfer'd Caractach affords
A tragedy complete in all but words? ||
Who but muse* mourn, while these are all the rage,
The degradation of our vanted stage.
Heavens! is all sense of shame and talent gone?
Have we no living bard of merit?—none!
Awake, George Colman! Cumberland, awake!
Ring th' alarum bell! let folly quake!
Oh, Sheridan! if aught can move thy pen,
Let Comedy assume her throne again;
Abjure the mummery of German schools;
Leave new Pizarros to translating fools;
Give, as thy last memorial to the age,
One classic drama, and reform the stage.
Gods! o'er those boards shall Polly rear her head,
While Garrick trod, and Siddons lives to tread?‡
On those shall Farce display buffoon'ry's mask,
And Hook conceal his heroes in a cask?
Shall sapient managers new scenes produce
From Cherry, Skeffington, and Mother Goose,
While Shakespeare, Otway, Massinger, forgot,
On stalls must moulder, or in closets rot?
Lo! with what pomp the daily prints proclaim
The rival candidates for Attic fame!
In grim array though Lewis's spectres rise,
Still Skeffington and Goode divide the prize.
And sure great Skeffington must claim our praise,
For skirrless casts and skeleton of plays
Remov'd alike; whose genius ne'er confines
Her flight to garnish Greenwood's gay designs; **
Nor sleeps with "Sleeping Beauties," but anon
In five facettious acts comes thundering on,††

* Mr. Brougham, in No. XXXV. of the Edinburgh Review, throughout his article concerning Don Pedro de Cevallos, has displayed more politics than policy; many of the worthy burgesses of Edinburgh being so infatuated at the infamous principles it avises, as to have withdrawn their subscription.

† It seems that Mr. Brougham is not a Plt, as I supposed, but a Borderer, and his name is pronounced Broom, from Trent to Tug—the isto be it.

‡ I ought to apologise to the worthy dedites for introducing a new goddess with short petition to their notice; but alas! what was to be done? I could not call Colden's goddess; it being well known there is no such genius to be found from Clockman to Candence; yet without supernatural agency, how was Jeffrey to be saved? The national "kittens" are too unpolished, and the "cronies," and "pipe neighbors" (spoils of a good disposition) re fused to extricate him. A goddess, therefore, has been called for the purpose; and, guess, ought to be the gratitude of Jeffrey, seeing it is the only consent he can ever hold, or is likely to hold, with any thing heavenly.

§ Then prosper, Jeffrey! &c.—This paragraph was introduced in the fifth edition.

¶ See the color of the back binding of the Edinburgh Review.

parochial pronunciation is Brougham, in two syllables."

†† The conclusion of the note was substituted for the above in the second edition.

I knew the late Lord Falkland well. On Sunday night I beheld him presiding at his own table, in all the honest pride of hospitality; on Wednesday morning, at three o'clock, I saw stretched before me all that remained of his honest, good nature, feeling, and society. He was a gentleman and converse officers: his faults were the faults of a statesman—such as Britons will forgive. He died like a brave man in a better cause: for had he fallen in lesser matters on the deck of the figure to which he was just appointed, his last moments would have been held up by his countrymen as an example to succeeding heroes.

And every brother rake will smile to see
That miracle, a moralist in me.
No matter—when some bard in virtuous
Gifford perchance, shall raise the chastening song,
Then sleep my pen for ever! and my voice
Be only heard to hail him, and rejoice;
Rejoice, and yield my feeble praise, though I
May feel the lash that Virtue must apply.

As for the smaller fry, who swarm in shoals
From silly Haifa* up to simple Bowles,
Why should we call them from their dark abode,
In broad St. Giles's or in Tottenham-road?
Or (since some men of fashion nobly dare
To scrawl in verse) from Bond-street or the Square?
If things of ton their harmless lays indite,
Most wisely doomed to shun the public sight,
What harm? In spite of every critical elf,
Sir T. may read his stanzas to himself;
Miles Andrews still his strength in couples try,
And live in prologues, though his dramas die;
Lord too are bards, such things at times befall,
And 'tis some praise in peers to write at all.
Yet, did or taste or reason sway the times,
Ah! who would take their titles for their rhymes?†

So dull in youth, so drivelling in his age,
His scenes alone had dam'd our sinking stage,
But managers for once cried, "Hold, enough!"
Nor drugged their audience with the tragic stuff.
Yet at their judgment let his lordship laugh,
And case his volumes in comenial calf;

*What would be the sentiments of the Persian Amancon, Hafiz, could he

The protestation alluded to in Lord Byron's note, page 393, took place while the action was in press. These lines were erased in consequence, and all these done over, "With you, ye Druids," &c., substituted in their place.
The following additional lines were written, but suppressed before publication:

In these our times, with daily wonders sig-
A lettered peer is like a lettered pig;
Both know their alphabet, but who, from hence,
Lovers that peers or pigs have mainly seen?
Still less is such should wear the grateful loin?
Parnassus was not made for lords and swine.
No muse will cheer, with renovating smile,
The paretic piling of Carlisia.

This couplet stood in the first edition,
"Nor e'en a hatman's muse will deign to smile,
On minor Byron, or master Carlisia.

Opposed these lines on Lord Carlisia, Lord Byron has written, in the note which he prefixed in 1816, "Wrong also—protestation was not sufficient to justify the suspicion."
‡The Earl of Carlisia has lately published an eighteen-penny pamphlet on the state of the stage, and offers his plan of building a new theatre. It is to be hoped his lordship will be permitted to bring forward any thing for the stage, except his own tragedie.

Yes! doff that covering, where morocco shins,
And hang a calf-skin on those recrnet lines.

With you, ye Druids! rich in native lead,
Who daily scribble for your daily bread;
With you I war not: Gifford's heavy hand
Has crush'd, without remorse, your numerous bard
On "all the talents" vent your venal spleen;
Want is your plea, let pity be your screen.
Let monodies on Fox regale your crew,
And Melville's Mantle prove a blanket too!
One common Lethe waits each hapless bard,
And, peace be with you! 'tis your best reward.
Such damning fame as Duncieads only give
Could bid your lines beyond a morning live;
But now at once your fleeting labors close,
With names of greater note in blent repose.

eral to distressed revenue; a kind of genteel accommodation to those who wish to be delivered of rhyme, but do not know how to bring forth.
Then why no more? if Phæbus smile on you, Bloomfield! why not on brother Nathan too?

Him too the mania, not the muse has seized;
Not inspiration, but a rainy season;
And now no bard can seek his last abode,
No common be enclosed, without an ode.
Oh! since increased refinement deigns to smile
On Britain's sons, and bless our genial isle,
Let poesy go forth, pervade the whole,
Alas the rustic, and mechanic soul!
Ye tuneful cobblers! still your notes prolong,
Compose at once a slipper and a song;
So shal, the fair your handiwork peruse;
Your sons' sure shall please,—perhaps your shoes.

May Moorland's weavers boast Fandick skill,
And tailors' lays be longer than their bill!
While punctual beaux reward the grateful notes,
And pay for poems,—when they pay for coats.
To the famed thron now paid the tribute due,
Neglected genius! let me turn to you.

Come forth, oh Campbell! give thy talents scope;
Who dares aspire if thou must cease to hope?
And thou, melodious Rogers! rise at last,
Recall the pleasing memory of the past;
Arise! let blest remembrance still inspire,
And strike to wond'rous tones thy hallow'd lyre;
Restore Apollo to his vacant throne,
Asser thy country's honor and thine own.
What! must deserted Poesy still weep
Where her last hopes with pious Cowper sleep?
Unless, perhance, from his cold bier she turns,
To deck the turf that wraps her minstrel, Burns!
No! though contempt hath mark'd the spurious
The race who rhyme from folly, or for food, [brood].
Yet still some genuine sons 'tis hers to boast,
Who 'vast affecting, still affect the most:
Feel as they write, add write as they feel—
Dear witness Gifford, Sothey, Manuell.

Why slumbers Gifford? once was ask'd in vain;
Why slumbers Gifford? let us ask again.
Are there no fellows for his pen to purge?
Are there no fools whose bad demand the scourge?
Are there no sins for satire's bard to greet?
Stalks not gigantic Vice in every street?

shall peers or princes tread pollution's path,
And 'scape alike the law's and muse's wrath?
Nor blaze with guilty glare through future time
Eternal beacons of consummate crime?
Arouse thee, Gifford! be thy promise claim'd,
Make bad men better, or at least ashamed.

Unhappy White! while life was in its spring,
And thy young muse just waved her joyous wing,
† The spoiler swept that soaring lyre away,
Which else had sounded an immortal lay.
Oh! what a noble heart was here undone,
When Science! self destroyed her favorite son;
Yes, she too imposed thy fond pursuit,
She sow'd the seeds, but death has reaped the fruit
'Twas thine own genius gave the final blow,
And help'd to plant the wound that laid thee low
So the struck eagle, stretch'd upon the plain,
No more through rolling clouds to soar again,
View'd his own feather on the fatal dart,
And wing'd the shaft that quiver'd in his heart;
Keen were his pangs, but keener far to feel,
He nursed the pinion which impell'd the steel;
While the same plumage that had warm'd his nest
Drank the last life-drop of his bleeding breast.

There be, who say, in these enlighten'd days,
That splendid lies are all the poet's praise;
That strain'd invention, ever on the wing,
Alone impels the modern bard to sing:
'Tis true, that all who rhyme, nay, all who write,
Shrink from that fat... word to genius—trite;
Yet Truth sometimes will lend her noblest fires,
And decorate the verse herself inspires:
This fact in V. true's name let Crabbe! attest;
Though nature's sternest painter, he was the best.
*And here let Shee! and genius find a place,
Whose pen and pencil yield an equal grace;
To guide whose hand the sister arts combine,
And trace the poet's or the painter's line;
Whose magic touch can bid the canvas glow,
Or pour the easy rhyme's harmonious flow,
While honors, doubly merited, attend
The poet's rival, but the painter's friend.

Blest is the man who dares approach the bower
Where dwelt the muses at their natal hour:
Whose steps have press'd, whose eye has mark'd afar,
The clime that nursed the songs of song and war,
The scenes which glory still must hover o'er,
Her place of birth, her own Achaian shore.

—Henry Kirke White died at Cambridge, in October, 1816, in consequence of too much exertion in the pursuit of studies which would have made a mind which disease and poverty could not impair, and which death and despondency rather than a minute. His poems shone in his hand as with beams of the sun on the finest plate glass; as soon as the readerwill be well refresh'd in not a short a period was sufficient to mould what would have dignified even the sacred functions he was destined to assume.

† The spoiler swept that soaring lyre away,
Which else had sounded an immortal lay.
So altered by Lord Byron on reproving the artist in 1816. In reply to a sonnet, the lines stood,

"The spoiler came; and all thy promise fair Dissipates, the page, to sleep for ever more,"

† Crabbe.† co-author "Shelley and Coleridge as the first of these to rise to power and genius—1817, not Lord Byron, 1818.

† The Shakspearean sonnet of "Rhymes on Art," and "Elements of Art,"
But doubly blest is he whose heart expands
With hallow'd feelings for those classic lands;
Who rends the veil of ages long gone by,
And views their remnants with a poet's eye!
Wright! twas thy happy lot at once to view
Those shores of glory, and to sing them too;
And sure no common muse inspired thy pen
To hail the land of gods and godlike men.

And you, associate bards! who snatch'd to light
Those gems too long witheld from modern sight:
Whose mingling tastes combined to hurl the wreath
Where Attic flowers Aonian odors breathe,
And all their renovated fragrance flung,
To grace the beauties of your native tongue:
Now let those minds, that nobly could transmute
The glorious spirit of the Grecian muse,
Though soft the echo, scorn a borrowed tone:
Resign Achala's lyre, and strike your own.

Let these or such as these, with just applause,
Restore the muse's violated laws:
But not in flimsy Darwin's pomposous chime,
That mighty master of unmeaning rhyme,
Whose gilded symbols, more adorn'd than clear,
The eye delighted, but fatigued the ear;
In show the simple lyre could once surpass,
But now, worn down, appear in native brass;
While all his train of hoary sylphs around
Emerge in similes and sound:
He let them shun, with him let tiisel die:
False glare attracts, but more offends the eye.‡

Yet let them not to vulgar Wordsworth stoop,
The meanest object of the lowly group,
Whose verse, of all but childish prattle void,
Seems blessed harmony to Lamb and Lloyd;
Let them—but hold, my muse, nor dare to teach
A strain far, far beyond thy humble reach:
The native genius with their being given
Will point the path, and peal their notes to heaven.

And thou, too, Scott![⁵] resign to minstrels rude
The wilder Slogan of a border feud:
Let others spin the meagre lines for hire;
Enough for genius if itself inspire!
Let Southey sing, although his teeming muse,
Prolific every spring, be too profuse;
 Let simple Wordsworth chime his childish verse,
And brother Coleridge hail the babbles at nurse;
Let spectre-mongering Lewis aim, at most,
To raise the galleries, or to raise a ghost: [Moore,‡

* Mr. Wright, late consol.-general for the Iveron islands, is author of a very beauteous poem just published: it is entitled "Heraeion," and is descriptive of the island and the surrounding coast of Greece.

† The translators of the Archylogi, Blund and Merivale, have inserted separate poems, which entice genius that only requires opportunity to obtain eminence.

‡ The neglect of the "Botanic Garden" is some proof of returning taste; the scenery is in -to-recommendation.

§ Misses. Lamb and Lloyd, the most ignoble followers of Southey and Co., in the by, I hope that to Mr. Scott's next poem his hero or heroine will be less addicted to "Graemarye," and more to grammar, than the Lady of the Ley and her brave, William of Dambless.

¶ According to passages on Wordsworth, and the following line on Coleridge's, Lord Byron has written, "out of,"

 Let Moore still sigh.—Fifth edition. The original reading was, "Let Moore bewail!"

Let sonneteering Bowles his strains refine
And whine and whimper to the fourteenth line,
Let Scott, Carlisle, Matilda and the rest
Of Grub-street and of Grosvenor-place the best,
Scrawl on, 'till death release us from the strain,
Or Common Sense assert her rights again.
But thou, with powers that mock the aid of praise
Should leave to humbler bards ignoble lays,
Thy country's voice, the voice of all the nine,
Demand that moral'd harp—that hearse-borne thine.
Say! will not Caledonia's annals yield
The glorious record of some nobler field,
Than the vile foray of a plundering clan,
Whose proudest deeds disgrace the name of man?
Or Marmon's acts of darkness, fitter food
† For Sherwood's outland tales of Robin Hood,
Scotland! still proudly claim thy native bard,
And be thy praise his first, his best reward!
Yet not with thee alone his name should live,
But own the vast renown a world can give;
Be known, perchance, when Albion is no more,
And tell the tale of what she was before;
To future times her future fame recall
And save her glory, though his country fall.

† Yet what avails the sanguine poet's hope,
To conquer ages and with time to cope?
New eras spread their wings, new nations rise,
And other victors fill the applauding skies;
A few brief generations fleet along,
Whose sons forget the poet and his song;
E'en now, what once-loved minstrels scarce may claim
The transient mention of a dubious name!
When Famine's loud trump hath blown its noblest blast,
Though long the sound, the echo sleeps at last;
And glory like the phoenix midst her fires,
Exhales her odors, blazes, and expires
Shall hoary Granta call her sable sons,
Expert in science, more expert at puns?"
Shall these approach the muse? ah, no! she flies,
Even from the tempting ore of Seaton's prize;
Though printers condescend the press to soil
With rhymes by Hoare, and epic blank by Hoyle:
Not him whose page, if still upheld by whist,
Requires no sacred theme to bid us list.
Ye. who in Granta's honors would surpass,
Must mount her Pegasus, a full-grown ass;
A soul well worthy of her ancient dam,
Whose Helicon is duller than her Carus.

There Clarke, still striving piteously "to please,"
Forgetting doggerel leads not to degrees,
A would-be satirist, a hired buffoon,
A monthly scribbler of some low lampoon,
Condemned to drudge, the meanest of the meaz,
And furnish falsehoods for a magazine,
Devotes to scandal his congenial mind;
Himself a living libel on mankind.

Hoyle's whose learned page if still upheld by whist,
Required no sacred theme to bid us list.

† The "Game of Hoyle," well known to the vocables of wit, clever, etc. are not to be superseded by the vagaries of the poetical manuscripts, whose poems composed, as expressly stated in the advertisement, all the "plays of Egypt."

So sunk in dulness, and so lost in shame,
That Hoyle and Hodgson scarce redeem thy fame.

Thus far J. ye held my undisturb'd career,
Prepared for rancor, steel'd 'gainst selfish fear:
This thing of rhyme I ne'er disdained to own—
Though not obtrusive, yet not quite unknown:
My voice was heard again, though not so loud,
My page, though nameless, never disavow'd;—
And now at once I tear the veil away:—

And though I hope not hence unsathed to go,
Who conquers me shall find a stubborn foe.
The time hath been, when no harsh sound would fall
From lips that now may seem imbued with gill,
Nor foils nor follies tempt me to despire
The meanest thing that craw'd beneath my eyes;
But now so callous grown, so changed since youth,
I've learn'd to think, and sternly speak the truth:
Learn'd to deride the critic's stale decree,
And break him on the wheel he meant for me;
To spurn the rod a scribbler bids me kiss,
Nor care if courts and crowd's applaud or hiss;
Nay more, though all my rival rhymsters frown,
I too can hunt a poetaster down;
And, arm'd in proof, the gauntlet cast at once
To Scotch marauder, and to southern dune.
Thus much I've dared; if my indecent lay* Hath wrong'd these righteous times, let others say:
This, let the world, which knows not how to spare,
Yet rarely blames unjustly, now declare.†

Y. Z.—Rogers, Campbell, Gilfillan, &c. was post—translation of the Greek Anthology—Cowper—Drake's eye—Cambridge—Botanizer Prize—Smyth—Hogge—Oxford—Radcliffe Post—nonsense—conclusion.
I have been informed, since the present edition went to press, that my trusty and well-beloved cousins, the Edinburgh Reviewers, are preparing a most vehement critique on my poor, gentle, unresisting Muse, whom they have already so bedevilled with their ungodly ribaldry:

"Tantum animis aequalibus fin."

I suppose I must say of Jeffrey as Sir Andrew Aguecheek saith, "an' I had known he was so cunning of fence, I had seen him damned ere I had taught him." What a pity it is that I shall be beyond the Bosphorus before the next number has passed the Tweed! But I yet hope to light my pipe with it in Persia.

My northern friends have accused me, with justice, of personality towards their great literary anthropophagus, Jeffrey; but what else was to be done with him and his dirty pack, who feed by "lying and slandering," and slake their thirst by "evil speaking?" I have added facts already well known, and of Jeffrey's mind I have stated my free opinion, nor has he thence sustained any injury;—what scavenger was ever soiled by being pelted with mud? It may be said that I quit England because I have censured there "persons of honor and wit about town," but I am coming back again, and their vengeance will keep hot till my return. Those who know me can testify that my motives for leaving England are very different from fears, literary or personal: those who do not, may one day be convinced. Since the publication of this thing my name has not been concealed; I have been mostly in London, ready to answer for my transgressions, and in daily expectation of sundry cartels; but alas, "the age of chivalry is over," or, in the vulgar tongue, there is no spirit new-days.

There is a youth ycleped Hewson Clarke (Suidand Esquire), a sizer of Emmanuel College, and, I believe, a denizen of Berwick-upon-Tweed, whom I have introduced in these pages to much better company than he has been accustomed to meet; he is, notwithstanding, a very sad dog, and for no reason that I can discover, except a personal quarrel with a bear, kept by me at Cambridge to sit for a fellow ship, and whom the jealousy of his Trinity contem poraries prevented from success, has been abusing me, and what is worse, the defenceless innocent above mentioned, in "The Satirist" for one year and some months. I am utterly unconscious of having given him any provocation; indeed, I am guiltless of having heard his name till coupled with "The Satirist." He has therefore no reason to complain, and I dare say that, like Sir Fretful Pi giary, he is rather pleased than otherwise. I have now mentioned all who have done me the honor to notice me and mine, that is, my bear and my book except the editor of "The Satirist," who, it seems is a gentleman—God wit! I wish he could impart a little of his gentility to his subordinate scribblers. I hear that Mr. Jerningham is about to take up the cudgels for his Maecenas, Lord Carlisle: I hope not: he was one of the few, who, in the very short intercourse I had with him, treated me with kind ness when a boy, and whatever he may say or do "pour on, I will endure." I have nothing to add, save a general note of thanks to readers, purchasers, and publishers, and, in the words of Scott, I wish

To all who teach a task good night, and pray dinner and chivalrous light.\footnote{This is a note.}

And nonsense in a lofty note goes down,
As pertness passes with a legal gown:
Thus many a bard describes in pompous strain
The clear brook babbling through the goodly plain.
The groves of Grants, and her gothic halls,
King's Coll., Cam's stream, stain'd windows, and
.. old walls:
Or in advent'rous numbers, neatly aims
To pain a rainbow or the river Thames.

You sketch a tree, and so perhaps may shine—
But daub a shipwreck like an alehouse sign;
You plan a vase—it dwindles to a pot;
Then glide down Grub-street—fasting and forgot—
Laugh'd into Lethe by some quint review,
Whose wit is never troublesome till true.

In fine, to whatsoever you aspire,
Let it at least be simple and entire.

Dear authors! suit your topics to your strength,
And ponder well your subject, and its length;
Nor lift your look, 'tis quite invisible
What weight your shoulders will, or will not bear.

Await the poet skillful in his choice;
With native elegance he soars along.
Grace in his verse, as music in his song.

Bia k verse is now, with one consent, allied
To Tragedy, and rarely quits her side.
Though mad Almanzor rhymed in Dryden's days
No sing-song hero rants in modern plays;
While modest Comedy her verse foregoes
For jest and pam* in very middling prose.
Not that our Beins or Beaumonts show the worse,
Or lose one point, because they wrote in verse;
But so Thalia pleases to appear,
Poor virgin! damn'd some twenty times a year.

Whate'er the scene, let this advice have weight:
Adapt your language to your hero's state.
At times Melpomene forgets to groan,
And brisk Thalia takes a serious tone;
Nor unregarded will the act pass by
Where angry Townly lifts his voice on high
Again our Shakspeare limits verse to kings,
When commo prosse will serve for common things;
And live Hal resigns heroic ire,
To "hollowing Hotspur"† and the sceptred sire.

'Tis not en ugh, ye bards,' with all your art,
To polish poems; they must touch the heart:
Where'er the scene be laid, whate'er the song,
Still let it bear the hearer's soul along;
Command your audience or to smile or weep,
Which' er may please you—any thing but sleep.
The poet claims our tears; but, by his leave,
Before I shed them, let me see him grieve.

If banish'd R muco feign'd nor sigh nor tear,
Lull'd by his languor, I should sleep 8 sneer.
Sad words, no doubt, become a serious face,
And men lo'k angry in the proper place.
At double meanings folks seem wondrous sly,
And sentiment prescribes a pensive eye;
For nature form'd at first the inward man,
And actors copy nature—when they can.

Quo scribi possent numero monstravit Homerus.
Versibus impariter junctis querimonia primum;
Post etiam inclusa est voto sententia copos.
Quis tamen exiguis elegos emiserit auocos,
Grammatici errant, et adhuc sub judice lis est.
Archilochum proprio rabies armavit imabo.
Hunc soci cepere pedem, grandesque othurni,
Alternis aptum sernonibus, et populares
Vincentem strequisit, et nutum robus agenda.
Musae dedit fabulos, puerseque decorum,
Et pugilem victorem, et eumque certaine primum,
Et juvenum curas, et libera vina referre.

Descriptas servare vices operunque colors,
Cur ego, si nqueo ignoroque poeta salutor?
Cur nescire, id dens prave, quam discere male?
Versibus ex, tamen tragicis res conclam non vult,
Indignatur item privatis, et pugnare socco
Digna carminibus nacta, esse lypsesta.
Singular que locum teneant sortita decenter
Interdum tamen et vocem commedia tollit,
Itaque C. echems tumido deligtit ore.
Et tragicos plenissim delect sermone pedestri.
Telepous et Peleus, cum pauper et exul, eterque
Projectum ampullas et sesquipedalia verba,
Si curat cor spectantis teligisse querela.

* With all the vulgar applause and critical abhorrence of poets, they have resided on their side, who persuade them to cotise, and give them成型.

† As in the our Pil bylow. Mortimer!—I, Henry IV.

She bids the beating heart with rapture bound,
Raised to the stars, or level'd with the ground;
And for expression's aid, 'tis said, or sung,
She gave our mind's interpreter—the tongue,
Who, worn with use, of late would fain disperse
(At least in theatres) with common sense;
O'erwhelm with sound the boxes, gallery, pit,
And raige a laugh with any thing but wit.

To skilful writers it will much import,
Whence spring their scenes, from common life and court;
Whether they seek applause by smile or tear,
To draw a "Lying Valet," or a "Lear,"
A sage, or rakish youngster wild from school
A wandering "Peregrine," or plain "John Bull;"
All persons please, when nature's voice prevails,
Scottish or Irish, born in Wilts or Wales.

Or follow common fame, or forge a plot:
Who cares if mimic heroes lived or not?
One precept serves to regulate the scene:
Make it appear as if it might have been.

If some Drawenair you aspire to draw,
Present him raving, and above all law:
If female furies in your scheme are plann'd,
Macbeth's fierce dame is ready to your hand;
For tears and treachery, for good or evil,
Constance, King Richard, Hamlet, and the Devil
But if a new design you dare essay,
And freely wander from the beaten way,
True to your characters, till all be past,
Preserve consistency from first to last.

'Tis hard to venture where we better's fail,
Or lend fresh interest to a twice-told tale;
And yet, perchance, 'tis wiser to prefer
A hackney'd plot, than choose a new, and err;

Humani vultus: si vis me flere, dolendum est.
Primam ipsi tibi; tone tua me infortunia laedent.
Telephe: vel Peleu, male si mandata loquers,
Ant dare labes, nos abhorrere: tristia mecum
Vultur ventris decent; iratam, plena xinarum,
Ludentem, lasciva; severum, sera dictu.
Format enim natura pruis nos intus ad omnem
Fortunam habuit; juvat, aut impellit ad iam
Ant ad humum morore gravdi ducet, et angit;
Post effert animo motus interprete lingua.
Si dicentis erunt fortunis absa obdata,
Romani tollent equites pedesque cæsinum.
Interreti nutrum, Davusse licuquit an hero;

Quam si proferret ignota inditaequa primus
Publica materies privati juris erit,
Nec circum villam patutumque minoribus orbem
Nec verbum verbo curabiss reddere sidus
Interpres, nec des'illes imitator in arctum
Yet copy not too closely, but record,
More justly, thought for thought than word for word;
Nor trace your prototype through narrow ways,
But thy where he merits praise.

For you, young bard! whom luckless fate may lead
To tremble on the four all who read,
Ere your first score of cantos time unrolls,
Beware—God's sake, don't begin like Bowies
"Awake a louder and a loftier strain,
And pray, what follows from his boiling brain?—
"Of man's first disobedience and the fruit"
He speaks, but as his subject swells along,
Earth, heaven, and He in the song.
Stirred to the midst of things he hastens on,
As if we witnessed all already done;
Leaves on his path whatever seems too mean
To raise the subject, or adorn the scene;
Gives, as each page improves upon the sight, [light; Not smoke from brightness, but from darkness—
And truth and fiction with such art compounds,
We know not where to fix their several bounds.
If you would please the public, deign to hear
What soothes the many-headed monster's ear;
If your heart triumph when the hands of all
Applaud in thunder at the curve, content;
Deserve the plaudits—study nature's page,
And sketch the striking traits of every age;
While varying man and varying years unfold
Life's little tale so oft, so vainly told.

Unde pedem proferre pudor vetet, aut operis lex.

*About two years ago a young man, named Townsend, was announced by Mr. Coleridge (in a review since destroyed) as being engaged in an epic poem to be entitled "Armageddon." This plan and specimen promise much; but I hope neither to offend Mr. Townsend nor his friends, by recommending to his attention the lines of Horace to which those stanzas allude. If Mr. Townsend succeeds in his undertaking, as there is reason to hope, how much the world will be indebted to Mr. Coleridge for being the first to publish such a poem! But till that eventful day arrives, it may be deemed whether the premature display of his plan (sublime as the idea confessedly is) has not, by raising expectation too high, or diminishing curiosity, by destroying our interest, rather incurred the hazard of injuring Mr. Townsend's future prospects. Mr. Coleridge (whose talents I shall not deprecate) is the humble tribute of my praise) and Mr. Townsend must not suppose me actuated by unworthy motives in this suggestion. I wish the author all the success he can wish himself; and shall be truly happy to see poetry weighed up from the ashes where it lies smouldering with Soundly, Cowley (Mrs. or Albraham), Gertrude, Wilde, Pye, and all the dead of past and present days. Even if he is not a Milton, he may be better than Blakesmore; if not an Homer, an Aeneidsurus. I should despise myself presented with an offering worthy the last of these, and not addressed to one still younger. Mr. Townsend has the greatest difficulties to encounter; yet in conquering them he will find employment: in having conquered them, he will have gained so much. I am not a child, nor am I afraid to teach. I know with certainty, and am afraid only that Mr. Townsend will know too well. Those who succeed and those who do not must bear this silks, and it is hard to say which is most of it. I trust that Mr. Townsend's shine will be from away the "I will know mankind well enough not to attribute this expression to silence.

The above note was written before the author was apprised of Mr. Constable's death.

Observe his simple childhood's dawning days,
His pranks, his prate, his playmates, and his plays
Till time at length the mannish tyro weans,
And prurient vice outstrips his tardy teens!

Behold him freshman! force no more to groan
"O'er Virgil's devilish verses and his own,
Prayers are too tedious, lectures too abstruse,
He flies from Tavell's form to "Forlorn Mews:"
(Uneakly Tavell! doom'd to daily cares
By pugilistic pupils and by bears.)
Fines, tutors, tasks, conventions threat in vain,
Before hounds, hunters, and Newmarket plain.
Rough with his elders, with his equals rash,
Civil to sharpers, prodigal of cash;
Constant to nought—save hazard and a whore,
Yet cursing both—for both have made him sore;
Unread (unless, since books beguile disease,
The p-x becomes his passage to degrees)
Fool'd, plighted, dunn'd, he wastes his term away
And, unexpell'd perhaps, retires M. A.;
Master of arts! as helle and clubz proclaim,
Where scarce a blackleg bears a brighter name!

Launch'd into life, extinct his early fire,
He apes the selfish prudence of his sire;
Marries for money, chooses friends for rank,
Buys land, and shrewdly trusts not to the Bank;
Sits in the senate; gets a son and heir;
Sends him to Harrow, for himself was there.
Mute, though he votes, unless when call'd to cheer
His son's so sharp—he'll see the dog a peer.

Manhood declines—age pails every limb,
He quits the scene—or else the scene quits him.

Harvey, the director of the circulation of the blood, used to fly away Virgil in his ecstasy of admiration, and say, "the book had a devil." Now, such a character as I am copying would probably fly it away also, Mr. Ogilvy, the deceased, did not wish it, for he could not bear to have my slights to the post, but a well-founded horror of hexameters. Indeed the public school goes a "long and short" is enough to begin an end to poetry for the residue of a man's life, and, perhaps, for me may be an advantage.

"If infundam, region, jubes renovare dijum?"
I dare say Mr. Tavell (to whom I mean no affront) will understand me; and it is no matter whether I am wise, I am so wise, or foolishness takes the place of sense and sense bears testimony.

"Hell," a grinding-house so called, where you risk little, and are cheated a good deal. "Club," a pleasant purgatory, where you lose more, and are supposed to be cheated as ill.

Then may Euphrosyne, who sped the past,
See the thy life's scene's nor leave thee in the last;
But find in thine, like pagan* Plato's bed,
Some sorry manuscript of mimes, when dead.

Now to the Drama let us bond our eyes,
Where petter'd by whig Walpole low 'she lies;
Corruption foil'd her, for she fear'd her glance;
Decorum left her for an opera dance!
Yet *Chesterfield, whose polish'd pen inveighs
Against laughter, fought for freedom to our plays;
Uncheck'd by megrim of patriotic brains,
And damning dulness of lord chamberlains.
Repeal that act! again let Humor roam
Wild or the stage—we're time for tears at home;
Let "Archer" plant the horns on "Sullen" s bows,
And "Estafania" gull her "Copper"'s spouse;
The moral's scant—but that may be excused,
Men go not to be lectured, but amused.
He whom our plays dispose to good or ill
Must wear a head in want of Willis' skill;
Ay, but Macbeth's example—psha!—no more!
It form'd no thieves—the thief was form'd before,
And spite of puritans and Collier's curse,
Plays make mankind no better, and no worse.
Then spare our stage, ye methodistic men!
Nor burn dam'd Drury if it rise again.
But why to brain-score'd bigots thus appeal?
Can heavenly mercy dwell with earthly zeal?
For times of fire and fagot let them hope:
Times dear alike to puritan or pope.
As pious Calvin saw Sercutus-blaze,
So would new sects on newer victims gaze.
E'en now the songs of Solyma begin;
Faith chants, perplex'd apostol of sin!
While the Lord's servant chastens whom he loves,
And Simeon kicls, where *Baxtry only "shoves."

Whom nature guides, so writes, that every dunce
Encaps'd, thinks is do the same at once;
But after inky thumbs and bitten nails
And twenty scatler'd quires, the cocxom fails.

Let pastoral be dumb; for who can hope
To match the youthful elocution of our Pope?
Yet his and Phillips' faults, of different kind,
For art too rude, for nature too refined,

Ex noto fictum carmen sequar, ut sibi quivis
Speret idem: sedet multum frustraque laboret
Audax idem; tandem series juncturit polce
Tantum de medio sumtis accedit honestis.

Ne vis dedit cavat, me judice, Pausini,
Ne, velit inlati trivis ac pene forenses,
Ad unum teneris juvenescet versibus unquam,
At immunda crepent, ignominiosae dicta, *res: Offendatur enim, quibus est equus, et pater,
Ne, si quid frici ciceris probat et nescius ector.

Instruct how hard the medium 'tit to hit
'Twixt too much polish and too coarse a wit
A vulgar scribbler, certes, stands disgraced
In this nice age; when all aspire to taste;
The dirty language, and the noisy jest,
Which pleased in Swift of yore, we now detest;
Proscribed not only in the world polite,
But even too nasty for a city knight!

Peace to Swift's faults, his wit hath made them pass
Unmatched by all, save matchless Hudibras!
Whose author is perhaps the first we meet,
Who from our couplet lopp'd two final feet;
Nor less in merit than the longer line,
This measure moves a favorite of the Nine.
Though at first view eight feet may seem in vain
Form'd, save in ode, to bear a serious strain,
Yet Scott has shown our wondering isle of late,
This measure shrinks not from a theme of weight
And, varied skillfully, surpasses far
Heroic rhyme, but most in love and war,
Whose fluctuations, tender or sublime,
Are curb'd too much by long-recurring rhyme

But many a skilful judge abhors to see,
What few admire—irregularity.
This some vouchsafe to pardon; but 'tis hard,
When such a word contents a British bard.

And must the bard his glowing thoughts confine,
Lest censure hover o'er some faulty line?
Remove whate'er a critic may suspect
To gain the paltry suffrage of "correct:"
Or prune the spirit of each daring phrase,
To fly from error, not to merit praise?

Ye who seek finish'd models, never cease,
By day and night, to read the works of Greece.
But our good fathers never bent their brains
To heathen Greek, content with native strains.
The few who read a page, or used a pen,
Were satisfied with Chaucer and old Ben;
The jokes and numbers suited to their taste
Were quaint and careless, any thing but chaste
Yet whether right or wrong the ancient rules,
It will not do to call our fathers fools!

* Aquis acipiens aninis, donantve et rona.

With little rhyme, less reason, if you please
The name of poet may be got with ease,
So that no turns of helleborie juice
Shall ever turn your head to any use;
Write but like Wordsworth, live beside a lake,
And keep your bushy locks a year from Blake.*

Then put your present book, once more return to town
And boys shall hunt your bardship up and down.

Am I not wise, if such some poets' plight,
To purge in spring (like Bayes) before I write?
If this precaution soften'd not my bile,
I know no scribbler, with a madder style;
But since (perhaps my feelings are too nice),
I cannot purchase fame at such a price,
I'll labor gratis as a grinder's wheel,
And, blunt myself, give edge to others' steel,
Nor write at all, unless to teach the art,
To those rehearsing for the poet's part;
From Horace show the pleasing paths of song
And from my own example, what is wrong.

Though modern practice sometimes differs quite,
'Tis just as well to think before you write;
Let every book that suits your theme be read,
So shall you trace it to the fountain-head.

He who has learnt the duty which he owes
To friend and country, and to pardon foes;
Who models his deportment as may best
Accord with brother, sire, or stranger guest;
Who takes our laws and worship as they are,
Nor roars reform for senate, church, and bar;
In practice, rather than loud precept, wise,
Bids not his tongue, but heart, philosophy:
Such is the man the poet should rehearse,
As joint exemplar of his life and verse.

Sometimes a sprightly wit and tale well told,
Without much grace, or weight, or art, willold
A longer empire o'er the public mind
Than sounding trifles, empty, though refined.

HINTS FROM HORACE.

Through three long weeks the taste of London lead
And cross St, George's Channel and the Tweed.

But every thing has faults, nor is't unknown
That harps and fiddles often lose their tune,
And wayward voices, at their owner's call,
With all his best endeavors, only squall;
Dogs blink their cover, flints withhold their spark,
And double-barrels (damn them!) miss their mark.

Where frequent beauties strike the reader's view
We must not quarrel for a blot or two;
But pardon equally to books or men,
The slips of human nature, and the pen.

Yet if an author, spite of foe or friend,
Despises all advice too much to mend,
But ever twangs the same discordant string,
Give him no quarter, howsoe'er he sing.
Let Haward's fate o'ertake him, who for once
Produced a play too dashing for a dune:
At first none deem'd it his, but when his name
Announced the fact—what then?—it lost its fame
Though all deplore when Milton деigns to doze,
In a long work 'tis fair to steal repose.

As pictures, so shall poems be; some stand
The critic eye, and please, when near at hand;
But others at a distance strike the sight;
This seeks the shade, but that demands the light;
Nor dreads the connoisseur's fastidious view,
But, ten times scrutinized, is ten times new.

Parnassian pilgrims! ye whom change or choice
Hath led to listen to the muse's voice,
Receive this counsel, and be timely wise;
Few reach the summit which before you lies.
Our church and state, our courts and camps, con-cede
Reward to very moderate heads indeed!
In these plain common sense will travel far;
All are not Erskines who mislead the bar.

Lectorem delactando pariterque monendo.

Et longum noto scriptorpi prorogat annum.

Aut humana parum cavit natura. Quid ergo est?
Ut scriptor si peccat idem librarium usque,
Quamvis est montus, vennia caret; et cithareus

As Mr. Pope took the liberty of stanzing Homer, to whom he was under great obligation—"And Homer (damos him) etsi!"—it may be presumed that any body or any thing may be damned in verse by poetical Homer; and, in case of accident, I beg leave to plead as Homer's proprietor.

Whose generos children narrow'd not their hearts
With commerce, given alone to arms and arts.
Our boys (save those whom public schools compel)
To "long and short" before they're taught to spell,
Froze: frugal fathers soon imbibe by rote,
A penny saved, my lad's, a penny got.
Babe of a'ck'birth! from sixpence take
Two thirds how rich will the remainder make?
"A great."—"Ah, brave! Dick hath done the sum;
He'll swell my fifty thousand to a plume."
Theys whose young souls receive this rust betimes,
'Tis clear, are fit for any thing but rhymes;
And Locke will tell ye, that the father's right
Who hides all verses from his children's sight.
For poets (says this sage, and many more),
Make sad mechanics with their lyre lore;
And Delphi now, however rich of old,
Discovers little silver and less gold,
Because Parnassus, though a mount divine,
Is poor as Iris, & an Irish wine.

Two objects always should the poet move,
Or one or both,—to please or to improve.
Whate'er you teach, be brief, if you design
For our remembrance your didactic line;
Redundance places memory on the rack,
For brains may be o'eloaded, like the back.

Fiction does best when taught to look like truth,
And fairy fables bubble none but youth;
Expect no credit for too wondrous tales,
Since Jonas only springs alive from whales!

Young men with aught but elegance dispense,
Maturer years require a little sense.
To end at once—that bard for all is fit
Who mingles well instruction with his wit;
For him reviews shall smile, for him o'erflow
The patronage of Paternostero-row;
His book, with Longman's liberal aid, shall pass,
(Who ne'er despises books that bring him brass.)

What then?—Edina starves some lanker son,
To write an article thou canst not shun:
Some less fastidious Scotchman shall be found,
As bold in Billingsgate, though less renoun'd.

As if at table some discordant dish
Should shock our optics, such as frogs for fish;
As oil in lieu of butter men decry,
And poppies please not in a modern pie;
If all such mixtures then be half a crime,
We must have excellence to relish rhyme.
Mere roast and boil'd'd no epicure invites;
Thus poetry disgusts, or else delights.

Who shoot not flying rarely touch a gun;
Who he swins not to the river run?
And men unpractis'd in exchanging knocks
Must go to Jackson ere they dare to box.
What'er the broom, cudgel, flint, or spear,
None reach expertness without years of toil;
But fifty dunces can, with perfect ease,
Tag twenty thousand couples when they please.

Why not?—shall I, thus qualified to sit
For rotten bowers, never show my wit?
Shall I, whose fathers with the quorum sate,
And lived in freedom on a fair estate;
Who left me heir, with stable's, kennels, packs,
To all their income; and to twice its tax;
Whose form and pedigree have scarce a fault,
Shall I, I say, suppress my attic salt?

Thus think "the mob of gentlemen;" but you,
Besides all this, must have some genius too.
Be this your sober judgment, and a rule,
And print not piping hot from Southey's school,
Who (ere another Thalaba appears),
I trust will spare us for at least nine years.
And hark'ye, Southey! pray—but don't be next
Burn all your last three works—and half the next.

To the Eclectic or Christian Reviewers I have to return thanks for the favor of that charity which in 1809 induced them to express a hope, that a thing then published by me might lead to certain consequences, which, all English natural, surely came not ready from reverend lips. I refer them to their own pages, where they condescended themselves on the pro- pect of a slight between Mr. Jeffrey and myself, from which some great good was to spring, provided one or both were knocked on the head. Having received two pages and a half of those "Eligens" which they were kindly prepar'd to review, I have no peculiar genus to give them "so joyful a custody," except, indeed, "upon composition, Hut," but if, Mr. Jeffrey says in the "Rivista," it should come to "bleeding and gun fighting," we "won't run, will we"? I do not know what had gone to those Eclectic gentlemen; my works are their lawful property, to be worn in the pieces as Agar, if she should seem meet unto them; but why should they be thus a议论 to kill off their author, I was ignorant.
'Tis the race is not always to the swiftest but to the strong: and now, as those Eclectic Reviewers 'amn me on one side,' I hold them up the other; and in return for their good wishes, give them an opportunity of repeating them. Had any other sort of men expressed such sensations, they would have audited, and lent them to the "pointing angel," but from the phrenesis of Christianity docility might be expected. I can name these brethren, that, politicians and shamer I am, I would not have mine dog dance. To see them the superiority of my brutality lives, if ever the Reverend Muses Simon or Hannah should be engaged in such a conflict as that in which they requested me to fall, I hope they may escape with being "winded" only, and that Havreble may be all safe to extract the boll.

Orpheus, we learn from Ovid and Lempriere, led all wild beasts but women by the ear; and had he fiiled at the present hour, We'd seen the lions Waltzing in the Tower: And old Amphiicon, such were must have been then, Had built St. Paul's without the aid of Wren. Verse too was justice, and the bands of Greece Did more than constables to keep the peace; Abolish'd cuckoldom with much applause, Cal'd county meetings, and enforced the laws, Cut down crown influence with reforming sectaries, And served the church without demanding tithes; And hence, throughout all Hellas and the East, Each poet was a prophet and a priest, Whose old-establish'd beard of joint controls Included kingdom: in the cure of souls.

Next rose the martial Homer, epic prince, And fighting's been in fashion ever since; And old Tyrtaeus, when the Spartan's war'd, (A limping leader, but a lofty bard,) Though wall'd I'thome had resisted long, Reduced the fortress by the force of song.

When oracles prevail'd, in times of old, In song alone Apollo's will was told. Then if your verse is what all verse should be, And gods were not ashamed on't, why should we?

HINTS FROM HORACE.

But why this vain advice? O once published, books Can never be recall'd—from pastry cooks! Though "Madoc," with "Pucelle," instead of punk, May travel back to Quito—on a trunk! ♦

The muse, like mortal females, may be w. o'd; In turns she'll seem a Paphian or a prude; Fierce as a bride when first she sees affright, Mild as the same upon the second night; Wild as the wife of alderman or peer, Now for his grace, and now a grenadier! Her eyes beseech, her heart belies, her zone, Ice in a crowd, and lava when alone.

If verse be studied with some show of art, Kind nature always will perform her part. Though without genius, and a native vein Of wit, we loathe an artificial strain; Yet art and nature join'd will win the prize, Unless they act like us and our allies.

The youth who trains to ride or run a race Must bear privation with unruuffled face, Be call'd to labor when he thinks to dine, And, harder still, leave wenching and his wine. Ladies who sing, at least who sing at sight, Have follow'd music through her farthest flight; But rhymer tell you neither more nor less, "I've got a pretty poem for the press!" And that's enough; then write and print so fast— If Satan take the hindmost, who'd be last? They storm the types, they publish; one and all. They leap the counter, and they leave the stall. Provincial maidens, men of high command, Yea, baronet's have ink'd the bloody hand! Cash cannot quell them; Pollio play'd this prank. (Then Phæbus first found credit in a bank!) Not all the living only, but the dead, Fool on, as thouent an as an Orpheus' head; ♦

BYRON'S WORKS.

Some fancied slight has roused his lurking hate.
Some folly cross'd, some jest, or some debate;
Up to his den Sir Scribbler bies, and soon
The gather'd gall is voided in lampoon.
Perhaps at some pert speech you've dared to frown
Perhaps y'ur poem may have pleased the town:
If so, alas, 'tis nature in the man—
May heaven forgive you, for he never can!
Then be it so; and may his withering bays
Bloom fresh in satire, though they fade in praise!
While his lost songs to more shall steep and stick
The dullest, fattest wocks on Lethes's brink,
But springing upwards from the sluggish mold,
Be (what they never were before)—be sold!
Should some rich bard, (but such a monster now,
In modern physics, we can scarce allow,) Should some pretending scribbler of the court,
Some rhyming peer—there's plenty of the sort—
All but one poor dependent priest withdrawn,
(Ah! too regardless of his chaplain's yawn!) Condemn that unmemory, lend to recite
Their last dramatic work by candle-light,
How would the preacher turn each rueful leaf,
Dull as his sermons, but not half so brief!
Yet, since 'tis promised at the rector's death,
He'll risk no living for a little breath.

"I beg Nathaniel's pardon; he is not a cobbler; he is a tailor, but begged Capell Loft to sink the profession in his praise to two pair of paste—pads of canvas, which he wished the public to try on; but the slave of a saxon let it out, and so for saved the expense of an advertisement to his country com-mongers.——Mr. "Morality" s white's was nothing to all this. The "Della Crusca," were people of some distinction, and no profession; but these Ar-nodus ("Arionus obus"—bumpkins both) sold out their native miserers without the smallest alloy, and leave all the shoes and smallclothes in the path unshod, to pick up Elgesiers on Roscmun and Presia powder.
Sitting up a shoemaker, they describe diffici of battle, when the only blood they ever saw was shed from the finger; and an "Essay on War" is produced by the ninth part of a "past.""

"And own that wise poet wrote a "Tune."

Did Nathan ever read that line of Pope? and if he did, why not take it as his motto?

! This well-meaning gentleman has spoiled some excellent shoemakers, and been accessory to the poetical unlamenting of many of the instructious poor.
Nathaniel Boofield and his brother Bobby have set all Romerumans singing long; nor has the melody confused itself so much. Poetess too, (who once was wise,) has caught the contage of plagiarize, and decyred a poor fellow named Illison into poetry; but he had during the operation, inhered seen child and two volumes of "Remains" lately deviutan. The girl, if she don't take a poetical twist, and come forth as a shortmaking Sophpa, may do well; but the "exigens" are as richly as if they had been the offspring of an Enol or a Samsonian prize poete. The patrons of this poor lad are certainly unwarrantable for his mould, and it ought to be an indicible offence. But this is the least they have done for, by a refinement of baseness, they have made the (same) man posthumous ridiculous, by printing what he would have had some enough to keep himself honest. Corus these rangers of "Remains" more under the statute against "recreation men." What does it signify when on a poor, poor, dead, dead verses he is stuck up in "Bragman's" or "Ruffman's"
"Bed? Is it so bad to mourn his bones as his blunderers? Is it not better to gobble his body on a heap, than his soul in an octave? "We know what we are, but we know not what we may be; " and it is to be hoped we never shall know, if a man who has passed through life with a sort of edict, is to find himself a mountebank on the other side of Sty, and made, like poor Joe Blackett, the laugher of publications. This tale of publics is to prove-ly for the child; now, might not some of this "Sister ultra Cribbens's" friends and seducers have done a decent action without inveigling Prius into biography? And then his licentiousness, and his real confidence! To the Duchess of Somerset, the Right Hon. So-and-So, and Mrs. and Miss Somebody; these volumes are, the, etc., etc.,—why, this is doing out the '"soft milk of dedication's' in gills,—there is but a word or two divides it to a great degree. Why, Priest, but thou not a puff-top? Dost thou think six families of Biblemen can share this in quiet?—there's a child, a book, and a dedication; read the girl in the grave, the yawn to the grocer, and the dedication to the lady.

* Here will Mr. Gifford allow me to introduce once more to his notice the sole survivor of the "ultimae Romanorum, the last of the "Crusca"?—
"Edwin," the "professor," by our Lady of Parliament! here he is as lively as in the days of "well said! Babelic the Correct." I thought Plutus had been the tail of poetry, but, alas! he is only the penultimate.

A FAMILAR EPISTLE TO THE EDITOR OF THE MORNING CHRONICLE.

"What means of paper, floods of ink,
Do some men spoil, who never think!
And so perhaps you'll say of me,
In which your readers may agree.
Tell me, why not, and tell you why?
Nothing's so bad, you don't deny,
But may laureate or entertain,
Without the risk of giving pain.
And should you dare to doubt me, I,
The same of Camden I Swett,
Who nows read, and all volunteer'd
Here be and some share some gaud's gal'd
Then why not I indulge my pen,
Though I au fame or profit gain,
Yet may serve your little men!
Of whom, though some may be severe,
Others may read without a tear!
Such must remain; I next proceed
To give you what I feel my creed,
And in what follows to display
Some branches of the poisoning lay.

ON SOME MODERN QUICKS AND REFORMISTS.

In tracing of the human mind
Through all its various courses,
Though strange, 'tis true, we often find
It know not its resources
And men through life assume a part
For which so seldom they possesss,
Yet wonder that, with all their art,
They meet no better with success.
'Tis thus we see, through life's career,
So few excel in their profession;
Whereas, would each man but appear
To what's within his own powers,
Hints from Horace.

Then spouts and foams and cries at every line,
(Th3 Lord forgive him.) "Bravo! grand! divine!"
Hearse with those prayers, (which, by flat'ry fed, Dependence barter for her bitter bread,)
He strides and stamps along with breaking foot,
Till the door echoes his emphatic foot;
Then sits again, then rolls his pious eye,
As the dying viceroy will not die!
Nor feels, forsooth, emotion at his heart; —
But all dissenters overact their part.

Ye who aspire to build the lofty rhyme,
Believe not all who had your false "sublime,"
But if some friend shall hear your work, and say,
"Expunge that stanza, lop that line away."
And, after fruitless efforts, you return
Without amendment, and he answers "Burn!"
That instant throw your paper in the fire,
Ask not his thoughts, or follow his desire;
But if (true bard!) you scorn to descend,
And will not alter what you can't defend,
If you will breed this bastard of your brains,—
We'll have no words—I've only lost my pains.

Yet, if you only prize your favorite thought
As critics kindly do, and authors ought;
If your cool friend annoy you now and then,
And cross whole pages with his pugil pen;
No matter, throw your ornaments aside—
Better let him than all the world persuade.
Give light to passages too much in shade,
Nor let a doubt obscure one verse you've made;
Your friend's "a Johnson," not to leave one word,
However trifling, which may seem absurd;
Such erring trifles lead to serious ills,
And furnish food for critics, or their quills.

Argut ambiguous dictum: mutanda notabit;
Fiet Aristarchus: nec dicet, Cur ego amicum
Offendam in mugis? Nee nunc semper ducent
In mala deruam semel exceptunque sinistre.
Ut mala quem scabiei aut morbus regius urges,
As the Scotch fiddle, with its touching tune,
Or the sad influence of the angry moon,
All men avoid bad writers' ready tongue;
As yawning waiters fly* Pitascribile's lungs;
Yet on he mouths—ten minutes—cudgel each
As prelate's homily or placeman's speech;
Long as the last years of a lingering lease,
When riot pauses until rents increase.
While such a minstrel, muttering fustian, strays
O'er hedge and ditch, through unfrequented ways.
If by some chance he walks into a well,
And shouts for succor with stentorian yell,
"A rope! help, Christians, as ye hope for grace!"
Nor woman, man, nor child will stir a pace;—
For there his carcass he might freely dig,
From frenty, or the humor of the thing;
Though this has hap'ned to more hard's than one,
I'll tell you Budgell's story and have done.

Budgell a rogue and rhymer for no good.
(Unless his case be much misunderstood,)
When teased with creditors' continual claims,
"To die like Catob,"* leap into the Thames—
And therefore be it lawful through the town
For any bard to poison, hang or drown.
Who saves the intended suicide receives
Small thanks from him who loathes the life he leaves;
And, sooth to say, mad poets must not lose
The glory of that death they freely choose.

Nor is it certain that some sort of verse
Prick not the poets conscience as a curse;
Dosed with vile dramas on Sunday he was found,
Or got a child on consecrated ground!

Aut fanaticus error et iraena Dina,
Vesanum tegitae timet fugitae sequuntur.
Hic dam sublines versus ructurat, et errat,
Si velitur merita decidunt aequae.
In putem, favesuan: licet, Succurritte, longum
Clanet, Io cives! non sit qui tollere curet.
Si quis curet opem ferre, et demittire funem,
Qui sci an pars hae se dejicerit, atque

Narrabo interitum. Deus immortalis haberi
Dun cupit Empedocles, ardentem frigidus.
Insiluit: sit jus, licetique perire poetis:
Invidia qui servat, idem facit occidenti.
Nec semel hoc fecit; nec, si retractus erit, jam
Fiet homo, et ponet famosae mortis amorem
Nec satis apparat cur versus factetis: utrum
Minervit in patriis cineres, an triste bidental

* And the "walkers" are the only fortunate people who can "fly" through all the rest, viz., the by-standers who are compelled, by courtesy, to sit out the redactions, without a hope of excusing:
"Sie (that is, by clacking Fitz, with bad wine or worse poetry) ist von servitu Apollo!"

* On his table were found these words: What Cato said and Addison approved cannot be wrong. But Addison did not "approve," and if he had, it would not have mended the matter. He had invited his daughter on the same sort of party, but Miss Budgell, by some accident, escaped the noted attraction. Thus fell the synonym of "Achilles," and the enemy of Pope.

* If "dosed with," etc., be considered as low, I beg leave to refer to the medical for something will lower; and if any reader will translate "Miss e. patriae cineres," etc., into a decent couplet, I will accept said couplet in lieu of the nephew.

* For each man is who either appears to be what he is not, or strives to be what he is not.
And hence is haunted with a rhyming rage—
Fear'd like a bear just bursting from his cage.
If free, all fly his vertiginous fit,
Fatal at once to simpleton or wit:

Objectos caevea valuit si fragare clathros,
Indoctum doctunqua fugat recitator acerbus.

* D'Occie est propre commissia divina.—Mile. Dacier, Mile. de Berville, Boulain, and others, have left their dispute on the meaning of this passage in a treat considerably longer than the poem of Horace. It is printed at the close of the eleventh volume of Madame de Berville's Lettres, edited by Gravelot, Paris, 1786. Assuming that all who ever concern may venture an opinion on such subjects, particularly as so many who can not have taken the same liberty, I should have held my "fluttering candle" as awkwardly as another, had not my respect for the wit of Lucile the Genevoise's Augustan style inclin'd me to subjoin these illustrous authorities. [M. Boulain:] "Il est difficile de traiter des sujets qui sont à la portée de tout le monde d'une manière qui vous les rende propres, en qui s'appelle s'approprier un sujet par le tiers qu'on y donne." [M. Dacier:] "Mais il est bien difficile de dresser des traîts propres et intéressans aux éditeurs puramente possibles." [M. Dacier:] "Il est difficile de traiter convenablement ces caractères que tout le monde veut inventer." [M. de Berville's opinion and translation, consisting of

"Pallas te hos vulnera, Pallas Immalis, et param sorcerum ex angusta sumit,"

Athena, Cephalon Covenv, March 17, 1811.

Slow sinks, more lovely ere his race be run,
Along Morea's hills the setting sun;
Not, as in northern climes, obscurely bright,
But one unclouded blaze of living light;
O'er the hush'd deep the yellow beam he throws,
Gilds the green wave that trembles as it glows;
On old Argina's rock and Hydra's isle
The god of gladness sheds his parting smile;
O'er his own regions lingering loves to shine,
Though there his altars are no more divine.
Descending fast, the mountain-shadows kiss
Thy glorious gulf, unconqu'd Salamis!
Their azure arches through the long expanse,
More deeply purified, meet his mellowing glance,
And tenderest tints, along their summits driven,
Mark his gay course, and own the hues of heaven;
Till, darkly shaded from the land and deep,
Behind his Delphian rock he sinks to sleep.

On such an o've his palest beam he cast
When, Athens! here thy wisest look'd his last.

And how watch'd thy better sons his farewell ray,
That closed their murder'd sage's* latest day.
Not yet—not yet—Sol pauses on the hill,
The precious hour of parting lingers still;
But sad his light to agonizing eyes,
And dark the mountain's once delightful dyes
Gloom o'er the lovely land he seem'd to pour,
The land where Phoebus never frown'd before;
But ere he sunk below Citharion's head,
The cup of wo was quaff'd—the spirit fled;
The soul of him that scorn'd to fear or fly,
Who lived and died as none can live or die.

But, lo! from high Hymentus to the plain
The queen of night asserts her silent reign;†
No murky vapor, herald of the storm,
Hides her fair face, or gilds her glowing form.
With cornice glittering as the moonbeams play,
There the white column greets her grateful ray,

* Source's drunk the hemlock: a short time before sunset, (the hour of exeption), I notwithstanding the entreaties of his disciples to wait till the sun went down.
† The twilight in Greece is much shorter than in our own country; by day's in winter are longer, but in summer less duration.

As thus within the walls of Pallas’ face,
I mark’d the beauties of the land and hill,
Alone, and friendless, on the magic saire,
Whose arts and arms but live in poets’ lore:

Thrills the lone heart like echoes from the dead.
Long had I mused, and treasured every trace
The wreck of Greece recorded of her race,
When, lo! a giant form before me strode,
And Pallas hail’d me in her own abode!

Yes, ’twas Minerva’s self; but, ah! how changed
Since o’er the Dardan field in arms she raged!
Not such as erst, by her divine command,
Hers form appeared from Phidias’ plastic hand;
Gone were the terrors of her awful brow,
Her idle agis bore no Gorgon now;
Her helm was dinted, and the broken lance
Seem’d weak and shaftless e’en to mortal glance;
The olive branch, which still she deign’d to clasp,
Shrunk from her touch, and wither’d in her grasp;
And, ah! though still the brightest of the sky,
Celestia’ tears bedim’d her large blue eye;
Bound the rent casque her owlet circled slow,
And mourn’d his mistress with a shriek of wo!

"Mortal!" ’twas thus she spake—"that blush of shame

* This is spoken of the city in general, and not of the Acropolis in particular; the temple of Jupiter Olympus, by some supposed the Parthenon, was finished by Hadrian; sixteen columns are standing, of the most beautiful marble and architecture.

* His thirteenth name, and that of one who no longer bears it, are carved on a stele on the Parthenon: above, in a part not far distant, are the bent remnants of the brazen figure destroyed in a wild attempt to remove them.

As once, of yore, in some obnoxious place,
I can names (if found) had saved a wretched race."

"Mortal!" the blue-eyed maid resumed, "once
Bear back my mandate to thy native shore. Yet
Though fallen, alas! this vengeance yet is mine,
To turn my counsels far from lands like thine.
Fear then in silence Pallas' stern bohèst;
And fear and believe, for time will tell the rest."

"First on the head of him who did this deed
My curse shall light, on him and all his seed:
Without one spark of intellectual fire,
Be all the sons as senseless as the sire:
If one with wit the parent brood disgrace,
Believe him a bastard of a brighter race:
Still with his hirpling artists let him prate
And Folly's praise repay for Wisdom's hate;
Long of their patron's gusto let them tell,
Whose noblest, native gusto is—to sell:
To sell, and make—may Shamo record the day!
The state receiver of his pilder'd prey.
Meantime, the flatterimg, feeble dotard, West,
Europe's worst dauber, and poor Britain's best,
With pecked hand shall turn each model o'er,
And own himself an infant of fourscore.
Be all the bruisee cull'd from all St. Gile's,
That art and nature may compare their styles;
While brawny brutes in stupid wonder stare,
And marvel at his lordship's 'stone shop'† there.
Round the throng'd gate shall sauntering coxcombs creep,
To lunge and luaborate, to prate and peep;
While many a languid maid, with longing sigh,
On giant statues casts the curious eye:
The room with transient glance appears to skim,
Yet marks the mighty back and length of limb;
Mourns o'er the difference of now and then:
Exclaims, 'These Greeks indeed were proper men!
Draws sly comparisons of these and those,
And envies Lais all her Attic beaux.
When shall a modern maid have swains like these!
Alas! Sir Harry is no Hercules!
And last of all, amidst the gaping crew,
Some calm spectator, as he takes his view,
In silent indignation mix'd with grief,
Advises the plunder, but abhors the thief.
Oh, loathed in life, nor pardon'd in the dust,
May hate pursue, his sacrilegious lust!
Link'd with the fool that fired the Ephesian dome,
Shall vengeance follow far beyond the tomb,
And Eratostratus and Elgin shine
In many a banding page and burning line;
Alas reserved for aye to stand accurst,
Perchance the second blacker than the first.

"So let him stand, through ages yet unborn,
Fix'd statue on the pedestal of Scorn;
Though not for him alone revenge shall wait,
But fits thy country for her coming fate:
Hers were the deeds that taught her lawless son
To do to what oft Britannia's self had done.
Lock to the Baltic—blazing from afar,
Your old ally yet mourns perilous war,
Not to such deeds did Pallas lend her aid,
Or break the compact which herself hath made,
Far from such counsels, from the faithless field,
She fled—but left behind her Gorgon shield:
A fatal gift, that turn'd your friends to stone,
And left lost Albion hated and alone.

"Look to the East, where Ganges' swarthy race
Shall shake your tyrant empire to its base;
Lo! there Rebellion rears her ghastly head,
And glares the Nemesis of native dead;
Till Indus rolls a deep purpureal flood,
And claims his long arrear of northern blood
So may ye perish—Pallas, when she gave
Your free-born rights, forbode ye to enslave.

"Look on your Spain!—she claps the hand of hate,
But boldly claps, and thrusts you from her gates
Bear witness, bright Barossa! thon canst tell
Whose were the sons that bravely fought and fell.
But Lusitania, kind and dear ally,
Can spare a few to fight, and sometimes fly.
Oh glorious field! by Famine fiercely won,
The Gaul retreats for once, and all is done!
But when did Pallas teach that one retreat
Retrieved three long olympiads of defeat?

"Look last at home—ye love not to look there
On the grim smile of comfortless despair:
Your city saddens; loud though Revel howls,
Here Famine faints, and yonder Rapine prowls.
See all alike of more or less bereft;
No misers tremble when there's nothing left.
'Dlest paper credit,'* who shall dare to sing?
It clogs like lead Corruption's weary wing.
Yet Pallas pluck'd each premier by the ear,
Who gods and men alike disdain'd to hear;
But one, repentant o'er a bankrupt state,
On Pallas calls, but calls, alas! too late:
Then raves for ; to that Mentor bends,
Though he and Pallas never yet were friends.
Him senators hear, whom never yet they heard,
Contemptuous o'er, and now no less absurd.
So once of yore, each reasonable frog
Sware faith and fealty to his sovereign 'log.'
Thus hail'd your rulers their patron clod,
As Egypt chose an onion for a god."

"Now fare ye well! enjoy your little hour;
Go, grasp the shadow of your vanish'd power;
Gloss o'er the failure of each fondest scheme;
Your strength a name, your bloated wealth a dream
Gone is that gold, the marvel of mankind,
And pirates barter all that's left behind.†
No more the hirelings, purchased near and far,
Crowd to the ranks of mercenary war.
The idle merchant on the useless quay,
Droops o'er the bales no bark may bear away!
Or, back returning, sees rejected stores,
Rut piece.Ceal on his own encumber'd shores:
The starved mechanic breaks his rusting loan
And desperate mans him 'gainst the common doom
Then in the senate of your sinking state,
Show me the man whose counsels may have weight † Poor Cobb was sadly puzzled when exhibited at E.—House: he was told if it was not a stone shop?—'He was right, it is a shop.

* "Blest paper credit! how sad but supply,
That binds Corruption lighter who's to fly?"—Page 8.
† The D'Eal and Dover thriftless in store.
Vain is each voice where tones could once command;
E'en factions cease to charm a factious land;
Yet jarring sects converse a sister isle,
And light with maddening hands the mutual pile.

"Tis done, 'tis past, since Pallas warns in vain,
The furies seize her abdicated reign:
Wid' o'er the realm they wave their kindling brands,
And wring her vitals with their fiery hands.
But one convulsive struggle still remains,
And Gaul shall weep ere Albion wears her chains.
The banner'd pomp of war, the glittering files,
O'er whose gay trappings stern Bellona smiles;
The frozen trump, the spirit-stirring drum,
That bid the foe defiance ere they come;
The hero bounding at his country's call,
The glorious death that decorates his fall,
Swell the young heart with visionary charms,
And bids it antedote the joys of arms.

But know a lesson you may yet be taught,
With death alone are laurels cheaply bought:
Not in the conflict Havoc seeks delight,
His day of mercy is the day of light.
But when the field is fought, the battle won,
Though drench'd with gore, his woes are but beg in
His deeper deeds as yet ye know by name;
The slaughter'd peasant and the ravish'd dame,
The rifled mansion and the foe-reap'd field,
Ill suit with souls at home, untaught to yield.
Say with what eye along the distant down
Would flyingburghers mark the blazing town?
How view the column of ascending flames
Shake his red shadow o'er the startled Thames?
Nay, frown not, Albion! for the torch was thine
That lit such pyres from Tagus to the Rhine.
Now should they burst on thy devoted coast,
Go, ask thy bosom who deserves them most.
The law of heaven and earth is life for life.
And she who raised, in vain regrets the strife."

THE WALTZ:

AN APOSTROPHIC HYMN.

Sir,
I am a country gentleman of a midland county, I might have been a parliament-man for a certain borough, having had the offer of as many votes as General T. at the general election in 1812.* But I was all for domestic happiness; as, fifteen years ago, on a visit to London, I married a middle-aged maid of honor. We lived happily at Hornem Hall till last season, when my wife and I were invited by the Countess of Walsawey (a distant relation of my spouse) to pass the winter in town. Thinking no harm, and our girls being come to a marriageable (or as they call it, marketable) age, and having besides a Chancery suit inveritable entailed upon the family estate, we came up in our old chariot, of which by the by, my wife grew so much ashamed in less than a week, that I was obliged to buy a second-hand barouche, of which I might mount the box, Mrs. H. says, if I could drive, but never see the inside—that place being reserved for the Honorable Augustus Uptoe, her partner-general and opera-knight. Hear.

* State of the poll, first day, 5.

* My Lady is all forgotten, if a man can be said to have forgotten what he never remembered; but I bought my talent-paper notes of a Catholic priest for a shilling blind token, after much buggling for the same obloge. I grogged the money to a couple, being all for the memory of Terrence; and "No popery," and quite regretting the downfall of the popes, because we can't burn him any more.

you see they are valtzing! or valtzing, (I forget which;) and then up she got, and her mother and sister, and away they went, and round-abouted it till supper-time. Now that I know what it is, I like it of all things, and so does Mrs. H. (though I have broken my shins, and four times overturned Mrs. Hornem's maid, in practising the preliminary steps in a morning.) Indeed, so much do I like it, that having a turn for rhyme, tastily displayed in some election ballads, and songs in honor of all the victories, (but till lately I have had little practice in that way,) I sat down, and with the aid of W. F. Esg, and a few hints from Dr. B. (whose recitations I attend, and am monstrous fond of Master B.'s manner of delivering his father's late successful "D. L. Address," I composed the following hymn, wherewithal to make my sentiments known to the public, whom, nevertheless, I heartily despise as well as the critics.

I am, Sir, yours, &c. &c. HORACE HORNEM.

Muse of the many-twinkling feet * whose charms Are now extended up from legs to arms; Terpsichore!—too long misdeem'd a maid— Reproachful term—bestowed but to upraid— Henceforth in all the bronze of brightness shine, The least a vestal of the virgin Nine. Far be from thee and the name of pride; Mock'd, yet triumphant; sneer'd at, unadjudged— Thy legs must move to conquer as they fly, If but thy feet are reasonably dry.

Thy breast—if bare enough—requires no shield— Dance forth—sans armour thou shalt take the field. And own—impregnable to most assaults Thy not too lawfully begotten "Waltz."

* "Glance at their many-twinkling feet."—Gray.

† To rival Lord W. F., or his nephew A., as the reader please;—the one gained a pretty woman, whom he desired, by fighting for; and the other has been fighting in the Peninsula many a long day, "by shrewd garter clock," without gaining anything in that country but the title of "the Great Lord," I say, and the Lord, whose reasons of applying, having been hinted at, applied only to that Being to whom "To Deume" for carnage are the rankest blasphemy,—it is presumed the general will one day return to his Shakespear turn; more To tome the genius of the stubborn plain, Almost as perhaps he conquer'd Spain!"

The I and Peterborough corresponded comments in a summer we do more countries both to conquer and lose them in a shorter season. If the great Lord's "Concentration progress in agriculture be no speedier than the proper Great average of time in Pope's copied, it will, according to the farmer's provost, be "pounding with dogs."

By the by—one of these illusorium person's new titles is forgotten—it be however, worth remembering—"Whidower did mankind!!" credulous, posterity! which the paymasters have been induced to induce as the habitations of the Peninsulars is, as name of a man who has not yet ascertained them—query—are they worth saving, even in this world? For, according to the minute mutilations of any Christian crown, those three words make the whole much against them in the next. "Bourbiers of the world," quotes J—were to be wished that he, or any other, could save a corner of r.-u. country. Yet this stupid, unimaginative, although it was the near connection between associations and longevity, so he has his use, that it proves there can be little to dread from those Catholics (in parochial Catholic too) who can confer such an appellation on a Preceptor. I suppose that year he will be entitled the "Virgin Mary!" if so Lord George Gordon himself would have nothing to object to such liberal extracts of our Lady of Lightfield.

Hail, nimble nymph! to whom the young hussar. The whiskey'd-vortany of waltz and war, His night devotes, despite of spur and boots; A sight unmatch'd since Orpheus and his brute:

Hail, spirit-stirring Waltz!—beneath whose bare and Modern a hero fought for modest manners; On Hounslow's heath to rival Wellesley's fame Cock'd—Fred and mis'd his name but gain'd his aim;

Hail moving muse! to whom the fair one's breast gives all it can, and bids us take the rest.

Oh! for the flow of Busby, or of Fitz,
The latter's loyalty, the former's wit,
To "energize the object I pursue;"
And give both Belial and his dance their due!

Imperial Waltz! imported from the Rhine,
(Famed for the growth of pedigrees and wine,) Long be thine import from all duty free,
And if itself be less esteem'd than thee;
In some few qualities alike—for hook
Improves our cellar—thou our living stock.
The head to hawk belongs—thy subtler art
Intoxicates alone the heedless heart;
Through the full veins thy gentler poison swims,
And wakes to wantonness the willing limbs.

Oh Germany! how much to thee we owe,
As heaven-born Pitt can testify below,
Ere cursed confederation made thee France's,
And only left us thy d—d debts and dances! Of subsidies and Hanover berte,
We bless thee still—for George the Third is left!
Of kings the best—and last, not least in worth,
For graciously begetting George the Fourth.
To Germany, and highnesses serene,
Who owe us millions—don't we owe the queen?
To Germany, what owe we not besides?
So oft bestowing Brunswickers and bridles;
Who paid for vulgar, with her royal blood,
Drawn from the stem of each Teutonic stud:
Who sent us—so be pardon'd all her faults—
A dozen dukes—some kings—a queen—and Waltz.

But peace to her—her emperor and diet,
Though now transferred to Buonaparte's "flat!"
Back to my theme—O Muse of motion say,
How first to Albion found thy Waltz her way?

Borne on the breath of Hyperborean gales,
From Hamburg's port, (while Hamburg yet had mails.)

Ere yet un lucky Fame—compell'd to creep
To snowy Gottingham—was chill'd to sleep;
Or starting from her slumbers, deign'd arise,
Heligoland! to stock thy mart with lies;
While unburnt Moscow yet had news to send,
Nor owed her fiery exult to a friend,

* The patriotic motto of our enslaved allies cannot be sufficiently commended to American emigration. Among other details omitted in the various descriptions of our eloquent ambassador, he did not state, (being too much occupied with the explorations of Col. C, in swimming river from, and grappling over mails impassable,) that one entire province petitioned by families in the most melancholy manner, as follows—In General Haukolin's communication with the consumption of tobacco and tea was so great, that the market was inadequate to the demand, and that one hundred and thirty thousand persons were starved to death, by being reduced in some series diet? The lamplighters of London have since obtained a just price for each piece, and the tailor-coughs have unanimously wished a quantity of better models (four to the pound) to the relief of the sufferingSubjects by scarcity will soon, by such exertions, and a proper attention to the sale-
THE WALTZ.

She came—Waltz came—and with her certain sets
Of true despatches, and as true gazettes;
Then famed of Austerlitz the blest despatch,
Whi.b Moniteur or Morning Post can match:
And—almost crush'd beneath the glorious news—
Ten plays, and forty tales of Kotzebue's;
One envoy's letters, six composers' airs,
And loads from Frankfort and from Leipzig fairs;
Neimer's four volumes upon woman-kind,
Like Lapland witches to ensure a wind;
Brunck's heaviest tome for ballast, and, to back it
Of Heyne, such as should not sink the packet.
Fraught with this cargo—and her fairest freight,
Delightful Waltz, on tiptoe for a mate,
The welcome vessel reach'd the genial strand,
And round her flock'd the daughters of the land.
Not decent David, when, before the ark,
His grand pas-seul excited some remark;
Not love-born Quixote, when his Sancho thought
The knight's fandango, friskier than it ought;
Not soft Herodias, when with winning tread
Her nimble feet danced of another's head;
Not Cleopatra on her galley's deck,
Display'd so much of leg, or more of neck,
Than thou, ambrosial Waltz, when first the moon
Beheld thee twirling to a Saxon tune!

To you, ye husbands of ten years! whose brows
Ache with the annual tributes of a spouse;
To you of nine years less, who only bear
The budding sprouts of those that you shall wear,
With added ornaments roll'd
Of native brass, or law-awarded gold;
To you, ye matrons, ever on the watch
To mar a son's, or make a daughter's match:
To you, ye children of whom chance accords—
Always the ladies, and sometimes their lords;
To you, ye single gentlemen, who seek
Torments for life, or pleasures for a week;
As Love or Hymen your endeavors guide,
To gain your own, or snatch another's bride—
To one and all the lovely stranger came,
And every ball-room echoes with her name.

Endearing Waltz—! to thy more melting tone
Bow Irish jig and ancient rigadoon.
Scotch reels, avaint! and country-dance, forgo
Your future claims to each fantastic toe!
Waltz—Waltz alone—both legs and arms demand
Liberal of feet, and lavish of her hands;
Hands which may freely range in public sight
Where never before—but—pray put out the light.
Methinks the glare of yonder chandelier
Shines much too far—or I am much too near:
And true, though strange—Waltz whispers this remark,
"My slippery steps are, safest in the dark!
"But here the muse with due decorum falls,
And lends her longest petticoat to Waltz.

Observant travellers of every time!
Ye quartos publish'd upon every clime!
O say, shall dull Romaika's heavy round,
Fandango's wriggle, or Bolero's bound;
Can Egypt's Almas—tantalizing group—
Columbia's capers to the warlike whom

Can aught from cold Kamasekta to Cape Horn
With Waltz compare, or after Waltz be borne?
Ah no! from Morier's pages down to Galt's,
Each tourist pens a paragraph for "Waltz."

Shades of those belles whose reign began of yore,
With George the Third's—and ended long before!
—Though in your daughters' daughters yet you thrive
Burst from your lead, and be yourselves alive.
Back to the ball-room sped your spectred host;
Fool's Paradise is dull to that you lost.
No treacherous powder bids conjecture quak;
No stifl-starch'd stays make meddling fingers ache (Transfer'd to those ambigous things that ape Goats in their visage,* women in their shape;)
No damask fanteins when rather closely press'd,
But more carressing seems when most care'sd
Superfluous harts horn, and reviving salts,
Both banish'd by the sovereign cordial "Waltz."

Seductive Waltz!—though on thy native shore
Even Werter's self proclaim'd thee half a whore;
Werter—to decent vice though much inclined,
Yet war, not wanton; dazzled, but not blind—
Though gentle Genius, in her striph with Stael,
Would even prescribe thee from a Paris ball;
The fashion hails—from courtesses to queens
And maids and valets Waltz behind the scenes
Wide and more wide thy witching circle spread.
And turns—if nothing else—at least our heads;
With thee even clumsy cats attempt to bounce,
And cockneys practice what they can't pronounce.
Gods! how the glorious theme my strain excites,
And rhyme and partner rhyme in praise of "Waltz."

Blest was the time Waltz chose for her d-but
The court, the Regent, like herself were new;
New face for friends, for foes some new rewards,
New ornaments for black and royal guards;
New laws to hang the rogues that roard for base
New coins (most new) to follow those that fled
New victories—nor can we prize them less,
Though Jenky wonders at his own success;
New wars, because the old succeed so well,
That most survivors envy those who fell;

* It cannot be complained now, as in the Lady Beaufrem's time, a 26 "Sieur de la Cruz," that there be "no whiskers;" but now for these are indications of valor in the field, or elsewhere, may still be questionable. Much may be and has been avouched on tech sides. In the older wise philosophers had whiskers; and squires none.—Siege of Calabar taught his howe eye backwoods without a beard; but Adrian, the emperor, wore a bound (having war's on his chin, which neither the emperor holds nor even the priests could subdue.)—Treguren had whiskers, Marlowe's not.—Besanose is unwhiskered, the Regent whiskered;—"argal" greatness of mind and whiskers may or may not go together—but certain the different occurrences, since the growth of the last mentioned, go farther in behalf of whiskers than the anthem of Anselm did against long hair in the reigns of Henry I.

Formerly red was a forlorn color. See Ledward Barry's comedy of Ham Aley, 1661, Act i. Scene 1.

"Taffeta. Now, for a wage.—What colored head comes next by the window?"

"Adrianus, A black man's, I think."

"Taffeta. I think not so; I thik a red, for that is most in fashion"

There is "nothing new under the sun;" but red, then a taffeta, has now ousted into a fashionable color.

† An incendiary—Waltz and the battle of Austerlitz are before sold to have opened the ball together; the hand means, (if he means any thing, Waltz was not so much in vogue at all the Regent and the soul of his popularity, Waltz, the comet, whiskers, and the new government, illuminated heavens and earth, in all their glory, much about the same time of the comet only has disappeared; the other three continue to astonish us still.

† Among others was a new grapevine—a creditable vote now forthcoming worth a pound, in paper, at the fairest calculation.
New mistresses—no, old—and yet 'tis true,
Though they be old, the thing is something new;
Each new, quite new—(except some ancient tricks,)*
New white-sticks, gold-sticks, broom-sticks, all new sticks!
With vests or ribbands—deck'd alike in hue,
New troopers strut, new turncoats blush in blue:
So saith the muse—my—,† what say you?
Such was the time when Waltz might best maintain
Her new preferments in this novel reign;
Such was the time, nor ever yet was such;
Hoops are no more, and petticoats saf wash;
Morals and minuets, virtue and her stays,
And tell-tale powder—all have had their days.
The ball begins—the honors of the house
First duly done by daughter or by spouse,
Some potentate—or royal or serene—[men.
With Kent's gay grace, or saucy Gloucester's
Leads forth the ready dame, whose rising flush
Might once have been mistaken for a blush.
From where the garb just leaves the bosom free,
That spot where hearts were once supposed to be;
Round all the confines of the yielded waist,
The strangest hand may wander undisplaced;
The lady's in return may grasp as much
As princely panaches offer to her touch.
Pleased round the chalky floor how well they trip,
One hand reposing on the royal hip:
The other to the shoulder no less royal
Ascending with affection truly loyal!
Thus front to front the partners move or stand,
The foot may rest, but none withdraw the hand;
And all in turn may follow in their rank,
The Earl of—Asterisk—and Lady—Blank;
Sir Such-a-one—with those of fashion's host,
For whose heirs surnames—vide "Morning Post;"
(Or if for that impartial print too late, [date,] Search Doctors' Commons six months from my
Thus all and each, in movemont soft or slow,
The genial countess gently undergo;

Till some might marvel with the modest Turk,
If "nothing follows all this palming work?"†
True, honest-Mirza!—you may trust my rhyme—
Something does follow at a litter time;
The breast thus publicly resign'd to man,
In private may resist him—if it can.

O ye who loved our grandmothers of yore,
Fitzpatrick, Sheridan, and many more!
And thou, my prince! whose sovereign taste was will
It is to love the lovely beldames still!
Thou ghost of Queensbury! whose judging sprite
Satan may spare to peep a single night,
Pronounce—if ever in your days of bliss
Asmodeus struck so bright a stroke as this;
To teach the young ideas how to rise,
Flush in the cheek and languish in the eyes,
Rush to the heart and lighten through the frame,
With half-told wish and ill-dissembled flame;
For prurient nature still will storm the breast—
Who, tempted thus, can answer for the rest?

But ye—who never felt a single thought
For what our morals are to be or ought;
Who wisely wish the charms you view to reap,
Say—would you make those beauties quite so cheap;
Hot from the hands promiscuously applied,
Round the slight waist, or down the glowing side,
Where were the rapture then to clasp the form
From this lowd grasp and lawless contact warm?
At once love's most endearing thought resign,
To press the hand so press'd by none but thine;
To gaze upon that eye which never met
Another's ardent look without regret;
Approach the lip which all, without restraint,
Come near enough—if not to touch—to kiss:
If such thou loves—love her then no more,
Or give—like her—careasses to a score;
Her mind with these is gone, and With it go
The little left behind it to bestow.

Voluptuous Waltz! and dare I thus blaspheme?!
Thy hard forgot thy praises were his theme.
Terpsichore, forgive!—at every ball
My wife now waltzes—and my daughters shall;
My son—(or stop)—tis needless to inquire—
Those little accidents should ne'er transpire;
Some ages hence our genealogic tree
Will wear as green a bough for him as me)—
Waltzing shall rear, to make our name anned,
Grandsons for me—in heirs to all his friends.

THE AGE OF BRONZE;

OR,

CARMEN SECULARE ET ANNUS HAUD MIRABILIS

"Imus Congressus Absibilis!"

I.

THE "good old times"—all times when old are good—
Are gone; the present might be if they would;
Great things have been, and are, and greater still Want little of mere mortals but their will;
A wider space, a greener field, is given
To those who play their "tricks before high heaven."
I know not if the angels weep, but men
Have wept enough—for what?—to weep again.

II.

All is exploded—be it good or bad,
Reader! remember when thou wert a lad,
Then Pitt was all; or, if not all, so much,
His very rival almost deem'd him such.
We, we have seen the intellectual race
Of giants stand, like Titans, face to face—
Athos and Ida, with a dashing sea
Of eloquence between, which flow'd all free,
As the deep billows of the Ægean roar
Betwixt the Hellenic and the Phrygian shore;
But where are they—the rivals?—a few feet
Of sullen earth divide each winding sheet.
How peaceful and how powerful is the grave
Which hushes all! a calm, unstormy wave
Which oversweeps the world. The theme is old
Of "Dust to dust;" but half its tale untold:
Time tempers not its terrors—still the worm
Winds its cold folds, the tomb preserves its form,
Varied above, but still alike below;
The urn may shine, the ashes will not glow,
Though Cleopatra's mummy cross the sea
O'er which from empire she lured Antony;
Though Alexander's urn a show be grown,
On shores he wept to conquer, though unknown—
How vain, how worse than vain, at length appear
The madman's wish, the Macedonian's tear!
He wept for worlds to conquer—half the earth

dknew not his name, or but his death, and birth,
And desolation; while his native Greece
Hath all of desolation save its peace.
He "wept for worlds to conquer!" he who ne'er
Conceived the globe, he panted not to spare!
With even the busy Northern Isle unknown,
Which holds his urn, and never knew his throne.

III.

But where is he, the modern, mightier far,
Who, born no king, made monarchs draw his car;
The new Sesostris, whose unharried's kings,
Freed from the bit, believe themselves with wings,
And spurn the dust o'er which they crawl'd of late,
Chain'd to the chariot of the chieftain's state?
Yes! where is he, the champion and the child
Of all that's great or little, wise or wild?
Whose game was empires, and whose stakes were thrones?

Whose table earth—whose dice were human bones!
Behold the grand result in yon lone isle,
And, as thy nature urges, weep or smile
Sigh to behold the eagle's lofty rage
Reduced to nibble at his narrow cage;
Smile to survey the queller of the nations
Now daily squabbling o'er disputed rations;
Weep to perceive him mourning, as he dines,
O'er curtail'd dishes and o'er stinted wines;
O'er petty quarrels upon petty things.
Is this the man who scourged or feasted kings?
Behold the scales in which his fortune hangs,
A surgeon's statement, and an earl's harangues
A bust delay'd, a book refused, can shake
The sleep of him who kept the world awake.
Is this indeed the tamer of the great,
Now slave of all could tease or irritate—

The pauly jailer and the prying spy,
The staring stranger with his note-book ne'rh!
Plunged in a dungeon, he had still been great
How low, how little was this middle state,
Between a prison and a palace, where

How few could feel for what he had to bear!
Vain his complaint, —my lord presents his bill,
His food and wine were doled out duly still:
Vain was his sickness, never was a clime
So free from homicide—to doubt's a crime;
And the stiff surgeon, who maintains'd his cause,
Had lost his place, and gained the world's applause.
But smile—though all the pangs of brain and heart
Disdain, defy, the tardy aid of art:
Though, save the few fond friends, and imaged face
Of that fair boy his sire shall ne'er embrace,
None stand by his low bed—though even the mind
Be wavering, which long swed and awes mankind;
Smile—for theetter'd eagle breaks his chain,
And higher worlds than this are his again.

IV.
How, if that soaring spirit still retain
A conscious twilight of his blazing reign,
How must he smile, on looking down, to see
The little that he was and sought to be?
What though his name a wider empire found
Than his ambition, though with scarce a bound;
Though first in glory, deepest in reverse,
He tasted empire's blessings and its curse;
Though kings, rejoicing in their late escape
From chains, would gladly be their tyrant's ape:
How must he smile, and turn to you lone grave,
The proudest sea-mark that o'ertops the wave!
What though his jailer, duteous to the last,
Scarce deem'd the coffin's lead could keep him fast,
Refusing one poor line along the lid,
To date the birth and death of all it hid;
That name shall hallow the ignoble shore,
A tombstone to all save him who bore
The fleets that sweep before the eastern blast
Shall hear their sea-boys hail it from the mast;
When Victory's Gallie column shall but rise,
Like Pomp'y's pillar, in a desert's skies,
The rocky isle that holds or held his dust
Shall crown the Atlantic like the hero's bust,
And mighty nature o'er his obsequies
Do more than niggard envy still denies,
But what are these to him? Can glory's lust
Touch the freed spirit or the fetter'd dust?
Small care hath he of what his tomb consists;
Nought if he sleeps—or more if he exists;
Allike the better-seeing Shade will smile
On the rude cavern of the rocky isle,
As if his ashes found their latest home
In Rome's Pantheon or Gaul's mimic dome.
He wants not this; but France shall feel the want
Of his last consolation, though so scant;
Her honor, fame, and faith demand his bones,
To rear above a pyramid of thrones;
Or carried onward in the battle's van,
To form, like Geselin's* dust, his tallisman.
But be it as it is—the time may come
His name shall beat the alarm, like Ziska's drum.

V.
Oh heaven! of which he was in power a feature,
Oh earth! of which he was a noble creature;
Thou isle! to be remember'd long and well,
That saw'st the ungod'd eagle chip his shell!

Ye Alps, which view'd him in his dawning flights
Hover, the victor of a hundred fights!
Thou Rome, who sawst thy Caesar's deeds outside
Alas! why past he too the Rubicon—
The Rubicon of man's awaken'd rights,
To herd with vulgar kings and parasites?
Egypt! from whose all dateless toms arose
Forgotten Pharaohs from their long repose,
And shook within their pyramids to hear
A new Cambyses thundering in their ear;
While the dark heart of forty ages stood
Like startled giants by NRe's famous flood;
Or from the pyramid's tall pinnacle
Behold the desert peoples, as from hell,
With clashing hosts, who stew'd the barren sand
To re-man to the unwatered land!
Spain! which, a moment mindless of the Cid,
Behold his banner flouting thy Madrid!
Austria! which saw thy twice-ta'en citadel
Twice spared, to be the traitress of his fall?
Ye race of Frederic! Frederic but in name
And falsehood—heirs to all except his fame;
Who, crush'd at Jena, crouch'd at Berlin, fell
First, and but rose to follow! Ye who dwell
Where Kosciusko dwelt, remembering yet
The unpaid amount of Catherine's bloody debt
Poland! o'er which the swelling angel pass,
But left thee as he found thee, still a waste,
Forgetting all thy still enduring claim,
Thy lofted people and extinguish'd name,
Thy sigh for freedom, thy long-flowing tear,
That sound that crashes in the tyrant's ear.
Kosciusko! On—on—on—the thrust of war
Gasps for the gore of serfs, and of their car.
The half barbaric Moscow's minarets
Gleam in the sun, but 'tis a sun that sets!
Moscow! thou limit of his long career,
For which rude Charles had kept his frozen tear
To see in vain—se saw thee—how? with spire
And palace fuel to one common fire.
To this, the soldier lent his kindling match,
To this the peasant gave his cottage thatch,
To this the merchant flung his hoarded store.
The prince his hall—and Moscow was no more!
Sublimest of volcanos! Etna's flame
Pales before thine, and quenchless Hecla's tame.
Velevusv shows his blaze, anusual sight
For gaping tourists, from his horizon's height:
Thou stand'st alone unrivall'd, till the fire
To come, in which all empires shall expire!
Thou other element! as strong and stern,
To teach a lesson conquerors will not learn
Whose icy wing flapp'd o'er the faltering fire,
Till fell a hero with each flake of snow;
How did thy mumbling beak and silent fang
Pierce, till hosts perish'd with a single pang;
In vain shall Seine look up along his banks
For the gay thousands of his dashing ranks.
In vain shall France recall beneath her vines
Her youth—then's dawn awaken'd 2nd faster than set wines;
Or stagnant in their human ice remains
In frozen mummies on the Polar plains.
In vain will Italy's broad sun awaken
Her offspring chill'd; its beams are now forsaken
Of all the trophies gather'd from the war,
What shall return?—the conqueror's broken car;
The conqueror's yet unbroken heart! Again
The horn of Roland sounds, and not in vain.

* Geselin died during the siege of a city; it surrendered, and one key was brought and laid upon his head, so that the place might appear rendered his own.
THE AGE OF BRONZE.

Lutzen, where fell the Swede of victory,
Behold's him conquer, but, alas! not die;
Dresden surveys three deserts fly once more
Before their sovereign,—sovereign as before;
But there exhausted Fortune quits the field,
And Leipsin's treason bids the unvanquish'd yield;
The Saxon jackal leaves the lion's side
To turn the bear's, and wolf's, and fox's, guide;
And backward to the den of his despair
The forest monarch shrinks, but finds no air!
Oh ye! and each, and all! Oh France! who found
Thy long fair fields, plough'd up as hostile ground,
Dispar'd foot by foot, till treason, still
His only victor, from Montmartre's hill
Look'd down o'er trampled Paris! and thou Isle,
Which seest Etruria from thy ramparts smile,
Thou momentary shelter of his pride,
Till woe'd by danger, this yet weeping bride!
Oh France! retaken by a single march,
Whose path was through one long triumphal arch!
Oh bloody and most boastless Waterloo!
Which proves how fools may have their fortune too,
Won half by blunder, half by treachery:
Oh dull Saint Helen! with thy jalter nigh—
Hear! hear Prometheus' from his rock appeal
To earth, air, ocean, all that felt or feel
His power and glory, all who yet shall hear
A name eternal as the rolling year;
He teaches them the lesson taught so long,
So oft, so vainly—learn to do no wrong!
A single step into the right had made
This man the Washington of worlds betray'd:
A single step into the wrong has given
His name a doubt to all the winds of heaven;
The reed of Fortune, and of thrones the rod,
Of fame the Moloch or the demigod;
His country's Cesar, Europe's Hannibal,
Without their door it dignity of fall.
Yet Vanity herself had better taught
A surer path even to the fame he sought,
By pointing out on history's fruitless page
Ten thousand conquerors for a single sage.
While Franklin's quiet memory climbs to heaven,
Calming the lightning which he thence hath riven,
Or drawing from the no less kindled earth
Freedom and peace to that which honors his birth;
While Washington's a watchword such as ne'er
Shall sink while there's an echo left to air:
While even the Spaniard's thirst of gold and war
Forgets Pizarro to shout Bolivar!
Alas! why must the same Atlantic wave
Which wafted freedom gird a tyrant's grave—
The king of kings, and yet of slaves the slave,
Who bursts the chains of millions to renew
The very fetters which his arm broke through,
And crush'd the rights of Europe and his own,
To sit between a dungeon and a throne?

VI.

But 'twil not be—the spark's awaken'd—lo!
The swarthy Spaniard feels his former glow;
The same high spirit which beat back the Moor
Through eight long ages of alternate gore
Revives—and where? in that avenging clime
Where Spain was once synonymous with crime,
Where Cortes' and Pizarro's banner flour,
The infant world redeems her name of "New."
The old aspiration breathed afresh,
To kindle souls within degraded flesh,
Such as repulsed the Persian from the shore
Where Greece was—No! she still is Greece no more.
One common cause makes myriads of one breast,
Slaves of the east, or helots of the west;
On Andes' and on Athos' peaks unfurl'd,
The self-same standard streams o'er each world;
The Athenian weans again Harmodius' sword;
The Chilli chief abjures his foreign lord;
The Spartan vows himself once more a Greek,
Youth Freedom plumes the crest of each cacique;
Debating despotisms, hemm'd on either shore,
Shrink vainly from the roused Atlantic's roar;
Through Calpe's strait the rolling tides advance,
Swept lightly by the half-tamed land of France,
Dash o'er the old Spaniard's cradle, and would fail
Unite Ausonia to the mighty main:
But driven from thence awhile, yet not for s'e,
Break o'er th' Igean, mindful of the day
Of Salamis!—there, there the waves arise,
Not to be lull'd by tyrant victories,
Lone, lost, abandoned in their utmost need
By Christians, unto whom they gave their creed.
The desolated lands, the ravaged isle,
The foster'd feud encouraged to beguile,
The aid evaded, and the cold delay,
Prolong'd but in the hope to make a prey:—
These, these shall tell the tale, and Greece can show
The false friend worse than the infuriate foe,
But this is well: Greeks only should free Greece
Not the Barbarian: with his mask of peace,
How should the autocrat of bondage be
The king of serfs, and set the nations free?
Better still serve the haughty Mussulman,
Than swell the Cossack's prowling caravan;
Better still toil for master's, than await,
The slave of slaves, before a Russian gate,—
Number'd by hordes, a human capital,
A live estate, existing but for thrall,
Lotted by thousands, as a meet reward
For the first courtier in the czar's regard;
While their immediate owner never tastes
His sleep, amid dreaming of Siberia's wastes;
Better succumb even to their own despair,
And drive the camel than purvey the bear.

VII.

but not alone within the hoariest clime
Where Freedom dates her birth with that of Time
And not alone, where, plunged in night, a crowd
Of Incas darken to a dubious cloud,
The dawn revives: renown'd, romantic Spain
Holds back the invader from her soil again.
Not now the Roman tribe nor Punic horde
Demand her fields as lists to prove the sword;
Not now the Vandal or the Visigoth
Pollute the plains, alike abhorring both;
Nor old Peluyo on his mountain rears,
The warlike fathers of a thousand years.
That seed is sown and reap'd, as oft the Moor
Signs to remember on his dusky shore.
Long in the peasant's song or poet's page
Has dwelt the memory of Abencerrage;
The Zegri, and the captive victors, flung Back to the barbarous realm from whence they

I refer the reader to the first address of Prometheus in Aeschylus, where he is left alone to his torments, and before the arrival of the Chorus of Sighs.
But these are gone— their faith, their swords, their sway,
Yet left more antichristian foes than they;
The bigot monarch and the butcher priest,
The inquisition, with her burning founts,
The faith's red "auto," fed with human fuel,
While sate the Catholic Moloch, calmly cruel,
Enjoying, with inexorable eye,
That fiery festival of agony!
The stern or feeble sovereign, one or both;
By turns; the haughtiness whose pride was sloth;
The long degenerate noble; the debased
Hidalgo, and the peasant less disgraced,
But mer: degraded; the unpeopled realm
The once proud navy which forgot the helm;
The once impervious phalanx disarray'd;
The idle forge that form'd Toledo's blade;
The foreign wealth that flow'd on ev'ry shore,
Save hers who earned it with the natives' gore;
The very language which might vie with Rome's,
And once was known to nations like their home's,
Neglected or forgotten;—such was Spain;
But such she is not, nor shall be again.
These worst, these home invaders, felt and feel
The new Numantine soul of old Castile.
Up! up again! undaunted Tauridor!
The bull of Phalaris roars his roar;
Mount, chivalrous Hidalgo! not in vain
Revive the cry—"Iago! and close Spain!" *
Yes, close her with your armed bosoms round,
And form the barrier which Napoleon found,—
The exterminating war, the desert plain,
The streets without a tenant, save the slain;
The wild sierra, with its wilder troop
Of vulture-plumed guerrillas, on the stump
For their incessant prey; the desperate wall
Of Saragossa, mightiest in her fall;
The man nerved to a spirit, and the maid
Waving her more than Amazonian blade,
The knife of Aragon,† Toledo's steel;
The famous lance of chivalrous Castile;
The unerring rifle of the Catalon;
The Andalusian courser in the van;
The torch to make a Moscow of Madrid;
And in each heart the spirit of the Cid:—
Such have been, such shall be, such are. Advance,
And win—not Spain, but thine own freedom, France!

VIII.
But lo! a Congress! What! that hallow'd name
Which freed the Atlantic? May we hope the same
For outworn Europe? With the sound arise,
Like Samuel's shade to Saul's monarchical eyes,
The prophets: young Freedom, summon'd far
From climes 't Washington and Bolivar,
Henry, the forest-born Demosthenes,
Whose thunder shook the hilt of the e.x.u;
And stolic Franklin's energetic shade,
Robed in the lightnings which his hand allay'd;
And Washington, the tyrant-tamer, wake,
To bid us blush for these old chains, or break.
But who compose this senate of the few
That should redeem the many? Who renew
This consecrated name, till now assign'd
To councils held to benefit mankind!

* "Iago! and close Spain!" the old Spanish war-cry.
† The Array, whose peculiarly destructive in the use of idle weapon, and deployed "perpendicularly to it were French wars.

Who now assemble at the holy call:
The best Alliance, which says three are all
An earthly trinity! which wears the shape
Of heaven's, as man is mimick'd by the ape.
A pious unity! in purpose one,
To melt three fools to a Napoleon.
Why, Egypt's gods were rational to these;
Their dogs and oxen knew their own degrees,
And, quiet in their kennel or their shed,
Cared little, so that they were duly fed;
But these, more hungry, must have something more
The power to bark and bite, a toss and gore.
Ah! how much happier were good Esop's frogs
Than we! for ours are animated logs,
With ponderous malice swaying to and fro,
And crushing nations with a stupid blow;
All duly anxious to leave little work
Unto the revolutionary stock.

IX.
Thrice blest Verona! since the holy three
With their imperial presence shine on thee;
Honor'd by them, thy treacherous site forgets
The vaunted tomb of "all the Capulets;"
Thy Scaligers—for what was "Dog the Great,
"Can Grande," (which I venture to translate,) To these sublimier juggs? Than poet too, Cattius, whose old tunnel yield to new,
Tuine amphitheatres, where Romans sat;
And Dante's exile shelter'd by thy gate:
Thy good ol' man,* whose world was all within Thy wall, nor knew the country held him in:
Would that the royal guests it girds about
Were so far like, as never to get out!
Ay, shout! inscribe! rear monuments of shame,
To tell Oppression that the world is tame!
Crowd to the theatre with loyal rage,
The comedy is not upon the stage;
The show is rich in ribandry and stars,
Then gaze upon it through thy dungeon bars:
Clap thy permitted palus, kind Italy,
For thus much still thy fettered hands are free.

X.
Res; lenoifit sight! Behold the coxcomb czar,
The autocrat of waltzes and of war!
As eager for a plaudit as a realm,
And just as fit for flirting as the helm;
A Calmuck beauty with a Cossack wit,
And generous spirit, when 'tis not frost-bit;
Now half dissolving to a liberal thaw,
But harden'd back when'er the morning's raw,
With no objection to true liberty,
Except that it would make the nations free
How well the imperial dandy prates of peace,
How fain, if Greeks would be his slaves, free
Greece!
How nobly gave he back the Poles their Diet
Then told pugnacious Poland to be quiet!
How kindly would he send the mild Ukraina,
With all her pleasant pulks, to lecture Spain!
How royally show off in proud Madrid
His goodly person, from the South long lid!
A blessing cheaply purchased, the world knows,
By having Muscovites for friends or foes.
Proceed, thou namesake of great Philip's son!
La Harpe, thine Aristotle, beckons on:

* The surnames of old men of Verona.
The Age of Bronze.

And that which Scythia was to him of yore
Find with thy Scythians on Iberia's shore.
Yet think upon, thou somewhat aged youth,
Thy predecessor on the banks of Pruth:
Thou hast to aid thee, should his lot be thine,
Many an old woman: o! no Catherine.
Spain too hath rocks, and rivers, and desiles—
The bear may rush int' the lion's toils.
Fateful to Goths are Xeres' sunny fields;
Think'st thou to the e Napoleon's victor yields?
Let her reclaim thy deserts, turn thy swords
To ploughshares, shave and wash thy Bashkir hordes,
Redeem thy realms from slavery and the knout,
Than follow headlong in the fatal route,
To infest the cline whose skies and laws are pure
With thy foul legion. Spain wants no manure;
Her soil is fertile, but she feeds no foe;
Her vultures, too, were gorged not long ago;
And wouldst thou furnish them with fresher prey?
Alas! thou wilt not conquer, but purvey.
I am Diogenes, though Russ and Hun
Stand between mine and many a myriad's sun;
But were I not Diogenes, I'd wander
Rather a worm than such an Alexander!
Be slaves who will, the cynic shall be free;
His tub hath tougher walls than Sinope:
Still will he hold his lantern up to scan
The face of monarchs for an "honest man."

XI.

And what doth Gaul, the all-prolific land
Of ne plus ultra ultras and their band
Of mercenaries? and her noisy chambers
And tribune, which each orator first clambers
Before he finds a voice, and when 'tis found,
Hears "the lie" echo for his answer round!
Our British commons sometimes deign to "hear!"—
A Gallic senate hath more tongue than ear;
Even Constant, their sole master of debate,
Must fight next day his speech to vindicate.
But this costs little to true Franks, who had rather Combat than listen, were it to their father.
What is the simple standing of a shot,
To listening long, and interrupting not?
Though this was not the method of old Rome,
When Tully fulfilled o'er each vocal dome,
Demaethenes had sanction'd the transaction,
In saying eloquence meant "Action, action!"

XII.

But where's the monarch? hath he dined? or yet
Groans beneath indigestion's heavy debt?
Have revolutionary pates risen,
And turn'd the royal entrails to a prison?
His discontented movements stir'd the troops;
Or have no movements follow'd traitorous soups?
Have Carbonaro cooks not carbonaded
His predecessor on the banks of Pruth?
Each course enough? or doctors dire dissuaded
Repletion? Ah! in thy dejected looks
I read all France's treason in her cooks!
Good classic Louis I is it, cannot thou say,
Desirable to be the "Desire?"
Wouldst thou leave calm Hartwell's green abode,
Apician table, and Horatian ode,
To rule a people who will not be ruled,
And love much rather to be scourged than a school'd?
Ah! thine was not the temper or the taste
For thrones; the table sees thee better placed:
A mild Epicurean, form'd, at best,
To be a kind host and as good a guest,
To talk of letters, and to know by heart
One half the poet's, all the gourmand's art.
A scholar always, now and then a wit,
And gentle when digestion may permit:—
But not to govern lands enslaved or free;
The gout was martyrdom enough for thee.

XIII.

Shall noble Albion pass without a phrase
From a bold Briton in her wonted praise?
"Arts—arms—and George—and glory—and the isles—
And happy Britain—wealth—and freedom's smiles—
White cliffs, that held invaslop far afoar—
Contented subjects, all alike tax-proof—
Proud Wellington, with Eagle beak so curl'd,
That nose, the hook where he suspends the world!
And Waterloo—and trade,—and—(shush! not yet
A syllable of impostors or of debt)—
And ne'er (enough) lamented Castlereagh,
Whose penknife slit a goose-quill o'ther day—
And 'pilots who have weather'd every storm'—
(But, no, not even for rhyme's sake, name reform."
These are the themes thus sung so off before,
Methinks we need not sing them any more;
Found in so many volumes far and near,
There's no occasion you should find them i.e.
Yet something may remain perchance to chime
With reason, and, what's stranger still, with rhyme
Even this thy genius, Canning! may permit,
Who, bred a statesman, still was born a wit,
And never, even in that dull house could'st amate,
To unavailing 'prose thine own poetic face;
Our last, our best, our only orator,
Even I can praise thee—tories do no more;
Nay, not so much;—they hate thee, me, because
Thy spirit less upheals them than it awes;
The hounds will follow to the huntsman's holo,
And where he leads the duteous pe.k will follow;
But not for love mistake their yelping cry;
Their yelp for game is not an eulogy;
Less faithful far than the fourfooted pack,
A dubious scent would lure the bipeds back.
Thy saddle-girths are not yet quite secure,
Nor royal stallion's feet extremely sure;
The unwieldy old white horse is apt at last
To stumble, kick, and now and then stick fast
With his great self and rider in the mud;
But what of that? the animal shows blood.

XIV.

Alas, the country! how shall tongue or pen
Bewail her now once country gentlemen?
The last to bid the cry of warfare cease,
The first to make a malady of peace.
For what were all these country patriots born?
To hunt, and vote, and raise the price of corn t
But corn, like every mortal thing, must fall,
Kings, conquerors, and markets most of all
And must ye fall with every ear of grain?
Why would you trouble Bonaparte's reign?
He was your great Triptolemus; his vices [prices];
Destroy'd but realms, and still maintain'd your
He amplified to every lord's content
The grand agrarian alchymy, hight rent.
Why did the tyrant stumble on the Tartars,
And lower wheat to such desponding quarters?
Why did you chain him on your isle so lone?
The man was worth much more than his throne.
True, blood and treasure boundlessly were spilt;
But what of that? the Gaul may bear the guilt;
But bread was high, the farmer paid his way,
And acres told upon the appointed day.
But where is now the godly audit ale?
The purse proud tenant, never known to fail?
The farm which never yet was left on hand?
The marsh reclaim'd to most improving land?
The impatient hope of the expiring lease?
The doubling rental? What an evil's peace!
I'm vain the prize excites the ploughman's skill,
In vain the Commons pass their patriot bill;
The landed interest—(you may understand)
The phrase much better leaving out the land—
The land self-interest groans from shore to shore,
For fear that plenty should attain the poor.
Up, up again, ye rents! exult your notes,
Or else the ministry will lose their votes,
And patriotism, so delicately nice,
Her loaves will lower to the market price;
For ah! "the loaves and fishes," once so high,
Are gone—their even closed, their ocean dry.
And ought remains of all the millions spent,
Excepting to grow moderate and content.
They who are not so, had their turn—and turn
About still flows from Fortune's equal urn;
Now let their virtue be its own reward,
And share the blessing which themselves prepared.
See these inglorious Cincinnati swarm,
Farmers of war, dictators of the farm;
Their ploughshare was the sword in hireling hands,
Their fields manured by gore of other lands;
Safe in their barns, these Saratogians sent
Their brethren out to battle—why? for rent!
Year after year they voted cent. per cent.,
Blood sweat, and tear-wrung millions—why? for rent!
They roor'd, they dined, they drank, they swore.
...they meant
To die for England—why then live? for rent!
The peace has made one general malecontent
Of these high-market patrons; war was rent.
Their love of country, millions all misspent,
How reconcile? by reconciling rent?
And will they not repay the treasures lent?
No; down with every thing, and up with rent!
Their good, ill, hea.th, wealth, joy, or discontent,
Being, end, aim, religion—rent, rent, rent!
I thou sold'st thy birthright, Esau! for a mess;
Thou should'st have gotten more, or eaten less;
Now thou hast swill'd thy potage, thy demands Are idle; Israel says the bargain stands.
Such, landlords! was your appetite for war,
And, gorged with blood, you grumble at a scar!
What! would they spread their earl'squake even or cash?
And when land crumbles, bid farm pa or crash?
To rent may rise, bid bank and nation fall,
And found on 'Change a Fundling Hospital.

Lo, Mother Church, while all religion withres, Like Niobe, weeps o'er her offspring, Tithes;
The prelates go to—where the saints have gone,
And proud pluralities subside to one;
Church, state, and faction wrestle in the dark,
Toss'd by the deluge in their common ark.

"Go to these ants, thou sluggard, and be wise!"
Admire their patience through each sacrifice,
Till taught to feel the lesson or their pride,
The price of taxes and of homicide;
Admire their justice, which would fain deny
The debt of nations: pray who made it high?

XV.
Or turn to sail between those shifting rocks,
The new Symplegades—the crushing Stocks,
Where Midas might again his wish behold
In real paper or imagined gold.
That magic palace of Aëra shows
More wealth than Britain ever had to lose,
Were all her atoms of unlev'n'd ore,
And all her pebbles from Pactus' shore.
There Fortune plays, while Rumar holds the stake
And the world trembles to bid brokers break.
How rich is Britain! not indeed in mines,
Or peace or plenty, corn or oil, or wines;
Jo land of Canaan, full of milk and honey,
Nor (save in paper shekels) ready money: But let us not to own the truth refuse,
Was ever Christian land so rich in Jews?
Those parted with their teeth to good King John,
"A'st now, ye kings! they kindly draw your own;
In states, all things, all sovereigns they control,
Waft a loan "from Indus to the pole."
The banker—broker—baron—brethren, speed
To aid these bankrupt tyrants in their need.
Nor these alone: Columbia feels no less.
Fresh speculations follow each success;
And philanthropic Israel &c. to drain Her mild percentage from exhausted Spain.
Not without Abraham's seed can Russia march;
"Tis gold, not stone, that bears the conqueror's arch.
Two Jews, a chosen people, can command in every realm their scripture-promised land:—
Two Jews keep down the L.mans, and uphold
The accursed Hun, more brutal than of old.
Two Jews—but not Samaritan's—direct
The world, with all the spirit of their sect.
A congress forms their "New Jerusalem,"
Where baronies and orders both invite—
Oh, holy Abraham! dost thou see the sight?
Thy followers mingling with these royal swine,
Who spit not "on their Jewish gaberdine;"—
But honor them as portion of the show—
(Where now, oh pope! is thy forsaken toe?
Could it not favor Judah with some kicks? Or has it ceased to "kick against the pricks?"
On Shylock's shore behold them stand afresh,
To cut from nations' hearts their "pound of flesh."

XVI.
Strange sight this Congress! destined to unite
All that's incongruous, all that's opposite.
speak of: the sovereigns—t'ey're alike,

A common coin, as ever mind could strike:

But those who sway the puppet, pull the strings,

Have more of motley than the jolly kings.

Jews, authors, generals, charlatans, combine,

While Europe wonders at the vast design:

There: Metternich, power's foremost parasite,

Cajoles; there Wellington forgets to fight;

There Chateaubriand forms new books of martyr's;

And subtle Greeks intrigue for stupid Tartars;

There Montmorenci, the sworn foe to charters,

Turns a diplomatist of great eclat,

To furnish articles for "the Debates;"

Of war so certain—yet not so sure

As his dismissal in the "Moniteur."

Alas! how could his cabinet thus err?

Can peace be worth an ultra-minister?

He falls indeed, perhaps to rise again

"Almost as quickly as he conquered Spain."

XVII.

Enough of this—a sight more mournful woos

The averted eye of the reluctant muse,

The imperial daughter, the imperial bride,

The imperial victim—sacrifice to pride,

The mother of the hero's hope, the boy,

The young Astyanax of modern Troy;

T'is stale pale shadow of the loftiest queen

That earth has yet to see, or e'er hath seen;

&c. fits amid the phantoms of the hour,

Lo! theme of pity, and the wreck of power.

Oh, cruel mockery! Could not Austria spare

A daughter? What did France's widow there?

Her fitter prince was by St. Helen's wave,

Her only throne is in Napoleon's grave.

But, no,—she still must hold a petty reign,

Flank'd by her formidable chamberlain;

The martial Argus, whose not hundred eyes

Must watch her through these paltry pageantries.

What though she share no more, and shared in vain

A sway surpassing that of Charlemagne,

Which swept from Moscow to the southern seas;

Yet still she rules the pastoral realm of cheese,

Where Parma views the traveller resort

To note the trappings of her mimic court.

But she appears! Verona sees her shorn

Of all her beams—while nations gaze and mourn

Ere yet her husband's ashes have had time

To chill in their inhospitable eulogies;

(If e'er those awful ashes can grow cold;

But no,—their embers soon will burst the mould;)

She comes!—the Andromache (but not Racine's),

Nor Homer's)—Lo! on Pyrrhus' arm she leans!

Yes! the right arm, yet red from Waterloo,

Which cut her lord's half-shatter'd sceptre through.

Is offer'd and accepted! Could a slave

Do more? or less?—and he in his new grave!

Her eye, her cheek, betray no inward strife,

And he ex-empress grows as ex a wife!

So much for human ties in royal breasts!

Why spare men's feelings, when their own are Jesus;

XVIII.

But, tired of foreign follies, I turn home,

And sketch the group—the picture's yet to come

My muse 'gan weep, but ere a tear was spilt,

She caught Sir William Curtis in a kilt!

While throng'd the chiefs of every highland clan

To hail their brother, Vich Ian Alderman!

Guildhall grows Gael, and echoes with Erin roar,

While all the Common Council cry "Claymore!"

To see proud Albyn's tartan's as a belt

Gird the gross sirloin of a city Celt,

She burst into a laughter so extreme,

That I awoke—and lo! 'twas no dream!

Here, reader, will we pause:—if there's no harm is

First—you'll have perhaps, a second "Carmen."
THE VISION OF JUDGMENT
BY QUEVEDO REDIVIVUS.

SUGGESTED BY THE COMPOSITION SO ENTITLED BY THE AUTHOR OF "WAT TYLER."

"A Daniel come to judgment! yes, a Daniel!
I thank thee, Jew, for teaching me that word."

3dly. Was he not entitled by William Smith, in full parliament, "a rancorous renegade?"

4thly. Is he not poet laureate, with his own lines on Martin the regicide staring him in the face?

And 5thly. Putting the four preceding items together, with what conscience dare he call the attention of the laws to the publication of others, be they what they may?

I say nothing of the cowardice of such a proceeding; its meanness speaks for itself; but I wish to touch upon the motive, which is neither more nor less than that Mr. S. has been laughed at a little in some recent publications, as he was of yore in the "Arti-jacobin" by his present patrons. Hence all this "skimble-scamble stuff" about "Satanic," and so forth. However, it is worthy of him—"Qualis ab incepto."

If there is any thing obnoxious to the political opinions of a portion of the public in the following poem, they may thank Mr. Southey. He might have written hexameters, as he has written every thing else, for aught that the writer cared—had they been upon another subject. But to attempt to canonize a monarch, who, whatever were his household virtues, was neither a successful nor a patriotic king—inasmuch as several years of his reign passed in war with America and Ireland, to say nothing of the aggressions upon France,—like all other exag- geration, necessarily begets opposition. In whatever manner he may be spoken of in this new "Vision," his public career will not be more favorably transmitted by history. Of his private virtues (although a little expensive to the nation) there can be no doubt.

With regard to the supernatural personages treated of, I can only say, that I know as much about them, and (as an honest man) have a better right to talk of them than Robert Southey. I have also treated them more tolerantly. The way in which that poor insane creature, the laureate, deals about

PREFACE.

Is hath been wisely said, that "One fool makes many;" and it hath been poetically observed,

"That fools rush in where angels fear to tread."—Pope.

If Mr. Southey had not rushed in where he had no business, and where he never was before, and never will be again, the following poem would not have been written. It is not impossible that it may be as good as his own, seeing that it cannot, by any species of stupidity, natural or acquired, be worse.

The gross flattery, the dull impudence, the renegade intolerance, and impious cant of the poem by the author of Wat Tyler, are something so stupendous as to form the sublime of himself—containing the quintessence of his own attributes.

So much for his poem—a word on his preface. In this preface it has pleased the magnanimous laureate to draw the picture of a supposed "Satanic School," the which he doth recommend to the notice of the legislature; thereby adding to his other laurels the addition of those of an informer. If there exists any where, excepting in his imagination, such a school, is he not sufficiently armed against it by his own intense vanity? The truth is, that there are certain writers whom Mr. S. imagines, like Scrub, to have "talked of him; for they laughed consumenedly."

I think I know enough of most of the writers to whom he is supposed to allude, to assever, that they in their individual capacities, have done more good in the charities of life to their fellow-creatures in any one year, than Mr. Southey has done harm to himself by his absurdities in his whole life; and this is saying a great deal. But I have a few questions to ask.

1stly. Is Mr. Southey the author of Wat Tyler?
2dly. Was he not refused a remedy at law by the highest judge of his beloved England, because it was a blasphemous and seditious publication?

Mrs. Siddons, "Arthur," and "Thorn," were not produced but at the instance of Mr. Southey. She raises the subject as a favorite child. All the pictures are intended to bring him into Mr. S.'s closet, and to show his passion for "written hexameters."
his judgment in the next world, is like his own judgment in this. If it was not completely ludicrous, it would be something worse. I don't think that there is much more to say at present.

QUEVEDO REDITIVUS.

"It is possible that some readers may object, in these objectionable times, to the freedom with which saints, angels, and spiritual persons discourse in this 'Vision.' But for precedents upon such points I must refer him to Fielding's 'Journey from this World to the Next,' and to the Visions of myself, the said Quevedo, in Spanish or translated. The reader is also requested to observe, that no doctrinal tenets are insisted upon or discussed; that the person of the Deity is carefully withheld from sight, which is more than can be said for the laureate, who hath thought proper to make him talk, not "like a school divine," but like the unscholarlike Mr. Southey. The whole action passes on the outside of heaven; and Chaucer's Wife of Bath, Pulci's Morgante Maggiore, Swift's Tale of a Tub, and the other works above referred to, are cases in point of the freedom with which saints, &c., may be permitted to converse in works not intended to be so serious.

Q. R.

* * * Mr. Southey, being, as he says, a good Christian and vindictive, threatens, I understand, a reply to this answer. It is to be hoped that his visionary faculties will in the meantime have acquired a little more judgment, properly so called; otherwise he will get himself into new dilemmas. These apostate Jacobins furnish rich rejoinders. Let him take a specimen. Mr. Southey laudeth grievously "one Mr. Landor," who cultivates much private renown in the shape of Latin verses; and not long ago, the poet laureate dedicated to him, it appeareth, one of his fugitive lyrics, upon the strength of a poem called Gebr. Who could suppose that in this same Gebr the aforesaid Savage Landor (for such is his grim cognomen) putterth into the infernal regions no less a person than the hero of his friend Mr. Southey's heaven.—yes, even George the Third! See also how personal Savage becometh, when he hath a mind. The following is his portrait of our late gracious sovereign:

(Prison Garth having descended into the infernal regions, the reader of his royal ancestor are, at his request, called up to his view, and he exclaims to his ghastly guide—)

"Ahoy, what worthy soul present! what wretch
Is that with eyewhite white and standing brow?
Less I him yeander, who, bound down super.
Writhe yelie from yon, with that, engine-thein.
He too among my predecessors I hate
The deponent, but the stained I disdain.
Who is our emperor?"

"Alas, O king!
Beard beauteous, but the beard accost
Insolent words, rude and blustering from northeast.
"He was a vilesst then, nor fared the god?"

Gebr, he face'd the demons, not the gods,
Though them indeed his deadly face accorded;
And was no warrior, yet the thousand did
Evander's, as stances to exercise a ding,
And the more cruelly and cold expostute—
On behove of mankind! adnion's, adored: "--\fr. 10, x."

I cannot noticing some edifying Ithyllalics of Savagius, wishing to keep the proper veil over them, if his grave but somewhat indiscreet worshipper will suffer it; but certainly these teachers of "great moral lessons" are apt to be found in strange company.

TIR VISION OF JUDGMENT.

I.

SAINT PETER sat by the celestial gate;
His keys were rusty, and the lock was dull;
So little trouble had been given of late;
Not that the place by any means was full,
But since the Gallic era "eighty-eight;"
The devils had taken a longer, stronger pull
And "a pull altogether," as they say.
At sea—which drew most souls another way.

II.

The angels all were singing out of tune,
And hoarse with having little else to do.
Excepting to wind up the sun and moon,
Or curb a runaway young star or two.
Or wild coll of a comet, which too soon
Broke out of bounds o'er the ethereal blue,
Splitting some planet with its playful tail.
As boats are sometimes by a wanton whale.

III.

The guardian seraphs had retired on higa,
Finding their charges past all care below;
Terrestrial business fill'd nought in the sky.
Save the recording angel's black bureau;
Who found, indeed, the facts to multiply.
With such rapidity of vice and wo,
That he had strip'd off both his wings in quirks.
And yet was in arrear of human ill.

IV.

His business so augmented of late years,
That he was forced, against his will, no doubt.
(Just like those churls, earthly ministers.)
For some resource to turn himself about.
And claim the help of his celestial peers,
To aid him ere he should be quite worn out
By the increased demand for his remarks:
Six angels and twelve saints were named his clerks.

V.

This was a handsome board—at least for heaven.
And yet they had even then enough to do.
So many conquerors' cars were daily driven,
So many kingdoms fitted up anew;
Each day too slew its thousands six or seven;
Till at the crowning carnage, Waterloo,
They threw their pens down in divine disgust—
The page was so besmeared with blood and dust.

VI.

This by the way: 'tis not mine to record
What angels shrink from: even the very devil.
On this occasion his own work abhor'd,
So surfeited with the infernal revel,
Though he himself had sharpen'd every scrow,
It almost quench'd his innate thirst of evil.
(Here Satan's sole good work deserves insertion—
'Tis, that he hath both generals in reversion.)

VII.

Let's skip a few short years of hollow peace,
Which people earth no better, hell as went.
And heaven none—then form'd they the tyrant's lease.
With nothing but now names subscrib'd upon;
'Twill one day finish: meantime they increase,
"With seven heads and ten horns," and all in front.
Like Saint John's foretold beast: but ours are born
Less formidable in the head than horn.
VIII.
In the first year of freedom's second dawn
Died George the Third; although no tyrant, one
Who shielded tyrants, till each sense withdrawn
Left him nor mental nor external sun:
A better farmer ne'er brush'd dew from lawn.
A worse king never left a realm undone!
He died—but left his subjects still behind,
One half as mad—and 'tother no less blind.

IX.
He died!—his death made no great stir on earth,
His burial made some pomp; there was profusion
Of velvet, gliding, brass, and no great dearth
Of ought but tears—save those shed by exultation,
For these things may be bought at their true worth;
Of elegy there was the due infusion—
 Bought also; and the torches, eloqns, and ha.ner.s,
Heralds, and relics of old Gothic manners,
Form'd a sepulchral melodrama.

X.
So mix his body with the dust! It might Return to what it must far sooner, were
The natural compound left alone to fight
Its way back into earth, and fire, and air;
But the unnatural balsams merely blight
What nature made him at his birth, as bare
As the mere millions' base unmummied clay—
Yet all his spices but prolong decay.

XI.
He s dead—and upper earth with him has done:
He's buried; save the undertaker's lill,
Or lapidary scrolli, the world is gone
For him, unless he left a German will;
But where's the proctor who will ask his son?
In whom his qualities are reigning still,
Except that household virtue, most unequal-moon,
Of constancy to a bad, ugly Woman.

XII.
"God save the king!" It is a large economy
In God to save the like; but if he will
Be saving all the better; for not one am I
Of those who think damnation better still:
I hardly know too if not quite alone am I
In this small hope of bettering future ill
By circumcising, with some slight restriction,
The eternity of hell's hot jurisdiction.

XIII.
I know: this is unpopular; I know
'Tis blasphemous; I know one may be damn'd
For hoping no one else may e'er be so;
I know my catechism; I know we are cram'd
With the best doctrines till we quite overflown;
I know that all save England's church have shamm'd,
And that the other twice two hundred churches
And synagogues have made a damn'd bad purchase.

XV.
God help us all! God help me too! I am,
God knows, as helpless as the devil can wish.
And not a whit more difficult to damn
Than is to bring to land a late-hock'd fish,
Or to the butcher to purvey the lound:
Not that I'm fit for such a noble dish
As one day will be that immortal fry
Of almost every body born to die.

XVI.
Saint Peter sat by the celestial gate,
And nodded o'er his keys; when lo! there came
A wond'rous noise he had not heard of late—
A rushing sound of wind, and stream, and flame—
In short, a roar of things extremely great, [claim
Which would have made ought save a saint ex
But he, with first a start and then a wink,
Said, "There's another star gone out, I think!"

XVII.
But ere he could return to his repose,
A cherub flapp'd his right wing o'er his eyes—
At which Saint Peter yawn'd, and rubb'd his nose;
"Saint porter," said the angel, "prithee rise!"
Waving a goodly wing, which glow'd, as glows
An earthly peacock's tail, with heavenly dyes,
To which the saint replied, "Well, what's the matter?
Is Lucifer come back with all this clatter?"

XVIII.
"No," quoth the cherub; "George the Third is dead."
[apostle:
"And who is George the Third?" replied the
"What George isat Third?" "The king of England," said
The angel. "Well! he won't find kings to jostle
Him on his way; but does he wear his head?
Because the last we saw here had a tussle,
And ne'er would have got into heaven's good
Had he not flung his head in all our faces. [graces

XIX.
"He was, if I remember, king of France;
That head of his, which could not keep a crown
On earth, yet ventured in my face to advance
A claim to those of martyrs—like my own:
If I had had my sword, as I had once
When I cut ears off, I had cut him down;
But having but my keys, and not my brand,
I only knock'd his head from out his hand.

XX.
"And then he set up such a headless howl,
That all the saints came out and took him in,
And there he sits by St. Paul, check by jowl;
That fellow Paul—the par excellence! The skin
Of Saint Bartholomew, which makes his cowl
In heaven, and upon earth redeemed his sin,
So as to make a martyr, never spied
Better than did this weak and woollen head.

XXI.
"But had it come up here upon its shoulders,
There would have been a different tale to tell:
The fellow feeling in the saints' beholders
Seems to have acted on them like a spell;
And so this very foolish head heaven solders
Back on its trunk: it may be very well,
And seems the custom here to overthrow
Whatever has been wisely done below"
THE VISION OF JUDGMENT.

XXII.
The angel answer'd, "Peter! I do not pout:
The king who comes has head and all entire,
And never knew much what it was about—
He did as doth the puppet—by its wire,
And will be judged like all the rest, no doubt,
My business and your own is not to inquire
Into such matters, but to mind our cue—
Which is to act as we are bid to do."

XXIII.
While thus they spake, the angelic caravan,
Arriving like a rush of mighty wind,
Cleaving the fields of space, as doth the swan
Some silver stream, (say Ganges, Nile, or Inde,
Or Thames, or Tweed,) and 'mid them, an old man
With an old soul, and both extremely blind,
Halted before the gate, and in his shroud
Seated their fellow-traveller on a cloud.

XXIV.
But bringing up the rear of this might host
A Spirit of a different aspect waved
His wings, like thunder-clouds above some coast
Whose barren beach with frequent wrecks is paved;
His brow was like the deep when tempest-tost,
Fierce and unfathomable thoughts engraved
Eternal wrath on his immortal face,
And where he gazed a gloom pervaded space.

XXV.
As he drew near, he gazed upon the gate
Never to be entered more by him or sin,
With such a glance of supernatural hate,
As made Saint Peter wish himself within;
He patted with his keys at a great rate,
And sweated through his apostolic skin,
Of course his perspiration was but ichor,
Or some such other spiritual liquor.

XXVI.
The very cherubs huddled altogether,
Like birds when soars the falcon; and they felt
A tingling to the tip of every feather,
And form'd a circle like Orion's belt [whither
Around their poor old charge; who scarce knew
His guards had led him, though they gently dealt
With royal manes, (for by many stories,
And true, we learn the angels all are tories.)

XXVII.
As things were in this posture, the gate flew
Asunder, and the flashing of its hinges
Flung over space an universal hue
Of many-color'd flame, until its tinges
Reach'd even our speck of earth, and made a new Aurora borealis spread its fringes [bound,
O'er the North Pole; the same seen, when see-
By Captain Parry's crews, in "Majestic's Sound."

XXVIII.
And from the gate thrown open issued beaming
A beautiful and mighty Thing of Light,
Radiant with glory, like a banner streaming
Victorious from some world-o'erthrowing fight:
My poor comparisons must needs be teeming
With earthly likenesses, for her the night
Of clay obscures our best conceptions, saving
Johanna Southcote, or Bob Southey raving.

XXIX.
"Twas the archangel Michael; all men know
The make of angels and archangels, since
There's scarce a scribbler has not one to show,
From the fiends' leader to the angels' prince.
There also are some altar-pieces, though
I really can't say that they much evince
One's inner notions of immortal spirits;
But let the connoisseurs explain their merits

XXX.
Michael flew forth in glory and in good;
A goodly work of him from whom all glory
And good arise; the portal past—he stood;
Before him the young cherubs and saint hoary,
(I say young, begging to be understood
By looks, not years; and should be very sorry
To state they were not older than Saint Peter,
But merely that they seem'd a little sweeter.)

XXXI.
The cherubs and the saints bowed down before
That archangelic hierarch, the first
Of essences angelical, who wore
The aspect of a god; but this ne'er bust
Pride in his heavenly bosom, in whose core
No thought, save for his Maker's service, durst
Intrude, however glorified and high;
He knew him but the viceroy of the sky

XXXII.
He and the sombre silent Spirit met—
They knew each other both for good and ill;
Such was their power, that neither could forget
His former friend and future foe; but still
There was a high, immortal, proud regret
In either's eye, as if 'twere less their will
Than destiny to make the eternal years
Their date of war, and their "champ clos" the spheres.

XXXIII.
But nere they were in neutral space: we know
From Job, that Satan hath the power to pay
A heavenly visit thrice a year or so;
And that "the sons of God," like those of clay;
Must keep him company; and we might show,
From the same book, in how polite a way
The dialogue is held between the Powers
Of Good and Evil—but 'twould take up hours

XXXIV.
And this is not a theologic tract,
To prove with Hebrew and with Arabic
If Job be allegory or a fact,
But a true narrative; and thus I pick
From out the whole but such and such an act
As sets aside the slightest thought of trick.
'Tis every title true, beyond suspicion,
And accurate as any other vision.

XXXV.
The spirits were in neutral space, before
The gate of heaven; like eastern thresholds is
The place where Death's grand cause is argued o'er
And souls despatch'd to that world or to this;
And therefore Michael and the other wore
A civil aspect: though they did not kiss,
Yet still between his Darkness and his Brightness
There pass'd a mutual glance of great po'ience
XXXVI.
The Archangel bow'd, not like a modern beau,
But with a graceful Oriental bend,
Pressing one radiant arm just where below
The heart in good men is supposed to tend.
He turn'd as to an equal, not too low,
But kindly; Satan met his ancient friend
With more hauteur, as might an old Castilian
Poor noble meet a mushroom rich civilian.

XXXVII.
He merely bent his diabolic brow
An instant; and then raising it, he stood
In act to assert his right or wrong, and show Cause why King George by no means could or Make out a case to be exempt from wo
[should Eternal, more than other kings, endued] [ions,
With better sense and hearts, whom history men-

Who long have "paved hell with their good intentions."

XXXVIII.
Michael began: "What wouldst thou with this man,
Now dead, and brought before the Lord? What ill
Hath he wrought since his mortal race began,
That thou can'st claim him? Speak! and do thy
If it be just: if in this earthly span
[will,
He hath been greatly failing to fulfil
His duties as a king and mortal, say,
And he is thine; if not, let him have way."

XXXIX.
"Michael!" replied the Prince of Air, "even here,
Before the gate of thou servest, must
I claim my subject; and will make appear
That as he was my worshipper in dust,
So shall he be in spirit, although dear
To thee and thine, because nor wine nor lust
Were of his weaknesses; yet on the throne
He reign'd o'er millions to serve me alone.

XL.
"Look to our earth, or rather mine; it was,
One, more thy master's: but I triumph not
In this poor pikmen's conquest; nor, alas!
Need thou servest envy me my lot:
With all the myriads of bright worlds which pass
In worship round him, he may have forgot
Yon weak creation of such paltry things:
I think few worth damnation save their kings."

XLI.
"And these but as a kind of quitrent, to Assert my right as lord; and even bad
I such an inclination, 'twere (as you
Well know) superfluous; they are grown so bad,
That hell has nothing left to do [mad]
Than leave them to themselves: so much more
And evil by their own internal curse,
 Heaven cannot make them better, nor I worse.

XLII.
"Look to the earth, I said, and say again:
When this old, blind, mad, helpless, weak, poor worm
Began in youth's first bloom and flush to reign,
The world and he both wore a different form,
And much of earth and all the watery plain
Of ocean call'd him king: through many a storm
His isles had floated on the abyss of time;
For the rough virtues chose them for their cline.

XLIII.
"He came to his sceptor young; he leaves it old
Look to the state in which he found his realm,
And left it; and his annals too behold,
How to a minion first he gave the helm:
How grew uppn his heart a thirst for gold,
The beggar's vice, which can but overwhelm
The meanest hearts; and for the rest, but glance
Thine eye along America and France.

XLIV.
"Tis true, he was a tool from first to last,
(I have the workmen safe;) but as a tool
So let him be consumed. For out the past
Of ages, since mankind have known the rule
Of monarchs—from the bloody rolls annas'd
Of sin and slaughter—from the Cæsars' school,
Take the worst pupil; and produce a reign
More drench'd with gore, more cumber'd with th slain.

XLV.
"He ever warr'd with freedom and the free:
Nations as men, home subjects, foreign foes,
So that they utter'd the word 'Liberty!'
[Whose Found George the Third their first opponent.
History was ever stain'd as his will be
With national and individual woes?
I grant his household abstinence; I grant
His neutral virtues, which most monarchs want;

XLVI.
"I know he was a constant consort; own
He was a decent sire, and middling lord.
All this is much, and most upon a throne;
As temperance, if at Apiclus' board,
Is more than at an anchorite's supper shown.
I grant him all the kindest can accord;
And this was well for him, but not for those Millions who found him what oppression chose.

XLVII.
"The New World shook him off; the Old yet
Beneath what he and his prepared, if not Completed: he leaves his heirs on many thrones
To all his vices, without what begot
Compassion for him—his tame virtues; drones
Who sleep, or despots who have now forgot
A lesson which shall be re-taught them, wake
Upon the thrones of earth; but let them quake!

XLVIII.
"Five millions of the primitive, who hold
The faith which makes ye great on earth, explored
A part of that vast all they held of old,—
Freedom to worship—not alone your Lord,
Michael, but you, and you, Saint Peter! Cold
Must be your souls, if you have not abhor'd
The foe to Catholic participation
In all the license of a Christian nation.

XLIX.
"True! he allow'd them to pray God; but as A consequence of prayer, refused the law
Which would have placed them upon the same base
With those who did not hold the saints in awe."
But here Saint Peter started from his pace,
And cried, "You may the prisoner withdraw:
Ere heaven shall ope her portals to this Guelph, While I am guard may I be damn'd myself!"
THE VISION OF JUDGMENT.

L.

'Sooner will I with Cerberus exchange
My office (and his is no sincere)
Than see this royal Bedlam bigot range
The azure fields of heaven, of that be sure!'

'Saint!' replied Satan, 'you do well to avenge
The wrongs he made your satellites endure;
And if to this exchange you should be given,
I'll try to coax our Cerberus up to heaven.'

II.

Here Michael interposed: "Good saint! and devil!
Pray, not so fast; you both outrun discretion.
Saint Peter! you were wont to be more civil:
Satan! excuse this warmth of his expression,
And condescension to the vulgar's level: [sion.
Even saints sometimes forget themselves in seas-
Have you got more to say?"—"No."—"If you
I'll trouble you to call your witnesses." [please,

III.

Then Satan turn'd and waved his swarthy hand,
Which stirr'd with its electric qualities
Clouds farther off than we can understand,
Although we find him sometimes in our skies;
Infernal thunder shook both sea and land
In all the planets, and hell's batteries
Let off the artillery, which Milton mentions
As one of Satan's most sublime inventions.

IV.

They are proud of this—as very well they may,
It being a sort of knighthood, or gilt key
Stuck in their loins; or like an "entré"
Up the back stairs, or such free-masonry.
I borrow my comparisons from clay,
Being clay myself. Let not those spirits be Offended with such base low likenesses;
We know their posts are nobler far than these.

V.

When the great signal ran from heaven to hell—
About ten million times the distance reckon'd
From our sun to its earth, as we can tell
How much time it takes up, even to a second,
For every ray that travels to dispel
The fogs of London, through which, dimly bea-
The weathercocks are gilt some thrice a year,
If that the summer is not too severe:—

VI.

I say that I can tell—'twas half a minute:
I know the solar beams take up more time
Ere, pack'd up for their journey, they begin it;
But then their telegraph is less sublime,
And if they ran a race, they would not win it
'Gainst Satan's couriers bound for their own clime;
The sun takes up some years, for every ray
To reach its goal—the devil not half a day.

VII.

Upon the verge of space, about the size
Of half-a-crown, a little speck appear'd,
(‘I’ve seen a something like it in the skyes
In the Egean, ere a squall; it near'd,
And, growing bigger, took another guise;
Like an aerial ship it tack'd, and steer'd.
Or was steer'd, (I am doubtful of the grammar
Of the last phrase, which makes the stanza stem:-

But take your choice;) and then it grew a cloud,
And so it was—a cloud of witnesses.

No such a cloud! No land e'er saw a crown
Of locusts numerous as the heavens saw these;
They shadow'd with their myriads space; their lord
And varied cries were like those of wild geese,
(If nations may be liken'd to a goose,)
And realized the phrase of "hell broke loose"

Here crash'd a sturdy oath of stout John Bull,
Who damn'd away his eyes as heretofore: [wull?]
There Paddy brogued "By Jesus!"—"What's your
The temperate Scot exclaim'd: the French ghost
In certain terms I shan't translate in full, [awore
As the first coachman will; and 'mid the war.
The voice of Jonathan was heard to express
"Our President is going to war, I guess."'

Besides, there were the Spaniard, Dutch, and Dane:
In short, an universal showal of shades,
From Otahite's isle to Salisbury Plain,
Of all climes and professions, years, and trades,
Ready to swear against the good king's reign,
Bitter as clubs in cards are against spades—
All summon'd by this grand "subpoena," to Try if kings mayn't be damn'd like me or you.

When Michael saw this host, he first grew pale,
As angels can; next, like Italian twilight,
He turn'd all colors—as a peacock's tail,
Or sunset streaming through a gothic skylight
In some old abbey, or a trout not stale,
Or distant lightning on the horizon by night,
Or a fresh rainbow, or a grand review
Of thirty regiments in red, green, and blue

Then he address'd himself to Satan: "Why—
My good old friend, for such I deem you, though
Our different parties makes us fight so shy,
I ne'er mistake you for a personal loc;
Our difference is political, and I
Trust that, whatever may occur below,
You know my great respect for you; and this Makes me regret whate'er you do amiss—

"Why, my dear Lucifer, would you abuse
Like the rake, you're always in the sun;
Type even superfluous, since two honest clean.
True testimonials are enough: we lose
Our time, nay, our eternity, between
The accusation and defense: if we Hear both, 'twill stretch our immortality"
LXIV.

Satan replied, "To me the matter is Indifferent, in a personal point of view:
I can have fifty better souls than this
With far less trouble than we have gone through Already; and I merely argued his Late majesty of Britain's case with you
Upon a point of form: you may dispose
Of him; I've kings enough below, God knows!"

LXV.

This spoke the Demon, (late call'd "multifaced"
By mutlo-scribbling Southey.) "Then we'll call
One or two persons of the myriads placed
Around our congress, and dispense with all
The rest," quoth Michael: "Who may be so grac'd
As to speak first? there's choice enough—who shall
It be?" Then Satan answer'd, "There are many;
But you may choose Jack Wilkes as well as any."

LXVI.

A merry, cock-eyed, curious-looking sprite,
Upon the instant started from the throng,
Drest in a fashion now forgotten quite;
For all the fashions of the flesh stick long
By people in the next world; where unite
All the costumes since Adam's, right or wrong,
From Eve's fig-leaf down to the petticoat,
Almost as scanty, of days less remote.

LXVII.

The spirit look'd around upon the crowds
Assembled, and exclaim'd, "My friends of all
The spheres, we shall catch cold among these clouds;
So let's to business: why this general call?
If those are freethinkers I see in throngs,
And 'tis for an election that they bawl,
Behold a candidate with unturnd' coat!
Saint Peter, may I count upon your vote?"

LXVIII.

"Sir," replied Michael, "you mistake: these things
Are of a former life, and what we do
Above is more august; to judge of kings
Is the tribunal met: so now you know.
"Then I presume those gentlemen with wings,"
Said Wilkes, "are cherubs; and that soul below
Looks much like George the Third, but to my mind
A good deal older—Bless me! is he blind?"

LXIX.

'He is what you behold him, and his doom
Depends upon his deeds," the Angel said
'If you have ought to arraign in him, the tomb
Gives licence to the humblest beggar's head
To lift itself against the loftiest."—"Some,"
Said Wilkes, "don't wait to see them laid in lead,
For such a liberty—and I, for one,
Have told them what I thought beneath the sun."

LXX.

"Above the sun repeat, then, what thou hast
To urge against him," said the Archangel. "Why,
Replied the spirit, "since old scores are past,
Must I turn evidence! In faith, not I.
Besides, I bent him hollow at the last,
With all his Lords and Commons: in the sky
I don't like ripping up old stories, since
His conduct was but natural in a prince.
LXXXVIII.
The moment that you had pronounced him one,
Fredot! his face changed, and he was anc her,
And when that change was hardly well put on,
It varied, till I don't think his own mother
(If that he had a mother) would her son
Have known, he shifted so from one to t'other.
Till guessing from a pleasure grew a task,
At this epistolary "Iron Mask."

LXXXIX.
For sometimes he like Cerberus would seem—
"Three gentlemen at once," (as sagely says Good Mrs. Malaprop) then you might deem
That he was not even one; now many "a's
Were flashing round him; and now a thick steam
Hid him from sight—like fogs on London days;
Now Burke, now Tooke, he grew to people's fancies,
And certes often like Sir Philip Francis.

LXXX.
I've an hypothesis—'tis quite my own;
I never let it out till now, for fear
Of doing people harm about the throne,
And injuring some minister or peer,
On whom the stigma might perhaps be blown.
It is—my gentle public, lend thine ear!
'Tis, that what Junius we are wont to call
Was sally, truly, nobody at all.

LXXXI.
I don't see wherefore letters should not be Written without hands, since we daily view
Them written without heads; and books, we see,
Are fill'd as well without the latter too;
And really till we fix on somebody
For certain sure to claim them as his due,
Their author, like the Niger's mouth, will bother
The world to say if there be mouth or author.

LXXXII.
"And who and what art thou?" the Archangel said.
"For that you may consult my title page;"
Replied this mighty shadow of a shade:
"If I have kept my secret half an age,
I scarce shall tell it now."—"Canst thou upbraid,
Continued Michael, "George Rex, or allege Aught further?" Junius answer'd, "You had better
First ask him for his answer to my letter:"

LXXXIII.
"My charges upon record will outlast
The brass of both his epitaph and tomb."
Repe'tst thou not," said Michael, "of some past
Exaggeration? something which may doom
Myself if false, as him if true? Thou wast
Too bitter—is it not so?—in thy gloom
Of passion?"—"Passion!" cried the phantom dim,
I loved my country, and I hated him.

LXXXIV.
"What I have written, I have written: let
The rest be on his head or mine!" So spoke
Old "Nominis Umbra;" and while speaking yet,
Away he melted in celestial smoke.
Then Satan said to Michael, "Don't forget Tooke,
To call George Washington, and John Horne
And Franklin":—but at this time there was heard
A crack for room, though not a phantom stir'd.

LXXXV.
At length with jesting, elbowing, and he aid
Of cherubim appointed to that post,
The devil Asmodeus to the circle made
His way, and look'd as if his journey cost
Some trouble; when his burden down he laid,
"What's this?" cried Michael; "'why, 'tis not
"I know it, " quoth the innumera, but he [ghost?]
Shall be one, if you leave the affair to me.

LXXXVI.
"Confound the renegade! I have spain'd
My left wing, he's so heavy; one would think
Some of his works about his neck were chain'd.
But to the point: while hovering o'er the Brink
Of Skiddaw, (where as usual it still rain'd),
I saw a taper, far below me, wink,
And stooping, caught this fellow at a libel—
No less on history than the Holy Bible.

LXXXVII.
"The former is the devil's scripture, and—
The latter yours, good Michael; so the affair
Belongs to all of us, you understand.
I snatch'd him up just as you see him there,
And brought him off for sentence out of hand.
I've scarcely been ten minutes in the air—
At least a quarter it cap hardly be:
I dare say that his wife is still at tea!

LXXXVIII.
Here Satan said, "I know this man of old,
And have expected him for some time here;
A siller fellow you will scarce behold,
Or more conceited in his petty sphere:
But surely it was not worth while to fold
Such trash below your wing, Asmodeus dear:
We had the poor wretch safe (without being bored
With carriage) coming of his own accord.

LXXXIX.
"But since he's here, let's see what he has done."
"Done!" cried Asmodeus, "he anticipates
The very business you are now upon,
And scribbles as if head clerk to the Fates.
Who knows to what his ribaldry may run,
When such an ass as this, like Balaam's, prates?
"Let's hear," quoth Michael, "what he has to say.
You know we're bound to that in every way."

XC.
Now the bard, glad to get an audience which
By no means often was his case below,
Began to cough, and hawk, and hem, and pitch
His voice into that awful note of wo
To all unhappy hearers within reach
Of poets when the tide of rhyme's in flow,
But stuck fast with his first hexameter,
Not one of all whose gouty feet would stir.

XCI.
But ere the spavin'd dactyl could be spurr'd
Into recitative, in great dismay
Both cherubin and seraphim were heard
To murmur loudly through their long array
And Michael rose ere he could get a word
Of all his founder'd verses under way,
And cried, "For God's sake stop, my friend: 't were Non Di, non homines—'t know the rest."
Fed, paid, and pamper'd by the very men
By whom his muse and morals had been maul'd
He had written much blank verse, and blanker prose
And more of both than any body knows.

XCIII.
He had written Wesley's life—here, turning round
To Satan, "Sir, I'm ready to write yours,
In two octavo volumes, so nicely bound,
With notes and preface, all that most allures
The pious purchaser; and there's no ground
For fear, for I can choose my own reviewers:
So let me have the proper documents,
That I may add you to my other saints."

C.
Satan bow'd, and was silent. "Well, if you,
With amiable modesty, decline
My offer, what says Michael? There are few Whose memoirs could be render'd more divine.
Mine is a pen of all work; not so new
As it was once, but I would make you shine
Like your own trumpet. By the way, my own
Has more of brass in it, and is as well blown.

CI.
"But talking about trumpets, here's my Vision
Now you shall judge, all people; yes, you shall Judge with my judgment, and by my decision
Be guided who shall enter heaven or fall.
I settle all these things by intuition,
Times present, past, to come, heaven, hell, and all
Like King Alfonso.* When I thus see double
I save the Deity some words of trouble."

CII.
He ceased, and drew forth an MS.; and no
Persuasion on the part of devils, or saints,
Or angels, now could stop the torrent; so
He read the first three lines of the contents;
But at the fourth, the whole spiritual show
Had vanished, with variety of scents,
Ambrosial and sulphureous, as they sprang,
Like lightning, off from his "melodious twang."†

CIII.
Those grand heroes acted as a spell:
The angels stop'd their ears and plied their pluon
The devils ran howling, deafen'd, down to hell;
The ghosts fled, gibbering, for their own dominion,
(For 'tis not yet deci'd where they dwell,
And I leave every man to his own opinion;) Michael took refuge in his trump—but lo!
His teeth were set on edge, he could not blow;

CIV.
Saint Peter, who has hitherto been known
For an impetuous saint, upraised his keys,
And at the fifth line knock'd the poet down;
Who fell like Phaeton, but more at ease,
Into his lake, for there he did not drown,
A different web being by the Destinies
Woven for the laureate's final wraith, whence'er
Reform shall happen either here or there.

* King Alfonso, speaking of the Puckernom system, said, that "had he been consulted at the creation of the world, he would have spared the Maker some absurdities."
† See Aubrey's account of the apparition which disappeared, with a savour of perfume and a melodious twang; it was the Antiparvus, vol. 2.
CV.

He first sank to the bottom—like his works,
But soon rose to the surface—like himself;
For all corrupted things are buoy'd, like corks,
By their own rottenness, light as an elf,
Or wish that fits o'er a morass: he lurks,
It may be, still, like dull books on a shelf,
In his own den, to scrawl some "Life," or "Vision."
As Welborn says—"the devil turn'd precocious."

A drowned body lies at the bottom till rotten; it then riseth, as most pain-

ADVERTISEMENT.

The Morgante Maggiore, of the first canto of which this translation is offered, divides with the Orlando Innamorato the honor of having formed and suggested the style and story of Ariosto. The great defects of Boiardo, were his treating too seriously the narratives of chivalry, and his harsh style.
Ariosto, in his continuation, by a judicious mixture of the gayety of Pulci, has avoided the one; and Berni, in his reformers of Boiardo's poem, has corrected the other. Pulci may considered as the precursor and model of Berni altogether, as he has partly been to Ariosto, however inferior to both his copists. He is no less the founder of a new style of poetry very lately sprung up in England. I allude to that of the ingenious Whistlercraft. The serious poems on Roncevalles in the same language, and more particularly the excellent one of Mr. Meivale, are to be traced to the same source.

It has never yet been decided entirely whether Pulci's intention was or was not to deride the religion which is one of his favorite topics. It appears to me, that such an intention would have been no less hazardous to the poet than to the priest, particularly in that age and country; and the permission to publish the poem, and its reception among the classes of Italy, prove that it neither was nor is so interpreted. That he intended to ridicule the monastic life, and suffered his imagination to play with the simple dulness of his converted giant, seems evident enough; but surely it were as unjust to accuse him of irreligion on this account, as to denounce Fielding for his

the Ordinary in Jonathan Wild—or Scott, for the exquisite use of his Covenanters in the "Tales of my Landlord."

In the following translation I have used the liberty of the original with the proper names;
as Pulci uses Gan. Gannelon; or Gannelone; Carlo, Carliomagno, or Carliomano; Rondel, or Rondelle,
&c., as it suits his convenience; so has the translator. In other respects the version is faithful to the best of the translator's ability in combining his interpretation of the one language with the not very easy task of reducing it to the same verification in the other. The reader, on comparing it with the original, is requested to remember that the antiquated language of Pulci, however pure, is not easy to the generality of Italians themselves, from its great mixture of Tuscan proverbs; and he may therefore be more indulgent to the present attempt. How far the translator has succeeded, and whether or no he shall continue the work, are questions which the public will decide. He was induced to make the experiment partly by his love for, and partial intercourse with, the Italian language, of which it is so easy to acquire a slight knowledge, and with which it is so nearly impossible for a foreigner to become accurately conversant.
The Italian language is like a capricious beauty who accords her smiles to all, her favors to few,
and sometimes least to those who have courted her longest. The translator wished also to present in an English dress a part at least of a poem never yet rendered into a northern language; at the same time that it has been the original of some of the most celebrated productions on this side of the Alps, as well of those recent experiments in poetry

Parson Adams, Barnabas, Twhackum, Supple, and in England which have been already mentioned.
CANTO I.

I.
In the beginning was the Word next God;
God was the word, the word no less was he:
This was in the beginning, to my mode
Of thinking, and without him naught could be;
Therefore, just Lord! from out thy high abode,
Benign and pious, bid an angel rise,
One only, to be my companion, who Shall help my famous, worthy, old song through,

II.
And thou, oh Virgin! daughter, mother, pride,
Of the same Lord, who gave to you each key
Of heaven, and hell, and every thing beside,
The day cy Gabriel said "All hail!" to thee,
Since to thy servants pity's ne'er denied,
With flowing rhymes, a pleasant style and free,
Be to my verses then benignly kind.
And to the end illuminate my mind.

III.
'Twas in the season when said Philomel
Weeps with her sister, who remembers and Deplores the ancient woes which both befell,
And makes the nymphs enamor'd, to the hand
Of Phaeton by Phoebe loved so well
His car (but temper'd by his sire's command)
Was given, and on the horizon's verge just now
Appeard', so that Tithonus scratch'd his brow;

IV.
When I prepared my bark first to obey,
As it should still obey, the helm, my mind,
And carry prose or rhyme, and this my lay
Of Charles the Emperor, whom you will find
By several pena already praised; but they
Who to diffuse his glory were inclined,
For all that I can see in prose or verse,
Have understood Charles badly—and wrote worse.

V.
Leonardo Arctino said already,
That if, like Pepin, Charles had had a writer
Of genius quick, and diligently steady,
No hero would in history look brighter,
He in the cabinet being always ready,
And in the field a most victorious fighter,
Who for the church and Christian faith had wrought
Certs far more than yet is said or thought.

VI.
You still may see at Saint Liberatore
The abbey, no great way from Manopoli,
Erected in the Abruzzi to his glory,
Because of the great battle in which fell
A pagan king, according to the story,
And felon people whom Charles sent to hell;
And there are bones so many, and so many,
Near them Giussaffa's would seem few, if any.

VII.
But the world, blind and ignorant, don't prize
His virtues as I wish to see them; thou,
Florence, by his great bounty don't arise
And hast, and may have, if thou wilt allow.
All proper customs and true courtesies:
Whate'er thou hast acquired from then till now
With knightly courage, treasure, or the lance,
Is sprung from out the noble blood of France.

VIII.
Twelve paladins had Charles in court, of whom
The wisest and most famous was Orlando;
Him traitor Gan conducted to the tomb
In Ronesvalles, as the villain plann'd too,
While the horn rang so loud, and knoll'd the doom
Of their sad rout, though he did all knight can do.
And Dante in his comedy has given
To him a happy seat with Charles in heaven.

IX.
'Twas Christmas-day; in Paris all his court
Charles held; the chief, I say, Orlando was,
The Dane; Astolfo there too did reside
Also Ansuigi, the gay time to pass
In festival and in triumphal sport,
The much-renown'd St. Dennis being the cause;
Angiolin of Bayonne, and Oliver,
And gentle Belinghiere too came there:

X.
Avallo, and Arino, and Othone
Of Normandy, and Richard Paladini,
Wise Hamo, and the ancient Salamone,
Walter of Lion's Mount, and Baldovin,
Who was the son of the sad Ganellone,
Were there, exciting too much gladness in
The son of Pepin:—when his knights came hither
He groan'd with joy to see them altogether.

XI.
But watchful Fortune, lurking, takes good heed
Ever some bar 'gainst our intents to bring.
While Charles repose him thus, in word and deed
Orlando ruled court Charles, and every thing;
Curst Gan, with envy bursting had such need
To vent his spite, that thus with Charles the king
One day he openly began to say,
"Orlando must we always then obey?"

XII.
"A thousand times I've been about to say,
Orlando too presumptuously goes on;
Here are we, counts, kings, dukes, to own thy sway
Hamo, and Otho, Ogier, Solomon,
Each have to honor thee and to obey;
But he has too much credit near the throne,
Which we won't suffer, but are quite decided,
By such a boy to be no longer guided.

XIII.
"And even at Aspramont thou didst begin
To let him know he was a gallant knight,
And by the fount did much the day to win;
But I know who that day had won the fight,
If it had not for good Gherardo been;
The victory was Almonte's else; his sight
He kept upon the standard, and the laurels
In fact and fairness are his earning, Charles
XIV.

"If thou rememberest being in Gascony,
When there advanced the nations out of Spain,
The Christian cause had suffer'd shamefully,
Had not his valor driven them back again.
Best speak the truth when there's a reason why:
Know then, oh emperor! that all complaint:
As for myself, I shall repass the mounts
O'er which I cross'd with two and sixty counts.

XV.

"Tis fit thy grandeur should dispense relief,
So that each here may have his proper part,
For the whole court is more or less in grief:
Perhaps thou deem'st this lad a Mars in heart?"

Orlando one day heard this speech in brief,
As by himself it chanced he sate apart:
Displeased he was with Gan because he said it,
But much more still that Charles should give him credit.

XVI.

And with the sword he would have murder'd Gan,
But Oliver thrust in between the pair,
And from his hand extracted Durfandain,
And thus at length they separated were.

Orlando, sterry too with Carlonain,
Wanted but little to have slain him there;
Then forth alone from Paris went the chief,
And burst and madden'd with disdain and grief.

XVII.

From Ermellina, consort of the Dane,
He took Cortana, and then took Rondell,
And on towards Barra prick'd him o'er the plain;
And when she saw him coming, Alidadell
Stretch'd forth her arms to clasp her lord again.

Orlando, in whose brain all was not well,
As "Welcome, my Orlando, home," she said,
Raised up his sword to smite her on the head.

XVIII.

Like him a fury counsels; his revenge
On Gan in that rash act he seem'd to take,
Which Alidadell thought extremely strange;
But soon Orlando found himself awake;
And his spouse took his bridle on this change,
And he dismounted from his horse, and spake
Of every thing which pass'd without demur,
And then repos'd himself some days with her.

XIX.

Then full of wrath departed from the place,
As far as pagan countries roam'd astray;
And while he rode, yet still at every pace
The traitor Gan remember'd by the way;
And wandering on in error a long space,
An abbey which in a lone desert lay,
Mid glens obscure, and distant lands he found,
Which form'd the Christians and the pagan's bound.

XX.

The abbot was call'd Clermont, and by blood
Descended from Anglante; under cover
Of a great mountain's brow the abbey stood,
But certain savage giants look'd him over;
One Passamont was foremost of the brood,
And Alabaster and Morgante hover
Second and third, with certain slings, and throw
In daily jet pardy the place below.

XXI.

The monks could pass the convent gate no more,
Nor leave their cells for water or for wood;
Orlando knock'd, but none would ope, before
Unto the prior it at length seem'd good;
Entered, he said that he was taught to adore
Him who was born of Mary's holiest blood,
And was baptized a Christian; and then show'd
How to the abbey he had found his road.

XXII.

Said the abbot, "You are welcome; what is mine
We give you freely, since that you believe
With us in Mary Mother's Son divine;
And that you may not, cavalier, conceive
The cause of our delay to let you in
To be rusticity, you shall receive
The reason why our gate was barr'd to you:
Thus those who in suspicion live must do.

XXIII.

"When hither to inhabit first we came
These mountains, albeit that they are obscure
As you perceive, yet without fear or blame
They seem'd to promise an asylum sure.
From savage brutes alone, too fierce to tame,
'Twas fit our quiet dwelling to secure;
But now, if here we stay, we needs must guard
Against domestic beasts with watch and ward.

XXIV.

"These make us stand, in fact, upon the watch;
For late there have appear'd three g'nte rough;
What nation or what kingdom bore the batch
I know not, but they are all of savage stuff.
When force and malice with some genius match,
You know, they can do all— we are not enough;
And these so much our orisons derange,
I know not what to do, till matters chang'd.

XXV.

"Our ancient fathers living the desert in,
For just and holy works were duly fed;
Think not they lived on locusts sole, 'tis certain
That manna was rain'd down from heaven instead
But here 'tis fit we keep on the alert in [bread
Our bounds, or taste the stones shower'd down for
From off you mountain daily raining faster,
And flung by Passamont and Alabaster.

XXVI.

"The third, Morgante, 's savagest by far; he Plucks up pines, beeches, poplar-trees, and oaks,
And flings them, our community to bury;
And all that I can do but more provokes."
While thus they parley in the cemetery,
A stone from one of their gigantic strokes,
Which nearly crush'd Rondell, came tumbling over
So that he took a long leap under cover.

XXVII.

"For God sake, cavalier, come in with speed;
The manna's falling now," the rbot cried.
"This fellow does not wish my horse should feed,
Dear abbot," Roland unto him reply'd.
"Of restiveness he'd cure him had he need;
That stone seems with good will and aln applied
The holy father said, "I don't deceiv'e;
They'll one day fling the mountain, I believe."
XXVIII
Orlando had the Argemone take care of Rondelovo,
And also made a breakfast of his own.
"Abbot," he said, "I want to find that fellow
Who flung at my good horse yon corner-stone.
Said the abbot, "Let not my advice seem shallow;
As to a brother dear I speak alone;
I would dissuade you, baron, from this strife,
As knowing sure that you will lose your life.

XXX.
"Then go you with God's benison and mine;"
Orlando, after he had scaled the mount,
As the abbot had directed, kept the line
Right to the usual haunt of Passamont;
Who, seeing him alone in this design,
Survey'd his fore and aft with eyes observant,
Then said, "If he wish'd to stay as servant?"

XXXI.
And promised him an office of great ease.
But, said Orlando, "Saracen insane!
I come to kill you, if it shall so please
God, not to serve as footboy in your train;
You with your monks so oft have broke the peace—
Vile dog! 'tis past his patience to sustain."
The giant ran to fetch his arms, quite furious,
When he received an answer so injurious.

XXXII.
And being returned to where Orlando stood,
Said, "I will go, and while he lies alone,
Disarm me: why such avarice did I fight?"
But Christ his servants never abandons long,
Especially Orlando, such a knight,
As so devout would almost be a wrong.
While the giant goes to put off his defences,
Orlando has recall'd his force and senses:

XXXIII.
And loud he shouted, 'Giant, where dost go?
Thou thought'st me doubtless for the bier outlaid;
To the right about—without wings thou'rt too slow
To fly my vengeance—curry renegade!
Twas but by treachery thou laidst me low.
The giant astonishment betray'd,
And turn'd about, and stopp'd his journey on,
And then he stopp'd to pick up a great stone.

XXXV.
Orlando had the Cortana bare in hand,
To split the head in twain was what he schemed
Cortana clave the skull like a true brand,
And pagan Passamont died unredeem'd.
Yet harsh and haughty, as he lay he bann'd,
And most devoutly Macon still blasphemed;
Yet while his crude, rude blasphemies he heard,
Orlando thank'd the Father and the Word.

XXXVI.
"Abbot," said, "What grace to thee thou'rt given!
And to thee, oh Lord! I am ever bound.
I know my life was saved by thee from heaven
Since by thy giant I was fairly down'd.
All things by thee are measured just and even;
Our power without thine aid would have been
I pray thee take heed of me, till I can
At least return once more to Carlonman."

XXXVII.
And having said thus much, he went his way;
And Alabaster found out below,
Doing the very best that in him lay
To root from out a bank a rock or two.
Orlando, when he reach'd him, loud 'gan say,
"How think'st thou, glutton, such a stone to throw?"
When Alabaster heard his deep voice ring,
He suddenly betook him to his sling.

XXXVIII.
And hurl'd a fragment of a size so large,
That if it had in fact fulfill'd its mission,
And Roland not avail'd him of his targe,
There would have been no need of a physician.
Orlando set himself in turn to charge,
And in his bulky bosom made incision
With all his sword. The lout fell, but, o'erthrown, he However by no means forgot Macone.

XXXIX.
Morgante had a palace in his mode,
Composed of branches, logs of wood, and earth,
And stretch'd himself at ease on this abode,
And shut himself at night within his berth.
Orlando knock'd, and knock'd again, to good
The giant from his sleep; and he came forth,
The door to open, like a crazy thing,
For a rough dream had shook him slumbering.

XL.
He thought that a fierce serpent had attack'd him,
And Mahomet he call'd; but Mahomet
Is nothing worth, and not an instant back'd him;
But praying blessed Jesu, he was set
At liberty from all the fears which rack'd him;
And to the gate he came with great regret—[be.
"Who knockes here?" grumbling all the while, said
That," said Orlando, "you will quickly see.

XLI.
"I come to preach to you, as o your brothers,
Sent by the miserable monks—repenance;
For Providence divine, in you and others,
Condemns the evil done by new acquaintance.
'Tis writ c h high—your wrong must pay another's
From heaven itself is issued out this sentence.
Know then, that colder now than a plaster
I left your Passamont and Alabaster."
XLII.

Morgante said, "Oh, gentle cavalier!
Now by thy God say me no villain;
The favor of your name I fain would hear,
And, if a Christian, speak for courtesy."

Replied Orlando, "So much to your ear,
I by my faith disclose contentedly;
Christ I adore, who is the genuine Lord,
And, if you please, by you may be adored."

XLIII.

The Saracen rejoin'd in humble tone,
"I have had an extraordinary vision;
A savage serpent fell on me about,
And Macon would not pity my condition;
Hence to thy God, who for ye did alone
Upon the cross, preferr'd my petition;
His timely succor set me safe and free,
And I a Christian am disposed to be."

XLIV.

Orlando answer'd, "Baron just and pious,
If this good wish your heart can really move
To the true God, who will not then deny us
Eternal honor, you I will go show,
And, if you please, as friends we will ally us,
And I will love you with a perfect love.
Your idols are vain liars, full of fraud;
The only true God is the Christian's God."

XLV.

"The Lord descended to the virgin breast
Of Mary Mother, sinless and divine;
If you acknowledge the Redeemer blest,
Without whom neither sun nor star can shine,
Abjure bad Macon's false and felon test,
Your renegade god, and worship mine,—
Baptize yourself with zeal, since you repent.
To which Morgante answer'd, "I'm content."

XLVI.

And then Orlando to embrace him flew,
And made much of his convert, as he cried,
"To the abbey I will gladly marshal you."
To whom Morgante, "Let us go," replied;
"I to the triars have for peace to sue."
Which thing Orlando heard with inward pride,
Saying, "My brother, so devout and good,
Ask the Abbot pardon, as I wish you would."

XLVII.

"Since God has granted your illumination,
Accepting you in mercy for his own,
Humility should be your first obligation." [known—Morgante said, "For goodness' sake, make
Since that your God is to be mine—your station,
And let your name in verity be shown;
Then will I every thing at your command do."
On which the other said, he was Orlando.

XLVIII.

"Then," quoth the giant, "blessed be Jesus
A thousand times with gratitude and praise!
Oft, perfect baron! have I heard of you
Through all the different periods of my days:
And, as I said, to be your vassal too
I wish, for your great gallantry always."
Thus reasoning, they continued much to say,
And onwards to the abbey went their way.
Orlando, seeing him thus agitated,
Said quickly, "Abbot, be thou of good cheer;
He Christ believes, as Christian must be rated,
And hath renounced his Mason false;" which here
Morgante with the hands corroborated,
A proof of both the giants' fate quite clear
Thence, with due thanks, the abbot God adored,
Saying, "Thou hast contented me, oh Lord!"

He gazed; Morgante's height he calculated,
And more than once contemplated his size;
And then he said, "Oh giant celebrated!
Know that no more my wonder will arise,
How could you tear and fling the trees you late did,
When I behold your form with my own eyes,
You now a true and perfect friend will show
Yourself to Christ, as once you were a foe.

"And one of our apostles, Saul once named,
Long persecuted sore the faith of Christ,
Till one day, by the Spirit being inflamed,
"Why dost thou persecute me thus!" said Christ;
And then from his offence he was reclaim'd,
And went for ever after preaching Christ,
And of the faith became a trump, whose sounding
O'er the whole earth is echoing and rebounding.

"So, my Morgante, you may do likewise;
He who repents—thus writes the Evangelist,
Occasions more rejoicing in the skies
Than ninety-nine of the celestial list.
You may be sure, should each desire arise
With just zeal for the Lord, that you'll exist
Among the happy saints for evermore;
But you were lost and damnd't to hell before!"

And thus great honor to Morgante paid
The abbot: many days they did repose.
One day, as with Orlando they both stray'd,
And saunter'd here and there, where'er they chose,
The abbots shaw'd a chamber, where array'd
Much armor was, and hung up certain bows;
And one of these Morgante for a whim
Girt on, though useless, he believed to him.

There being a want of water in the place,
Orlando, like a worthy brother, said,
"Morgante, I could wish you in this case
To go for water, " You shall be obey'd,
In all commands," was the reply, "straightways."
Upon his shoulder a great tub he laid,
And went out on his way unto a fountain,
Where he was wont to drink below the mountain.

Arrived there, a prodigious noise he hears,
Which suddenly along the forest spread;
Whereat from out his quiver he prepares
An arrow for his bow, and lifts his head;
And lo! a monstrous herd of swine appears,
And onward rushes with tempestuous tread,
And to the fountain's brink precisely pours;
So that the giant's join'd by all the boars.

Morgante at a venture shot an arrow,
Which pierced a pig precisely in the ear
And pass'd unto the other side quite thorongh.
So that the giant, defunct, lay trip'd up near
Another, to revenge his fellow frawor,
Against the giant rush'd in fierce career,
And reach'd the passage with so swift a foot,
Morgante was not now in time to shoot.

The ten was on one shoulder, and there were
The hogs on t'other, and he brash'd apace
On to the abbey, though by no means near,
Nor split one drop of water in his race.
Orlando, seeing him so soon appear
With the dead boars, and with that brimful vase,
Marye'll to see his strength so very great;
So did the abbot, and set wide the gate.

The monks, who saw the water fresh and good,
Rejoiced, but more much to perceive the pork:
All animals are glad at sight of food:
They lay their brevities to sleep, and work
With greedy pleasure, and in such a mood,
That the flesh needs no salt beneath their fork.
Of rankness and of rot there is no fear,
For all the fasts are now left in arrear.

As though they wish'd to burst at once, they ate;
And gorged so that, as if the bones had been
In water, sorely grieved the dog and cat,
Perceiving that they all were pick'd too clean.
The abbot, who to all did honor great,
A few days after this convivial scene,
Gave to Morgante a fine horse, well train'd,
Which he long time had for himself maintain'd.

The horse Morgante to a meadow led,
To gallop, and to put him to the proof,
Thinking that he a back of iron had,
Or to skim eggs unbroke was light enough;
But the horse, sinking with the pain, fell dead,
And burst, while cold on earth lay head and hoof,
Morgante said, "Get up, thou sulky cur!"
And still continued prickling with the spur.

"Oh dette in eu in teas un grand punzone." It strange that Pule should have literally translated the sublaced terms of my old friend and masn, Jackson, and the art which he has coveted to its highest pitch. "A punch on the head," or "a punch on the head,"" un punzone in eu in teas," is the exact and frequent phrase of our best pagliate, who little dream that they are taking the poet's Thoason.
LAIX.

But finally he thought fit to dismount,
And said, "I am as light as any feather,
And he has burst;—to this what say you, count?"
Orlando answered, "Like a ship's mast rather
You seem to me, and with the truck for front:—
Let him go; Fortune willed that we together
Should march, but you on foot Morgante still."
To which the giant answered, "So I will.

LXX.

"When there shall be occasion, you will see How I approve my courage in the fight."
Orlando said, "I really think you'll be,
If it should prove God's will, a goodly knight;
Nor will you napping there discover me,
But never mind your horse, though out of sight
"I were best to carry him into some wood,
If but the means or way I understood."

LXXI.

The giant said, "Then carry him I will,
Since that to carry me he was so slack—
To render, as the gods do, good for ill;
But lend a hand to place him on my back."
Orlando answered, "If my counsel still
May weigh, Morgante, do not undertake
To lift or carry this dead courier, who,
As you have done to him, will do to you.

LXXII.

"Take care he don't revenge himself, though dead,
As Nessus did of old beyond all cure.
I don't know if the fact you've heard or read;
But he will make you burst, you may be sure."
"But help him on my back," Morgante said;
"And you shall see what weight I can endure.
In place, my gentle Roland, of this pallet,
With all the belts, I'd carry yonder belfry."

LXXIII.

The abbot said, "The steeple may do well,
But, for the walls you've broken them, I wot."
Morgante answered, "Let them pay in hell
The penalty who lie dead in your groat;"
And hoisting up the horse from where he fell,
"He said, "Now look if I the gout have got,
Orlando, in the legs—or if I have force;"—
And then he made two gambols with the horse.

LXXIV

Morgante was like any mountain framed;
So if he did this, 'tis no prodigy;
But secretly himself Orlando blamed,
Because he was one of his family;
And fearing that he might be hurt or maim'd,
Once more he bade him lay his burden by:
"Put down, nor bear him further the desert in."
Morgante said, "I'll carry him for certain."

LXXV.

He did; and stow'd him in some nook away,
And to the abbey then return'd with speed.
Orlando said, "Why longer do we stay?"
Morgante, here is nought to do indeed."
The abbot by the hand he took one day,
And said, with great respect, he had agreed
To leave his reverence; but for this decision
He wish'd to have his pardon and permission.

LXXVI.

The honors they continued to receive
Perhaps exceeded what his merits claim'd
He said, "I mean, and quickly, to retrieve
The lost days of time past, which may be blanched.
Some days ago I should have ask'd your leave,
Kind father, but I really was ashamed,
And knew not how to show my sentiment,
So much I see you with our stay content

LXXVII.

"But in my heart I bear through every clime
The abbot, abbey, and this solitude—
So much I love you in so short a time;
For me, from heaven reward you with all good
The God so true, the eternal Lord sublime!
Whose kingdom at the last hath open stood.
Meantime we stand expectant of your blessing,
And recommend us to your prayers with pressing."

LXXVIII.

Now when the abbot Count Orlando heard,
His heart grew soft with inner tenderness
Such favor in his bosom bred each word;
And "Cavaller," he said, "if I have less
Courteous and kind to your great worth appear'd
Than fits me for such gentle blood to express.
I know I've done too little in this case;
But blame our ignorance, and this poor place

LXXIX.

"We can indeed but honor you with masses,
And sermons, thanksgivings, and pater-nosters,
Hot suppers, dinners, (fitting other places
In verity much rather than the cloisters);
But such a love for you my heart embraces,
For thousand virtues which your bosom fosters.
That whereas'er you go I too shall be,
And, on the other part, you rest with me

LXXX.

"This may involve a seeming contradiction;
But you I know are sage, and feel, and taste,
And understand my speech with full conviction,
For your just pious deeds may you be graced
With the Lord's great reward and benediction,
By whom you were directed to this waste:
To his high mercy is our freedom due,
For which we render thanks to him and you.

LXXXI.

"You saved at once our life and soul: such fear
The giants caused us, that the way was lost
By which we could pursue a fit career
In search of Jesus and the saintly host.
And your departure breeds such sorrow here,
That comfortless we all are to our cost;
But months and years you could not stay in sloth
Nor are you form'd to wear our sober cloth:

LXXXII.

"But to bear arms, and wield the lance; indeed,
With these as much is done as with this cowl;
In proof of which the Scripture you may read.
This giant up to heaven may bear his soul
By your compassion: now in peace proceed.
Your state and name I seek not to unroll;
But, if I'm ask'd, this answer shall be given,
That here an angel was sent down from heaven
THE PROPHECY OF DANTE.

"If the accent of life gives me mystical love,
And coming events cast their shadows before.”

CAMPBELL.

DEDICATION.

LADY! if for the cold and cloudy clime,
Where was I born, but where I would not die,
Of the great Poet-Sire of Italy
I dare to build the imitative rhyme,
Harsh Banic copy of the South’s sublime,
Though art the cause; and howsoever I
Fall short of his immortal harmony,
Thy gentle heart will pardon me the crime.
Then, in the pride of Beauty and of Youth,
Spak’st; and for thee to speak and be obey’d
Are one; but only in the sunny South
Such sounds are utter’d, and such charms display’d.
So sweet a language from so fair a mouth—
Aye! to what effect would it not persuade?
   Ravenna, June 21, 1819.

PREFACE.

In the course of a visit to the city of Ravenna in the summer of 1819, it was suggested to the author that having composed something on the subject of Tasso’s confinement, he should do the same on Dante’s exile—the tomb of the poet forming one of the principal objects of interest in that city, both to the native and to the stranger.

"On this hint I spake," and the result has been the following four cantos, in terza rima, now offered to the reader. If they are understood and approved, it is my purpose to continue the poem in various other cantos to its natural conclusion in the present age. The reader is requested to suppose that Dante addresses him in the interval between the conclusion of his Divina Commedia and his death, and shortly before the latter event, foretelling the fortunes of Italy in general in the ensuing centuries. In adopting this plan I have had in my mind the Cassandra of Lycophron, and the Prophecy of Nereus by Horace, as well as the Prophecies of Holy Writ. The measure adopted is the terza rima of Dante, which I am not aware to have seen hitherto tried in our language except it may be by Mr. Hayley, of whose translation I never saw but one extract, quoted in the notes to Caliph Vathek; so that—if I do not err—this poem may be considered as a metrical experiment. The cantos are short, and about the same length of those of the poet whose name I have borrowed, and most probably taken in vain.

Among the inconveniences of authors in the present day, it is difficult for any one who have a name, good or bad, to escape translation. I have had the fortune to see the fourth canto of Childe Harold translated into Italian versi scioliti that is, a poem written in Spenserian stanza into blank verse, with out regard to the natural divisions of the stanzas, or of the sense. If the present poem, being on national topic should chance to undergo the same fate, I would request the Italian reader to remember that when I have failed in the imitation of his great "Padre Alighier," I have failed in imitating that which all study and few understand, since to this day it is not yet settled what was the meaning of the allegory in the first canto of the Inferno, unless Count Marchetti's ingenious and probable conjecture may be considered as having decided the question.

He may also pardon my failure the more, as I am not quite sure that he would be pleased with my success, since the Italians, with a pardonable nationality, are particularly jealous of all that is left them as a nation—their literature; and in the present bitterness of the classic and romantic war, are but ill disposed to permit a foreigner even to approve or imitate them without finding fault with his ultramontane presumption. I can easily enter into this all, knowing what would be thought in England of an Italian imitator of Milton, or if a translation of Monti, or Pindemonte, or Arieti, should be held up to the rising generation as a model for their future poetical essays. But I perceive that I am deviating into an address to the Italian reader, when my business is with the English one, and be they few or many, I must take my leave of both.

CANTO I.

ONCE more in man's frail world! which I had left
So long that 'twas forgotten; and I feel
The weight of clay again,—too soon bereft
Of the immortal vision which could heal
My earthly sorrows, and to God's own skies
Lift me from that deep gulf without repeal,
Where late my ears rung with the damned cries
Of souls in hopeless bale; and from that place
Of lesser torment, whence men may arise
Pure from the fire to join the angelic race;
Mist whom my own bright Beatrice bless'd
My spirit with her light; and to the base
Of the eternal Triad! first, last, best,
Mysterious, three, sole, infinite, great God!
Soul universal! led the mortal guest,
Unblasted by the glory, though he trod
From star to star to reach the almighty throne.
Oh Beatrice! whose sweet limbs the sod
So long hath prest, and the cold marble stone,
Thou sole pure scraph of my earliest love,
Love so ineffable, and so alone,
That nought on earth could more my bosom move,
And meeting thee in heaven was but to meet
That without which my soul, like the arksless dove,
Had wander'd still in search of, nor her feet
Relieved her wing till found; without thy light
My paradise had still been incomplete.
Since my tenth sun gave summer to my sight
Thou wert my life, the essence of my thought,
Loved ere I knew the name of love, and bright
Still in these dim old eyes, now overwrought
With the world's war, and years, and banishment,
And tears for thee, by other woes untaught;
For mine is not's nature to be bent
By tyrannous faction, and the brawling crowd;
And though the long, long conflict hath been spent
In vain, and never more, save when the cloud
Which overhangs the Apennine, my mind's eye
Pierces to fancy Florence, once so proud
Of me, can I return, though but to die,
Unto my native soil, they have not yet
Quench'd the old exile's spirit, stern and high
But the sun, though not overcast, must set,
And the night cometh; I am old in days,
And deeds, and contemplation, and have met
Destruction face to face in all his ways.
The world hath left me, what it found me, pure,
And if I have not gather'd yet its praise,
I sought it not by any baser lure;
Man wrongs, and Time avenge, and my name
May form a monument not all obscure,
Though such was not my ambition's end or aim.
To add to the vain-glorious list of those
Who dabble in the pettiness of fame,
And make men's fickle breath the wind that blows
Their sail, and deem it glory to be class'd
With conquerors, and virtue's other foes,
In bloody chronicles of ages past.
I would have had my Florence great and free;
Oh Florence! Florence! unto me thou wast
Like that Jerusalem which the Almighty He Wept over, 'but thou would'st not;' as the bird
Gathers its young, I would have gather'd thee
Beneath a parent pinion, badst thou heard
My voice; but as the adder, deaf and fierce,
Against the breast that cherished thee was stirr'd
Thy venom, and my state thou didst amerce
And doom this body forfeit to the fire.
Alas! how bitter is his country's curse
To him who for that country would expire,
But did not merit to expire by her,
And loves her, loves her even in her ire.
The day may come when she will cease to err,
The day may come she would be proud to have
The dust she dooms to scatter, and transfer
Of him whom she denied a home, the grave.
But this shall not be granted; let my dust
Lie where it falls; nor shall the soil which gave Me breath, but in her sudden fury thrust
Me forth to breathe elsewhere, so reassure
My indignant bones, because her angry gust
Forsooth is over, and repeal'd her doom;
No,—she denied me what was mine—my roof,
And shall not have, what is not here—my tomb.
Too long her armed wrath hath kept aloof
The breast which would have bled for her, the heart
That beat, the mind that was temptation proof,
The man who fought, told'd, travelled, and each part
Of a true citizen fulfill'd, and saw
For his reward the Guelf's ascendent art
Pass his destruction even into a law.
These things are not made for forgetfulness
Florence shall be forgotten first; too raw
The wound, too deep the wrong, and the distress
Of such endurance too prolong'd to make
My pardon greater, her injustice less,
Though late repented; yet—yet for her sake
I feel some tender yearnings, and for thine
My own Beatrice, I would hardly take
Vengeance upon the land which once was mine,
And still is hallow'd by thy dust's return,
Which would protect the murderers like a shrine
And save ten thousand foes by thy sole urn.
BYRON'S WORKS.

Though, like old Marius from Minturno's marsh
And Carthage ruins, my lone breast may burn
At times with evil feelings hot and harsh,
And sometimes the last pangs of a vile foe
Writhe in a dream before me, and o'erarch
My brow with hopes of triumph,—let them go!
Such are the last infirmities of those
Who long have suffer'd more than mortal wo,
And yet being mortal still, have no repose,
But on the pillow of Revenge—Revenge,
Who sleeps to dream of blood, and waking glows
With the off-bailed, slaveless heart of change,
When we shall mount again, and they that trod
Be trampled on, while Death and At' range
O'er humbled heads and sever'd necks—Great God!
Take these thoughts from me—to thy hands I yield
My many wrongs, and thine almighty rod
Will fall on those who smote me,—be my shield!
As thou hast been in peril, and in pain,
In turbulent cities, and the tented field—
In toil, and many troubles borne in vain
For Florence,—I appeal from her to Thee!
Thee, whom I late saw in thy loftiest reign,
Even in that glorious vision, which to see
And live was never granted until now,
And yet thou hast permitted this to me.
Alas! with what a weight upon my brow
The sense of earth and earthly things come back,
Corrosive passions, feelings dull and bare,
The heart's quick throb upon the mental rock,
Long day, and dreary night; the retrospect
Of half a century bloody and black,
And the frail few years I may yet expect
Hasty and hopeless, but less hard to bear,
For I have been too long and deeply wear'd
On the lone rock of desolate Despair
To lift my eyes more to the passing sail
Which shuns that reef so horrible and bare,
Nor raise my voice—for who would heed my wail?
I am not of this people, nor this age,
And yet my harpings will unfold a tale
Which shall preserve these times when not a page
Of their perturbed annals could attract
An eye to gaze upon their civil rage,
Did not my verse emblaze full many an act
 Worthless as they who wrought it: 'tis the doom Of spirits, my order to be rack'd
In life, to wear their hearts out, and consume
Their days in endless strife, and die alone;
Then future thousands crowd around their tomb,
And pilgrims come from climes where they have known
The name of him—who now is but a name,
And wasting homage o'er the sullen stone,
Spread his,—by him unheard, unheeded—fame;
And mine at least hath cost me dear: to die
Is nothing, but to wither thus—to tame
My mind down from its own infinity—
To live in narrow ways with little men,
A common sight to every common eye,
A wanderer, while even wolves can find a den,
Ripp'd from all kindred, from all home, all things
That make communion sweet, and softer pain—
To feel me in the solitude of kings
Without the power that makes them bear a crown—
To envy every dove his nest and wings
Which waft him where the Apennine looks down
On Arno, till he perches, it may be,
Within my all inexorable town,

Where yet my boys are, and that fatal she:
Their mother, the cold partner who hath brought Destruction for a dowry—this to see
And feel, and know without repair, hath taught
A bitter lesson; but it leaves me free:
I have not vilely found, nor basely sought,
They made an exile—not a slave of me.

CANTO II.

The Spirit of the fervent days of Old,
When words were things that came to pass, and thought
Flash'd o'er the future, bidding men behold
Their children's children's doom already brought Forth from the abyss of time which is to be,
The chaos of events, where lie half-wrought Shapes that must undergo mortality;
What the great Seers of Israel wore within,
That spirit was on them, and is on me,
And if Cassandra-like, amidst the din
Of conflict none will hear, or heaving head
This voice from out the Wilderness, the sin
Be theirs, and my own feelings be my meed,
The only guerdon I have ever known.
Hast thou not bled? and hast thou still to bleed
Italia? Ah! to me such things, foreshown
With dim sepulchral light, bid me forget
In thine irreparable wrongs my own;
We can have but one country, and even yet
Thou'rt mine—my bones shall be within thy breast,
My soul within thy language, which once set
With our old Roman sway in the wide West,
But I will make another tongue arise
As lofty and more sweet, in which express
The hero's ardor, or the lover's sighs,
Shall find alike such sounds for every theme
That every word, as brilliant as thy skies,
Shall realize a poet's proudest dream,
And make thee Europe's nightingale of song,
So that all present speech to thine shall seem
The note of meaner birds, and every tongue
Confess its barbarism, when compared with thine
This shalt thou owe to him thou didst so wrong,
Thy Tuscan Bard, the banish'd Ghibelline.
Woe! woe! the veil of coming centuries
Is rent,—a thousand years which yet supine
Lie like the ocean waves ere winds arise,
Heaving in dark and sullen undulation,
Float from eternity into these eyes;
The storms yet sleep, the clouds still keep their station,
The unborn earthquake yet is in the womb,
The bloody chaos yet expects creation,
But all things are disposing for thy doom;
The elements await but for the word,
"Let there be darkness!" and thou grow'st a tomb!

Yes! thou so beautiful, shall feel the sword,
Thou, Italy! so fair that Paradise,
Revived in thee, blooms forth to man restored;
Ah! must the sons of Adam lose it twice
Thou, Italy! whose ever golden fields,
Flush'd by the sunbeams solely, would suffice...
THE PROPHECY OF DANTE.

For the world's granary; thou, whose sky heaven gilds
With brighter stars, and robes with deeper blue;
Thou, in whose pleasant places Summer builds
Her palace, in whose cradle Empire grew,
And form'd the Eternal City's ornaments
From spoils of kings whom freemen overthrew;
Birthplace of heroes, sanctuary of saints,
Where earthly first, then heavenly glory made
Her home; thou, all which fondest fancy paints,
And finds her prior vision but portray'd
In feebler colors, when the eye—from the Alp
Of horrid snow, and rock, and shaggy shade
Of desert-loving pine, whose emerald scalp
Nods to the storm—dilates and dotes o'er thee,
And wistfully implores, as 'twere, for help
To see thy sunny fields, my Italy,
Nearer and nearer yet, and nearer still
The more approach'd, and dearest were they free,
Thou—Thou must wither to each tyrant's will;
The Goth hath been,—the German, Frank and Hun
Are yet to come,—and on the imperial hill
Ruin, already proud of the deeds done
By the old barbarians, there awaits the new,
Throned on the Palatine, while lost and won
Rome at her feet lies bleeding; and the hue
Of human sacrifice and Roman slaughter,
Troubles the clotted air, of late so blue,
And deepens into red the saffron water
Of Tiber, thick with dead; the helpless priest,
And still more helpless nor less holy daughter,
Wov'd to their God, have shrieking fled, and ceased
Their ministry; the nations take their prey,
Iberian, Almain, Lombard, and the beast
And bird, wolf, vulture, more humane than they Are; these but gorge the flesh and lap the gore
Of the departed, and then go their way;
But those, the human savages, explore
All paths of torture, and insatiate yet,
With Ugolino hunger prowl for more.
Nine moons shall rise o'er scenes like this and set;
The chiefless army of the dead, which late
Beneath the traitor Prince's banner met,
Hath left its leader's ashes at the gate;
Had but the royal Rebel lived, perchance
Thou hadst been spared, but his involved thy fate.
Oh! Rome, the spoiler or the spoil of France,
From Brennus to the Bourbon, never, never Shall foreign standard to thy walls advance
But Tiber shall become a mournful river.
Oh! when the strangers pass the Alps and Po, Crush them, ye rocks! fixéd whelm them, and for ever!
Why sleeps the idle avalanches so,
To topple on the lonely pilgrim's head?
Why doth Eridanus but overflow
The peasant's harvest from his turbid bed?
Were not each barbarous horder a nobler prey?
Over Cambyses' host the desert spread
Her sandy ocean, and the sea waves' sway
Roll'd over Pharaoh and his thousands,—why
Mountains and waters, do ye not as they?
And you, ye men! It means, who dare not die,
Sons of the conquerors who overthrew
"those who overthrew proud Xerxes, where yet lie
The dead whose tomb Oblivion never knew,
Are the Alps weaker than Thermopylas?
Their paws more alluring to the view
Of an invader? is it they, or ye,
That to each host the mountain-gate unbar,
And leave the march in peace, the passage free?
Why, Nature's self detains the victor's car,
And makes your land impregnable, if earth
Could be so; but alone she will not war,
Yet aids the warrior worthy of his birth
In a soil where the mothers bring forth men:
Not so with those whose souls are little worth;
For them no fortress can avoid,—the den
Of the poor reptile which preserves its sting
Is more secure than walls of adamant, when
The hearts of those within are quivering.
Are ye not brave? Yes, yet the Ausonian soil
Hath hearts, and hands, and arms, and hosts to bring Against Oppression; but how vain the toil,
While still Division sows the seeds of woe.
And weakness, till the stranger reaps the spoil
Oh! my own beauteous land! so long laid low,
So long the grave of thy own children's hopes,
When there is but required a single blow.
To break the chain, yet—yet the Avenger stops,
And Doubt and Discord stop 'twixt thine and thee,
And join their strength to that which with thee copes;
What is there wanting then to set thee free,
And show thy beauty in its fullest light?
To make the Alps impassable; and we,
Her sons, may do this with one deed—Unite.

CANTO III.

FROM out the mass of never-dying ill,
The Plague, the Prince, the Stranger, and the Sword,
Vials of wrath but emptied to reful!
And flow again, I cannot all record
That crowds on my prophetic eye the earth
And ocean written o'er would not afford
Space for the annal, yet it shall go forth;
Yes, all, though not by human pen, is graven,
There where the farthest suns and stars have birth
Spread like a banner at the gate of heaven,
The bloody scroll of our millennial wrongs
Waves, and the echo of our groans is driven
Awith the sounds of archangelic songs,
And Italy, the martyr'd nation's gore,
Will not in vain arise to where belongs
Omnipotence and mercy evermore.
Like to a harpstring stricken by the wind,
The sound of her lament shall, rising o'er
The seraph voices, touch the Almighty Mind.
Meantime I, humblest of thy sons, and of Earth's dust by immortality refined
To sense and suffering, though the vain may scoff,
And tyrants threat, and meeker victims bow
Before the storm because its breath is rough,
To thee, my country! whom before, as now,
I loved and love, devote the mournful lyre
And melancholy gift high powers allow
To read the future; and if now my fire
Is not as once it shone o'er thee, forgive!
I but foretell thy fortunes—then expire;
Think not that I would look on them and live
A spirit forces me to see and speak,
And for my guerdon grants not to survive;
My heart shall be pour’d over thee and break:
Yet for a moment, ere I must resume
Thy sable web of sorrow, let me take Over the gleams that flash athwart thy gloom
A softer glimpse; some stars shine through thy night,
And many meteors, and above thy tomb

Leans sculptured Beauty, which Death cannot blight;
And from thine ashes soundless spirits rise
To give thee honor, and the earth delight.
Thy soil shall still be pregnant with the wise,
The gay, the learn’d, the generous, and the brave,
Native to thee as summer to thy skies,
Conquerors on foreign shores, and the far wave?
Discoverers of new worlds, which take their name;
For thee alone they have no arm to save,
And all thy recompense is in their fame,
A noble one to them, but not to thee—
Shall they be glorious, and thou still the same?
Oh! more than these illustrious far shall be
The being—and even yet he may be born—
The mortal saviour who shall set thee free,
And see thy diadem so changed and worn
By fresh barbarians, on thy brow replaced;
And the sweet sun replenishing thy morn,
Thy moral morn, too long with clouds defaced
And noxious vapors from Avernus risen.
Such as all they must breathe who are debased
By servitude, and have the mind in prison.
Yet through this century’d eclipse of wo
Some voices shall be heard, and earth shall listen;
Poets shall follow in the path I show,
And make it broader; the same brilliant sky
Which cheers the birds to song shall bid them glow,
And raise their notes as natural and high;
Tuneful shall be their numbers; they shall sing
Many of love, and some of liberty,
But few shall soar upon that eagle’s wing,
And look in the sun’s face with eagle’s gaze,
All free and fearless as the feather’d king,
But fly more near the earth; how many a phrase
Sublime shall lavish’d be on some small prince
In all the prodigality of praise!
And language, eloquently false, evince
The harlotry of genius, which, like beauty,
Too oft forgets its own self-reverence,
And looks on prostitution as a duty.
*He who once enters in a tyrant’s hall
As guest is slave, his thoughts become a boasty,
And the first lay which sees the chain enthrall
A captive, sees his half of manhood gone—!
The soul’s emasculation saddens all
His spirit; thus the Bard too near the throne
Quails from his inspiration, bound to please—,
How servile is the task to please alone!
To smooth the verse to suit his sovereign’s ease
And royal leisure, nor too much prolong
Aught save his eulogy, and find, and seize,
Or force, or forge his argument of song?
Thus trampe’d, thus condemn’d to Flattery’s trebles,
As tolls through all, still trembling to be wrong:
For fear some noble thoughts, like heavenly rebels,
Should rise up in high tresson to his brain,
He sings, as the Athenian spoke, with pebbles

In mouth, lest truth should stammer through his strain,
But out of the long file of sonneaters
There shall be some who will not sing in vain,
And he, their prince shall rank among my peers
And love shall be his torment; but his grief
Shall make an immortality of tears,
And Italy shall hail him as the Chief
Of poet-lovers, and his higher song
Of Freedom wreath him with as green a leaf.
But in a farther age shall rise along
The banks of Po two greater still than he;
The world which smiled on him shall laugh wrong
Till they are ashes, and repose with me.
The first will make an epoch with his lyre
And fill the earth with feats of chivalry;
His fancy like a rainbow, and his fire
Like that of Heaven, immortal, and his thought
Borne onward with a wing that cannot tire:
Pleasure shall, like a butterfly new caught
Flutter her lovely pinions o’er his theme,
And Art itself seem into Nature wrought
By the transparency of his bright dream—
The second, of a tenderer, sadder mood,
Shall pour his soul out o’er Jerusalem;
He, too, shall sing of arms, and Christian blood
Shed where Christ bled for man; and his high harp
Shall, by the willow over Jordan’s flood,
Revive a song of Sion, and the sharp
Conflict, and final triumph of the brave
And plious, and the strife of hell to warp
Their hearts from their great purpose, until wave
The red-cross banners where the first red Cross
Was crinsomed’ from his veins who died to save
Shall be his sacred argument; the loss
Of years, of favor, freedom, even of fame
Contested for a time, while the smooth gloss
Of courts would slide o’er his forgotten name,
And call captivity a kindness, meant
To shield him from insanity or shame.
Such shall be his meet guerdon! who was sent
To be Christ’s Laureat—they reward him well!
Florence dooms me but death or banishment,
Ferrara him a pittance and a cell,
Harder to bear and less deserved, for I
Had stung the factions which I strove to quell;
But this meek man, who with a lover’s eye
Will look on earth and heaven, and who will deign
To embalm with his celestial flattery,
As poor a thing as e’er was spaw’d to reign,
What will he do to merit such a doom?
Perhaps he’ll love,—and is not love in vain,
Torture enough without a living tomb?
Yet it will be so—he and his compeer,
The Bard of Chivalry, will both consume
In penury and pain too many a year,
And, dying in despondency, bequeath
To the kind world, which scarce will yield a tear
A heritage enriching all who breathe
With the wealth of a genuine poet’s soul,
And to their country a redoubled wreath,
Unmatch’d by time; not Hellas can unroll
Through her Olympiads such names, though one
Of hers be mighty;—and is this the whole
Of such men’s destiny beneath the sun?
Must all the finer thoughts, the thrilling sense,
The electric blood with which their arteries run
Their body’s self-tune soul with the intense Feeling of that which is, and fancy of
That which should be, to such a recompense
Conduct? shall their bright plumage on the rough Storm be still scattered? Yes, and it must be;
For, form'd of far too penetrable stuff,
These birds of Paradise but long to flee
Back to their native mansion, soon they find
Earth's mist with their pure pinions not agree,
And die or are degraded, for the mind
Succumbs to long infection, and despair,
And vulture passions flying close behind,
Await the moment to assail and tear;
And when at length the winged wanderers stoop,
Then is the grey-lord's triumph, then they share
The spoil, o'erpower'd at length by one fell swoop.
Yet some have been untouch'd who learn'd to bear,
Some whom no power could ever force to droop,
Who could resist themselves even, hardest care!
And task most hopeless; but some such have been,
And if my name among the number were,
That destiny austere, and yet serene,
Were prouder than more dazzling fame unblest;
The Alp's snow summit nearer heaven is seen,
Than the volcano's fierce eruptive crest,
Where splendor from the black abyss is sprung,
While the scorch'd mountain, from whose burning
A temporary torturing flame is wrung, [breath
Shines for a night of terror, then repels
Its fire back to the hell from whence it sprung,
The hell which in its entails ever dwells.

CANTO IV.

Many are poets who have never penn'd
Their inspiration, and perchance the best:
They felt, and loved, and died, but would not lend
Their thoughts to meaner beings; they compress'd
The god within them, and rejoin'd the stars
Unlaurell'd upon earth, but far more blest
Than those who are degraded by the jars
Of passion, and their frailties link'd to fame,
Conquerors of high renown, but full of scars.
Many are poets, but without the fame,
For what is poet but to create
From overfeeling good or ill; and aim
At an eternal life beyond our fate,
And be the new Prometheus of new men,
Bestowing fire from heaven, and then, too late,
Finding the pleasure given repaid with pain,
And vultures to the heart of the bestower,
Who having lavish'd his high gift in vain,
Lies chain'd to his lone rock by the sea-shore? So be it: we can bear.—But thus all they Whose intellect is an o'ermastering power
Which still recoils from its incumbering clay,
Or lightens it to spirit, whatso'er
The form which their creations may essay,
Are bards; the kindled marble's bust may wear
More poesy upon its speaking brow,
Than aught less than the Homeric page may bear;
One noble stroke with a whole life may glow
Or daify the canvass till it shine
With beauty so surpassing all below,
That they who kneel to idols so divine
Break no commandment, for high heaven is there
Transfigured, transfigur'd: and the line

Of poesy, which peoples out the air
With thought and beings of our thought reflected
Can do no more: then let the artist share
The palm, he shares the peril, and delighted,
Faints o'er the labor unapproved—Alas!
Despair and Genius are too oft connected.
Within the ages which before me pass,
Art shall resume and equal even the sway,
Which with Apelles and old Phidias,
She held in Hellas' unforgotten day.
Ye shall be taught by Ruin to revive
The Grecian forms at least from their decay,
And Roman souls at last again shall live
In Roman works wrought by Italian hands,
And temples, loftier than the old temples, give
New wonders to the world; and while still stands
The austere Pantheon, into heaven shall soar
A dome, 13 its image, while the base expands
Into a fame surpassing all before,
Such as all flesh shall flock to kneel in: ne'er
Such sight hath been unfolded by a door
As this, to which all nations shall repair,
And lay their sins at this gate of heaven.
And the bold Architect unto whose care
The dark and from the range to raise it shall be given,
Whom all arts shall acknowledge as their lord
Whether into the marble chaos driven
His chisel bid the Hebrew, 13 at whose word
Israel left Egypt, stop the waves in stone,
Or hies of Hell be by his pencil pour'd
Over the damn'd before the Judgment throne, 14
Such as I saw them, such as all shall see,
Or fumes be built of grandeur yet unknown,
The stream of his great thoughts shall spring from
The Ghibelline, who traversed the three realms
Which form the empire of eternity.
Amidst the clash of swords, and clang of gongs,
The age which I anticipate, no less
Shall be the Age of Beauty, and while wheels
Calamity the nations with distress,
The genius of my country shall arise,
A Cedar towering o'er the Wilderness,
Lovely in all its branches to all eyes,
Frugant as fair, and recognized afar,
With whose native incense they shall rise.
Sovereigns shall pause amidst their sport of war,
Wean'd for an hour from blood, to turn and gaze
On canvas or on stone; and they who mar
All beauty upon earth, compel'd to praise,
Shall feel the power of that which they destroy,
And Art's mistaken gratitude shall raise
To tyrants, who but take her for a toy,
Emblems and monuments, and prostitute
Her charms to pontiffs proud, 18 who but employ
The man of genius as the meanest brute,
To bear a burden, and to serve a need,
To sell his labors and his soul to boot.
Who toils for nations may be poor indeed,
But free; who sweats for monarch is no more
Than the gilt chamberlain, who, clothed sad
and fee'd,
Stands sleek and slavish, bowing at his door
Oh, Power that rules and inspires! how
Is it that they on earth, whose earthly power
Is likest thine in heaven in outward show,
Leaning like thee in attributes divine,
Tread on the universal necks that bow,
And then assure us that their right are thine i
Ar'd how is it that they, the sons of fame, Whose inspiration seems to them to shine From high, they whom the nations ofest name, Must pass their days in penury or pain, Or step to grandeur through the paths of shame, And wear a deeper brand and gaudier chain? Or if their destiny be born aloof From lowliness, or tempted thence in vain, In their own souls sustain a harder proof, The inner war of passions deep and fierce? Florence! when thy harsh sentence razed my roof, I loved thee; but the vengeance of my verse, The hate of injuries which every year Makes greater, and accumulates my curse, Shall live, outliving all thou holdest dear, Thy pride, thy wealth, thy freedom, and even that, The most infernal of all evils here, The sway of petty tyrants in a state; For such sway is not limited to kings, And demagogues yield to them but in date, As swept off sooner; in all deadly things other, Which make men hate themselves, and one another: In discord, cowardice, cruelty, all that springs From Death the Sin-born's incest with his mother, In rank oppression in its rudest shape, The faction Chief is but the Sultan's brother, And the worst despot's far less human ape:

Florence! when this lone spirit, which so long Yearned, as the captive toiling at escape, To fly back to thee in despite of wrong, An exile, saddest of all prisoners, Who has the whole world for a dungeon strong Seas, mountains, and the horizon's verge for bars Which shut him from the sole small spot of earth Where—whatso'er his fate—he still were hers, His country's, and might die where he had birth Florence! when this lone spirit shall return To kindred spirits, thou wilt feel my worth, And seek to honor with an empty urn The ashes thou shalt ne'er obtain—Alas! "What have I done to thee, my people?" Stea Are all thy dealings, but in this they pass The limits of man's common malice, for All that a citizen could be I was; Raised by thy will, all things in peace or war, And for this thou hast war'd with me.—"Tis done I may not overlap the eternal bar Built up between us, and will die alone, Beholding with the dark eye of a seer The evil days to gifted souls foreshown, Foretelling them to those who will not hear. As in the old time, till the hour be come [a tear When truth shall strike their eyes through many And make them own the Prophet in his tomb

NOTES TO THE PROPHECY OF DANTE.

1. Midst whom my own sweet Beatrice bless'd. Page 511, line 59. The reader is requested to adopt the Italian pronunciation of Beatrice, sounding all the syllables.

2. My paradise had still been incomplete. Page 511, line 65. "Che soi por la belle opre Che fanno in Cielo il sole e l' altre stelle Dentro di lui si crede il Paradiso, Cosi se guardo" Pensar ben d'ici ch' ogni terren' piacere.

_Canto_, in which Dante describes the person of Beatrice, Strophe third.

3. I would have had my Florence great and free. Page 511, line 87. "L'Esilio che me' è dato onor mi tegno. Cader tra' buoni è pur di lode dognò." _Sonnets of Dante_, in which he represents Right, Generosity, and Temperance as banished from among men, and seeking refuge from Love, who inhabits b's bosom.

4. The dust she dooms to scatter. Page 511, line 103. "Ut si quis predictorum ullo tempore in fortiam dicti: communis pervenerit, tallis perveniens igne comburatur, sic quod maritur." Second sentence of Florence against Dante, and the fourteen accused with him.—The Latin is worthy of the sentence.

5. Where yet my boys are, and that fatal she. Page 512, line 69. This lady, whose name was Gemma, sprung from one of the most powerful Guelf families, named Donati. Corso Donati was the principal adversary of the Ghibellines. She is described as being "Almodum morosa, ut de Xantipp Socrates philosophi coniuge scriptum esse legitur," according to Giannozino Manetti. But Leonardo Arcino is scandalized with Boccace, in his life of Dante, for saying that literary men should not marry. "Qui il Boccaccio non ha pazienza, e dice, le mogli esser contrarie agli studi; e non si ricorda che Socrate il più nobile filosofo che mai fosse, ebbe moglie e figliuoli e uffici della Repubblica nella sua Città; e Aristote che, &c., &c., ebbe due mogli in vari tempi, ed ebbe figliuoli, e ricchezze assai.—B Marco

SONETTO
Di Giovanni Battista Zappi.

Chi è costui, che in dura pietra scolto,
Siede gigante; e le più illustre, e conte
Prove dell’arte avanza, e ha vive, e pronte
Le labbra si, che le parole ascolto?
Quest’è Moses; ben me ’l diceva il solito
Onor del mento; e ’l doppio raggio in fronte.
Quest’è Moses, quando scendea del monte
E gran parte del Nume avea nel volto.
Tal era allor, che le sonanti, e vaste
Acque ei sospese a se d’intorno, e tale
Quando il mar chiusse, e ne fe tomba altrui
E voi sue turbe un rio vitello alzate?
Alzata aveste imago a questa eguale?
Ch’era men follo l’adorar costui

15. The stream of his great thoughts shall spring, from me
Page 516, line 97.

I have read somewhere (if I do not err, for I can not recollect where) that Dante was so great a favorite of Michael Angelo’s, that he had designed the whole of the Divina Commedia; but that the volume containing these studies was lost by sea.

16. Her charms to pontiff’s proud, who but employ, &c.
Page 515, line 117.

See the treatment of Michael Angelo by Julius II., and his neglect by Leo X.

17. “What have I done to thee, my people?”

“E scrissi più volte non solamente a particolari cittadini del reggimento, ma ancora al popolo, e in altro una Epistola assai lunga che comincia:

— Popula mi, quid feci tibi?”

HEBREWS MELODIES.

ADVERTISEMENT.

The subsequent poems were written at the request of my friend, the Hon. D. Kinnaird, for a selection of Hebrew Melodies, and have been published, with the music arranged by Mr. Braham and Mr. Nathan.

SHE WALKS IN BEAUTY.

She walks in beauty, like the night
Of cloudless climes and starry skies;
And all that's best of dark and bright
Meet in her aspect and her eyes:
Thus mellow'd to that tender light
Which heaven to gaudy day deny's.

One shade the more, one ray the less,
Had half impair'd the nameless grace
Which waves in every raven tress,
Or softly lightens o'er her face:
Where thoughts serenely sweet express
How pure, how dear their dwelling-place.

And on that cheek, and o'er that brow,
So soft, so calm, yet eloquent,
The smiles that win, the tints that glow,
But tell of days in goodness spent,
A mind at peace with all below,
A heart whose love is innocent!

THE HARP THE MONARCH MINSIRAJ, SWEPT.

The harp the monarch minstrel swept,
The King of men, the loved of Heaven,
Which music hollow'd while she wept
O'er tones her heart of hearts had given.
Redoubled be her tears, its chords are riven:
It soften'd men of iron mould,
It gave them virtues not their own;
No ear so dull, no soul so cold,
That felt not, fire! not to the tone,
"'ill David's lyre grew mightier than his throne!"

It told the triumphs of our King,
It wafted glory to our God;
It made our gladden'd valleys ring,
The cedars bow, the mountains nod;
Its sound aspired to Heaven and there abode
Since then, though heard on earth no more,
Devotion, and her daughter, Love,
Stil' bid the bursting spirit soar
To sounds that seem as from above,
In dreams that day's broad light can not remove.

IF THAT HIGH WORLD.

Is that high world, which lies beyond
Our own, surviving Love endeared;
If there the cherished heart be fond,
The eye the same, except in tears—
How welcome those unrodden spheres!
How sweet this very hour to die!
To soar from earth and find all fears
Lost in thy light—Eternity!

It must be so; 'tis not for self
That we so tremble on the brink;
And striving to o'erleap the gulf,
Yet cling to Being's severing link.
Oh! in that future let us think
To hold each heart the heart that shares,
With them the immortal waters drink,
And soul in soul grow deathless theirs!

THE WILD GAZELLE

The wild gazelle on Judah's hills
Exulting yet may bound,
And drink from all the living rills
That gush on holy ground;
Its alry step and glorious eye
May glance in timeless transport by—
A step as fleet, an eye more bright,
Hath Judah witness'd there:
Hebrew Melodies.

And o'er her scenes of lost delight
Inhabitants more fair.

Inhabitants more fair,
The cedars wave on Lebanon,
But Judah's statelier maids are gone.

More beat each palm that shades those plains
Than Israel's scatter'd race;
For, taking root, it there remains
In solitary grace:
It cannot quit its place of birth,
It will not live in other earth.

But we must wander witheringly,
In other lands to die;
And where our fathers' ashes be,
Our own may never lie;
Our temple hath not left a stone,
And Mockery sits on Salem's throne.

O! WEEP FOR THOSE.
Oh weep for those that wept by Babel's stream,
Whose shrines are desolate, whose land a dream;
Weep for the harp of Judah's broken shell;
Mourn where their God hath dwelt the Godless dwell!

And where shall Israel love her bleeding feet?
And when shall Zion's songs again seem sweet?
And Judah's melody once more rejoice
The hearts that leap'd before its heavenly voice?

Tribe of the wandering foot and weary breast,
How shall ye flee away and be at rest!
The wild dove hath her nest, the fox his cave,
Mankind their country—Israel but the grave!

ON JORDAN'S BANKS.

O! Jordan's banks the Arab's camel stray,
Or Zion's hill the False One's votaries pray,
The Baal-adorer bows on Sinai's steep—
Yet there—even there—O God! thy thunders sleep!

There—where thy finger scorched the tablet stone!
There—where thy shadow to thy people shone.
Thy glory shrouded in its garb of fire:
Thyself—none living see and not expire!

O! in the lightning let thy glance appear!
Sweep from his shiver'd hand the oppressor's spear:
How long by tyrants shall thy land be trod?
How long thy temple worshipless, Oh God!

JEPHTHA'S DAUGHTER.

Since our Country, our God—Oh, my Sire!
Demand that thy Daughter expire;
Since thy triumph was bought by thy vow—
Strike the bosom that's bared for thee now;

And the voice of my mourning is o'er,
And the mountains behold me no more:
If the hand that I love lay me low,
There cannot be pain in the bow.

And of this, oh, my Father! be sure—
That the blood of thy child is as pure
As the blessing I beg ere it flow,
And the last thought that soothes me below

Though the virgins of Salem lament,
Be the judge and the hero uncost!
I have won the great battle for thee,
And my Father and Country are free!

When this blood of thy giving hath gush'd,
When the voice that thou lovest is hush'd,
Let my memory still be thy pride,
And forget not I smiled as I died!

OH! SNATCH'D AWAY IN BEAUTY'S BLOOM.

O! snatch'd away in beauty's bloom,
On thee shall press no ponderous tomb;
But on thy turf shall roses rear
Their leaves, the earliest of the year;
And the wild cypress wave in tender gloom:

And oft by yon blue gushing stream,
Shall Sorrow lean her drooping head,
And feed deep thought with many a dream,
And lingering pause and lightly tread;
Fond wretch! as if her step disturb'd the dead.

Away! we know that tears are vain,
That death nor needs nor hears distress;
Will this unteach us to complain?
Or make one mourner weep the less?
And ah! who tell'st me to forget,
Thy looks are wan, thine eyes are wet.

MY SOUL IS DARK.

My soul is dark—Oh! quickly string
The harp I yet can brook to hear;
And let thy gentle fingers fling
Its melting murmurs o'er mine ear.
If in this heart a hope be dear,
That sound shall charm it forth again:
If in these eyes there lurk a tear,
'Twill flow, and cease to burn my brain.

But bid the strain be wild and deep
Nor let thy notes of joy be first
I tell thee, minstrel, I must weep,
Or else this heavy heart will burst,
For it hath been by sorrow nurst,
And ached in sleepless silence long.
And now 'tis doom'd to know the worse,
And break at once—or yield to song.
I SAW THEE WEEP.

I saw thee weep—the big bright tear
   Came o’er that eye of blue;
And then methought it did appear
   A violet dropping dew:
I saw thee smile—the sapphire’s blaze
   Beside thee ceased to shine;
It could not match the living rays
   That fill’d that glance of thine.

As clouds from yonder sun receive
   A deep and mellow dye,
Which scarce the shade of coming eve
   Can banish from the sky,
Those smiles upon the moodiest mind
   Their own pure joy impart;
Their sunshine leaves a glow behind
   That lights o’er the heart.

THY DAYS ARE DONE.

Thy days are done, thy fame begun;
   Thy country’s strains record
The triumphs of her chosen Son,
   The slaughters of his sword!
The deeds he did, the fields he won,
   The freedom he restored!

Though thou art fall’n, while we are free
   Thou shalt not taste of death!
The generous blood that flow’d from thee
   Disdain’d to sink beneath:
Within our veins its currents be,
   Thy spirit on our breath!

Thy name, our charging hosts along,
   Shall be the battle-word!
Thy fall, the theme of choral song
   From virgin voices pour’d!
To weep would do thy glory wrong;
   Thou shalt not be depleted.

SONG OF SAUL BEFORE HIS LAST BATTLE.

Warriors and Chiefs! should the shaft or the sword
   Pierce me in leading the host of the Lord,
Heed not the corse, though a king’s, in your path:
   Bury your steel in the bosoms of Gath!

Thou who art bearing my buckler and bow,
   Should the soldiers of Saul look away from the foe,
Stretch me that moment in blood at thy feet!
   Mine be the doom which they dared not to meet.

Farewell to others, but never we part,
   Heir to my royalty, son of my heart!
Bright is the diadem, boundless the sway,
   Or kingly the death, which awaits us to-day!

SAUL.

Thou whose spell can raise the dead
   Bid the prophet’s form appear.
   “Samuel, raise thy buried head!
   King, behold the phantom seer!”
Earth yawned; he stood the centre of a cloud:
   Light changed its hue, retiring from his shroud.
Death stood all glassy in his fixed eye;
   His hand was wither’d, and his veins were dry:
His foot, in bony whiteness, glitter’d thence,
   Shrunken and sinewless, and ghastly bare:
From lips that moved not, and unbreathing frame
   Like cavern’d winds, the hollow accents came.
Saul saw, and fell to earth, as falls the oak,
   At once, and blasted by the thunder-stroke.

   “Why is my sleep disquieted?
   Who is he that calls the dead?
   Is it thou, O king? Behold,
   Bloodless are these limbs, and cold:
   Such are mine; and such shall be
   Thine to-morrow, when with me;
   Ere the coming day is done,
   Such shalt thou be, such thy son.
Fare thee well, but for a day;
   Then we mix our mouldering clay.
Thou, thy race, lie pale and low,
   Pierced by shafts of many a bow;
   And the falchion by thy side
   To thy heart thy hand shall guide;
Crownless, breathless, headless fall,
   Son and sire, the house of Saul!”

   “ALL IS VANITY, SAITH THE PREACHER.”

Fame, wisdom, love, and power were mine
   And health and youth possess’d me.
My goblets blush’d from every vine,
   And lovely forms caress’d me;
I sum’d my heart in beauty’s eyes,
   And felt my soul grow tender;
All earth can give, or mortal prize.
   Was mine of regal splendor.

I strive to number o’er what days
   Remembrance can discover,
Which all of life or earth displays
   Would lure me to live over.
There rose no day, there roll’d no hour
   Of pleasure unembitter’d;
And not a trapping deck’d my power
   That gall’d not while it glitter’d.

The serpent of the field, by art
   And spells, is won from harming;
But that which evils around the heart,
   Oh! who hath o’er of charming?
It will not list to wisdom’s lore,
   Nor music’s voice can lure it;
But there it stings for evermore
   The soul that must endure it.
WHEN COLDNESS WRAPS THIS SUFFERING CLAY.

When coldness wraps this suffering clay,
Ah, whither strays the immortal mind?
"I cannot die, it cannot stay,
But leaves its darken'd dust behind.
Then, unembodied, doth it trace
Fly steps each planet's heavenly way?
Oh! at once the realms of space,
A thing of eyes, that all survey?

Eternal, boundless, undiseg'd,
A thought unseen, but seeing all,
All, all in earth, or skies display'd,
Shall it survey, shall it recall:
Each fainter trace that memory holds
So darkly of departed years,
In one broad glance the soul beholds,
And all, that was, at once appears.

Before Creation peopled earth,
Its eye shall roll through chaos back;
And where the furthest heaven had birth,
The spirit trace its rising track.
And where the future mars or makes,
Its glance dilate o'er all to be,
While sun is quench'd or system breaks,
Fled in its own eternity.

Above or Love, Hope, Hate, or Fear,
It lives all passionless and pure:
An age shall fleet like earthly year;
Its years as moments shall endure.
Away, away, without a wing,
O'er all, through all, its thoughts shall fly;
A manless and eternal thing,
Forgetting what it was to die.

VISION OF BELSHAZZAR.

The king was on his throne,
The Satraps throng'd the hall;
A thousand bright lamps shone
O'er that high festival,
A thousand cups of gold,
In Judah deem'd divine—
Jehovah's vessels hold
The godless Heathen's wine.

In that same hour and hall,
The fingers of a hand
Came forth against the wall,
And wrote as if on sand:
The fingers of a man;—
A solitary hand
Along the letters ran,
And traced them like a wand.

The monarch saw, and shook,
And bade no more rejoice;
All bloodless wax'd his look,
And tremulous his voice.
"Let the men of lore appear,
The wisest of the earth,
And expound the words of fear,
Which mar our royal mirth."

CHALDEA'S SEERS ARE GOOD,
But here they have no skill;
And the unknown letters stood
Untold and awful still.
And Babel's men of age
Are wise and deep in lore
But now they were not sage,
They saw—but knew no more.

A captive in the land,
A stranger and a youth,
He heard the king's command,
He saw that writing's truth.
The lamps around were bright,
The prophecy in view;
He read it on that night,—
The morrow proved it true.

"Belshazzar's grave is made,
His kingdom pass'd away,
He, in the balance weigh'd,
Is light and worthless clay.
The shroud, his robe of state,
His canopy the stone;
The Mede is at his gate!
The Persian on his throne."

SUN OF THE SLEEPLESS!

Sun of the sleepless! melancholy star!
Whose tearful beam glows tremulously far,
That show'st the darkness thou canst not dispel,
How like art thou to joy remember'd well!
So gleams the past, the light of other days,
Which shines, but warms not with its powerless rays,
A night-beam Sorrow watcheth to behold,
Distinct, but distant—clear—but, oh how cold!

WERE MY Bosom AS FALSE AS THOU DEEM' ST IT TO BE.

Were my bosom as false as thou deem'st it to be
I need not have wander'd from far Galilee;
It was but adjuring my creed to efface
The curse which, thou say'st, is the crime of my race.

If the bad never triumph, then God is with thee!
If the slave only sin, thou art spotless and free!
If the Exile on earth is an Outcast on high,
Live on in thy faith, but in mine I will die.

I have lost for that faith more than thou canst betwixt,
As the God who permits thee to prosper doth know;
In his hand is my heart and my hope—and in thine
The land and the life which for him I resign.

HEROD'S LAMENT FOR MARIAMNE.

Oh, Mariamne! now for thee
The heart for which thou blest'st is bleeding;
Revenge is lost in agony,
And wild remorse to rage succeeding.
THE DESTRUCTION OF SENNACHARIB.

The Assyrian came down like the wolf on the fold,
And his cohorts were gleaming in purple and gold;
And the sheen of their spears was like stars on the sea,
When the blue wave rolls nightly on deep Galilee.

Like the leaves of the forest when Summer is green,
That host with their banners at sunset were seen:
Like the leaves of the forest when Autumn hath blown
That host on the morrow with its nestling was flown.

For the Angel of Death spread his wings on the blast,
And breathed in the face of the foe as he pass’d;
And the eyes of the sleepers were opened to a sight
That on the morrow to unsee’rdness again was blind.

And there lay the steed with his Nezil wide,
But through it there roll’d not the breath of his pride:
And the foam of his gazing lay white on the turf,
And cold as the spray of the rock-beating surf.

And there lay the river deep and serpents all slow,
With the dew on his brow, and the rust on his tail,
And the tents were all silent, the banners alone,
The lances unfurled, the trumpet unbown.

And the widows of Ashur are loud in their wail,
And the idols are hewn in the temple of Baal;
And the might of the Gentile, unsmote by the sword,
Hath melted like snow in the glimpse of the Lord.

FROM JOB.

A SPIRIT pass’d before me: I beheld
The face of Immortality unvail’d—
Deep sleep came down on every eye, save mine—
And there it stood,—all formless—but divine:
Along my bones the creeping fife did quake;
And as my hair stiffen’d, then it spoke:

"Is man more just than God? Is man more pure
Than he who deems even Seraphs insecure?
Creatures of clay,—vain dwellers in the dust!
The mesh survives you, and are ye more just?
Things of a day! yee without are the night,
Headless and blind to Wisdom’s wasted light!"

At Ferrara, in the library, are preserved the original MSS of Tasso's Gerusalemme and of Guarini's Pastor Fido, with letters of Tasso, one from Titian to Ariosto; and the inkstand and chair, the tomb and the house of the latter. But as misfortune has a greater interest for posterity, and little or none for the contemporary, the cell where Tasso was confined in the hospital of St. Anna attracts a more fixed attention than the residence of the monument of Ariosto—at least it had this effect on me. There are two inscriptions, one on the outer gate, the second over the cell itself, inviting, unnecessarily, the wonder and the indignation of the spectator. Ferrara is much decayed, and depopulated; the castle still exists entire; and I saw the court where Parisina and Hugo were beheaded, according to the annals of Gibbon.

I.

Long years!—It tries the thrilling frame to bear
And eagle-spirit of a Child of Song—
Long years of outrage, calamity, and wrong;
Imputed madness, prison'd solitude,
And the mind's canker in its savage mood,
When the impatient thirst of light and air
Parches the heart; and the abhorred grate,
Marring the sunbeams with its hideous shade,
Works through the throbbing eyeball to the brain
With a hot sense of heaviness and pain;
And bare, at once, Captivity display'd
Stands scoffing through the never-open'd gate,
Which nothing through its bars admit, save day
And tasteless food, which I have eat alone
Fill its unsozial bitterness is gone;
And I can banquet like a beast of prey,
Tullen and lonely, couching in the cave
Which is my lair, and—it may be—my grave.
All this hath somewhat worn me, and may wear,
But must be borne. I stoop not to despair;
For I have battled with mine agony,
And made me wings wherewith to overfly
The narrow circus of my dungeon wall,
And fled the Holy Sepulchre from thral;
And revel'd among men and things divine,
And pour'd my spirit over Palestine,
In honor of the sacred war for him,
The God who was on earth and is in heaven,
For he hath strengthen'd me in heart and limb.
That through this sufferance I might be forgiven,
I have employ'd my penance to record
How Salem's shrine was won, and how adored

II.

But this is o'er—my pleasant task is done
My long sustaining friend of many years!
If I do blot thy final page with tears,
Know, that my sorrows have wrung from me none
But thou, my young creation! my soul's child!
Which ever playing round me came and smiled,
And wo'd me from myself with thy sweet sight.
Thou too art gone—and so is my delight.
And therefore do I weep and illy bleed
With this last bruise upon a broken reed,
Thou too art ended—what is left me now?
For I have anguish yet to bear—and how?
I know not that—but in the innate force
Of my own spirit shall be found resource.
I have not sunk, for I had no remorse,
Nor cause for such: they call'd me mad—and why?
Oh Leonora! wilt not thou reply?
I was indeed delirious in my heart
To lift my love so lofty as thou art;
But still my frenzy was not of the mind;
I knew my fault, and feel my punishment
Not less because I suffer it unbent.
That thou wilt beautiful, and I not blind,
Hath been the sin which shuts me from mankind.
But let them go, or torture as they will,
My heart can multiply thine image still;
Successful love may sate itself away,
The wretched are the faithful; 'tis their lot
To have all feeling save the one decay,
And every passion into one dilate,
As rapid rivers into ocean pour;
But ours is fathomless, and hath no shore

III.

Above me, hark! the long and maniac cry
Of minds and bodies in captivity.
And hark! the lash and the increasing howl,
And the half-inarticulate blasphemy!
There be some here with worse than frenzy foul,
some who do still goad on the o'er-labor'd mind,
And dim the little light that's left behind
With needless torture, as their tyrants will
Is wound up to the lust of doing ill:
With these and with their victims am I class'd,
Mid sounds and sights like these long years have pass'd;
Mid sights and sounds like these my life may close;
So let it be—for then I shall repose.

IV.
I have been patient, let me be so yet;
I had forgotten half I would forget,
But it revives—oh! would it were my lot
To be forgetful as I am forgetful—
Feel I not wroth with those who bade me dwell
In this vast lazaret-house of many woes?
Where laughter is not mirth, nor thought the mind,
Nor words a language, nor ev'n men mankind;
Where cries reply to curses, shrieks to blows,
And each is tortured in his seperate hell—
For we are crowded in our solitudes—
Many, but each divided by the wall,
Which echoes Madness in her babbling moods;—
While all can hear, none heed his neighbor's call—
None! save that One, the veriest wretch of all,
Who was not made to be the mate of these,
Nor bound between Distraction and Disease.
Feel I not wroth with those who placed me here?
Who have debased me in the minds of men,
Debarring me the usage of my own,
Blighting my life in best of its career,
Branding my thoughts as things to shun and fear?
Would I not pay them back these pangs again,
And teach them inward sorrow's stifed groan?
The struggle to be calm, and cold distress,
Which undermines our Stoical success?
No!—still too proud to be vindictive—
I have pardon'd princes' insults, and would die.
Yes, Sister of my Sovereign! for thy sake
I weep all bitterness from out my breast,
It hath no business where thou art a guest;
Thy brother hates—but I can not detest;
Thou piest nor—but I can not forsake.

V.
Look on a love which knows not to despair,
But all unquench'd is still my better part,
Dwelling deep in my shut and silent heart,
As dwells the gather'd lightning in its cloud,
Encompass'd with its dark and rolling shroud,
Till struck,—forth flies the all-ethereal dart!
And thus at the collision of thy name
The vivid thought still flashes through my frame,
And for a moment all things as they were
Fib'd by me;—they are gone—I am the same.
And yet my love without ambition grew;
I knew thy state, my station, and I knew
A princess was no love-mate for a bard;
I told it not, I breathed it not, it was Sufficient to itself, its own reward;
And if my eyes reveal'd it, they, alas!
Were punish'd by the silentness of thine,
And yet I did not venture to repine.
Thou wert to me a crystal-girded shrine,
Worship'd at holy distance, and around
Hallowed and mystically kiss'd the sainted ground;
Not for thou wert a princess, but that Love
Dath robed thee with a glory, and array'd
Thy lineaments in beauty that dismay'd—

Oh! not dismay'd—but awed, like One above,
And in that sweet severity there was
A something which all softness did surpass—
I know not how—th'genius master'd mine—
My star stood still before thee—if it were Presumptuous thus to love without design,
That sad fatality hath cost me dear;
But thou art dearest still, and I should be Fit for this cell, which wrongs me, but for thee
The very love which lock'd me to my chain
Hath lighten'd half its weight; and for the rest,
Though heavy, lent me vigor to sustain,
And look to thee with undivided breast,
And foil the ingenuity of Pain.

VI.
It is no marvel—from my very birth
My soul was drunk with love, which did pervade
And mingle with whate'er I saw on earth;
Of objects all inanimate I made
Idols, and out of wild and lonely flowers,
And rocks, whereby they grew, a paradise,
Where I did lay me down within the shade
Of waving trees, and dream'd uncounted hours,
Though I was chid for wandering; and the wise
Shook their white aged heads o'er me, and said
Of such materials wretched men were made,
And such a truant boy would end in wo,
And that the only lesson was a blow;
And then they smote me, and I did not weep,
But cursed them in my heart, and to my haunt
Returned and wept alone, and dream'd again
The visions which arise without a sleep.
And with my years my soul began to pant
With feelings of strange tumult and soft pain;
And the whole heart exhaled into One Want,
But undefined and wandering, till the day
I found the thing I sought, and that was thee
And then I lost my being all to Absorb'd in thine—the world was pass'd away—
Thou didst annihilate the earth to me!

VII.
I loved all solitude—but little thought
To spend I know not what of life, remote
From all communion with existence, save
The maniac and his tyrant; had I been
Their fellow, many years ere this had seen
My mind like theirs corrupted to its grave,
But who hath seen me writhe, or heard me rave?
Perchance in such a cell we suffer more
Than the wretched sailor on his desert shore;
The world is all before him—mine is here,
Soars twice the space they must accord my bier.
What though he perish, he may lift his eye,
And with a dying glance upbraids the sky—
I will not raise my own in such reproof,
Although 'tis clouded by my dungeon roof

VIII.
Yet do I feel at times my mind decline,
But with a sense of its decay:—I see
Unwonted lights along my prison shine,
And a strange demon, who is vexing me
With pitting pranks and petty pains, below
The feeling of the healthful and the free;
But much to One, who long hath suffer'd so
Sickness of heart, and narrowness of place,
And all that may be borne, or can debase
MONODY ON THE DEATH OF SHERIDAN.

I thought mine enemies had been but man,
But spirits may be leagued with them—all Earth
Abandons—Heaven forgets me;—in the dearth
Of such defiance the Powers of Evil can,
It may be, tempt me further, and prevail
Against the outworn creature they assail.
Why in this furnace is my spirit proved
Like steel in tempering fire? because I loved?
Because I loved what not to love, and see,
Was more or less than mortal, and than me.

IX.
I once was quick in feeling—that is o'er:—
My scars are callous, or I should have dash'd
My brain against these bars as the sun flash'd
In mockery through them;—if I hear and bore
The much I have recounted, and the more
Which hath no words, 'tis that I would not die
And sanction with self-slaughter the dull lie
Which snared me here, and with a brand of shame
Stamp madness deep into my memory,
And woo compassion to a blighted name,
Sealing the sentence which my foes proclaim.
No,—it shall be immortal! and I make
A future temple of my present cell,
Which nations yet shall visit for my sake.

While thou, Ferrara! when no longer dwell
The ducal chiefs within thee, shalt fall down,
And crumbling piecemeal view thy heartless hall.
A poet's wreath shall be thine only crown,
A poet's dungeon thy most far renown,
While stranger's wonder o'er thy unpeopled walls
And thou, Leonora! thou—who worth ashame
That such as I could love—who blush'd to hear
To less than monarchs that thou couldst be dear,
Go! tell thy brother that my heart, untame
By grief, years, weariness—and it may be
A taint of that he would impute to me—
From long infection of a den like this,
Where the mind rots congenital with the abyss,
Adores thee still;—and add—that when the towers
And battlements, which guard his joyous hours
Of banquet, dance, and revel, are forgot,
Or left unattended in a dull repose,
This—this shall be a consecrated spot!
But Thou—when all that Birth and Beauty throws
Of magic round thee is extinct—shalt have
One half the laurel which o'ershades my grave.
No power in death can tear our names apart,
As none in life could rend thee from my heart
Yes, Leonora! it shall be our fate
To be entwined for ever—but too late!

MONODY
ON THE DEATH OF THE RIGHT HON. R. B. SHERIDAN

SPOKEN AT DRURY-LANE THEATRE.

When the last sunshine of expiring day
In summer's twilight weeps itself away,
Who hath not felt the softness of the hour
Sink on the heart, as dew along the flower?
With a pure feeling which absorbs and awes,
While Nature makes that melancholy pause,
Her breathing moment on the bridge where Time
Of light and darkness forms an arch sublime,
Who hath not shared that calm so still and deep,
The voiceless thought which would not speak but
A hry concord—and a bright regret,
A glorious sympathy with suns that set?
'Tis not harsh sorrow—but a tender wo,
Nameless, but dear to gentle hearts below,
Felt without bitterness—but full and clear,
A sweet dejection—a transparent tear,
Unmix'd with worldly grief or selfish stain,
Shed without shame—and secret without pain.

Even as the tenderness that hour instils,
When Summer's day declines along the hills,
So feels the fulness of our heart and eyes,
When all of Genius which can perish dies.
A mighty Spirit is eclipsed—a Power Hath pass'd from day to darkness—to whom hour
Of light no likeness is bequeath'd—no name,
Focus at once of all the rays of Fame!
The flash of Wit—the bright Intelligence,
The beam of Song—the blaze of Eloquence,
Set with their Sun—but still have left behind
The enduring produce of immortal Mind;
Fruits of a genial morn, and glorious noon,
A deathless part of him who died too soon.
But small that portion of the wondrous whole,
These sparkling segments of that circling soul,
Which all embraced—and lighten'd over all,
To cheer—to pierce—to please—or to appall.
From the charm'd council to the festive board,
Of human feelings the unbounded lord;
In whose acclain the loftiest voices vied,
The praised—the proud—who made his praise their pride.
When the loud cry of trampled Hiridostan*
Arose to heaven in her appeal from man,
His was the thunder—his the avenging rod,
The wrath—the delegated voice of God! [blazed
Which shook the nations through his lips—and Till vanquish'd senators trembled as they praised.

And here, oh! here, where yet all young and warm,
The guy creations of his spirit charm,
The matchless dialogue—the deathless wit,
Which knew not what it was to intermit;
The glowing portraits, fresh from life, that bring Home to our hearts the truth from which they spring;
These wondrous beings of his Fancy, wrought
To fulness by the fiat of his thought,
Here in their first abode you still may meet,
Bright with the hues of his Promethean heat,
A halo of the light of other days,
Which still the splendor of its orb betrays.

But should there be to whom the fatal blight,
Of failing Wisdom yields a base delight,
Men who exult when minds of heavenly tone
Jar in the music which was born their own,
Still let them pause—Ah! little do they know
That what to them seem'd Vice might be but Wo.
Hard is his fate on whom the public gaze
Is fix'd forever to detract or praise;
Repose denies her requiem to his name,
And Folly loves the martyrdom of Fame.
The secret enemy whose sleepless eye
Stands sentinel—accuser—judge—and spy,
The foe—the fool—the jealous—and the vain,
The envious who breathe the pain of others' pain,
Behold the host! delighted to deprave,
Who track the steps of Glory to the grave,
Watch every fault that daring Genius owes
Half to the ardor which his birth bestows,
Distort the truth, accumulate the lie,
And pile the pyramid of Calumny!

* See Fox, Burke, and Pitt's eulogy on Mr. Sheridan's speech on the charges exhibited against Mr. Hastings in the House of Commons. Mr.
Pitt expressed the House as suffused, to give time for a calmer consideration of the charges than could then occur after the immediate object of rage worn.

These are his portion—but if join'd to these Gaunt Poverty should league with deep Disease,
If the high Spirit must forget to soar,
And stoop to strive with Misery at the door,
To soothe the Indignity—and face to face
Meet sordid Rage—and wrestle with Disgrace,
To find in Hope but the renew'd caress,
The serpent-fold of further Faithlessness,—
If such may be the ills which men assail,
What marvel if at last the mightiest fall?
Breasts to whom all the strength of feeling given
Bear hearts electric—charged with fire from Heaven
Black with the rude collision, inflame torn,
By clouds surrounded, and on whirlwinds borne,
Driven o'er the lowering atmosphere that must Thoughts which have turn'd to thunder—scorch—and burst.

But far from us and from our mimic scene
Such things should be—if such have ever been;
Ours be the gentler wish, the kinder task,
To give the tribute Glory need not ask,
To mourn the vanquish'd beam—and add our rite
Of praise in payment of a long delight.
Ye Orators! whom yet our councils yield,
Mourn for the veteran Hero of our field!
The worthy rival of the wondrous Three!*
Whose words were sparks of Immortality!
Ye Bards! to whom the Drama's Muse is dear,
He was your Master—emulate him here!
Ye men of wit and social eloquence!
He was your brother hear his ashes hence!
While Pever's of mind, almost of boundless range,
Complete in kind—as various in their change,
While eloquence—Wit—Poesy—and Mirth,
That humble Harmonist of care on Earth,
Survive within our souls—while lives our sense
Of pride in Merit's proud pretminence,
Long shall we seek his likeness—long in vain,
And turn to all of him which may remain,
Sighing that Nature form'd but one such man,
And broke the die—in moulding Sheridan!

ODE TO NAPOLEON BONAPARTE.

"Expeude Ambitatem—quot Sera in dista numen iuovae."

"The Emperor Napoleon was acknowledged by the Senate, by the Italians, and by the Provinces of Gaul; his moral virtues, and military glories, were early celebrated; and those who desired any private benefit from his government, announced in prophetic strains the restoration of public felicity.

By this magnanimous abolition he prolonged his life a few years, in a very ambiguous state, between an Emperor and an Exile."

'*Tis done—but yesterday a King!
And arm'd with Kings to strive—
And now thou art a nameless thing:
So object—yet alive!
Is this the man of thousand thrones,
Who strew'd our earth with hostile bones,
And can he thus survive?
Since he, miscall'd the Morning Star,
Nor man nor fiend hath fallen so far.

Ill minded man! why scourge thy kind,
Who bow'd so low the knee?
By gazing on thyself grown blind,
Thou taught'st the rest to see.
With might unquestion'd—power to save
Thine only gift hath been the grave,
To those that worship'd thee;
Nor till thy fall could mortals guess
Ambition's less than littleness!

Thanks for that lesson—it will teach
To after-warriors more
Than high Philosophy can preach,
And vainly preach'd before.
That spell upon the minds of men
Breaks never to unite again,
That led them to adore
Those Pagod things of sabre-away,
With fronts of brass, and feet of clay

The triumph, and the vanity,
The rapture of the strife—
The earthquake voice of Victory,
To thee the breath of life
The sword, the sceptre, and that sway
Which man seem'd made but to obey,
Wherewith renown was rife—
All quell'd!—Dark spirit! what must be
The madness of thy memory!

The Desolator desolate!
The Victor overthrown.
The Arbiter of others' fate,
A Suppliant for his own!
Is it some yet imperial hope,
That with such change can calmly cope?
Or dread of death alone?
To die a prince—or live a slave—
Thy choice is most ignobly brave!

He of old would rend the oak,
Dream'd not of the rebound;
Chain'd by the trunk he vainly broke
Alone—how look'd he round?
Thou in the sternness of thy strength
An equal deed has done at length,
And darker fate has found:
He fell, the forest prowlers' prey,
But thou must eat thy heart away!

The Roman, when his burning heart
Was slaked with blood of Rome,
Threw down the dagger—dared depart,
In savage grandeur, home—
He dared depart in utter scorn
Of men that such a yoke had borne,
Yet left him such a doom!
His only glory was that hour,
Of self-uphold abandon'd power.

The Spaniard, when the lust of sway
Had lost its quickening spell,
Cast crowns for rosaries away,
An empire for a cell;
A strict accountant of his beads,
A subtle disputant on creeds,
His dotage trifled well:
Yet better had he neither known
A bigot's shrine, nor despot's throne.
But thou—from thy reluctant hand,
The thunderbolt is wrung—
Too late thou leav'st the high command,
To which thy weakness clung;
All Evil Spirit as thou art,
It is enough to grieve the heart,
To see thy own unstrung;
To think that God's fair world hath been
The footstool of a thing so mean!

And Earth hath spilt her blood for him,
Who thus can hoard his own!
And Monarchs bow'd the trembling limb,
And thank'd him for a throne!
Fair Freedom! we may hold thee dear,
When thus thy mightiest foes their fear
In humblest guise have shown.
Oh! ne'er may tyrant leave behind
A brighter name to lure mankind!

Thine evil deeds are writ in gore,
Nor written thus in vain—
Thy triumphs tell of fame no more,
Or deepen every strain—
If thou hast died as honor dies,
Some new Napoleon might arise,
To shame the world again—
But who would soar the solar height,
To set in su. a starless night?

Weigh'd in the balance, hero dust
Is vile as vulgar clay;
Thy scales, Mortality! are just
To all that pass away;
But yet methought the living great,
Some higher sparks should animate,
To dazzle and dismay;
Nor deem'd Contempt could thus make mirth
Of these, the Conquerors of the earth.

And she, proud Austria's mournful flower
Thy still imperial bride!
How bears her breast the torturing hour?
Still clings she to thy side?
Must she too bend, must she too share
Thy late repentance, long despair,
Thou throneless Homicide?
If still she loves thee, hoard that gem,
'Tis worth thy vanish'd diadem!

Then haste thee to thy sullen Isle,
And gaze upon the sea;
That element may meet thy smile,
It ne'er was ruled by thee!
Or trace with thine all idle hand,
In loitering mood upon the sand,
That earth is now as free!
That Corinth's pedagogue hath now
Transferr'd his by-word to thy brow.

Thou Timour! in his captive's cage,
What thoughts will there be thine,
While brooding in thy prison'd rage?
But one—'The world was mine!'
Unless, like he of Babylon,
All sense is with thy sceptre gone,
Life will not long confine
That spirit pour'd so widely forth—
So long obey'd—so little worth!

Or like the thief of fire from heaven,
Wilt thou withstand the shock?
And share with him, the unforgiven,
His vulture and his rock!
Foredoom'd by God—a man accurst,
And that last act, though not thy worst
The very Fiend's arch mock;
He in his fall preserved his pride,
And, if a moat, had as proudly died!

ODE ON VENICE.

I.
Our Venice! Venice! when thy marble walls
Are level with the waters, there shall be
A cry of nations o'er thy sunken halls,
A loud lament along the sweeping sea!
If I, a northern wanderer, weep for thee,
What should thy sons do?—any thing but weep:
And yet they only murmur in their sleep.
In contrast with their fathers—as the slime,
The dull green ooze of the receding deep,
Is with the dashing of the springtide foam
That drives the sailor shipless to his home,
Are they to those that were; and thus they creep,
Crouching and crab-like, through their sapping streets.
Oh! agony—that centuries should reap
No meadow harvest! Thirteen hundred years
Of wealth and glory turn'd to dust and tears;
And every monument the stranger meets,
Church, palace, pillar, as a mourner greets;
And even the Lion all subdued appears,
And the harsh sound of the barbarian drum,
With dull and daily dissonance, repeats
The echo of thy tyrant's voice along
The soft waves, once all musical to song,
That heaved beneath the moonlight with the throng
Of gondoliers—and to the busy hum
Of cheerful creatures, whose most sinful deeds
Were but the overbearing of the heart,
And flow of too much happiness, which needs
The aid of age to turn its course apart
From the luxuriant and voluptuous flood
Of sweet sensations, battling with the blood,
But these are better than the gloomy errors,
The weeds of nations in their last decay,
When Vice walks forth with her uns soften'd terrors,
And Mirth is madness, and but smiles to slay;
And Hope is nothing but a false delay,
The sick man's lightning half an hour ere death,
When Faintness, the last mortal birth of Pain,
And apathy of limb, the dull beginning
Of the cold staggering race which Death is winning,
Steals vein by vein and pulse by pulse away,
Yet so relieving the o'er-tortured clay,
To him appears renewal of his breath,
And freedom the mere numbness of his chain—
And then he talks of life, and how again
He feels his spirit soaring—albeit weak,
And of the fresher air, which he would seek—
And as he whispers knows not that he gasps,
That his thin finger feels not what it clasps,
And so the film comes o'er him—and the dizzv
Chamber swims round and round—and shadows busy
At which he vainly catches, fit and gleam,
Till the last rattle chokes the strangled sound,
And all is ice and blackness—and the earth
That which it was the moment ere our birth.

II.
There is no hope for nations!—Search the page
Of many thousand years—the daily scene,
The flow and ebb of each recurring age,
The everlasting to be which hath been,
Hath taught us nought or little: still we lean
On things that rot beneath our weight, and wear
Our strength away in wrestling with the air;
For 'tis our nature strikes us down: the beasts
Slaughter'd in hourly hecatombs for feasts
Are of as high an order—they must go Even where their driver goads them, though or slaughter.
Ye men, who purr your blood for kings as water,
What have they given your children in return?
A heritage of servitude and woe,
A blindfold bondage, where your hire is blows.
What! do not yet the red-hot ploughshares burn
O'er which you stumble in a false ordeal,
And deem this proof of loyalty the real,
Kissing the hand that guides you to your scars,
And gloying as you tread the glowing bars?
All that your sires have left you, all that Time
Bequeaths of free, and History of sublime,
Spring from a different theme!—Ye see and read,
Admire and sign, and then succumb and bleed!
Save the few spirits, who, despite of all,
And worse than all, the sudden crimes engender'd
By the down-thundering of the prison-wall,
And thirst to swallow the sweet waters tender'd,
Gushing from Freedom's fountains—when the crowd,
Madden'd with centuries of drought, are loud,
And trample on each other to obtain,
The cup which brings oblivion of a chain
Heavy and sore,—in which long yoked they plough'd
The sand,—or if there sprung the yellow grain,
'Twas not for them, their necks were too much bow'd,
And their dead palates chew'd the end of pain
Yes! the few spirits—who, despite of deeds.
Which they abhor, confound not with the cause,
Those momentary starts from Nature's laws,
Which, like the pestilence and earthquake, smite
But for a term, then pass, and leave the earth,
With all her seasons to repair the blight
With a few summers, and again put forth
Cities and generations—fair, when free—
For, Tyranny, there blooms no bud for thee!

III.
Glory and Empire! once upon these towers,
With Freedom—godlike Triad! how ye sate
The league of mightiest nations, in those hours
When Venice was an envy, might abide,
But did not quench, her spirit—in her fate
All were enwapp'd: the feasted monarchs knew
And loved their hostess, nor could learn to hate,
Although they humbled—with the kingly few
The many felt, for from all days and climes
She was the voyager's worship;—even her crimes
Were of the softer order—born of Love,
She drank no blood, nor fatten'd on the dead,
But gladden'd where her harmless conquests spread;
For these restored the Cross, that from above
Hallow'd her sheltering banners, which incessant
Flew between earth and the unholy Crescent,
Which, if it waned and dwindled, Earth may thank
The city it has clothed in chains, which clank
Now,创aking in the ears of those who owe
The name of Freedom to her glorious struggles;
Yet she but shares with them a common wo,
And call'd the 'kingdom' of a conquering foe,—
But knows what all—and, most of all, we know—
With what set gilded terms a tyrant joggles!

IV.
The name of Commonwealth is past and gone,
O'er the three fractions of the groaning globe;

Venice is crush'd, and Holland deigns to own
A sceptre, and endures the purple robe;
If the free Switzer yet bestrides alone
His chainless mountains, 'tis but for a time,
For tyranny of late is cunning grown,
And in its own good season tramples down
The sparkles of our ashes. One great clime,
Whose vigorous offspring by dividing ocean,
Are kept apart and nursed in the devotion
Of Freedom, which their fathers fought for, and Béqueathed—a heritage of heart and hand,
And proud distinction from each other land,
Whose sons must bow them at a monarch's motion,
As if his senseless sceptre were a wand,
Full of the magic of exploded science—
Still one great clime, in full and free defiance,
Yet rears her crest, unconquer'd and sublime,
Above the far Atlantic!—She has taught
Her Esau-bredren that the haughty flag,
The floating fence of Albion's feeble crag,
May strike to those whose red right hands have bought
Rights cheaply earn'd with blood.—Still, still, for ever
Better, though each man's life blood were a river,
That it should flow, and overflow, than creep
Through thousand lazy channels in our veins,
Damn'd like the dull canal with locks and chains,
And moving, as a sick man in his sleep,
Three paces, and then faltering—better be
Where the extinguish'd Spartans still are free,
In their proud channel of Thermopylae,
Than stagnate in our marsh,—or o'er the deep
Fly, and one current to the ocean add,
One spirit to the souls our fathers had,
One freeman more, America, to thee!
THE DREAM.

Was crown'd with a peculiar diadem
Of trees, in circular array, so fix'd,
Not by the sport of nature, but of man:
These two, a maiden and a youth, were there
Gazing—the one on all that was beneath
Fair as herself—but the boy gazed on her;
And both were young, and one was beautiful:
And both were young—yet not alike in youth.
As the sweet moon on the horizon's verge
The maid was on the eve of womanhood;
The boy had fewer summers, but his heart
Had far outgrown his years, and to his eye
There was, a one beloved face on earth,
And that was shining on him; he had look'd
Upon it till it could not pass away;
He had no breath, nor being, but in hers;
She was his voice; he did not speak to her,
But trembled on her words; she was his sight,
For his eye follow'd hers, and saw with hers,
Which color'd all his objects—he had ceased
To live within himself; she was his life,
The ocean to the river of his thoughts,
Which terminated all; upon her he slumber'd around
A touch of hers, his blood would ebb and flow
And his check change tempestuously—his heart
Unknowing of its cause of agony,
But she in these fond feelings had no share;
Her sighs were not for him; to her he was Even as a brother—but no more; 'twas much,
For brotherless she was, save in the name
Her infant friendship had bestow'd on him;
Herself the solitary scion left
Of a time-honor'd race. —It was a name
Which pleased him, and yet pleased him not—and why?
Time taught him a deep answer—when she loved
Another: even now she loved another,
And on the summit of that hill she stood
Looking afar if yet her lover's steed
Kept pace with her expectancy, and flew.

III.
A change came o'er the spirit of my dream.
There was an ancient mansion, and before
Its walls there was a steel caparison'd:
Within an antique Oratory stood
The Boy of whom I spake; he was alone,
And pale, and pacing to and fro: anon
He sate him down, and seized a pen, and traced
Words which I could not guess of; then he lean'd
His bow'd head on his hands, and shook as 'twere
With a convulsion—then arose again,
And with his teeth and quivering hands did tear
What he had written, but he shed no tears.
And he did ca'n himself, and fix his brow
Into a kind of quiet; as he paused,
The Lady of his love recert'd there;
She was serene and smiling then, and yet
She knew she was by him belov'd,—she knew
For quickly comes such knowledge, that his heart
Was darken'd with her shadow, and she saw
That he was wretched, but she saw not all.
He rose, and with a cold and gentle grasp
He took her hand; a moment o'er his face
A tablet of unutterable thoughts
Was traced, and then it faded, as it came;
He dropp'd the hand he held, and with slow steps
Retired, but not as bidding her adieu,
For they did part with mutual smiles; he pass'd
From out the massy gate of that old Hall,
And mounting on his steed he went his way,
And ne'er repass'd that hoary threshold more.

IV.
A change came o'er the spirit of my dream.
The Boy was sprung to manhood: in the wilds
Of fiery climes he made himself a home,
And his Soul drank their sunbeams: he was girl
With strange and dusky aspects; he was not Himself like what he had been; on the sea
And on the shore he was a wanderer;
There was a mass of many images
Crowded like waves upon me, but he was
A part of all: and in the last he lay
Reposing from the noontide sultriness,
Couch'd among fallen columns, in the shade
Of ruin'd walls that had survived the names
Of those who rear'd them; by his sleeping side
Stood camels grazing, and some goodly steeds
Were fasten'd near a fountain; and a man
Clad in a flowing garb did watch the while,
While many of his tribe slumber'd around:
And they were canopied by the blue sky,
So cloudless, clear, and purely beautiful,
That God alone was to be seen in Heaven.

V.
A change came o'er the spirit of my dream
The Lady of his love was wed with One
Who did not love her better: in her home,
A thousand leagues from his,—her native home.
She dwelt, begin with growing Infancy,
Daughters and sons of Beauty,—but behold!
Upon her face there was the tint of grief,
The settled shadow of an inward strife,
And an unquiet drooping of the eye
As if its lids were charged with unshed tears.
What could she grieve for?—she had all she loved,
And he who had so loved her was not there
To trouble with bad hopes, or evil wish,
Or ill-repressed affection, her pure thoughts.
What could such grief be?—she had loved him not
Nor given him cause to deem himself beloved,
Nor could he be a part of that which prey'd
Upon her mind—a spectre of the past.

VI.
A change came o'er the spirit of my dream
The Wanderer was return'd; I saw him stand
Before an Altar—with a gentle bride;
Her face was fair, but was not that which made
The Starlight of his Boyhood; —as he stood
Even at the altar, o'er his brow there came
The self-same aspect, and the quivering shock
That in the antique Oratory shook
His bosom in its solitude; and then—
As in that hour—a moment o'er his face,
The tablet of unutterable thoughts
Was traced,—and then it faded as it came,
And he stood calm and quiet, and he spoke
The fitting vows, but heard not his own words,
And all things reeld around him; he could see
Not that which was, nor that which should have
But the old mansion, and the accust'med hall,
And the remember'd chambers, and the place.
The day, the hour, the sunshine, and the shade
All things pertaining to that place and hour
And her who was his destiny, came back
And thrust themselves between him and the light:
What business had they there at such a time?

VII.
A change came o’er the spirit of my dream.
The lady of his love:—Oh! she was changed
As by the sickness of the soul; her mind
Had wandered from its dwelling, and her eyes
They had not their own lustre, but the look
Which is not of the earth; she was become
The queen of a fantastic realm; her thoughts
Were combinations of disjointed things;
And forms impalpable and unperceived
Of other’s sight familiar were to hers.
And this the world calls frenzy; but the wise
Have a far deeper madness, and the glance
Of melancholy is a fearful gift;
What is it but the telescope of truth?
Which strips the distance of its phantasies,
And brings life near in utter nakedness,
Making the cold reality too real!

VIII.
A change came o’er the spirit of my dream.
The Wanderer was alone as heretofore,
The beings which surrounded him were gone,
Or were at war with him; he was a mark
For blight and desolation, compass’d round
With Hatred and Contention; Pain was mix’d
In all which was served up to him, until,
Like to the Pontic monarch of old days,*
He fed on poisons, and they had no power,
But were a kind of nutriment; he lived
Through that which had been death to many men,
And made him friends of mountains: with the stars,
And the quick Spirit of the Universe
He held his dialogues; and they did teach
To him the magic of their mysteries;
To him the book of Night was open’d wide,
And voices from the deep abyss reveal’d
A marvel and a secret—be it so.

IX.
My dream was past; it had no further change.
It was of a strange order, that the doom
Of these two creatures should be thus traced out
Almost like a reality—the one.
To end in madness—both in misery.

THE BLUES:
A LITERARY ECLOGUE.

"Nunciam no erode colori."
VIRGIL.
Oh trust not, ye beautiful creatures, to him,
Through your hair were as red as your stockings are blue.

ECLOGUE FIRST.

London—Before the Door of a Lecture Room.

Enter Tracy, meeting Inkell.

Ink. Yow’re too late.

Tracy. Is it over?

Ink. No; nor will be this hour.

But the benches are cram’d, like a garden in flower,
With the pride of our belles, who have made it the fashion;
So instead of "beaux arts," we may say "la belle passion."

For learning, which lately has taken the lead in
The world, and set all the fine gentlemen reading.

Tracy. I know it too well, and have worn out my patience
With studying to study your new publications.
There’s Vamp, Scamp, and Mouthy, and Words-words and Co.

With their damnable—
Ink. Hold, my good friend, do you know
Whom you speak to?

Tracy. Right well, boy, and so does the Row:—

You’re an author—a poet—

Ink. And think you that I
Can stand tamely in silence, to hear you decry
The Muses?

Tracy. Excuse me; I meant no offence
To the Nine; though the number who make some pretence.

To their favors is such—but the subject to drop,
I am just piping hot from a publisher’s shop,
(Next door to the pastry-cook’s; so that when I Cannot find the new volume I wanted to buy
On the bibliopol’s shelves, it is only two paces,
As one finds every author in one of those places.)
Where I just had been skimming a charming critique,
So studded with wit, and so sprinkled with Greek!
THE BLUES.

533

Where your friend—you know who—has just got such a threshing,
That it is, as the phrase goes, extremely "refreshing."
What a beautiful word!

Ink. Very true; 'tis so soft
And so cooling—they use it a little too oft;
And the papers have got it at last—but no matter.
So they've cut up our friend then?

Tra. Not left him a tatter—
Not a rag of his present or past reputation,
Which they call a disgrace to the age and the nation.

Ink. I'm sorry to hear this; for friendship, you know—
Our poor friend—but I thought it would terminate so.

Our friendship is such, I'll read nothing to shock it.
You don't happen to have the Review in your pocket?

Tra. No; I left a round dozen of authors and others
(Very sorry, no doubt, since the cause is a brother's)
All scrambling and jostling, like so many imps,
And on fire with impatience to get the next glimpse.

Ink. Let us join them.

Tra. What, won't you return to the lecture?
Ink. Why, the place is so cram'd there's no room for a spectre.

Besides, our friend Scamp is to-day so absurd—
How can you tell that till you hear him?

Ink. I heard
Quite enough; and to tell you the truth, my retreat
Was from his vile nonsense, no less than the heat.

Tra. I have had no great loss then!

Ink. Loss!—such a palaver!
I'd inoculate sooner my wife with the slave
Of a dog when gone rabid, than listen two hours
To the torrent of trash which around him he pours,
Pump'd up with such effort, disgorg'd with such labor,
That—come—do not make me speak ill of one's neighbor.

Tra. I make you!

Ink. Yes, you! I said nothing until
You compell'd me, by speaking the truth—

Tra. To speak ill?

Is that your deduction?

Ink. When speaking of Scamp ill,
I certainly follow, not set an example.
The fellow's a fool, an impostor, a zany.

Tra. And the crowd of to-day shows that one fool makes many.

But we two will be wise.

Ink. Fray, then, let us retire.

Tra. I would, but—

Ink. There must be attraction much higher
Than Scamp, or the Jews' harp he nicknames his lyre,
I'd call you to this hot-bed.

Tra. I own it—'tis true—

A fair lady—

Tra. A spinster?

Ink. Miss Lilac!

Ink. The Blue!

The heiress?

Tra. The angel!

Ink. The devil! why, man!

Tra. You wed with Miss Lilac! 'twould be your perdition:
She's a poet, a chymist, a mathematician.
To be sure makes a difference.

Tru. I know what is what:
And you, who’re a man of the gay world, no less
Than a poet o’ t’ other, may easily guess
That I never could mean, by a word, to offend
A genius like you, and moreover my friend.

Ink. No doubt; you by this time ’should know what is due
To a man of——but come—let us shake hands.

Tru. You knew,
And you know, my dear fellow, how heartily I,
Whatever you publish, am ready to buy.

Ink. That’s my bookseller’s business; I care not for sale;
Indeed the best poems at first rather fail.
There were Renegade’s epics, and Botherby’s plays,
And my own grand romance——

Tru. Had its full share of praise.
I myself saw it puff’d in the “Old Girl’s Review.”

Ink. What Review?

Tru. ’Tis the English “Journal de Trevoux;”
A clerical work of our Jesuits at home.

Have you never yet seen it?

Ink. That pleasure’s to come.

Tru. Make haste then.

Ink. Why so?

Tru. I have heard people say
That it threatened to give up the ghost t’ other day.

Ink. Well, that is a sign of some spirit.

Tru. No doubt.
Shall you be at the Countess of Fiddlecombe’s rout?

Ink. I’ve a card, and shall go; but at present, as soon
As friend Scamp shall be pleased to step down from the moon,
(Where he seems to be soaring in search of his wits,) I’m engaged to the Lady Bluebottle’s collation,
To partake of a luncheon and learn’d conversation!
’Tis a sort of reunion for Scamp, on the days
Of his lecture, to treat him with cold tongue and praise,
And I own, for my own part, that ’tis not unpleasant.
Will you go? There’s Miss Lilac will also be present.

Tru. That “metal’s attractive.”

Ink. No doubt—to the pocket.

Tru. You should rather encourage my passion than shock it.
But let us proceed; for I think, by the hum——

Ink. Very true; let us go, then, before they can come,
’Or else we’ll be kept here an hour at their levy,
On the rack of cross questions, by all the blue bevy.

Drunk! Zounds, they’ll be on us; I know by the drone
Of Mr Botherby’s spouting, ex-cathedral tone,
Ay, ’tis here he is at it. Poor Scamp! better join
Your friends, or he’ll pay you back in your own coin.

Tru. All fair; ’tis but lecture for lecture.

Ink. That’s clear.
But for God’s sake let’s go, or the bore will be here.

Dun... dun... some, say, I’m off.

[Exit Inkel.

Tru. You are right, and I’ll follow;
’Tis high time for a “Sic me servavit Apollo.”

And let we shall have the whole crew on our kibes,
Blunt dandies, and dowagers, and second-hand scribes.

All flocking to moisten their exquisite throttles
With a glass of Madeira at Lady Bluebottle’s.

[Exit Traci.

ECLOGUE SECOND.

An Apartment in the House of Lady Bluebottle
A Table prepared.

SIR RICHARD BLUEBOTTLE, solus

Was there ever a man who was married so sorry?
Like a fool, I must needs do the thing in a hurry
My life is reversed, and my quiet destroy’d; My days, which once pass’d in so gentle a void,
Must now, every hour of the twelve, be employ’d:

The twelve do I say?—of the whole twenty-four,
Is there one which I dare call my own any more?
What with driving and visiting, dancing and dining
What with learning, and teaching, and scribbling,
And shining,

In science and art, I’ll be curst if I know Myself from my wife; for although we are two,
Yet she somehow contrives that all things shall be Done in a style that proclaims us eternally one.

But the thing of all things which distresses me more Than the bills of the week (though they trouble me sore)
Is the numerous, humorous, backbiting crew
Of scribblers, wits, lecturers, white, black, and blue,
Who are brought to my house as an inn, to my cost

—for the bill here, it seems, is defray’d by the host—

No pleasure! no leisure! no thought for my pains,
But to hear a vile jargon which addles my brains;
A smatter and chatter, glean’d out of reviews,
By the rag, tag, and bobtail, of those they call
"Blues;"
A rabble who know not—but soft, here they come!
Would to God I were dead! as I’m not, I’ll be dumb

Enter Lady Bluebottle, Miss Lilac, Lady Bluebent, Mr. Botherby, Inkel, Tracy, Miss Mazarine, and others, with Scamp, the Lecturer, &c.

Lady Blueb. Ah! Sir Richard, good morning; I’ve brought you some friends.

SIR RICH. (haste, and afterwards aside.) If friends, they’re the first.

Lady Blueb. But the luncheon attends.
I pray ye be seated;” sans ceremonie.

Mr. Scamp, you’re fatigued; take your chair there, next me. [They all sit

SIR RICH. (aside.) If he does, his fatigue is to come

Lady Blueb. Mr. Tracy—

Lady Bluebent—Miss Lilac—he pleased, ray, to place ye;
And you, Mr. Botherby—

Both. Oh, my dear Lady,
I obey.

Lady Blueb. Mr. Inkel, I ought to upbraid ye:
You were not at the lecture.

Ink. Excuse me, I was;
But the heat forced me out in the best part—alas!

And when——

Lady Blueb. To be sure it was broiling; but then
You have lost such a lecture!
Both. The best of the ten.

Tru. How can you know that? there are two more.

Both. Because

I defy him to beat this day's wondrous applause.
The very walls shook.

Ink. Oh, if that be the test,
I allow our friend Scamp has this day done his best.

Miss Lil. No more, sir, I thank you. Who lectures next spring?

Both. Dick Dunder.

Ink. That is, if he lives.

Miss Lil. And why not?

Ink. No reason whatever, save that he's a sot.

Lady Bluemount! a glass of Maderia?

Lady Bluemount. With pleasure.

Ink. How does your friend Wordswords, that Windermere treasure?

Does he stick to his lakes, like the leeches he sings,
And their gatherers, as Homer sung warriors and kings?

Lady Blu. He has just got a place.

Ink. *As a footman?

Lady Bluemount. For shame!

Nor profane with your sneers so poetic a name.

Ink. Nay, I meant him no evil, but pitied his master;

For the poet of pedlars 'twere, sure, no disaster
To wear a new livery; the more, as 'tis not
The first time he has turn'd both his creed and his coat.

Lady Bluemount. For shame! I repeat. If Sir George could but hear—

Lady Bluemount. Never mind our friend Inkel; we all know, my dear,

'Tis his way.

Sir Rich. But this place—

Ink. Is perhaps like friend Scamp's;

A lecturer's.

Lady Bluemount. Excuse me—'tis one in the "the Stamps;"

He is made a collector.

Tru. Collector!

Sir Rich. How?

Miss Lil. What?

Ink. I shall think of him oft when I buy a new hat:

There his works will appear—

Lady Bluemount. Sir, they reach to the Ganges.

Ink. I shant go so far—I can have them at Grange's.*

Lady Bluemount. Oh fie!

Miss Lil. And for shame!

Lady Bluemount. You're too bad.

Both. Very good!

Lady Bluemount. How good?

Lady Bluemount. He means nought—'tis his phrase.

Lady Bluemount. He grows rude.

Lady Bluemount. He means nothing; nay, ask him.

Lady Bluemount. Pray, sir! did you mean

What you say?

Ink. Never mind if he did: 'twill be seen

That whatever he means won't alloy what he says.

Both. Sir!

Ink. Pray be content with your portion of praise;

Twas in your defence.

Both. If you please, with submission,

I can make out my own.

* Grange is or was a famous pastry-cook and fruitster in Piccadilly.

Ink. It would be your perdition

While you live, my dear Botherby, never defend Yourself or your works, but leave both to a friend
Apropos—is your play then accepted at last?

Both. At last?

Ink. Why I thought—that's to say—there had past

A few green-room whispers, which hinted—you know

That the taste of the actors at best is so.

Both. Sir, the green-room's in rapture and so's the committee.

Ink. Ay—yours are the plays for exciting our "pity

And fear," as the Greek says: for "purging the mind,

I doubt if you'll leave us an equal behind.

Both. I have written the prologue, and meant to have pray'd

For a spice of your wit in an epilogue's aid.

Ink. Well, time enough yet, when the play's to be play'd.

Is it cast yet?

Both. The actors are fighting for parts,

As is usual in that most litigious of arts.

Lady Bluemount. We'll all make a party and go the first night.

Tru. And you promised the epilogue, Inkel.

Ink. Not quite.

However, to save my friend Betherby trouble,
I'll do what I can, though my pains must be double.

Tru. Why so?

Ink. To do justice to what goes before.

Both. Sir, I am happy to say, I've no fears on that score.

Your parts, Mr. Inkel, are—

Ink. Never mind mine;

Stick to those of your play, which is quite your own line.

Lady Bluemount. You're a fugitive writer I think, sir;

of rhymes?

Ink. Yes, ma'am; and a fugitive reader sometimes

On Wordswords, for instance. I seldom alight,

Or on Mouthey, his friend, without taking to flight

Lady Bluemount. Sir, your taste is too common; but

Time and posterity

Will right these great men, and this age's severity

Become its reproach.

Ink. I've no sort of objection,

So I'm not of the party to take the infection.

Lady Bluemount. Perhaps you have doubts that they ever will take?

Ink. Not at all; on the contrary, those of the lake

Have taken already, and still will continue

To take—what they can, from a great to a guinea,

Of pension or place—; but the subject's a bore!

Lady Bluemount. Well, sir, the time's coming.

Ink. Scamp! don't you feel sore?

What say you to this?

Scamp. They have merit, I own;

Though their system's absurdity keeps it unknown.

Ink. Then why not unearth it in one of your lectures?

Scamp. It is only time past which comes under my strictures.

Lady Bluemount. Come, a truce with all tarteness;—

the joy of my heart

Is to see Nature's triumph o'er all that is art

Wild Nature!—Grand Shakspeare!
Both. And down Aristotle! Lady Blub. Sir George thinks exactly with Lady Bluebottle;

And my Lord Seventy-four, who protects our dear Bard,

And who gave him his place, has the greatest regard For the poet, who, singing of pedlars and asses, Has found out the way to dispense with Parnassus.

Tra. And you, Scamp,— Scamp. I needs must confess I'm embarrass'd.

Ink. Don't call upon Scamp, who's already so harrass'd

With old schools, and new schools, and no schools, and all schools.

Tra. Well, one thing is certain, that some must be fools.

I should like to know who.

Ink. And I should not be sorry To know who are not,—it would save us some worry.

Lady Blueb. A truce with remark, and let nothing control

This "feast of our reason, and flow of the soul." Oh, my dear Mr. Botherby! sympathise!—I Now feel such a rapture, I'm ready to fly, I feel so elastic—"so buoyant—so buoyant !" *

Ink. Tracy! open the window.

Tra. I wish her much joy on't.

Both. For God's sake, my Lady Bluebottle, check not

This gentle emotion, so seldom our lot

Upon earth. Give it way; 'tis an impulse which lifts

Our spirits from earth; the sublimest of gifts;

For which poor Prometheus was chain'd to his mountain.

'Tis the source of all sentiment—feeling's true fountain:

'Tis the Vision of Heaven upon Earth: 'tis the gas Of the soul: 'tis the seizing of shades as they pass,

* Fact from life, with the words

And making them substance: 'tis something divine:—

Ink. Shall I help you, my friend, to a little more wine?

Both. I thank you; not any more, sir, till I dine.

Ink. Apropos—do you dine with Sir Humphrey to-day?

Tra. I should think with Duke Humphrey was more in your way.

Ink. It might be of yore; but we authors now look To the knight, as a landlord. much more than the Duke.

The truth is, each writer now quite at his ease is, And (except with his publisher) dines where he pleases.

But 'tis now nearly five, and I must to the Park.

Tra. And I'll take a turn with you there till 'tis dark.

And you, Scamp— Scamp. Excuse me; I must to my notes,

For my lecture next week.

Ink. He must mind when he quotes Out of "Elegant Extracts."

Lady Blueb. Well, now we break up; But remember Miss Diddle invites us to sup.

Ink. Then at two hours past midnight we all meet again,

For the sciences, sandwiches, hock, and champagne!

Tra. And the sweet lobster salad!

Both. I honor that meal;

For 'tis then, that our feelings most genuinely—feel.

Ink. True; feeling is truest then, far beyond question;

I wish to the gods 'twas the same with digestion! Lady Blueb. Pahaw!—never mind that; for one moment of feeling Is worth—God knows what.

Ink. 'Tis at least worth concealing For itself, or what follows—But here comes your carriage.

Sir Rich. (aside.) I wish all these people were d—d with my marriage.  [Exeunt
MISCELLANEOUS POEMS

WRITTEN IN AN ALBUM.

As o'er the cold sepulchral stone,
Some name arrests the passer-by;
Thus, when thou view'st this page alone,
May mine attract thy pensive eye!

And when by thee that name is read,
Reflect on me as on the dead,
And think my heart is buried here.

TO • • •

Oh, Lady! when I left the shore,
The distant shore, which gave me birth,
I hardly thought to grieve once more,
To quit another spot on earth:

Yet here, amidst this barren isle,
Where panting Nature droops the head,
Where only thou art seen to smile,
I view my parting hour with dread.

Though far from Albin's craggy shore,
Divided by the dark-blue main,
A few, brief, rolling seasons o'er,
Perchance I saw her cliffs again:

But whereas or I now may roam,
Through scorching clime, and varied sea,
Though Time restore me to my home,
I never shall bend mine eye on thee:

On thee, in whom at once conspire
All charms which heedless hearts can move,
Whom but to see is to admire,
And, oh! forgive the word—to love.

Forgive the word, in one who ne'er
With such a word can more offend;
And since thy heart I cannot share,
Believe me, what I am, thy friend.

And who so cold as look on thee,
Thou lovely wand'rer, and be less?
Nor be, what man should ever be,
The friend of Beauty in distress?

Ah! who would think that form had past
Through Danger's most destructive path,
Hath braved the Death-wing'd tempest's blast
And 'scaped a tyrant's fierce wrath?

Lady! when I shall view the walls
Where free Byzantium once arose;
And Stamboul's Oriental halls,
The Turkish tyrants now enclose;

Thou mightiest in the lists of fame,
That glorious city still shall be;
On me 'twill hold a dearer claim,
As spots of thy nativity:

And though I bid thee now farewell,
When I behold that wondrous scene,
Since where thou art I may not dwell,
'Twill soothe to be where thou hast been.

STANZAS,

WRITTEN IN PASSING THE AMBRACIAN GULF

Through cloudless skies, a silver sheen
Full beams the moon on Actium's coast,
And on these waves, for Egypt's queen,
The ancient world was won and lost.

And now upon the scene I look,
The azure grave of many a Roman;
Where stern Ambition once forsook
His wavering crown to follow woman.

Florence! whom I will love as well
As ever yet was said or sung,
(Since Orpheus sang his spouse from hell,)—
Whilst thou art fair and I am young;
Sweet Florence! those were pleasant times,
When worlds were staked for ladies' eyes:
Had bards as many realms as rhymes,
Thy charms might raise new Anthonies.

Though Fate forbids such things to be,
Yet, by thine eyes and ringlets curl'd,
I cannot lose a world for thee,
But would not lose thee for a world.

November 16th, 1809.

STANZAS,

COMPOSED DURING THE NIGHT, IN A THUNDER-STORM, WHEN THE GUIDES HAD LOST THE ROAD TO ZITZA, NEAR THE RANGE OF MOUNTAINS FORMERLY CALLED PINDUS, IN ALBANIA.

Chill and mirk is the nightly blast,
Where Pindus' mountains rise,
And angry clouds are pouring fast,
The vengeance of the skies.

Our guides are gone, our hope is lost,
And lightnings, as they play,
But show where rocks our path have crost,
Or gild the torrent's spray.

Is yon a cot I saw, though low?
When lightning broke the gloom—
How welcome were its shade!—ah, no!
'Tis but a Turkish tomb.

Through sounds of foaming waterfalls,
I hear a voice exclaim—
My way-worn countryman, who calls
On distant England's name.

A shot is fired—by foe or friend?
Another—'tis to tell
The mountain-peasants to descend,
And lead us where they dwell.

Oh! who in such a night will dare
To tempt the wilderness?
And who 'mid thunder peals can hear
Our signal of distress?

And who that heard our shouts would rise
To try the dubious road?
Or rather deem from nightly cries
That outlaws were abroad.

Clouds burst, skies flash, oh, dreadful hour!
More fiercely pours the storm!
Yet here one thought has still the power
To keep my bosom warm.

While wand'ring through each broken path,
O'er brake and craggy brow;
While elements exhaust their wrath,
Sweet Florence, where art thou?

Not on the sea, not on the sea,
Thy bark hath long been gone:
Oh, may the storm that pours on me,
Bow down my head alone!

Full swiftly blew the swift Siroc,
When last I press'd thy lip;
And long ere now, with foaming shock
Impell'd thy gallant ship.

Now thou art safe; nay, long ere now,
Hast trod the shore of Spain;
'Twere hard if fraught so fair as thou
Should linger on the main.

And since I now remember thee,
In darkness and in dread,
As in those hours of revelry
Which mirth and music sped:

Do thou amidst the fair white walls,
If Cadiz yet be free,
At times from out her latticed halls,
Look o'er the dark blue sea;

Then think upon Calypso's isles,
Endear'd by days gone by;
To others give a thousand smiles,
To me a single sigh.

And when the admiring circle mark
The paleness of thy face,
A half-formed tear, a transient spark
Of melancholy grace,

Again thou'lt smile, and blushing shun
Some coxcomb's raillery;
Nor own for once thou thought'st of one,
Who ever thinks on thee.

Though smile and sigh alike are vain,
When sever'd hearts repine,
My spirit flies o'er mount and main,
And mourns in search of thine.

WRITTEN AT ATHENS.

This spell is broke, the charm is flown!
Thus is it with life's fitful fever!
We madly smile when we should groan;
Delirium is our best deceiver.
Each lucid interval of thought,
Recalls the woes of Nature's charter,
And he that acts as wise men ought,
But lives, as saints have died, a martyr.

WRITTEN AFTER SWIMMING FROM SESTOS TO ABYDOS. *

If, in the month of dark December,
Leander, who was nightly wont
(What maid will not the tale remember?)
To cross thy stream, broad Hellespont!

* On the third of May, 1810, while the Blaunche (Captain Bathurst), was lying in the Dardanelles, Lieutenant Eberhard of that frigate, and the writer of these rhymes, swam from the European shore to the Asiatic—by the four Alydus to Sestos would have been more correct. The whole distance.
If, when the wintry tempest roar'd,
He sped to Hero, nothing loth,
And thus of old thy current pour'd,
Fair Venus! how I pity both!

For me, degenerate modern wretch,
Though in the genial month of May,
My dripping limbs I faintly stretch,
And think I've done a feat to-day.

But since he cross'd the rapid tide,
According to the doubtful story,
To woo,—and—Lord knows what beside,
And swam for Love, as I for Glory;

'Twore hard to say who fared the best:
Sad mortals! thus the Gods still plague you!
He lost his labor, I my jest;
For he was drown'd, and I've the ague.

SONG.

Ζών μεθ' ες δύνατον.

MAID of Athens, ere we part,
Give, oh, give me back my heart!
Or, since that has left my breast,
Keep it now and take the rest!

Hear my vow before I go,
Ζών μεθ' ες δύνατον.

By those tresses unconfin'd,
You'd by each Εgean wind;
By those lids whose jetty fringe
Kiss thy soft cheeks' blooming tinge;
By those wild eyes like the roe,
Ζών μεθ' ες δύνατον.

By that lip I long to taste;
Ορ' that zone-encircled waist;
By all the token-flowers* that tell
What words can never speak so well;
By Love's alternate joy and woe,
Ζών μεθ' ες δύνατον.

TRANSLATION OF THE FAMOUS GREEK WAR SONG,

Written by Rigas, who perished in the attempt to revolutionize Greece. The following translation is as literal as the author could make it in verse; it is of the same measure as that of the original.

Sons of the Greeks, arise!
The glorious hour's gone forth,
And, worthy of such ties,
Display who gave us birth

CHORUS.

Sons of Greeks! let us go
In arms against the foe,
Till their hated blood shall flow
In a river past our feet.

Then manfully despising
The Turkish tyrant's yoke,
Let you, country see you rising,
And all her chains be broke.

Brave shades of chi and sages,
Behold the comet's fire!
Hell-hordes of past age,
Oh, start again to roar!

At the sound of my trumpet, breaking
Your sleep, oh, join with me!
And the seven-hill'd city seeking,
Fight, conquer, till we're free.

Sons of Greeks, &c.

Sparta, Sparta, why in slumber,
Lethargic dost thou lie?
Awake, and join thy numbers
With Athens, old ally!

Leonidas recalling,
That chief of ancient song,
Who saved ye once from falling.
The terrible! the strong!
Who made that bold diversion
In old Thermopylae,
And warring with the Persian
To keep his country free;
With his three hundred waging
The battle, long he stood,
And like a lion raging,
Expired in seas of blood.

Sons of Greeks, &c.

TRANSLATION OF THE ROMAIC SONG,

"Μετέω με 'το νεό πετάλδα Θάνατσαν Χαλδή."

THE SONG FROM WHICH THIS IS TAKEN IS A GREAT FAVORITE WITH THE YOUNG GIRLS OF ATHENS, OF ALL CLASSES. THEIR MANNER OF SINGING IT IS BY VERSES IN ROTATION, THE WHOLE NUMBER PRESENT JOINING IN THE CHORUS. I HAVE HEARD IT FREQUENTLY AT OUR "Χάποσ" IN THE WINTER OF 1810-11. THE AIR IS PLAIN-TIVE AND PRETTY.

I enter thy garden of roses,
Beloved and fair Haidée,
Each morning where Flora reposés,
For surely I see her in thee.
Oh, Lovely! 'tis low I implore thee;
Receive this fond truth from my tongue,
Which utter's its song to adore thee,
Yet trembles for what it has sung;
As the branch, at the bidding of Nature,
Adds fragrance and fruit to the tree,
Through her eyes, through her every feature,
Shines the soul of the young Haidée.

But the loveliest garden grows hateful,
When Love has abandon'd the bower's;
Bring me hemlock—since mine is ungrateful,
That herb is more fragrant than flowers.
The poison, when pour'd from the chalice,
Will deeply embitter the bowl;
But when drunk to escape from thy malice,
The draught shall be sweet to my soul.
Too cruel! in vain I implore thee
My heart from these horrors to save;
Will nought to my bosom restore thee?
Then open the gates of the grave.

As the chief who to coq advances,
Secure of his conquest before,
Thus thou, with those eyes for thy lances,
Hast pierced through my heart to its core.
Ah, tell me, my soul! must I perish
By pangs which a smile would dispel?
Would the hope, which thou once bad'st me cherish,
For torture repay me too well?
Now sad is the garden of roses,
Beloved but false Haidée!
There Flora all wither'd reposés,
And mourns o'er thine absence with me.

WRITTEN BENEATH A PICTURE.

Dear object of defeated care!
Though not of love and thee bereft,
To reconcile me with despair
Thine image and my tears are left.

'Tis said with Sorrow Time can cope;
But this I feel can ne'er be true:
For by the death-blow of my Hope
My Memory immortal grew

ON PARTING.

The kiss, dear maid! thy lip has left,
Shall never part from mine,
Till happier hours restore the gift
Untainted back to thine.

Thy parting glance, which fondly beams
An equal love may see:
The tear that from thine eyelid streams
Can weep no change in me.

I ask no pledge to make me blest
In gazing when alone;
Nor one memorial for a breast,
Whose thoughts are all thine own.

Nor need I write—to tell the tale
My pen were doubly weak:
Oh! what can idle words avail,
Unless the heart could speak?

By day or night, in weal or wo,
That heart no longer free,
Must bear the love it cannot show
And silent ache for thee.

TO THYRZA.

Without a stone to mark the spot,
And say, what truth might well have said
By all, save one, perchance forgot,
Ah, wherefore art thou lowly laid?

By many a shore and many a sea
Divided, yet beloved in vain;
The past, the future fled to thee
To bid us meet—no—ne'er again!

Could this have been—a word, a look
That softly said "We part in peace."
Had taught my bosom how to brook,
With fainter sighs, thy soul's release.

And didst thou not, since Death for thee
Prepared a light and pangless dart,
Once long for him thou ne'er shall see,
Who held, and holds thee in his heart?

Oh! who like him had watch'd thee here?
Or sadly mark'd thy glazing eye,
In that dread hour ere death appear,
Since silent sorrow fears to sigh,

Till all was past! But when no more
'Twas thine to reek of human wo,
Affection's heart-drops, gushing o'er,
Had flow'd as fast—as now they flow.

Shall they not flow, when many a day
In these, to me, deserted towers,
Ere call'd but for a time away,
Affection's mingling tears were ours?

Works.
Ours was the glance none saw beside;
The smile none else might understand;
The whisper’d thought of hearts allied,
The pressure of the thrilling hand;

The kiss, so guiltless and refined
That Love each warmer wish forebore,
Those eyes proclaim’d so pure a mind,
Even passion blush’d to plead for more.

The tone that taught me to rejoice,
When prone, unlike thee to repine;
The song, celestial from thy voice,
But sweet to me from none but thine,

The pledge we wore—I wear it still,
But where is thine?—ah, where art thou?
Oft have I borne the weight of ill,
But never bent beneath till now!

Well hast thou left in life’s best bloom
The cup of wo for me to drain,
If rest alone be in the tomb,
I would not wish thee here again;

But if in worlds more blest than this
Thy virtues seek a fitter sphere,
Impart some portion of thy bliss,
To wean me from mine anguish here,

Teach me—too early taught by thee!
To hear, forgiving and forgiven:
On earth thy love was such to me;
It faim would form my hope in heaven!

STANZAS.

Away, away ye notes of wo!
Be silent, thou once soothing strain,
Or I must flee from hence, for oh!
I dare not trust those sounds again.

To me they speak of brighter days—
But lull the chords, for now, alas!
I must not think, I may not gaze
On what I am—on what I was.

The voice that made those sounds more sweet
Is hush’d, and all their charms are fled;
And now their softest notes repeat
A dirge, an anthem o’er the dead!

Yes, Thyrza! yes, they breathe of thee,
Beloved dust! since dust thou art;
And all that once was harmony
Is worse than discord to my heart!

'Tis silent all!—but on my ear
The well-remember’d echoes thrill;
I hear a voice I would not hear,
A voice that now might well be still:

Yet oft my doubting soul ‘twill shake;
Even slumber owns its gentle tone,
Till consciousness will vainly wake
To listen, though the dream be flown.

Sweet Thyrza! waking as in sleep,
Then art but now a lovely dream;
A star that trembled o’er the deep,
Then turn’d from earth its tender beam;

But, he, who through life’s dreary way
Must pass, when heaven is veil’d in wrath,
Will long lament the vanish’d ray
That scattered gladness o’er his path.

TO THYRZA.

One struggle more, and I am free
From pangs that rend my heart in twain
One last long sigh to love and thee,
Then back to busy life again.

It suits me well to mingle now
With things that never pleased before;
Though every joy is fled below,
What future grief can touch me more?

Then bring me wine, the banquet bring,
Man was not form’d to live alone:
I’ll be that light above meaning thing
That smiles with ill, and weeps with none.

It was not thus in days more dear,
It never would have been, but thou
Hast fled, and left me lonely here;
Thou’rt nothing, all are nothing now.

In vain my lyre would lightly breathe!
The smile that sorrow fain would wear
But mocks the wo that lurks beneath,
Like roses o’er a sepulchre.

Though gay companions o’er the bowl
Dispel awhile the sense of ill;
Though pleasure fires the maddening soul
The heart—the heart is lonely still!

On many a lone and lovely night
It sooth’d to gaze upon the sky;
For then I deem’d the heavenly light,
Shone sweetly on thy pensive eye:

And oft I thought at Cynthia’s noon,
When sailing o’er the Ægean wav.
“Now Thyrza gazes on that moon”
Alas, it gleam’d upon her grave!

When stretch’d on fever’s sleepless bed
And sickness shrunk my throbbing veins
“Tis comfort still,” I faintly said,
“That Thyrza cannot know my pains;”
Like freedom to the time-worn clare,
A boon ’tis idle then to give,
Relenting Nature vainly gave,
My life, when Thyrza ceased to live!

My Thyrza’s pledge in better days,
When love and life alike were new!
How different now thou meet’st my gaze!
How ting’d by time with sorrow’s hue!
The heart that gave itself with thee,
Is silent—ah, were mine as still!
Though cold as o’er the dead can be,
It feels, it sickness with the chill.
Though Earth received them in her bed
And o'er the spot the crowd may tread,
In carelessness or mirth,
There is an eye which could not brook
A moment on that grave to look.

I will not ask where thou liest low,
Nor gaze upon the spot;
There flowers or weeds at will may grow,
So I behold them not:
It is enough for me to prove,
That what I loved and long must love
Like common earth can rot;
To me there needs no stone to tell,
'Tis Nothing that I loved so well

Yet did I love thee to the last
As fervently as thou,
Who didst not change through all the past
And cannot alter now.
The love where Death has set his seal,
Nor age can chill, nor rival steal,
Nor falsehood disavow:
And, what were worse, thou canst not see
Or wrong, or change, or fault in me.

The better days of life were ours;
The worst can be but mine:
The sun that cheers, the storm that lowers,
Shall never more be thine.
The silence of that dreamless sleep
I envy now too much to weep,
Nor need I to repine,
That all those charms have pass'd away;
I might have watch'd through long decay.

The flower in ripen'd bloom unmatch'd,
Must fall the earliest prey;
Though by no hand untimely snatch'd,
The leaves must drop away:
And yet it were a greater grief,
To watch it withering, leaf by leaf,
'Than see it pluck'd to-day;
Since earthly eye but ill can bear
To trace the change to foul from fair.

I know not if I could have borne
To see thy beauties fade;
The night that follow'd such a morn
Had warn a deeper shade:
Thy day without a cloud hath past,
And thou wert lovely to the last;
Extinguish'd, not decay'd:
As stars that shoot along the sky
Shine brightest as they fall from high

As once I wept, if I could weep
My tears might well be shed,
To think I was not near to keep
One vigil o'er thy bed;
To gaze, how fondly! on thy face,
To fold thee in a faint embrace,
Uphold thy drooping head;
And show that love, however vain,
Nor thou nor I can feel again.

Yet how much less it were to gain
Though thou hast left me free,
The loveliest things that still remain,
Than thus remember thee!
The aid of thine that cannot die
Through dark and dread Eternity
Returns again to me,
And more thy buried love endears
Than supt, except its living years.

STanzAS.
If sometimes in the haunts of men,
The image from my breast may fade,
The lonely hour presents again,
The semblance of thy gentle shade.
And now that sad and silent hour,
Thus much of thee can still restore,
And sorrow unobserved may pour
Theplaint she dare not speak before.

O, pardon that in crowds awhile,
I waste one thought I owe to thee,
And, self-condemn'd, appear to smile,
Unfaithful to thy Memory!
Nor deem that memory less dear,
That then I seem not to repine,
I would not fools should overhear,
One sight that should be wholly thine

If not the goblet pass unquaff'd,
It is not drain'd to banish care;
The cup must hold a deadlier draught,
That brings a Lethe for despair.
And could Oblivion set my soul
From all her troubled visions free,
I'd dash to earth the sweetest bowl
That drown'd a single thought of thee.

For well I know, that such had been Thy gentle care for him, who now
Unmourn'd shall quit this mortal scene,
Where none regarded him, but thou;
And, oh! I feel in that was given,
A blessing never meant for me;
Thou wert too long a dream of Heaven,
For earthly love to merit thee.

March 14th, 1812.

ON A CORNELIAN HEART WHICH WAS BROKEN.

ILL-FATED Heart: and can it be,
That thou shouldst thus be rent in twain?
Have years of care for thine and thee
Alike be used in vain?

Yet precious seems each shatter'd part,
And every fragment dearer grown,
Since he who wears thee, feels thou art
A fitter emblem of his own.

TO A YOUTHFUL FRIEND.

Few years have pass'd since thou and I
Were firmest friends, at least, in name,
And childhood's gay sincerity
Preserved our feelings long the same.

But now, like me, too well thou know'st
What trifles oft the heart recall;
And those who once have lov'd the most,
Too soon forget they loved at all.

And such the change the heart displays,
So frail is early friendship's reign,
A month's brief lapse, perhaps a day's,
Will view thy mind estranged again.

If so, it never shall be mine
To mourn the loss of such a heart;
The fault was Nature's fault, not thine
Which made thee fickle as thou art,

As rolls the ocean's changing tide,
So human feelings ebb and flow;
And who would in a breast confide
Where stormy passions ever glow?

It boots not, that together bred,
Our childish days were days of joy;
My spring of life has quickly fled;
Thou, too, hast ceased to be a boy.

And when we bid adieu to youth,
Slaves to the specious world's control,
We sigh a long farewell to truth;
That world corrupts the noblest soul.

Ah, joyous season! when the mind
Dares all things boldly but to lie;
When thought ere spoke is unconfined,
And sparkles in the placid eye.

Not so in man's maturer years,
When man himself is but a tool,
When interest sways our hopes and fears
And all must love and hate by rule.

With fools in kindred vice the same,
We learn at length our faults to blend
And those, and those alone, may claim
The prostituted name of friend.

Such is the common lot of man:
Can we then 'scape from folly free?
Can we reverse the general plan,
Nor be what in turn must be?

No, for myself, so dark my fate
Through every turn of life hath been,
Man and the world I so much hate,
I care not when I quit the scene
BYRON’S WORKS.

But thou, with spirit frail and light,
Wilt shine awhile and pass away;
As glowworms sparkle through the night,
And dare not stand the test of day.

Alas! whenever folly calls
Where parasites and princes meet,
(For cherish’d first in royal halls,
The welcome vices kindly greet,)

Ev’n now thou’rt nightly seen to add
One insect to the fluttering crowd;
And still thy trifling heart is glad
To join the vain, and court the proud.

There dost thou glide from fair to fair,
Still simpering on with eager haste,
As flies along the gay parterre,
That taint the flowers they scarcely taste.

But say, what nymph will prize the flame
Which seems, as marshy vapors move,
To fit along from dame to dame,
An Ignis-fatuae gleam of love?

What friend for thee, howe’er inclin’d,
Will deign to own a kindred care?
Who will debase his manly mind,
For friendship every fool may share?

In time forbear; amidst the throng,
No more so base a thing be seen;
No more so idly pass along;
Be something, anything, but—mean.

TO • • • • •

WELL! thou art happy, and I feel
That I should thus be happy too;
For still my heart regards thy weal
Warmly, as it was wont to do.

Thy husband’s best—and ‘twill impart
Some pangs to view his happier lot,
But let them pass—Oh! how my heart
Would hate him, if he loved thee not!

When late I saw thy favorite child,
I thought my jealous heart would break,
But when th’ unconscious infant smiled,
I kiss’d it for its mother’s sake.

I kiss’d it, and repress’d my sighs,
Its father in its face to see;
But then it had its mother’s eyes,
And they were all to love and me.

Mary, adieu! I must away:
While thou art blest I’ll not repine,
But near thee I can never stay;
My heart would soon again be thine.

I deem’d that time, I deem’d that pride
Had quench’d at length my boyish flame,
Nor knew, till seated by thy side,
My heart in all, save hope, the same.

Yet was I calm; I knew the time
My breast would thrill before thy look,
But now to tremble were a crime—
We met, and not a nerve was shook

I saw thee gaze upon my face,
Yet meet with no confusion there,
One only feeling could’st thou trace,
The sullen calmness of despair.

Away! away! my early dream,
Remembrance never must awake,
Oh! where is Letho’s fabled stream?
My foolish heart be still, or break.

FROM THE PORTUGUESE.

In moments to delight devoted,
“ My life!” with tend’rest tone, you cry,
Dear words! on which my heart had doted,
If youth could neither fade nor die.

To death even hours like these must roll,
Ah! then repeat those accents never,
Or change “my life!” into “my soul!”
Which, like my love, exists for ever.

IMPRONTU, IN REPLY TO A FRIEND

When from the heart where Sorrow sits,
Her dusky shadow mounts too high,
And o’er the changing aspect sits,
And clouds the brow, or fills the eye,

If need not that gloom, which soon shall sink:
My thoughts their dungeon know too well;
Back to my breast the wanderers shrink,
And drop within their silent cell.

ADDRESS,

SPOKEN AT THE OPENING OF DRURY-LANE THEATRE, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 10, 1812.

In one dread night our city saw, and sigh’d,
Bow’d to the dust, the Drama’s tower of pride:
In one short hour beheld the blazing fame, Apollo sink, and Shakespeare cease to reign.

Ye who beheld, (oh! sight admired and mourn’d, Whose radiance mock’d the ruin it adorn’d!)
Through clouds of fire the massy fragments riven,
Like Israel’s pillar, chase the night from heaven;
Saw the long column of revolving flames
Shake its red shadow o’er the startled Thames.
While thousands, throng’d around the burning dome,
Shrank back appall’d, and trembled for their home.
As gazed they, with thoughts’om the sky, the skies,
With lightnings awful as their own,
Till blackening ashes and the lonely wall
Usurp’d the Muse’s realm, and mark’d her fall;
MISCELLANEOUS POEMS.

say shall this new, nor less aspiring pile,
Rear'd where once rose the mightiest in our isle,
Know the same favor which the former knew,
A shrine for Shakespeare—worthy him and you?

Yes—it shall be—the magic of that name
Defies the scythe of time, the torch of flame;
On the same spot still consecrates the scene,
And bids the Drama be where she hath been.
This fabric's birth attest the potent spell—
Indulge our honest pride, and say, How well.

As soars this fame to emulate the last,
Oh! might we draw our omens from the past,
Some hour propitious to our prayers may boast
Names such as hollow still the dome we lost.
On Drury first your Siddons' thrilling art
O'erwhelm'd the gentlest, storm'd the sternest heart.
On Drury, Garrick's latest laurels grew;
Here your last tears retiring Roscius drew,
Sigh'd his last thanks, and wept his last adieu:
But still for living wit the wreaths may bloom
That only waste their odors o'er the tomb.
Such Drury claim'd and claims—nor you refuse
One tribute to revive his slumbering muse;
With garlands deck your own Menander's head!
Nor hoard your honors idly for the dead!

Dear are the days which made our annals bright,
Ere Garrick fled, or Brinsley ceased to write.
Heirs to their labors, like all high-born heirs,
Vain of our ancestry, as they of theirs;
While thus Remembrance borrows Banquo's glass
To claim the sceptred shadows as they pass,
And we the mirror hold, where imaged shine
Immortal names, emblazoned on our line,
Pause—ere their feebler offspring you condemn,
Reflect how hard the task to rival them!

Friends of the stage! to whom both Players and Plays
Must sue alike for pardon, or for praise,
Whose judging voice and eye alone direct
The boundless power to cherish or reject;
If e'er frivolity has led to fame,
And made us blush that you forbore to blame;
If e'er the sinking stage could condescend
To soothe the sickly taste it dare not mend,
All past reproach may present scenes refute,
And censure, wisely loud, be justly mute!
Oh! since your flat stamps the Drama's laws,
Forbear to mock us with misplaced applause;
So pride shall doubly nerve the actor's powers,
And reason's voice be echo'd back by ours!

This greeting o'er, the ancient rule obey'd,
The Drama's homage by her herald paid,
Receive your welcome too, whose every tone
Springs from our hearts, and fain would win your own.
The curtain rises—may our stage unfold,
Scenes not unworthy Drury's days of old!
Britons our judges, Nature for our guide,
Still may we please—long, long may you preside!

TO TIME.

TIME! on whose arbitrary wing
The varying hours must flag or fly,
Whose tardy winter, fleeting spring,
But drag or drive us on to die—

Hail thou! who on my mirth bestow'd
Those boons to all that know thee known
Yet better I sustain thy load,
For now I bear the weight alone.

I would not one fond heart should share
The bitter moments thou hast given;
And pardon thee, since thou couldst spare
All that I loved; to peace or heaven.

To them be joy or rest, on me
Thy future ills shall press in vain;
I nothing owe but years to thee,
A debt already paid in pain.

Yet even that pain was some relief;
It felt, but still forgot thy power:
The active agony of grief
Retards, but never counts the hour.

In joy I've sigh'd to think thy flight
Would soon subside from swift to slow:
Thy cloud could overcast the light,
But could not add a night to wo.

For then, however drear and dark,
My soul was suited to thy sky;
One star alone shot forth a spark
To prove thee—not Eternity.

That beam hath sunk, and now thou art
A blank; a thing to count and curse
Through each dull, tedious, trifling part,
Which all regret, yet all rehearse.

One scene even thou canst not deform;
The limit of thy sloth or speed,
When future wanderers bear the storm
Which we shall sleep too sound to heed.

And I can smile to think how weak
Thine efforts shortly shall be shown,
When all the vengeance thou canst wreak
Must fall upon—a nameless stone.

TRANSLATION OF A ROMANIC LOVE SON

Ah! Love was never yet without
The pang, the agony, the doubt,
Which rends my heart with ceaseless sigh.
While day and night roll darkling by.

Without one friend to hear my wo,
I faint, I die beneath the blow.
That Love had arrows, well I know;
Alas! I find them poison'd too.
Birds, yet in freedom, shun the not
Which Love around your haunts hath set;
Or circled by his fatal fire,
Your hearts shall burn, your hopes expire.

A bird of free and careless wing
Was I, through many a smiling spring;
But caught within the subtle snare,
I burn, and feebly flutter there.

Who ne'er have loved, and loved in vain,
Can neither feel nor pity pain,
The cold repulse, the look askance,
The lightning of Love's angry glance.

In flattering dreams I deem'd thee mine;
Now hope, and he who hoped, decline;
Like melting wax, or withering flower,
I feel my passion, and thy power.

My light of life! ah, tell me why
That panting lip, and alter'd eye?
My bird of love! my beauteous mate!
And art thou changed, and canst thou hate?

Mine eyes like wintry streams o'erflow:
What wretch with me would barter wo?
My bird! relent: one note could give
A charm, to bid thy lover live.

My curdling blood, my madd'ning brain,
In silent anguish I sustain;
And still thy heart, without partaking
One pang, exults—while mine is breaking.

Pour me the poison; fear not thou!
Thou canst not murder more than now;
I've lived to curse my natal day,
And love, that thus can lingering slay.

My wounded soul, my bleeding breast,
Can patience preach thee into rest?
Alas! too late, I dearly know,
That joy is harbinger of wo.

A SONG.

THOU art not false, but thou art fickle,
To those thyself so fondly sought;
The tears that thou hast forced to trickle
Are doubly bitter from that thought:
'Tis this which breaks the heart thou grievesest,
Too well thou lov'st—too soon thou leavest.

The wholly false the heart despises,
And spurns deceiver and deceit;
But she who not a thought disguises,
Whose love is as sincere as sweet,—
When she can change who loved so truly,
It feels what mine has felt so newly.

To dream of joy and wake to sorrow,
Is doom'd to all who love or live;
And if, when conscious on the morrow,
We scarce our fancy can forgive,
That cheated us in slumber only,
To leave the waking soul more lonely,

What must they feel whom no false vision,
But truest, tenderest passions warm'd?
Sincere, but swift in sad transition,
As if a dream alone had charm'd?
Ah! sure such grief is fancy's scheming,
And all thy change can be but dreaming!

ON BEING ASKED WHAT WAS THE "ORIGIN OF LOVE."

The "Origin of Love!"—Ah, why
That cruel question ask of me,
When thou may'st read in many an eye
He starts to life on seeing thee?
And should'st thou seek his end to know
My heart forebodes, my fears foresee
He'll linger long in silent wo;
But live—until I cease to be.

REMEMBER HIM, &c.

REMEMBER him, whom passion's power
Scherely, deeply, vainly proved:
Remember thou that dangerous hour
When neither fell, though both were loved.

That yielding breast, that melting eye,
Too much invited to be blest;
That gentle prayer, that pleading sigh,
The wilder wish reproved, repress.

Oh! let me feel that all I lost
But saved thee all that conscience fears,
And blush for every pang it cost
To spare the vain remorse of years.

Yet think of this when many a tongue,
Whose busy accents whisper blame,
Would do the heart that loved thee wrong,
And brand a nearly blighted name.

Think that, what'er to others thou
Hast seen each selfish thought subdued
I bless thy purer soul even now,
Even now, in midnight solitude.

Oh, God! that we had met in time,
Our hearts as fond, thy hand more free,
When thou hadst loved without a crime,
And I been less unworthy thee!

Far may thy days, as heretofore,
From this our gaudy world be past!
And, that too bitter moment o'er,
Oh! may such trial be thy last!

This heart, alas! perverted long,
Its life itself destroy'd might there destroy;
To meet thee in the glittering throng,
Would wake Presumption's hope of joy.

Then to the things whose bliss or wo,
Like mine is wild and worthless all,
That world resign—such scenes forego,
Where those who feel must surely fall.
MISCELLANEOUS POEMS.

Thy youth, thy charms, thy tenderness,
Try soul from long seclusion pure;
From what even here hath past, may guess
What there thy bosom must endure.

Oh! pardon that imploring tear,
Since not by Virtue shed in vain,
My frenzy drew from eyes so dear;
For me they shall not weep again.

Though long and mournful must it be,
The thought that we no more may meet?
Yet I deserve the stern decree,
And almost deem the sentence sweet.

Still, had I loved thee less, my heart
Had then less sacrificed to thine;
It felt not half so much to part,
As if its guilt had made thee mine.

LINES

INSCRIBED UPON A CUP FORMED FROM A SKULL.

Start not—nor deem my spirit fled:
In me behold the only skull,
From which, unlike a living head,
Whatever flows is never dull.

I lived, I loved, I quaff'd, like thee;
I died let earth my bones resign:
Fill up—thou cannot injure me;
The worm hath fouler lips than thine.

Better to hold the sparkling grape,
Than nourish the earth-worm's slimy brood;
And circle in the goblet's shape
The drink of gods, than reptile's food.

Where once my wit, perseverance, hath shone,
In aid of others' let me shine;
And when, alas! our brains are gone,
What neither substitute than wine?

Quaff while thou canst—another race,
When thou and thine like me are sped,
May rescue thee from earth's embrace,
And rhyme and revel with the dead.

Why not? since through life's little day
Our heads such sad effects produce;
Redeem'd from worms and wasting clay,
This chance is theirs, to be of use.

Newstead Abbey, 1808.

ON THE DEATH OF SIR PETER PARKER,
BART.

There is a tear for all that die,
A mourner o'er the humblest grave;
But nations swell the funeral cry,
And Triumph weeps above the brave.

For them is Sorrow's purest sigh
O'er Ocean's leaving bosom sent;
In vain their bones unburied lie,
All earth becomes their monument.

A tomb is theirs on every page,
An epitaph on every tongue;
The present hours, the future age,
For them bewail, to them belong.

For them the voice of festal mirth
Grows hush'd, their name the only sound;
While deep Remembrance pours to Worth
The guilf's tributary round.

A theme to crowds that knew them not,
Lamented by admiring foes,
Who would not share their glorious lot?
Who would not die the death they chose?

And, gallant Parker! thus enshrined
Thy life, thy fall, thy fame shall be:
And early valor, glowing, find
A model in thy memory.

But there are breasts that bleed with thee
In wo, that glory cannot quell,
And shuddering hear of victory,
Where one so dear, so dauntless, fell.

Where shall they turn to mourn thee less?
When cease to hear thy cherish'd name?
Time cannot teach forgetfulness,
While Grief's full heart is fed by fame.

Alas! for them, though not for thee,
They cannot choose but weep the more,
Deep for the dead the grief must be,
Who ne'er gave cause to mourn before.

TO A LADY WEEPING

Weep, daughter of a royal line,
A Sire's disgrace, a realm's decay;
Ah, happy! if each tear of thine
Could wash a father's fault away!

Weep—for thy tears are Virtue's tears—
Auspicious to those suffering isles;
And be each drop in future years
Repaid thee by thy people's smiles!

March, 1812.

FROM THE TURKISH.

The chain I gave was fair to view,
The lute I added sweet in sound;
The heart that offer'd both was true,
And ill deserved the fate it found

These gifts were charm'd by secret spell,
Thy truth in absence to divine;
And they have done their duty well,
Alas! they could not teach thee thine.
That chain was firm in every link,
But not to bear a stranger's touch;
That lute was sweet—till thou could'st think,
In other hands its notes were such.

Let him, who from thy neck uncund
The chain which shiver'd in his grasp,
Who saw that lute refuse to sound,
Restring the chords, renew the clasp.

When thou wert changed, they alter'd too,
The chain is broke, the music mute.
'Tis past—to them and thee adieu—
False heart, frail chain, and silent lute.

SONNET.

TO GENEVRA.

Thick eyes' blue tenderness, thy long fair hair,
And the wan lustre of thy features—caught
From contemplation—where serenely wrought,
Seems Sorrow's softness charm'd from its despair—
Have thrown such speaking sadness in thine air,
That—but I know thy blessed bosom fraught
With mines of unalloy'd and stainless thought—
I should have deem'd thee doom'd to earthly care.
With such an aspect, by his colors blent,
When from his beauty-breathing pencil born,
(Except that thou hast nothing to repent,) The Magdalen of Guido saw the morn—
Such seem'st thou—but how much more excellent!
With nought: Remorse can claim—nor Virtue scorn.

SONNET.

TO GENEVRA.

Thy cheek is pale with thought, but not from wo,
And yet so lovely, that if Mirth could blush
Its rose of whiteness with the brightest flush,
My heart would wish away that ruder glow;
And dazzle not thy deep-blue eyes—but oh!
While gazing on them sterner eyes will gush,
And into mine my mother's weakness rush,
Soft as the last drops round heaven's airy bow,
For, through thy long dark lashes low depending,
The soul of melancholy Gentleness
Streams like a seraph from the sky descending,
Above all pain, yet pitying all distress;
At once such majesty with sweetness blending,
I worship more, but cannot love thee less.

INSCRIPTION

ON THE MONUMENT OF A NEWFOUNDLAND DOG.

This Praise, which would be unmeaning Flattery
If inscribed over human bones,
Is but a just tribute to the Memory of BOATSWAIN, a Dog,
Who was born at Newfoundland, May, 1803,
And died at Newwood Abbey, Nov. 10, 1806.

When some proud son of man returns to earth, Unknonv to glory, but upheld by birth,
The sculptor's art exhausts the pomp of we And storied urns record who rests below; When all is done, upon the tomb is seen, Not what he was, but what he should have been. But the poor dog, in life the firmest friend, The first to welcome, foremost to defend, Whose honest heart is still his master's own, Who labors, fights, lives, breathes for him alone, Unhonored falls, unnoticed all his worth, Denied in heaven the soul he held on earth: While man, vain insect! hopes to be forgiven, And claims himself a sole exclusive heaven. Oh man! thou feeble tenant of an hour, Debased by slavery, or corrupt by power, Who knows thee well must quit thee with disgust, Degraded mass of animated dust! Thy love is lust, thy friendship all a cheat, Thy smiles hypocrisy, thy words deceit! By nature vile, ennobled but by name, Each kindred brute might bid thee blush for shame Ye! who pereance behold this simple urn, Pass on—it honors none you wish to mourn; To mark a friend's remains these stones arise; I never know but one, and here he lies.

Newstead Abbey, Oct. 30, 1808.

FAREWELL.

FAREWELL! if ever fondest prayer
For others' weal avail'd on high,
Mine will not all be lost in air,
But waft thy name beyond the sky.
'Twere vain to speak, to weep, to sigh;
Oh! more than tears of blood can tell,
When wrung from guilt's expiring eye,
Are in that word—Farewell!—Farewell!

These lips are mute, these eyes are dry;
But in my breast, and in my brain,
Awake the pangs that pass not by,
The thought that ne'er shall sleep again.
My soul no deigns nor dares complain,
Though grief and passion there rebel;
I only know we loved in vain—
I only feel—Farewell!—Farewell!

BRIGHT BE THE PLACE OF THY SOUL

Bright be the place of thy soul!
No lovelier spirit than thine
E'er burst from its mortal control,
In the orbs of the blessed to shine.

On earth thou wert all but divine,
As thy soul shall immortally be;
And our sorrow may cease to repine.
When we know that thy God is with thee.
Light be the turf of thy tomb!
May its verdure like emeralds be;
There should not be the shadow of gloom,
In aught that reminds us of thee.

Young flowers and an evergreen tree
May spring from the spot of thy rest;
But nor cypress nor yew let us see;
For why should we mourn for the blest?

---

WHEN WE TWO PARTED.

When we two parted
In silence and tears,
Half broken-hearted
To sever for years,
Pale grew thy cheek and cold,
Colder thy kiss;
Truly that hour foretold
Sorrow to this.

The dew of the morning
Sunk chill on my brow—
It felt like the warning
Of what I feel now.
Thy vows are all broken,
And light is thy fame;
I hear thy name spoken,
And share in its shame.

They name thee before me,
A knell to mine ear;
A shudder comes o'er me—
Why wait thou so dear?
They know not I knew thee,
Who knew thee too well:—
Long, long shall I rue thee,
Too deeply to tell.

In secret we met—
In silence I grieve,
That thy heart could forget,
Thy spirit deceive.
If I should meet thee
After long years,
How should I greet thee?—
With silence and tears.

STANZAS FOR MUSIC.*

"O Lachrymarum fons, tenere solem
Ductantium oruis ex anno : quater
Pella in uno quod sanctum
Facies tu, pia Nymphae, erexit."

Gray's Poemata.

There's not a joy the world can give like that it takes away,
When the glow of early thought declines in feeling's dull decay;

*Tis not on youth's smooth cheek the blush alone
which fades so fast,
But the tender bloom of heart is gone, ere youth itself be past.

Then the few whose spirits float above the wreck of happiness
Are driven o'er the shoals of guilt or ocean of excess:
The magnet of their course is gone, or only points
in vain
The shore to which their shiver'd sail shall never stretch again.

Then the mortal coldness of the soul like death
itself comes down;
It cannot feel for others' woes, it dare not dream
its own;
That heavy chill has frozen o'er the fountain of our tears,
And though the eye may sparkle still, 'tis where the ice appears.

Though wit may flash from fluent lips, and mirth
distract the breast,
Through midnight hours that yield no more their former hope of rest;
'Tis but as ivy leaves around the ruin'd turret wreath,
All green and wildly fresh without, but worn and gray beneath.

Oh could I feel as I have felt,—or be what I have been,
Or weep as I could once have wept, o'er many a vanish'd scene:
As springs in deserts found seem sweet, all brackish
though they be,
So midst the wither'd waste of life, those tears
would flow to me. 1815

STANZAS FOR MUSIC.

There be none of Beauty's daughters
With a magic like thee;
And like music on the waters
Is thy sweet voice to me:
When, as if its sound were causing
The charmed ocean's pining,
The waves lie still and gleaming,
And the lull'd winds seem dreaming
And the midnight moon is weaving
Her bright chain o'er the deep;
Whose breast is gently heaving,
As an infant's asleep:
So the spirit bows before thee,
To listen and adore thee;
With a full but soft emotion,
Like the swell of Summer's ocean.
FAIR THEE WELL.

"Also I they had been friends in youth;
But whispering tongues can poison truth:
And cunning lies live in realms above;
And life is theory; and youth is vain;
And to be wrong with one we love,
Dole work like madness in the brain:

But never either found another
To free the inward heart from pain—

Like cliffs, which have been rent asunder;
A density now flows between.

But neither beat, nor fear, nor shame,
Shall whereby do away, I ween,

The marks of that which once hath been."

—Cowper's Christian. j

FAIR THEE WELL! and if for ever,
Still for ever, fare thee well:
Even though unforgiving, never
'Gainst thee shall my heart rebel.

Would that breast were bared before thee,
Where thy head so oft hath lain,
While that placid sleep came o'er thee
Which thou ne'er canst know again:

Would that breast, by thee glanced over,
Every inmost thought could show!
Then thou wouldst at last discover
'Twas not well to spurn it so.

Though the world for this commend thee—
Though it smile upon the blow,
Even its praises must offend thee,
Founded on another's wo—

Though my many faults defaced me,
Could no other arm be found,
Than the one which once embraced me,
To inflict a curseless wound?

Yet, oh yet, thyself deceive not;
Love may sink by slow decay,
But by sudden wrench, believe not
Hearts can thus be torn away:

Still thine own its life retainest—
"Still must mine, though bleeding, beat;
And the undying thought which paineth
Is—that we no more may meet.

These are words of deeper sorrow
Than the wall above the dead;
Both shall live, but every morrow
Wake us from a widow'd bed.

And when thou wouldst solace gather,
When our child's first accents flow,
Wilt thou teach her to say "Father!"
Though his care she must forego?

When her little hands shall press thee,
When her lip to thine is press,
Think of him whose prayer shall bless thee,
Think of him thy love had bless'd!"

Should her lineaments resemble
Those thou never more may'st see
Then thy heart will softly tremble
With a pulse yet true to me.

All my faults perchance thou knowest,
All my madness none can know;
All my hopes, where'er thou goest,
Wither, yet with thee they go.

Every feeling hath been shaken;
Pride, which not a world could bow,
Bows to thee—by thee forsaken,
Even my soul forsakes me now.

But 'tis done—all words are idle—

Words from me are vainer still;—
But the thoughts we cannot bridle
Force their way without the will.—

Fare thee well!—thus disunited,
Torn from every nearer tie.
Sear'd in heart, and lone, and blighted,
More than this I scarce can die.

A SKETCH.*

"Honest—most loyal I
If that thou be'at a devil, I cannot kill thee."

—Shakespeare

Born in the garret, in the kitchen bred,
Promoted thence to deck her mistress' head;
Next—for some gracious service unexpress,
And from its wages only to be guess'd—
Raised from the toilet to the table,—where
Her wondering better's wait behind her chair
With eye unmoved, and forehead unabash'd,
She dines from off the plate she lately wash'd.
Quick with the tale, and ready with the lie—
The genial confidante, and general spy—
Who could, ye gods! her next employment guess—
An only infant's earliest governess!
She taught the child to read, and taught so well,
That she herself, by teaching, learn'd to spell.
An adept next in penmanship she grows,
As many a nameless slander deftly shows:
What she had made the pupil of herart,
None know—but that high Soul secured the heart,
And pant'd for the truth it could not hear,
With longing breast and undeluded ear.

Foil'd was perversion by that youthful mind,
Which Flattery fool'd not—Baseness could not blind
Deceit infect not—near Contagion soil—
Indulgence weaken—nor Example spoil—
Nor master'd Science tempt her to look down
On humbler talents with a pitying frown—
Nor Genius swell—nor Beauty render vain—
Nor Envy ruffle to retaliate pain—
Nor Fortune change—Pride raise—nor Passion bow—
Nor Virtue teach austerity—till now
Serenely purest of her sex that live,
But wanting one sweet weakness—to forgive,
Too shock'd at faults her soul can never know,
She deems that all could be like her below:

Poesy to all vice, yet hardly Virtue's friend,
For Virtue pardons those she would amend.

But to the theme—now laid aside too long,
The baleful burden of this honest song—

—Mrs. Chatterton.
MISCELLANEOUS POEMS.

TO ———

When all around grew drear and dark,
And reason half withheld her ray—
And hope but shed a dying spark
Which more misled my lonely way;

In that deep midnight of the mind,
And that internal strife of heart,
When dreading to be deem’d too kind,
The weak despair—the cold depart;

When fortune changed—and love fled far.
And hatred’s shafts flew thick and fast.
Thou wert the solitary star
Which rose and set not to the last.

Oh! blest be thine unbroken light!
That watch’d me as a seraph’s eye,
And stood between me and the night,
For ever shining sweetly high.

And when the cloud upon us came,
Which strove to blacken o’er thy ray—
Then purer spread its gentle flame,
And dash’d the darkness all away.

Still may thy spirit dwell on mine,
And teach it what to brave or brook—
There’s more in one soft word of thine
Than in the world’s defied rebuke.

Thou stood’st, as stands a lovely tree,
That still unbroken, though gently bent,
Still waves with fond fidelity
Its boughs above a monument.

The winds might rend—the sky light pour
But there thou wert—and still couldst be Devoted in the stormiest hour
To shed thy weeping leaves o’er me.

But thou and thine shall know no blight,
Whatever fate on me may fall;
For heaven in sunshine will requite
The kind—and thee the most of all.

Then let the ties of baffled love
Be broken—thine will never break;
Thy heart can feel—but will not revive;
Thy soul, though soft, will never shake.

And these, when all was lost beside,
Were found and still are fix’d in thee—
And bearing still a breast so tried,
Earth is no desert—even to me.

ODE.

[FROM THE FRENCH.]

I.

We do not curse thee, Waterloo!
Though Freedom’s blood thy plain bedew
There ‘twas shed, but is not sure—
Rising from each gory trunk;

Though all her former functions are no more,
She rules the circle which she served before.
If mothers—none know why—before her quake;
If daughters dread her for the mothers’ sake;
If early habits—those false links, which bind
At times the loftiest to the meanest mind—
Have given her power too deeply to instil
The angry essence of her deadly will;
If like a snake she steal within your walls,
Till the black slime betray her as she crawls;
If like a viper to the heart she wind,
And leave the venom there she did not find;
What marvel that this bag of hatred works
Eternal evil latent as she lurks,
To make a Pandemonium where she dwells,
And reign the Hecate of domestic hells?
Skill’d by a touch to deepen scandal’s tints
With all the kind mendacity of hints,
While mingling truth with falsehood—snear’s with smiles—
A thread of candor with a web of wiles;
A plain blunt show of briefly-spoken seeming,
To hide her bloodless heart’s soul harden’d scheming;
A lip of lies—a face form’d to conceal;
And, without feeling, mock at all who feel:
With a vile mask the Gorgon would disown;
A cheek of parchment—and an eye of stone.
Mark, how the channels of her yellow blood
Ooze through her skin, and stagnate there to mud,
Cased like the centipede in saffron mail,
Or darker greenness of the scorpion’s scale—
(For drawn from reptiles only may we trace Congenial colors in that soul or face)—
Look on her features! and behold her mind
As in a mirror of itself defined:
Look on the picture! deem it not overcharged—
There is no trait which might not be enlarged:
Yet true to “Nature’s journeymen,” who made
This monster when their mistress left off trade—
This female dog-star of her little sky,
Where all beneath her influence droop or die.

Oh! wretch without a tear—without a thought,
Save joy above the ruin thou hast wrought—
The time shall come, nor long remote, when thou
Shalt feel far more than thou inflictest now;
Feel for thy vile self-loving self in vain,
And turn thee howling in unpitied pain.
May the strong curse of crush’d affections light
Back on thy bosom with reflected blight!
And make thee in thy leprosy of mind
As loathsome to thyself as to mankind!
Till all thy self-thoughts curdle into hate,
Black—as thy will for others would create:
Till thy hard heart be calcined into dust,
And thy scull welter in its hideous crust.
Oh, may thy grave be sleepless as the bed,—
The widow’d couch of fire, that thou hast spread!
Then, when thou fain wouldst weary Heaven with prayer—
Look on thine earthly victims—and despair!
Down to the dust!—and, as thou rost’st away,
Even worms shall perish on thy poisonous clay.
But for the love I bore, and still must bear,
To her thy malice from all ties would tear—
Thy name—thy human name—to every eye
The climax of all scorn should hang on high,
Exalted o’er thy less abhor’d companions—
And festering in the infancy of years.

* His sister, Mrs. Leigh.
Like the water-spout from ocean,
With a strong and growing motion—
It soars, and minglest in the air,
With that of lost LADROUER—
With that of him whose honor'd grave
Contains the " bravest of the brave."
A crimson cloud it spreads and glows,
But shall return to whence it rose;
When 'tis full 'twill burst asunder—
Never yet was heard such thunder
As then shall shake the world with wonder—
Never yet was seen such lightning
As o'er heaven shall then be bright'nin'!
Like the Wormwood Star foretold
By the sainted Seer of old,
Show'ring down a fiery flood,
Turning rivers into blood.*

II.

The Chief has fallen, but not by you,
Vanquishers of Waterloo!
When the soldier citizen
Sway'd not o'er his fellow men—
Save in deeds that led them on
Where glory smiled on Freedom's son—
Who, of all the despot's banded,
With that youthful chief competed?
Who could boast o'er France defeated,
Till lone Tyranny commanded?
Till, goaded by ambition's sting,
The Hero sunk into the King?
Then he fell—So perish all,
Who would men by man enthrall!

And thou, of the snow-white plume!
Whose realm refused thee e'en a tomb;†
Better hadst thou still been leading
France o'er hosts of hirelings bleeding,
Than sold thyself to death and shame
For a meanly royal name;
Such as he of Naples wears,
Who thy blood-bought title bears.
Little oldst thou deem, when dashing
On thy war-horse through the ranks,
Like a stream which burst its banks,
While helmets cleft, and sabres clashing,
Shone and shivered fast around thee—
Of the fate at last which found thee:
Was that haughty plume laid low
By a slave's dishonest blow?
Once—as the moon sways o'er the tide,
It roll'd in air, the warrior's guide;
Through the smoke-created night
Of the black and sulphur-fught,
The soldier raised his seeking eye
To catch that crest's ascendency,—

And, as it onward rolling rose,
So moved his heart upon our foes,
There, where death's brief pang was quickest:
And the battle's thickest
Slew'd beneath the advancing banner
Of the eagle's burning crest—
(Thrice with thunder-clouds to fan her,
Who could then her wing arrest—
Victory beaming from her breast?)
While the broken line enlarging
Fell, or fled along the plain;
There be sure was Murat charging!
There he ne'er shall charge again!

IV.

O'er glory's gone the invaders march,
Weeping Triumph o'er each level'd arch—
But let Freedom rejoice,
With her heart in her voice;
But, her hand on her sword,
Douby shall she be adored;
France has twice too well been taught
The " moral lesson " dearly bought—
Her safety sits not on a throne,
With CAPET or NAPOLEON!
But in equal rights and laws,
Hearts and hands in one great cause—
Freedom, such as God hath given
Unto all beneath his heaven,
With their breath, and from their birth,
Though Guilt would sweep it from the earth,
With a fierce and lavish hand
Scattering nations' wealth like sand;
Pouring nations' blood like water,
In imperial seas of slaughter!

V.

But the heart and the mind,
And the voice of mankind,
Shall arise in communion—
And who shall resist that proud union?
The time is past when swords subdued—
Man may die—the soul's renew'd:
Even in this low world of care
Freedom ne'er shall want an heri;
Millions breathe but to inherit
Her for ever bounding spirit—
When once more her hosts assemble,
Tyrants shall believe and tremble—
Smile they at this idle threat?
Crimson tears will follow yet

FROM THE FRENCH.

"ALL WISE, BUT PARTICULARLY SAVVY, AND A POLISH OFFICER WHO HAD BEEN EXALTED FROM THE RANKS BY BONAPARTE. HE CUMB TO HIS MASTER'S KNEES; WROTE A LETTER TO LORD KEITH, ENTREATING PERMISSION TO ACCOMPANY HIM, IN THE MOST MENTAL CAPACITY, WHICH COULD NOT BE ADMITTED."

MUST thou go, my glorious Chief,
Sever'd from thy faithful few?
Who can tell thy warrior's grief,
Madden'd o'er that long adieu?
Woman's love and friendship's zeal,
Dear as both has been to me—
What are they to all I feel,
With a soldier's faith for thee?

Idol of the soldier's soul!
First in fight, but mightiest now:
Many could a world control;
Thee alone no doom can bow.
By thy side for years I dared
Death; and envied those who fell,
When their dying shout was heard,
Blessing him they served so well.

Would that I were cold with those,
Since this hour I live to see;
When the doubts of coward foes,
Scarce dare trust a man with thee,
Dreading each should set thee free!
Oh! although in dungeons pent,
All their chains were light to me,
Gazing on thy soul unbent.

Would the sycophants of him,
Now so deaf to duty's prayer,
Were his borrow'd glories dim,
In his native darkness share?
Were that world this hour his own,
All thou calmly dest resign,
Could he purchase with that throne
Hearts like those which still are thine?

My chief, my king, my friend, adieu!
Never did I droop before;
Never to my sovereign sue,
As his foes I now implore:
All I ask is to divide
Every peril he must brave:
Sharing by the hero's side
His fall, his exile, and his grave.

ON THE STAR OF "THE LEGION OF HONOR."

[FROM THE FRENCH.]

Star of the brave!—whose beam hath shed
Such glory o'er the quick and dead—
I saw radiant and adored deceit;
Which millions rush'd in arms to greet,—
Wild meteor of immortal birth!
Why rise in Heaven to set on Earth?

Stars of slain heroes form'd thy rays;
Eternity flash'd through thy blaze;
The music of thy martial sphere
Was fame on high and honor here,
And thy light broke on human eyes,
Like a Volcano of the skies.

* Western one man was seen, whose left arm was shattered by a cannon ball, to wrench it off with the other, and throwing it up in the air, exclaim'd to his comrades 'Vive l'Etoile, Vere la France!' There were many other instances of the like; this you may, however, despise me as true.

Like lava roll'd thy stream of blood,
And swept down empires with its flood;
Earth rock'd beneath thee to her base,
As thou didst lighten through all space;
And the shorn Sun grew dim in air,
And set while thou wert dwelling there.

Before thee rose, and with thee grew,
A rainbow of the loveliest hue,
Of three bright colors, each divine,
And fit for that celestial sign;
For Freedom's hand had blended them,
Like tints in an immortal gem.

One tint was of the sunbeam's dyes;
One, the blue depth of Seraph's eyes;
One, the pure Spirit's veil of white
Had robed in radiance of its light:
The three so mingled did beseech
The texture of a heavenly dream.

Star of the brave! thy ray is pale,
And darkness must again prevail.
But, oh thou Rainbow of the free,
Our tears and blood must flow for thee.
When thy bright promise fades away
Our life is but a load of clay.

And Freedom hallows with her tread
The silent cities of the dead;
For beautiful in death are they
Who proudly fall in her array;
And soon, oh Goddess! may we be
For evermore with them or thee.

NAPOLEON'S FAREWELL

[FROM THE FRENCH.]

Farewell to the Land, where the gloom of my Glory
Arose and o'ershadow'd the earth with her name
She abandons me now—but the page of her story,
The brightest or blackest, is fill'd with my fame.
I have war'd with a word which vanquished me only
When the meteor of conquest allured me too far;
I have coped with the nations which dread me thus lonely,
The last single Captive to millions in war

Farewell to thee, France! when thy diadem crown'd me,
I made thee the gem and the wonder of earth,—
But thy weakness decrees I should leave as I found thee,
Decay'd in thy glory, and sunk in thy worth.
Oh! for the veteran hearts that were wasted
In strife with the storm, when their battles were won—
Then the Eagle, whose gaze in that moment was blasted,
Had still soar'd with eyes fix'd on victory's sun!
Farewell to thee, France!—but when Liberty rallies,
Once more in thy regions, remember me then—
The violet still grows in the depth of thy valleys;
Though with her, thy tears will unfold it again—
Yet, yet, I may well the hosts that surround us,
And yet may thy heart leap awake to my voice—
There are links which must break in the chain that has bound us,
Turn thee and call on the Chief of thy choice.

WRITTEN ON A BLANK LEAF OF "THE PLEASURES OF MEMORY."

ABSENT or present, still to thee,
My friend, what magic spells belong!
As all can tell, who share, like me,
In turn thy converse, and thy song,
But when the dreaded hour shall come
By Friendship ever deemed too nigh,
And "MEMORY" o'er her Druid's tomb
Shall weep that aught of thee can die,
How fondly will she then repay
Thy homage offer'd at her shrine,
And blend, while ages roll away,
Her name immortally with thine!
April 19th, 1812.

SONNET.

GOUVERNEUR—Voltaire—our Gibbon—and de Stael—
Leman! these names are worthy of thy shore,
Thy shore of names like thesewert thou no more,
Their memory thy remembrance would recall;
To them thy banks were lovely as to all,
But they have made them lovelier, for the lore
Of mighty minds doth hallow in the core
Of human hearts the ruin of a wall
Where dwelt the wise and woundrous; but by thee
How much more, Lake of Beauty! do we feel,
In sweetly gliding o'er thy crystal sea,
The wild glow of that not ungentle zeal,
Which of the heirs of immortality
Is proud, and makes the breath of glory real!

STANZAS TO ——.†

Though the day of my destiny's over,
And the star of my fate hath declined,
Thy soft heart refused to discover
The faults which so many could find;
Though thy soul with my grief was acquainted,
It shrunk not to share it with me,
And the love which my spirit hath painted,
It never hath found but in thee.

Then when nature around me is smiling,
The last smile which answers to mine,
I do not believe it beguiling,
Because it reminds me of thine;
And when winds are at war with the ocean,
As the breasts I believed in with me,
If their billows excite an emotion,
It is that they bear me from thee.

Though the rock of my last hope is shiver'd
And its fragments are sunk in the wave,
Though I feel that my soul is deliver'd
To pain—it shall not be its slave.
There is many a pang to pursue me:
They may crush, but they shall not contemn
They may torture, but shall not subdue me—
*Tis of thee that I think—not of them.

Though human, thou didst not deceive me,
Though woman, thou didst not forsake,
Though loved, thou forborest to grieve me,
Though slander'd, thou never couldst shake,
Though trusted, thou didst not disclaim me,
Though parted, it was not to fly,
Though watchful, it was not to defame me,
Nor mute, that the world might belie.

Yet I blame not the world, nor despise it,
Nor the war of the many with one—
If my soul was not fitted to price it,
'Twas folly not sooner to shun:
And if dearly that error hath cost me,
And more than I once could foresee,
I have found that, whatever it lost me,
It could not deprive me of thee.

From the wreck of the past, which hath perish'd
Thus much I at least may recall,
It hath taught me that what I most cherishest
Deserved to be dearest of all:
In the desert a fountain is springing,
In the wide waste there still is a tree,
And a bird in the solitude singing,
Which speaks to my spirit of thee.

DARKNESS.

I had a dream, which was not all a dream.
The bright sun was extinguish'd, and the stars
Did wander darkling in the eternal space,
Rayless, and pathless, and the icy earth
Swung blind and blackening in the moonless air;
Morn came, and went—and came, and brought me
And men forgot their passions in the dread
Of this their desolation; and all hearts
Were chill'd into a selfish prayer for light:
And they did live by watch-fires—and the thrones
The palaces of crowned kings—the huts,
The habitations of all things which dwell,
Were burnt for beacons; cities were consumed,
And men were gather'd round their blazing homes.
MISCELLANEOUS POEMS

To look once more into each other's face;
Happy were those who dwelt within the eye
Of the volcanos, and their mountain-torch:
A fearful hope was all the world contain'd;
Forests were set on fire—but hour by hour
They fell and faded—and the cracking trunks
Extinguish'd with a crash—and all was black.
The brows of men by the despairing light
Wore an unearthly aspect, as by fits
The flashes fell upon them; some lay down
And hid their eyes and wept; and some did rest
Their chins upon their clenched hands, and smiled,
And others hurried to and fro, and fed
Their funeral piles with fuel, and look*d up
With mad disquietude on the dull sky,
The pall of a past world; and then again
With curses cast them down upon the dust,
And gnash'd their teeth and howled: the wild birds
 shriek'd,
And, terrified, did flutter on the ground,
And flap their useless wings; the wildest brutes
Came tame and tremulous; and vipers crawl'd
And twined themselves among the multitude,
Hissing, but stingless—they were slain for food:
And War which for a moment was no more,
Did glut himself again in savagery
With blood, and each sate sullenly apart
Gorging himself in gloom: no love was left;
All earth was but one thought—and that was death,
Immediate and inglorious; and the paug
Of famine fed upon all entrails—men
Died, and their bones were tombless as their flesh;
The meagre by the meagre were devour'd,
Even dogs assail'd their masters, all save one,
And he was faithful to a core, and kept
The birds and beasts and famish'd men at bay,
Till hunger clung them, or the drooping dead
Lared their lank jaws; himself sought out no food.
But with a piteous and perpetual moan,
And a quick desolate cry, licking the hand
Which answer'd not with a caress—he died.
The crowd was famish'd by degrees; but two
Of an enormous city did survive,
And they were enemies; they met beside
The dying embers of an altar-place
Where had been heap'd a mass of holy things
For an unholy usage; they raked up,
And shivering scraped with their cold skeleton hands
The feeble ashes, and their feeble breath
Blow for a little life, and made a flame
Which was a mockery; then they lifted up
Their eyes as it grew lighter, and beheld
Each other's aspects—saw, and shriek'd, and died—
Even of their mutual hideousness they died,
Unknowning who he was upon whose brow
Famine had written Fiend. The world was void,
The populous and the powerful was a lump,
Seasonless, herless, treeless, manless, lifeless—
A lump of death—a chaos of hard clay.
The rivers, lakes, and ocean all stood still,
And nothing stir'd within their silent depths;
Ships sailors lay lodging on the earth
And their masts fell down piecemeal; as they dropp'd
They slept on the abyss without a surge—
The waves were dead; the tides were in their grave,
The moon, their mistress, had expired before;
The winds were wither'd in the stagnant air,
And the clouds perish'd; Darkness had no need
Of aid from them—She was the universe.

CHURCHILL'S GRAVE.

A FACT LITERALLY RENDERED.

I stood beside the grave of him who blazed
The comet of a season, and I saw
The humblest of all sepulchres, and gazed
With not the less of sorrow and of awe
On that neglected turf and quiet stone,
With name no clearer than the names unknown,
Which lay unread around it; and I ask'd,
The Gardener of that ground, why it might be
That for this plant strangers his memory task'd
Through the thick deaths of half a century;
And thus he answer'd:—'Well, I do not know
Why frequent travellers turn to pilgrims so;
He died before my day of Sextonship,
And I had not the digging of this grave
And is this all? I thought,—and do we r.i.p
The veil of Immortality? and crave
I know not what of honor and of light
Through unborn ages, to endure this blight?
So soon and so successless? As I said,
The Architect of all on which we tread,
For Earth is but a tombstone, did essay
To extricate remembrance from the cly,
Whose minglings might confuse a Newton's thought
Were it not that all life must end in one,
Of which we are but dreamers;—as he taught
As 'twere the twilight of a former Sun,
Thus spoke he,—’I believe the man of whom
You wot, who lies in this selected tomb,
Was a most famous writer in his day,
And therefore travellers step from our their way
To pay him honor,—and myself what'ee
Your honor pleases,—’then most pleased I shock
From out my pocket's avaricious nook
Some certain coins of silver, which as 'twere
Perforce I gave this man, though I could spare
So much but inconveniently,—Ye smile,
I see ye, ye profane ones! all the while,
Because my homely phrase the truth would tell
You are the fools, not I—for I did dwell
With a deep thought, and with a soften'd eye,
On that Old Sexton's natural homily,
In which there was Obscurity and Fame
The Glory and the Nothing of a Name.

PROMETHEUS.

I.
TIPTON! to whose immortal eyes
The sufferings of mortality,
Seen in their sad reality,
Were not as things that gods despise,
What was thy pity's recompense?
A silent suffering, and intense;
The rock, the vulture, and the chain
All that the proud can feel of pain,
The agony they do not show,
The suffocating sense of wo,
Which speaks but in its loneliness,
And then in jealousy lest the sky
Should have a listener, nor will sigh
Until its voice is echoless.
Let bigotry rear a gloomy fane,
Let superstition hail the pile,
Let priests, to spread their sable reign,
With tales of mystic rites beguile.

Shall man confine his Maker's sway
To Gothic domes of mouldering stone?
Thy temple is the face of day;
Earth, ocean, heaven, thy boundless throne

Shall man condemn his race to hell
Unless they bend in pompous form;
Tell us that all, for one who fell,
Must perish in the mingling storm?

Shall each pretend to reach the skies,
Yet doom his brother to expire,
Whose soul a different hope supplies,
Or doctrines less severe inspire?

Shall these, by creeds they can't expound,
Propare a fancied bliss or woe?
Shall reptiles, groveling on the ground,
Their great Creator's purpose know?

Shall those, who live for self alone,
Whose years float on in daily crime—
Shall they by Faith for guilt atone,
And live beyond the bounds of Time?

Father! no prophet's laws I seek,—
Thy laws in Nature's works appear;
I own myself corrupt and weak,
Yet will I pray, for thou wilt hear!

Thou, who canst guide the wandering star
Through trackless realms of ether's space
Who calms't the elemental war,
Whose hand from pole to pole I trace:—

Thou, who in wisdom placed me here,
Who, when thou wilt, can take me hence,
Ah! whilst I tread this earthly sphere,
Extend to me thy wide defence.

To Thee, my God, to Thee I call!
Whatever weal or wo betide,
By thy command I rise or fall,
In thy protection I confide.

If, when this dust to dust restored,
My soul shall float on airy wing,
How shall thy glorious name adored
Inspire her feeble voice to sing?

But, if this fleeting spirit share
With clay the grave's eternal bed,
While life yet throbs I raise my prayer,
Though doom'd no more to quit the dead.

To Thee I breathe my humble strain,
Grateful for all thy mercies past,
And hope, my God, to thee again
This erring life may fly at last.

ROMANCE MUY DOLOROSO

DEL

SITIO Y TOMA DE ALHAMA.

El cual dexo en Aragon seis.

PASEAVASE el Rey Moro
Por la ciudad deGranada,
Desde las puertas de Elvira
Hasta las de Bivarambla.
Ay de mi, Alhama!

Cartas le fueron venidas
Que Alhama era ganada.
Las cartas echó en el fuego,
a mí mensajero matav.
Ay de mi, Alhama!

Descavalga de una mula,
Y en un cavalo cavala.
Por el Zacatin arriba
Subido se avia al Alhambra.
Ay de mi, Alhama!

Como en el Alhambra estuvo,
Al mismo punto mandava
Que se tuquen las trompetas
Con añales de plata.
Ay de mi, Alhama!

Y que atambores de guerra
Apriosa toquen alarma;
Por que lo oygan sus Moros,
Los de la Vega y Granada.
Ay de mi, Alhama!

Los Moros que el son oyeron,
Que al sangriente Marte llama,
Uno a uno, y dos a dos,
Un gran esquadron formavan.
Ay de mi, Alhama!

Allí habló un Moro viejo;
Destá manera hablava:—
Para que nos llamas, Rey?
Para que es este llamada?
Ay de mi, Alhama!

Ayés de saber, amigos,
Una nueva desdichada;
Que Christianos, con bravura,
Ya nos han tomado Alhama.
Ay de mi, Alhama!

Allí habló un viejo Alfaqui,
De barba crecida y cana:—
Bien se te empleas, buen Rey
Buen Rey; bien se te empleav.
Ay de mi, Alhama!

Mataste los Bencerrages,
Que era la flor de Granada;
Cogiste los tornadizos
De Cordova la nombrada.
Ay de mi, Alhama!

A VERY MOURNFUL BALLAD

ON THE SIEGE AND CONQUEST OF ALHAMA,

Which, in the Arabic language, is so the following purports.

The effect of the original ballad (which existed both in Spanish and Arabic) was such that it was forbidden to be sung by the Moors, on pain of death, within Granada.

The Moorish King rides up and down
Through Granada’s royal town;
From Elvira’s gates to those
Of Bivarambla on he goes.
Wo is me, Alhama!

Letters to the monarch tell
How Alhama’s city fell;
In the fire the scroll he threw,
And the messenger he slew.
Wo is me, Alhama!

He quits his mule, and mounts his horse,
And through the street directs his course
Through the street of Zacatin
To the Alhambra spurring in.
Wo is me, Alhama!

When the Alhambra walls he gain’d,
On the moment he ordain’d
That the trumpet straight should sound
With the silver clarion round.
Wo is me, Alhama!

And when the hollow drums of war
Beat the loud alarm afar,
That the Moors of town and plain
Might answer to the martial strain,
Wo is me, Alhama!

Then the Moors by this aware
That bloody Mars recall’d them there,
One by one, and two by two,
To a mighty squadron grew.
Wo is me, Alhama!

Out then spake an aged Moor
In these words the king before,
“Wherefore call on us, oh King?
What may mean this gathering?”
Wo is me, Alhama!

“Friends! ye have, alas! to know
Of a most disastrous blow,
That the Christians, stern and bold,
Have obtain’d Alhama’s hold.”
Wo, is me, Alhama!

Out then spake old Alfaqui,
With his beard so white to see,
“Good King! thou art justly served,
Good King! this thou hast deserved
Wo is me, Alhama!

“By thee were slain, in evil hour,
The Abencerrage, Granada’s flower;
And strangers were received by thee
Of Cordova the Chivalry.
Wo is me, Alhama!
Por esso mereces, Rey,
Una pene bien doblada;
Que te pierdas tu y el reyno,
Y que se pierda Granada.
Ay de mi, Alhama!

Si no se respetan leyes,
Es ley que todo se pierda;
Y que se pierda Granada,
Y que te pierdas en ella.
Ay de mi, Alhama!

Fuego por los ojos vierte,
El Rey que esto oyera.
Y como el otro de leyes
De leyes tambien hablava.
Ay de mi, Alhama!

Sabe un Rey que no ay leyes
De darle a Reyes disgusto.—
Esse dize el Rey Moro
Rechinando de colera.
Ay de mi, Alhama!

Moro Alfaqui, Moro Alfaqui,
El de la velida barba,
El Rey te manda prender,
Yor la perdida de Alhama.
Ay de mi, Alhama!

Y cortarte la cabeça,
Y ponerla en el Alhambra,
Por que a ti castigo sea,
Y otros tiemblen en miralla.
Ay de mi, Alhama!

Cavalleros, hombres buenos,
Descid de mi parte al Rey,
Al Rey Moro de Granada,
Como no se deva nada.
Ay de mi, Alhama!

De averse Alhama perdido
A mi me pesa en el alma.
Que si el Rey perdio su tierra,
Otro mucho mas perdiera.
Ay de mi, Alhama!

Perdieran hijos padres,
Y casados las casadas:
Las cosas que mas amara
Perdie l' un y el otro fama.
Ay de mi, Alhama!

Perdi una hija donzella,
Que era la flor d' esta tierra,
Cien doblas dava por ella,
No me las estimo en nada.
Ay de mi, Alhama!

Diziendo asai al hacen Alfaqui,
Le coto ron la cabeza,
Y la elevan al Alhambra,
Asai como el Rey lo manda
Ay de mi, Alhama!

"And for this, oh King, is sent
On thee a double chastisement:
Thee and thine, thy crown and realm,
One last wreck shall overwhelm.
Wo is me, Alhama!"

"He who holds no laws in awe,
He must perish by the law;
And Granada must be won,
And thyself with her undone."
Wo is me, Alhama!

Fire flash'd from out the old Moor's eyes,
The Monarch's wrath began to rise,
Because he answer'd, and because
He spake exceeding well of laws.
Wo is me, Alhama!

"There is no law to say such things
As may disgust the ear of kings:"—
Thus, snorting with his choler, said
The Moorish King, and doom'd him dead.
Wo is me, Alhama!

Moor Alfaqui! Moor Alfaqui!
Though thy beard so hoary be,
The King hath sent to have thee seized,
For Alhama's loss displeased.
Wo is me, Alhama!

And to fix thy head upon
High Alhambra's loftiest stone;
That this for thee should be the law,
And others tremble when they saw.
Wo is me, Alhama!

"Cavalier, and man of worth!
Let these words of mine go forth;
Let the Moorish Monarch know,
That to him I nothing owe;"
Wo is me, Alhama!

"But on my soul Alhama weighs,
And on my inmost spirit preys;
And if the King his land hath lost,
Yet others may have lost the most.
Wo is me, Alhama!

"Sires have lost their children, wives
Their lords, and valiant men their lives;
One what best his love might claim
Hath lost, another wealth, or fame.
Wo is me, Alhama!

"I lost a damsel in that hour,
Of all the land the loveliest flower,
Doubloons a hundred I would pay,
And think her ransom cheap that day."
Wo is me, Alhama!

And as these things the old Moor said,
They sever'd from the trunk his head;
And to the Alhambra's wall with speed
'Twas carried, as the King decreed.
Wo is me, Alhama!

And for this, oh King, is sent
On thee a double chastisement:
Thee and thine, thy crown and realm,
One last wreck shall overwhelm.
Wo is me, Alhama!"
Hombres, niños y mugeres,
Lloran tan grande perdida;
Lloravan todas las damas
Quantas en Granada avia.
Ay de mi, Alhama!

Por las calles y ventanas
Mucho llorava parecia;
Llora el Rey como febra,
Qu’es mucho lo que perdia.
Ay de mi, Alhama!

SONETTO DI VITTORELLI.
PER MONACA.
Sonetto composto in il nome di un gentiluomo, che era morto poco insieme sua
figlia sproverbatissima: e dicono si gentiluomo ditta suor sposa.

Di due vaghe donzelle, oneste, accorte
Lieti miseri padri il ciel ne feo,
Il ciel, che degne di più nobil sorte
L’unà e l’altra veggendosi, ambo chiedeva.
La mia fu tolta da veloce morte
A le fumanti tede d’immeno;
La tua, Francesco, in soggiugate porte
Eterna prigioniera or si rende.
Ma tu almeno potrai di gelosa
Irremeabil soglia, ove s’asconde,
La sua tenera udir voce pietsosa.
Io verso un fume d’amarissimo onda,
Corro a quel marmo, in cui la figlia o possa,
Batto, e ribatto, ma nessun risponde.

TO MY DEAR MARY ANNE.
THE FOLLOWING LINES ARE THE EARLIEST WRITTEN BY LORD BYRON. THEY WERE ADDRESSED TO MISS CHAWORTH, AFTERWARDS MRS. MUSTERS, IN 1804, ABOUT A YEAR BEFORE HER MARRIAGE.

ADIEU to sweet Mary for ever!
From her I must quickly depart;
Though the fates us from each other sever,
Still her image will dwell in my heart.

The flame that within my heart burns
It unlike what in lovers’ hearts glows;
The love which for Mary I feel
Is far purer than Cupid bestows.

I wish not your peace to disturb,
I wish not your joys to molest
Mistake not my passion for love,
’Tis your friendship alone I request.

Not ten thousand lovers could feel
The friendship my bosom contains;
It will ever within my heart dwell,
While the warm blood flows through my veins.

May the Ruler of Heaven look down,
And my Mary from evil defend!
May she never know adversity’s frown,
May her happiness never have an end.

Once more, my sweet Mary, adieu!
Farewell! I with anguish repeat,
For ever I’ll think upon you
While this heart in my bosom shall beat.

To MISS CHAWORTH.

Oh Memory, torture me no more,
The present’s all o’ercast;
My hopes of future bliss are o’er,
In mercy veil the past.

What bring those images to view
I henceforth must resign?
Ah! why those happy hours renew,
That never can be mine?

Past pleasure doubles present pain,
To sorrow adds regret,
Regret and hope are both in vain.
I ask but to—forget.

1804
L'AMITIE EST L'AMOUR SANS AILES

Why should my anxious breast repine,
Because my youth is fled?
Days of delight may still be mine;
Affection is not dead.
In tracing back the years of youth,
One firm record, one lasting truth
Celestial consolation brings
Bear it, ye breezes, to the seat
Where first my heart responsive 'tis,
"Friendship is Love without his wings!"

Through few, but deeply checker'd years,
What moments have been mine!
Now, half obscured by clouds of tears,
Now, bright in rays divine;
How'er my future doom be cast,
My soul, unraptured with the past,
To one idea fondly clings:
Friendship! that thought is all thine own,
Worth worlds of bliss, that thou art alone,
"Friendship is Love without his wings!"

Where yonder yew-trees lightly wave
Their branches on the gale,
Unheeded heaves a simple grave,
Which tells the common tale;
Round this unconscious schoolboy's stray,
Till the dull knell of childish play
From yonder studious mansion rings,
But where'er my footsteps move.
My silent tears too plainly prove,
"Friendship is Love without his wings."

Oh Love! before thy glowing shrine
My early vows were paid;
My hopes, my dreams, my heart was thine,
But these are now dec'yd;
For thine are pinions like the wind,
No trace of thee remains behind,
Except, alas! thy jealous stings.
Away, away! delusive power,
Thou shalt not haunt my coming hour;
"Unless, indeed, without thy wings!"

Seat of my youth! thy distant sp'ire
Recalls each scene of joy;
My bosom glows with former fire,—
In mind again a boy.
Thy grove of elms, thy verdant hill,
Thy every path delights me still,
Each dower a double fragrance spills;
Again, as once, in converse gay,
Each dear associate seems to say
"Friendship is Love without his wings."

My Lycus! wherefore dost thou weep?
Thy falling tears restrain;
Affection for a time may sleep,
But oh, 'twill wake again.
Think, think, my friend, when next we meet,
Our long-wish'd interview, how sweet!
From thig my hope of rapture springs;
While youthful hearts thus fondly swell,
Absence, my friend, can only tell,
"Friendship is Love without his wings!"

---

HILLS of Annelesy, bleak and barren,
Where my thoughtless childhood strayed,
How the northern tempests, warning,
Howl above thy tufted shade!

Now no more, the hours beguiling,
Former favorite haunts I see;
Now no more my Mary smiling
Makes ye seem a heaven to me. 1805.

ON REVISITING HARRAW.

[Some years ago, when at Harrow, a friend of the author engraved on a particular spot of the name of both, with a few additional words, as a memorial. Afterwards, on receiving some real or imagined injury, the author destroyed the full record before he left Harrow. On revisiting the place in 1827, he wrote under it the following stanzas.]

Here once engaged the stranger's view
Young Friendship's record simply trace'd;
Few were her words,—but yet though few,
Resentment's hand the line defaced.

Deeply she cut,—but, not erased,
The characters were still so plain,
That Friendship once return'd, and gazed:—
Till Memory hail'd the words again.

Repentance placed them as before;
Forgiveness join'd her gentle name;
So fair the inscription seem'd once more,
That Friendship thought it still the same.

Thus might the Record now have been;
But, ah, in spite of Hope's endeavor,
Or Friendship's tears, Pride rush'd between,
And blotted out the line for ever!
MISCELLANEOUS POEMS

In one, and one alone deceived,
Did I my error mourn?
No—from oppressive bonds relieved,
I left the wretch to scorn.
I turn'd to those my childhood knew,
With feelings warm, with bosoms true,
Twined with my heart's according strings;
And till those vital chords shall break,
"or none but these my breast shall wake,
Friendship, the power deprived of wings!"

Ye few! my soul, my life is yours,
My memory and my hope;
Your worth a lasting love ensures,
Unfetter'd in its scope;
From smooth deceit and terror sprung,
With aspect fair and honey'd tongue,
Let Adulation wait on kings.
With joy clate, by snares beset,
We, we, my friends, can ne'er forget
"Friendship is Love without his wings!"

Fictions and dreams inspire the bard
Who rolls the epic song;
Friendship and Truth be my reward,
To me no bays belong;
If laurell'd fame but dwells with lies,
Me the enchantress ever flies,
Whose heart and not whose fancy sings;
Simple and young, I dare not feign,
Mine be the ruse yet heartfelt strain
"Friendship is love without his wings!"

TO MY SON:*

Those flaxen locks, those eyes of blue,
Bright as thy mother's in their hue;
Those rosy lips, whose dimples play
And smile to steal the heart away;
Recall a scene of former joy,
And touch thy father's heart, my Boy!

And thou canst list a father's name—
Ah, William, were thine own the same,—
No self-reproach—but, let me cease—
My care for thee shall purchase peace;
Thy mother's shade shall smile in joy,
And pardon all the past, my Boy!

* "The only circumstance I know, that bears even remotely on the subject of this poem, is the following. About a year or two before the date annexed to it, he wrote to his mother, from Harrow, (as I have been told by a person, to whom Mrs. Byron herself communicated the circumstances,) to say, that he had lately a good deal of uneasiness on account of a young woman, whom he knew to have been a favorite of his late friend, Cænon, and who, finding herself after his death in a state of progress towards matrimony, had declared Lord Byron was the father of her child. This, he positively asserted his mother was not the case; but believing, as he did firmly, that the child belonged to Cænon, it was his wish that it should be brought up with all possible care, and he therefore entreated that his mother would have the kindness to take charge of it. Though such a request might well (as I infer from the circumstances) have decomposed a temper more mild than Mrs. Byron's, she notwithstanding answered her son in the kindliest terms, saying that she would willingly receive the child as soon as it was born, and bring it up in whatever manner he desired. Happily, however, the infant died almost immediately, and was thus spared the being a tax on the good nature of any soul.—Shaw."

---

Her lowly grave the turf has press'd,
And thou hast known a stranger's breast.
Discretion sneers upon thy birth,
And yields thee scarce a name on earth;
Yet shall not these one hope destroy—
A father's heart is thine, my Boy!

Why, let the world unfeelingrown,
Must I 'nd Nature's claim disown?
Ah, no—though moralists reprove,
I hail thee, dearest child of love,
Fair childe, judge of youth and joy—
A father guards thy birth, my Boy!

Oh, 'twill be sweet in thee to trace
Ere age has wrinkled o'er my face,
Ere half my glass of life is run,
At once a brother and a son:
And all my wanes of years employ
In justice done to thee, my Boy!

Although so young thy heart is nigh,
Youth will not damp parental fire;
And, wert thou still less dear to me,
While Helen's form revives in thee,
The breast, which beat to former joy,
Will ne'er desert its pledge, my Boy!

EPITAPH ON JOHN ADAMS, OF SOUTHWELL, A CARRIER, WHO DIED OF BRUNKINNES.

John Adams lies here, of the parish of Southwell
A Carrier who carried his can to his mouth well;
He carried so much, and he carried so fast,
He could carry no more—so was carried at last;
For, the liquor he drank, being too much for one,
He could not carry off—so he's now carry-on.

FRAGMENT.

The following lines form the conclusion of a poem written by Lord Byron or his melancholy impression that he should soon die.)

Forget this world, my restless spirits
Turn, turn thy thoughts to heaven
There must thou soon direct thy flight.
If errors are forgiven,
To bigots and to sects unknown,
Bow down beneath th' Almighty Throne,
To him address thy trembling prayer.
He, who is merciful and just,
Will not reject a child of dust,
Although his meanest care.

Father of light! to thee I call,
My soul is dark within;
Thou, who canst mark the arrow fall
Avert the death of sin.
Thou, who canst guide the wandering star,
Who calm'st the elemental way.
Whose mantle is yon boundless sky,
My thoughts, my words, my crimes forgive;
And, since I soon must cease to live,
Instruct me how to die.
1807.

TO MRS. * * *

WHEN ASKED MY REASON FOR QUITTING ENGLAND IN THE SPRING.

When man, expell'd from Eden's bowers,
A moment linger'd near the gate,
Each scene recall'd the vanish'd hours,
And bade him curse his future fate.

But, wandering on through distant climes,
He learnt to bear his load of grief;
Just gave a sigh to other times,
And found in busier scenes relief.

Thus, Mary, will it be with me,
And I must view thy charms no more;
For, while I linger near to thee,
I sigh for all I knew before.

In flight I shall be surely wise,
Escaping from temptation's snare;
I cannot view my paradise
Without the wish of dwelling there.†

Dec. 2, 1808.

A LOVE-SONG.

TO * * * * *.

REMIND me not, remind me not,
Of those beloved, those vanish'd hours
When all my soul was given to thee;
Hours that may never be forgot,
Till time unnerves our vital powers,
And thou and I shall cease to be.

Can I forget—canst thou forget,
When playing with thy golden hair,
How quick thy fluttering heart did move?
Oh, by my soul, I see thee yet,
With eyes so languid, breast so fair,
And lips, though silent, breathing love.

When thus reclining on my breast,
Those eyes threw back a glance so sweet,
As half reproach'd yet raised desire,
And still we near and nearer press,
And still our glowing lips would meet,
As if in kisses to expire.

And then those pensive eyes would close,
And bid their lids each other seek,
Veiling the azure orbs below;
While their long lashes' darkening gloss
Seem'd stealing o'er thy brilliant cheek,
Like raven's plumage smooth'd on snow.

I dreamt last night our love return'd,
And sooth to say, that very dream
Was sweeter in its phantasy
Than if for other hearts I burn'd,
For eyes that ne'er like thine could beam
In rapture's wild reality.

Then tell me not, remind me not,
Of hours which, though for ever gone,
Can still a pleasing dream restore,
Till thou and I shall be forgot,
And senseless as the mouldering stone
Which tells that we shall be no more.

STANZAS

TO * * * * *.

THERE was a time, I need not name,
Since it will ne'er forgotten be,
When all our feelings were the same
As still my soul hath been to thee.

And from that hour when first thy tongue
Confess'd a love which equal'd mine,
Though many a grief my heart hath wrung,
Unknown and thus unfelt by thine,

None, none hath sunk so deep as this—
To think how all that love hath flown;
Transient as every faithless kiss,
But transient in thy breast alone.

And yet my heart some solace knew,
When late I heard thy lips declare,
In accents once imagined true,
Remembrance of the days that were.

Yes! my adored, yet most unkind!
Though thou wilt never love again,
To me 'tis doubly sweet to find
Remembrance of that love remain.

Yes! 'tis a glorious thought to me,
Nor longer shall my soul repine,
What'er thou art or e'er shalt be,
Thou hast been dearly, solely mine!

TO THE SAME.

And wilt thou weep when I am low?
Sweet lady! speak those words again:
Yet if they grieve thee, say not so—
I would not give that bosom pain.

My heart is sad, my hopes are gone,
My blood runs coldly through my breast,
And when I perish, thou alone
Wilt sigh above my place of rest.

And yet, methinks, a gleam of peace
Doth through my cloud of anguish shine
And for awhile my sorrows cease,
To know thy heart hath felt for mine.

* This and the five following poems were first published in Hobhouse's Miscellany.
† In the original this line stands, "Without a wish to enter them." The reading given above is from a MS. correction by Lord Byron.
Oh lady! bless'd be that tear—
It falls for one that cannot weep:
Such precious drops are doubly dear
To those whose eyes no tear may steep.

Sweet lady! once my heart was warm
With every feeling soft as thine;
But beauty's self hath ceased to charm
A wretch created to repine.

Yet wilt thou weep when I am low?
Sweet lady! speak those words again;
Yet if they grieve thee, say not so—
I would not give that bosom pain.

SONG.

Fill the goblet again, for I never before
Felt the glow which now gladdens my heart to its core;
Let us drink!—who would not?—since, through life's varied round,
In the goblet alone no deception is fond.

I have tried in its turn all that life can supply;
I have bask'd in the beams of a dark rolling eye;
I have loved!—who has not?—but what heart can declare
That pleasure existed while passion was there?

In the days of my youth, when the heart's in its spring,
And dreams that affection can never take wing,
I had friends!—who has not?—but what tongue will avow,
That friends, rosy wine! are so faithful as thou?

The heart of a mistress some boy may estrange,
Friendship shifts with the sunbeam—thou never canst change:
Thou grow'st old—who does not?—but on earth what appears,
Whose virtues, like thine, still increase with its years?

Yet if blest to the utmost that love can bestow,
Should a rival bow down to our idol below,
We are jealous!—who's not?—thou hast no such alloy
For the more that enjoy thee, the more we enjoy.

Then the season of youth and its vanities past,
For refuge we fly to the goblet at last:
Then we find—do we not?—in the flow of the soul,
That truth, as of yore, is confined to the bowl.

When the box of Pandora was open'd on earth,
And Misery's triumph commenc'd over Mis'th,
Hope was left, was she not?—but the goblet we kiss,
And care not for hope, who are certain of bliss.

Long life to the grape! for when summer is flown,
The age of our nectar shall gladden our own;
We must die—who shall not?—May our sins be forgiven,
And Hebe shall never be idle in heaven.

STANZAS.

TO * * *, ON LEAVING ENGLAND

'Tis done—and shivering in the gale
The bark unmus'ls her snowy sail;
And, whistling o'er the bending mast
Loud sings on high the fresh'ning blast;
And I must from this land be gone,
Because I cannot love but one.

But could I be what I have been,
And could I see what I have seen—
Could I repose upon the breast
Which once my warmest wishes blest,
I should not seek another zone
Because I cannot love but one.

'Tis long since I beheld that eye
Which gave me bliss or misery;
And I have striven, but in vain,
Never to think of it again;
For though I fly from Albion,
I still can only love but one.

As some lone bird, without a mate,
My weary heart is desolate;
I look around, and cannot trace
One friendly smile or welcome face,
And even in crowds am still alone,
Because I cannot love but one.

And I will cross the whitening foam
And I will seek a foreign home;
Till I forget a false face,
I ne'er shall find a resting zone;
My own dark thoughts I cannot shun
But ever love, and love but one.

The poorest wretch on earth
Still finds some hospitable heart,
Where friendship's or love's softer glow
May smile in joy or sooth in wo;
But friend or leman I have none,
Because I cannot love but one.

I go—but whereasoe'er I flee,
There's not an eye will weep for me;
There's not a kind congenial heart,
Where I can claim the meanest part;
Nor thou, who hast my hopes undone,
Wilt sigh, although I love but one.

To think of every early scene,
Of what we are, and what we've been,
Would whelm some softer hearts with wo—
But mine, alas! has stood the blow;
Yet still beats on as it begun,
And never truly loves but one.

And who that dear loved one may be
Is not for vulgar eyes to see,
And why that early love was cross,
Thon know'st the best, I feel the most,
But few that dwell beneath the sun
Have loved so long, and loved but one.
I've tried another's fetters too,
With charms perchance as fair to view;
And I would fain have loved as well,
But some unconquerable spell
Forbade my bleeding breast to own
A kindred care for aught but one.

'Twould soothe to take one lingering view,
And bless thee in my last adieu;
Yet wish I not those eyes to weep
For him that wanders o'er the deep;
His home, his hope, his youth are gone,
Yet still he loves, and loves but one.*

LINES TO MR. HODGSON.

HUZZA! Hodgson, we are going,
Our embargo's off at last;
Favorable breezes blowing
Bend the canvas o'er the mast.
From aloft the signal's streaming,
Hark! the farewell gun is fired;
Women screeching, tars blasphemying,
Tell us that our time's expired.
Here's a rascal
Come to task all,
Prying from the custom-house;
Trunks unpacking,
Casus cracking,
Not a corner for a mouse

'Scapes unsearch'd amid the racket,
Ere we sail on board the Packet.

Now our boatmen quit their mooring,
And all hands must ply the oar;
Baggage from the quay is lowering,
We're impatient—push from shore.

"Have a care! that case holds liquor—
Stop the boat—I'm sick—oh Lord!"
"Sick, ma'am, damme, you'll be sicker
Ere you've been an hour on board."

Thus are screaming
Men and women,
Gemmen, ladies, servants, Jacks;
Here entangling,
All are wrangling,
Stuck together close as wax—
Such the general noise and racket,
Ere we reach the Lisbon Packet.

Now we've reach'd her, lo! the captain,
Gallant Kid, commands the crew;
Passengers their births are clapt in,
Some to grumble, some to spew.
"Hey day! call you that a cabin?
Why, 'tis hardly three feet square;
Not enough to stow Queen Mab in—
Who the deuce can harbor there?"

"Who, sir? plenty—
Nobles twenty

* This corrected by himself in a copy of the Miscellany—the two last lines, originally, as follows:—

"Though where'er our bark may run,
Love but loo, I love but one."
ON MOORE'S LAST OPERATIC FARCE.

A FARCEFUL EPISTLE

Good plays are scarce,
So Moore writes farce:
The poet's fame grows brittle—
We knew before
That Little's Moore,
But now 'tis Moore that's Little.

EPISTLE TO MR. HODGSON.

2 ANSWER TO SOME LINES EXHIBITING HIM TO BE CHEERFUL, AND TO "BANISH CARE."

"Oh! banish care!"—such ever be
The motto of thy revelry!
Perchance of mine, when wassail nights
Renew those riotous delights,
Wherewith the children of Despair
Lull the lone heart, and "banish care."
But not in morn's reflecting hour,
When present, past, and future lower,
When all I loved is changed or gone,
Mock with such taunts the woes of one,
Whose every thought—but let them pass—
Thou know'st I am not what I was.
But, above all, if thou wert bold
Place in a heart that never was cold,
By all the powers that men revere,
By all unto thy bosom dear,
Thy joys below, thy hopes above,
Speak—Speak of any thing but love.

'Twere long to tell, and vain to hear,
The tale of one who scorns a tear;
And there is little in that tale
Which better bosoms would bewail.
But mine has suffer'd more than well:
'Twould suit philosophy to tell.
I've seen my bride another's bride,—
Have seen her seated by his side,—
Have seen the infant, which she bore,
Wear the sweet smile the mother wore,
When she and I in youth have smiled
As fond and faultless as her child;—
Have seen her eyes, in cold disdain,
Ask if I felt no secret pain,
And I have acted well my part,
And made my cheek belch my heart,
Return'd the freezing glance she gave,
Yet felt the while that woman's slave;—
Have kiss'd, as if without design,
The babe which ought to have been mine,
And show'd, alas! in each caress,
Time had not made me love the less.

But let this pass—I'll whine no more,
Nor seek again an eastern shore;
The world belittles a busy brain,—
I'll hide me to its haunts again.
But if, in some succeeding year,
When Brittin's "May is in the sere,"
Thou hearst at once, whose deepening crimes
Suit with the sablest of the times

Of one, whom love nor pity sways,
Nor hope of fame, nor good men's praise,
One, who in stern ambition's pride,
Perchance not blood shall turn aside,
One rank'd in some recording page
With the worst anarchists of the age,
Him wilt thou know—and knowing pause,
Nor with the effect forget the cause.

ON LORD THURLOW'S POEMS.

DEDICATED TO MR. ROGERS.

When Thurlow this damn'd nonsense sent,
(I hope I am not violent,) Nor men nor gods knew what he meant.
And since not ev'n our Rogers' praise—
To common sense his thoughts could raise—
Why would they let him print his lays?

To me, divine Apollo, grant—O!
Hermilda's first and second canto,
I'm fitting up a new portmanteau;
And thus to furnish decent lining
My own and others' says I'm twining—
So, gentle Thurlow, throw me thine in.
May, 1812.

TO LORD THURLOW.

"I lay my branch of laurel down,
Then thou to fame Apollo's crown,
Let every other bring his own." Thurlow's Lines to Mr. Rogers.

"Then thus to form Apollo's crown.
A crown! why, twist it how you will,
Thy chaplet must be foolscaap still.
When next you visit Delphi's town,
Inquire among your fellow-lookers,
They'll tell you Phæbus gave his crown,
Some years before your birth, to Rogers.

"Let every other bring his own." When coals to Newcastle are carried,
And oaks sent to Athens as wonders,
From his spouse when the Regent's unmarried.
Or Liverpool weeps o'er his blunders;
When Tories and Whigs cease to quarrel,
When Castlecorny's wife has an heir,
Then Rogers shall ask us for laurel,
And thou shalt have plenty to spare.
TO THOMAS MOORE.

WRITTEN THE EVENING BEFORE HIS VISIT, IN COMPANY WITH LORD BYRON, TO MR. LEIGH HUNT IN HORREMBOE-LANE JAIL, MAY 19, 1813.

Oh you, who in all names can tickle the town, Anacreon, Tom Little, Tom Moore, or Tom Brown,— For hang me if I know of which you may most brag, Your Quarto two-pounds, or your Two-penny Post Bag; —

But now to my letter—to yours 'tis an answer—
To-morrow be with me, as soon as you can, sir,
All ready and dress'd for proceeding to spunge on (According to compact) the wit in the dungeon—
Fray Phæbus at length our political malice May not get us lodgings within the same palace! I suppose that to-night you're engaged with some codgers,
And for Sotheby's Blues have deserted Sam Rogers;
And I, though with cold I have nearly my death got, Must put on my breeches, and wait on the Heathcote, But to-morrow, at four, we will both play the Scourer, And you'll be Catullus, the Regent Mamurra.

FRAGMENT OF AN EPISTLE TO THOMAS MOORE.

What say I?"—not a syllable further in prose; I'm your man "of all measures," dear Tom,—so here goes! Here goes, for a swim on the stream of old Time,
On those buoyant supporters, the bladders of rhyme. If our weight breaks them down, and we sink in the flood,
We are another's, at least, in respectable mud,
Where the Divers of Bathos lie drowned in a heap,
And Southey's last Poem has pillow'd his sleep;—
That "Felo de se," who, half drunk with his malmsey,
Walk'd out of his depth and was lost in a calm sea,
Singing "Glory to God" in a spick and span stanza,
The like (since Tom Sternhold was chok'd) never man saw.

The papers have told you, no doubt, of the fusées, The fetes, and the gapings to get at these Russes,—
Of his Majesty's suite, up from coachman to Hetman,—
And what dignity decks the flat face of the great man.
I saw him, last week, at two balls and a party,—
For a prince, his demeanor was rather too hearty.
You know, we are used to quite different graces,

The Czar's look, I own, was much brighter and brisker,
But then he is sadly deficient in whisker;
And wore but a starless blue coat, and in kersey—
mere breeches whisk'd round, in a waist with the Jersey,
Who, lovely as ever, seem'd just as delighted
With majesty's presence as those she invited.

June, 1814.
A child of famine dying;
And the carnage begun when resistance is done,
And the fall of the wily flying!

But the Devil has reach'd our cliffs so white,
And what did he there, I pray?
If his eyes were good, he but saw by night
What we see every day:
But he made a tour, and kept a journal
Of all the wondrous-sights nocturnal,
And he sold it in shares to the Men of the Row,
Who bid pretty well—but they cheated him, though.

The Devil first saw, as he thought, the Mail,
Its coachman and his coat;
So instead of a pistol he cock'd his tail,
And seized him by the throat:
"Aha," quoth he, "what have we here?
Tis a new barouche, and an ancient peer!"

So he sat him on his box again,
And bade him no fear,
But be true to his club, and stanch to his rein,
His brothel, and his beer;
"Next to seeing a lord at the council board,
I would rather see him here."

The Devil next went to Westminster,
And he turn'd "to the room" of the Commons;
But he heard, as he purposed to enter in there,
That "the Lords" had received a summons;
And he thought as a "quondam aristocrat,"
He might peep at the peers, though to hear them were flat;
And he walk'd up the house so like one of our own,
That they say that he stood pretty near the throne.

He saw the Lord Liverpool seemingly wise,
The Lord Westmoreland certainly silly,
And Johnny of Norfolk—a man of some size—
And Chatham, so like his friend Billy;
And he saw the tears in Lord Eldon's eyes,
Because the Catholics would not rise,
In spite of his prayers and his prophecies;
And he heard—which set Satan himself a staring—
A certain chief justice say something like swearing.
And the Devil was shock'd—and quoth he, "I must go,
For I find we have much better manners below.
If thus he harangues when he passes my border,
I shall hint to friend Moloch to call him to order."

MISSISSIPPI POEMS.

WINDSOR POETICS.

Lines composed on the occasion of His Royal Highness the Prince Regent sitting even stately beside the coffee of Henry VIII, and Charles I, in the royal room at Windsor.

FAME for contemptuous breach of sacred ties,
By headless Charles see heartless Henry lies;
Between them stands another sceptred thing—
It moves, it reigns—in all but name, a king:

Charles to his people, Henry to his wife,
—In him the double tyrant starts to life:
Justice and death have mix'd their dust in vain
Each royal vampire wakes to life again.
Ah, what can tombs avail!—since these disgorging
The blood and dust of both—to mould a G-ge.

ADDITIONAL STANZAS, TO THE ODE TO NAPOLEON BONAPARTE.

There was a day—there was an hour,
While earth was Gaul's—Gaul thine
When that immeasurable power
Unsated to resign
Had been an act of purer fame
Than gathers round Marengo's name
And gilded thy decline,
Through the long twilight of all time,
Despite some passing clouds of crime
But thou forsooth must be a king
And don the purple vest,
As if that foolish robe could wring
Remembrance from thy breast.
Where is that fated garment? where
The gewgaws thou Wert fond to wear,
The star—the string—the crest?
Vain froward child of empire! say,
Are all thy playthings snatch'd away?

Where may the weared eye repose
When gazing on the great?
Where neither guilty glory glows,
Nor despicable state?
Yes—one—the first—the last—the best—
The Cincinnatus of the West,
Whom envy dared not hate,
Bequeath'd the name of Washington,
To make man blash there was but one.

April, 1814.

TO LADY CAROLINE LAMB.

And say'st thou that I have not felt,
Whilst thou wert thus estranged from me?
Nor know'st how dearly I have dwelt
On one unbroken dream of thee?
But love like ours must never be,
And I will learn to prize thee less;
As thou hast fled, so let me flee,
And change the heart thou mayest not bless.

They'll tell thee, Clara! I have seem'd,
Of late, another's charms to woo,
Nor sigh'd, nor frown'd, as if I deem'd
That thou wert banish'd from my view.
Clara! this struggle—to undo
What thou hast done too well, for me
This mask before the babbling crew—
This treachery—was truth to thee.

I have not wept while thou wert gone,
Nor worn one look of sullen wo;
But sought, in many, all that one
(Ah! need I name her?) could bestow.
BYRON'S WORKS.

ADDRESS INTENDED TO BE RECIPIED AT THE CALEDONIAN MEETING.

Who hath not glow'd above the page where fame
Hath fix'd her Caledon's unconquer'd name;
The mountain-land which spurn'd the Roman chain
And baffled back the fiery-crest'd Dane,
Whose bright claymore and hardihood of hand
No foe could tame—no tyrant could command?
That race is gone—but still their children breathe,
And glory crowns them with redoubled wreath:
O'er Gael and Saxon mingling banners shine,
And England! add their stern born strength to thine
The blood which flow'd with Wallace flows as free,
But now 'tis only shed for fame and thee!
Oh! pass not by the northern veteran's claim,
But give support—the world hath given him fame.

The humbler ranks, the lowly brave, who bled
While cheerily following where the mighty led,
Who sleep beneath the undistinguish'd sod
Where happier comrades in their triumph trod,
To us bequeath—'tis all their fate allows—
The tireless offspring and the lonely spouse:
She on high Albyn's dusky hills may raise
The tearful eye in melancholy gaze,
Or view, while shadowy auspices disclose
The Highland seer's anticipated woes,
The bleeding phantom of each martial form
Dim in the cloud, or darkling in the storm;
While sad, she chants the solitary song,
The soft lament for him who tarries long—
For him, whose distant relics vainly crave
The Coronach's wild requiem to the brave.

'Tis Heaven—not man—must charm away the wo
Which bursts when Nature's feelings newly flow—
Yet tenderness and time may rob the tear
Of half its bitterness for one so dear.
A nation's gratitude perchance may spread
A thornless pillow for the widow's head;
May lighten well her heart's maternal care,
And wean from penury the soldier's heir.

ON THE PRINCE REGENT'S RETURNING THE PICTURE OF SARAH, COUNTESS OF JERSEY, TO MRS. MEE.

When the vain triumph of the imperial lord,
Whom servile Rome obey'd, and yet abhor'd,
Gave to the vulgar gaze each glorious bust,
That left a likeness of the brave or just;
What most admired each scrutinizing eye
Of all that deck'd that passing pageantry?
What spread from face to face the wondering air?
The thought of Brutus—for his was not there!
That absence proved his worth—that absence fix'd
His memory on the longing mind, unmix'd;
And more decreed his glory to endure,
Than all a gold Colossus could secure.

If thus, fair Jersey, our desiring gaze
Search for thy form, in vain and mute amaze,
Amid those pictured charms, whose loveliness,
Bright though they be, thine own had render'd less.

STANZAS FOR MUSIC.

I SPEAK not, I trace not, I breathe not thy name,
There is grief in the sound, there is guilt in the fame,
But the tear which now burns on my cheek may impart
The deep thoughts that dwell in that silence of heart.

Too brief for our passion, too long for our peace,
Were those hours—can their joy or their bitterness cease?
We repent—we abjure—we will break from our chain,—
We will part,—we will fly to—unite it again!

Oh! thine be the gladness, and mine be the guilt!
Forgive me, adored one!—forsake, if thou wilt:—
But the heart which is thine shall expire undeceived,
And man shall not break it—whatever thou may'st.

And stern to the haughty, but humble to thee,
Thine soul, in its bitterest blackness, shall be;
And our days seem as swift, and our moments more sweet,
With thee by my side, than with worlds at our feet.

One sigh of thy sorrow, one look of thy love,
Shall turn me or fix, shall reward or reprove;
And the heartless may wonder at all I resign—
Thy lip shall reply, not to theirs, but to mine.

MISCELLANEOUS POEMS.

HEBREW MELODIES.

In the valley of waters we wept o'er the day
When the host of the stranger made Salem his prey,
And our heads on our bosoms all droopingly lay,
And our hearts were so full of the land far away.

The song they demanded in vain—it lay still
In our souls as the wind that hath died on the hill
They called for the harp, but our blood they shall spill,
Ere our right hands shall teach them one tone of their skill.

All stringlessly hung on the willow's sad tree,
As dead as her dead leaf those mute harps must be,
Our hands may be fettered, our tears still are free,
For our God and our glory, and Sion! for thee.

October, 1814

They say that Hope is happiness,
But genuine Love must prize the past;
And Memory wakes the thoughts that bless—
They rose the first, they set the last.

And all that Memory loves the most
Was once our only hope to be;
And all that hope adored and lost
Hath melted into memory.

Alas! it is delusion all,
The future cheats us from afar,
Nor can we be what we recall,
Nor dare we think on what we are.

LINFS INTENDED FOR THE OPENING OF
"THE SIEGE OF CORINTH."

In the year since Jesus died for men,
Eighteen hundred years and ten,
We were a gallant company,
Riding o'er land, and sailing o'er sea.
Oh! but we went merrily!
We forded the river and clomb the high hill.
Never our steeds for a day stood still;
Our sleep fell soft on the hardest bed;
Whether we couched in our rough capote,
On the rougher plank of our gliding boat
Or stretch'd on the beach, or our saddles sprawled
As a pillow beneath the resting head,
Fresh we woke upon the morrow:
All our thoughts and our words had scope
We had health, and we had hope,
Toil and travel, but no sorrow.
We were of all tongues and creeds;
Some were those who counted beads,
Some of mosque, and some of church,
And some, or I mis-say, of neither;
Yet through the wide world might ye search
Nor find a motlier crew nor blither

TO BELSHAZZAR.

BELSHAZZAR! from the banquet turn,
Nor in thy sensual fulness fall:
Behold! while yet before thee burn
The graven words, the glowing wall.
Many a despotic man miscall
Crown'd and anointed from on high;
But thou, the weakest, worst of all—
Is it not written, thou must die?
Go! dash the roses from thy brow—
Gray hairs but poorly wreath with them
Yoke's garlands misbecome thee now,
More than thy very diadem.
Where thou hast tarnish'd every gem—
Then throw the worthless bauble by,
Which, worn by thee, even slaves contemn,
And learn like better men to die.
Oh! early in the balance weigh'd,
And ever light of word and worth,
Whose soul expired ere youth decay'd,
And left thee but a mass of earth.
To see thee moves the sower's mirth:
But tears in Hope's averted eye
Lament that even thou hadst birth—
Unfit to go-ern, live, or die.

July, 1814

If he, that vain, old man, whom truth admits
Hair of his father's throne and shatter'd wits,
If his corrupted eye and wither'd heart
Could with thy gentle image bear depart,
That tarless shame be his, and ours the grief,
To gaze on Beauty's band without its chief:
Yet comfort still one selfish thought imparts,
We lose the portrait, but preserve our hearts.

What can his vaulted gallery now disclose?
A garden with all flowers—except the rose;
A font that only wants its living stream;
And light with every star, save Dian's beam.
Lost to our eyes the present forms shall be,
That turn from tracing them to dream of thee;
And more on that recall'd resemblance pause,
Than all he shall not force on our applause.

Long may thy yet meridian lustre shine,
With all that Virtue asks of Homage thine:
The symmetry of youth—the grace of mien—
The eye that gladdens—and the brow serene—
The glossy darkness of that clustering hair,
Which shades, yet shows that forehead more than fair,
Each glance that wins us, and the life that throws
A spell which will not let our looks repose,
But turn to gaze again, and find anew
Some charm that well rewards another view.
These are not lessen'd, these are still as bright,
Albeit too dazzling for a dotard's sight;
And these must wait till every charm is gone
To please the paltry heart that pleases none,
That dull, cold sensualist, whose sickly eye
In envious dimness pass'd thy portrait by;
Who rack'd his little spirit to combine
Its hate of Freedom's loveliness, and thine.

The dead are thy inheritors—and we
But bubbles on thy surface; and the key
Of thy profundity is in the grave,
The ebon portal of thy people's cave,
Where I would walk in spirit, and behold
Our elements resolved to things untold,
And fathom hidden wonders, and explore
The essence of great bosoms now no more.

TO AUGUSTA.

I.
My sister! my sweet sister! if a name
Dearer and purer were, it should be thine.
Mountains and seas divide us, but I claim
No tears, but tenderness to answer mine:
Go where I will, to me thou art the same—
A loved regret which I would not resign.
There yet are two things in my destiny,—
A world to roam through, and a home with thee

II.
The first were nothing—had I still the last,
It were the haven of my happiness;
But other claims and other ties thou hast,
And mine is not the wish to make them less.
A strange doom is thy father's son's, and past
Recalling, as it lies beyond redress;
Reversed for him our grandsire's* fate of yore,—
He had no rest at sea, nor I on shore

III.
If my inheritance of storms hath been
In other elements, and on the rocks
Of perils, overlook'd or unforeseen,
I have sustain'd my share of worldly shocks,
The fault was mine; nor do I seek to screen
My errors with defensive paradox;
I have been cunning in mine overthrow,
The careful pilot of my proper wo.

IV.
Mine were my faults, and mine be their reward.
My whole life was a contest, since the day
That gave me being, gave me that which mar'sd
The gift,—a fate, or will, that walk'd astray;
And at times have found the struggle hard,
And thought of shaking off my bonds of clay
But now I fain would for a time survive,
If but to see what next can well arrive.

V.
Kingdoms and empires in my little day
I have outlived, and yet I am not old;
And when I look on this the petty spray
Of my own years of trouble, which have roll'd
Like a wild bay of breakers, melts away:
Something—I know not what—does still uphold
A spirit of light patience:—not in vain,
Even for its own sake, do we purchase pain.

* Admiral Byron was remarkable for never making a voyage without a tempest. He was known to the sailors by the facetious name of "Pond-washing Jack."

"But though it were tempest-tossed,
Still his bark could not be lost." He returned safely from the wreck of the Wager, (in Amon's voyage,) and subsequently commanded and had many years after, as commander of a similar expedition.
VI.
Perhaps the workings of defiance stir
Within me,—or perhaps a cold despair,
Brought on when ill habitually recur,—
Perhaps a kindred clime, or purer air,
(For even to this may change of soul refer,
And with light armor we may learn to bear,)
Have taught me a strange quiet, which was not
The chief companion of a calmer lot.

VII.
I feel almost at times as I have felt
In happy childhood: trees, and flowers, and brooks,
Which do remember me of where I dwelt
ERE my young mind was sacrificed to books,
Come as of yore upon me, and can melt
My heart with recognition of their looks;
And even at moments I could think I see
Some living thing to love—but none like thee.

VIII.
Here are the Alpine landscapes which create
A fund for contemplation;—to admire
Is a brief feeling of a trivial date;
But sometimes worthier do such scenes inspire:
Here to be lonely is not desolate,
For much I view which I could most desire,
And, above all, a lake I can behold
Lovelier, not dearer, than our own of old.

IX.
Oh that thouwert but with me!—but I grow
The fool of my own wishes, and forget
The solitude which I have vaunted so
Has lost its praise in this but one regret;
There may be others which I less may show;
I am not of the plaintive mood, and yet
I feel an ebb in my philosophy,
And the tide rising in my alter'd eye.

X.
I did remind thee of our own dear lake,*
By the old hall which may be mine no more.
Leman's is fair; but think not I forsake
The sweet remembrance of a dearer shore:
The havoc Time must with my memory make,
ERE that or thou can fade these eyes before;
Though, like all things which I have loved, they are Resign'd for ever, or divided far.

XI.
The world is all before me; I but ask
Of Nature that with which she will comply—
It is but in her summer's sun to bask,
To mingle with the quiet of her sky,
To see her gentle face without a mask,
And never gaze on it with apathy.
She was my early friend, and now shall be
My sister—till I look again on thee.

XII.
I can reduce all feelings but this one;
And that I would not—for at length I see
Such scenes as those wherein my life began
The earliest—even the only paths for me—
Had I but sooner learnt the crowd to shun,
I had been better than I now can be;
The passions which have torn me would have slept,
I had not suffered, and thou hadst not wept.

* The lake of Newnham Abbey.

XIII.
With false ambition what had I done?
Little with love, and least of all with fame;
And yet they came unsought, and with me grew,
And made me all which they can make—a name
Yet this was not the end I did pursue;
Surely I once beheld a nobler aim.
But all is over—I am one the more
To baillen millions which have gone before.

XIV.
And for the future, this world's future may
From me demand but little of my care;
I have outlived myself by many a day;
Having survived so many things that were;
My years have been no slumber, but the prey
Of ceaseless vigils; for I had the share
Of life which might have fill'd a century,
Before its fourth in time had pass'd me by.

XV.
And for the remnant which may be to come
I am content; and for the past I feel
Not thankless,—for within the crowded sum
Of struggles, happiness at times would steal,
And for the present I would not bennumb
My feelings farther.—Nor shall I conceal
That with all this I still can look around,
And worship Nature with a thought profound

XVI.
For thee, my own sweet sister, in thy heart
I knew myself secure, as thou in mine;
We were and are—I am, even as thou art—
Being who ne'er each other can resign;
It is the same, together or apart,
From life's commencement to its slow decline
We are entwined—let death come slow or fast,
The tie which bound the first endures the last!

ON THE BUST OF HELEN, BY CANOVA

In this beloved marble view,
Above the works and though.as of man,
What Nature could, but would not do,
And beauty and Canova can!

Beyond imagination's power,
Beyond the bard's defeated art,
With immortality her dower,
Behold the Helen of the heart!

FRAGMENT OF A POEM ON HEARING
THAT LADY BYRON WAS ILL.—1816

And thou wert sad—yet was I not with thee;
And thou wert sick—and yet I was not near.
Methought that joy and health alone could be
Where I was not, and pain and sorrow here.
And is it thus?—it is as I foretold,
And shall be more so:—&c., &c.
TO THOMAS MOORE.

Mr. boat is on the shore,
And my bark is on the sea;
But, before I go, Tom Moore,
Here's a double health to thee!

Here's a sigh to those who love me,
And a smile to those who hate;
And, whatever sky's above me,
Here's a heart for every fate.

Though the ocean roar around me,
Yet it still shall bear me on;
Though a desert should surround me,
It hath springs that may be won.

Were't the last drop in the well,
As I gasp'd upon the brink,
 Ere my fainting spirit fell,
'Tis to thee that I would drink.

With that water as this wine,
The libation I would pour
Should be—peace with thine and mine,
And a health to thee, Tom Moore.

STANZAS TO THE RIVER PO.

River, that rollest by the ancient walls,
Where dwells the lady of my love, when she Walks by thy brink, and there perchance recalls
A faint and fleeting memory of me;

What if thy deep and ample stream should be
A mirror of my heart, where she may read
The thousand thoughts I now betray to thee,
Wild as thy wave, and headlong as thy speed!

What do I say—a mirror of my heart?
Are not thy waters sweeping, dark, and strong?
Such as my feelings were and are, thou art;
And such as thou art were my passions long.

Time may have somewhat tamed them,—not for ever,
Thou overflow'st thy banks, and not for aye
Thy bosom overflows, congenial river!
Thy floods subside, and mine have sunk away,

But long wounds behind, and now again
Borne in our old unchanged career, we move;
Thou tendest wildly onwards to the main,
And—'tis loving one I should not love.

I see current I behold will sweep beneath
Her native walks, and murmur at her feet;
Her eyes will look on thee, when she shall breathe
The twilight air, unharrow'd by summer's heat.

She will look on thee,—I have look'd on thee,
Full of that thought; and, from that moment, ne'er
Thy waters could I dream of, name, or see,
Without the inseparable sigh for her;

Her bright eyes will be imaged in thy stream,—
Yes! they will meet the wave I gaze on now:
Mine cannot witness, even in a dream,
That happy wave repass me in its flow!

The wave that bears my tears returns no more;
Will she return by whom that wave shall sweep?
Both tread thy banks, both wander on thy shore,
I by thy source, she by the dark-blue deep.

But that which keepeth us apart is not
Distance, nor depth of wave, nor space of earth,
But the distraction of a various lot,
As various as the climates of our birth.

A stranger loves the lady of the land,
Born far beyond the mountains, but his blood
Is all meridian, as if never fann'd
By the bleak wind that chills the polar flood.

My blood is all meridian; were it not,
I had not left my clime, nor should I be,
In spite of tortures ne'er to be forgot,
A slave again of love,—at least of thee.

'Tis vain to struggle—let me perish young—
Live as I lived, and love as I have loved;
To dust if I return, from dust I sprung,
And then, at least, my heart can ne'er be moved.

SONNET TO GEORGE THE FOURTH,
ON THE REPEAL OF LORD EDWARD FITZGERALD'S FORFEITURE.

To be the father of the fatherless,
To stretch the hand from the throne's height, an raise
His offspring, who expired in other days,
To make thy sire's sway by a kingdom less,—
This is to be a monarch, and express
Envy into unutterable praise.
Dismiss thy guard, and trust thee to such traits,
For who would lift a hand, except to bless?
Were it not easy, sire? and is't not sweet
To make thyself beloved? and to be Omnipotent by mercy's means? for thus
Thy sovereignty would grow but more complete;
A despot thou, and yet thy people free,
And by the heart, not hand, enslaving us.

August, 1819.

FRANCESCA OF RIMINI.

TRANSLATED FROM THE INFERNO OF DANTÉ.
CANTO FIFTH.

"The land where I was born sits by the seas,
Upon that shore to which the Po descends,
With all his followers, in search of peace.
Love, which the gentle heart soon apprehends,
Seized him for the fair person which was taken
From me, and me even yet the mode offends,
Love, who to none beloved to love again.
Remits, saileth me with wish to please, so strong, That, as thou seest, yet, yet it doth remain.

Love to one death conductus us along,
But Calna waits for him our life who ended:"
These are the accents utter'd by her tongue.

Since first I listen'd to these soul's offended,
I bow'd my visage and so kept it till

"What think'st thou?" said the bard; "when doth I
unbend,
And recommended: "Alas! unto such ill
How many sweet thoughts what strong ecstasies,
Led these their evil fortune to fulfill!"

And then I turn'd unto their side eyes,
And said, "Francesca, thy sad desistances
Have made me sorrow till the tears arise.

But tell me, in the season of sweet sighs,
By what and how thy love to passion rose,
So as his dim desires to recognize?"

Then she to me: "The greatest of all woes
Is to recall to mind
\{ remind us of\} our happy days
\{ this \}
In misery, and \{ that\} thy teacher knows.

But if to learn our passion's first root proys
Upon thy spirit with such sympathy,

\{ relate \}
I will \{ do\} even \{ as\} he who weeps and says—
We read one day for pastime, seated nigh,
Of Lancelot, how love enchain'd him too.
We were alone, quite unsuspiciously.

But oft our eyes met, and our cheeks in hue
All other discolor'd by that reading were;

But one point only wholly \{ desired \}
When we read the \{ long-sighed for\}'s smile of her,
\{ a fervent \} lover,
He who from me can be divided ne'er
Kiss'd my mouth, trembling in the act all over.
Accursed wa, 'tis book and he who wrote!
That day no further leaf we did uncover.

While thus one spirit told us of their lot,
The other wept, so that with pity's thralls
I swoon'd as if by death I had been smote,
And fell down even as a dead body falls."

THE IRISH AVATAR.†

Era the daughter of Brunswick is cold in her grave,
And her ashes still float to their home o'er the tide,
Lo! George the triumphant speeds over the wave,
To the long-cherish'd isle which he loved like his—his—tride.

True, the grand of her bright and brief era are gone,
The rainbow-like epoch where Freedom could pause
For the few little years, out of centuries won,
Which betray'd not, or crush'd not, or wept not her cause.

* In some of the editions it is, "sire," in others, "sire;" "an essential difference between "saying" and "talking," which I know not how to de-

* In the King's "Old" edition of 1814. cede me read.

* On the King's "Old" to Ireland, in 1603.

True, the chains of the Catholic clank o'er his rags,
The castle still stands, and the senate's no more.
And the famine which dwelt on her freedomless crags
Is extending its steps to her desolate shore.

To her desolate shore—where the emigrant stands
For a moment to gaze ere he flies from his heart,
Tears fall on his chain, though it drops from his hands,
For the dungeon he quits is the place of his birth

But he comes! the Messiah of royalty comes!
Like a godly Leviathan roll'd from the waves!
Then receive him as best such an advent becomes,
With a legion of cooks and an army of slaves!

He comes in the promise and bloom of threescore,
To perform in the pageant the sovereign's part—
But long live the shamrock which shadow him o'er!
Could the green in his hat be transferr'd to his heart?

Could that long-wither'd spot but be verdant again,
And a new spring of noble affections arise—
Then might freedom forgive thee this dance in thy chain,

And this shout of thy slavery which saddens the skies.

Is it madness or meanness which clings to thee now?
Were he God—as he is but the commonest clay,
With scarce fewer wrinkles than sins on his brow—
Such servile devotion might shame him away.

Ay, roar in his train! let thine orators lash
Their fanciful spirits to pamper his pride—
Not thus did thy Grattan indignantly flash
His soul o'er the freedom implored and denied.

Ever glorious Grattan! the best of the good!
So simple in heart, so sublime in the rest!
With all which Demosthenes wait'd endured,
And his rival or victor in all he possessed.

Ere Tully arose in the zenith of Rome,
Though unequal'd, preceded, the task was begun;
But Grattan sprung up like a God from the tomb
Of ages, the first, last, the savior, the one!

With the skill of an Orpheus to soften the brute;
With the fire of Prometheus to kindle mankind;
Even Tyranny listening sate melted or mute,
And Corruption shrunk scorch'd from the glance of his mind.

But back to our theme! Back to despots and slaves!
Feasts furnish'd by Famine! rejoicings by Pain!
True Freedom but welcometh, while slavery still races,
When a week's saturnalia hath loosen'd her chain.

Let the poor squalid splendor thy wreck can afford
(As the bankrupt's profession his ruin would hide)
Gild over the palace. Lo! Erin, thy lord!
Kiss his foot with thy blessing for blessings denied.

Or if freedom past hope be extorted at last,
If the idol of brass find his feet are of clay,
Must what terror or policy wring forth be class'd
With what monarch's ne'er give, but as wolves yield their prey?
Each brute hath its nature, a king's is to reign,—
To reign! in that word see, ye ages, comprised
The cause of the curses the all annals contain,
From Caesar the dreaded to George the despised.

Wear, Fingal, thy trappings! O'Connell proclaims
His accomplishments! His!! and thy country

Half an age's contempt was an error of fame,
And that "Hal is the rascaliest, sweetest young prince!"

Will thy yard of blue riband, poor Fingal, recall
The fetters from millions of Catholic limbs?
Or, has it not bound thee the fastest of all
The slaves, who now hail their betrayer with hymns?

Ay! "build him a dwelling!" let each give his mite!
Till, like Babel, the new royal dome hath arisen!
Let thy beggars and helots their pittance unite—
And a palace bestow for a poorhouse and prison!

Spread—spread, for Vitellius the royal repast,
Till the glutonous despot be stuff'd to the gorge!
And the roar of his drunkards proclaims him at last
The Fourth of the fools and oppressors, call'd
"George!"

Let the tables be loaded with feasts till they groan!
Till they groan like thy people, through ages of wo!
Let the wine flow around the old Bacchanal's throne,
Like their blood which has flow'd, and which yet has to flow.

But let not his name be thine idol alone—
On his right hand behold a Sejanus appears!
Thine own Castlereagh! let him still be thine own!
A wretch never named but with curses and jeers!

Till now, when the isle which should blush for his birth,
Deep, deep as the gore which he shed on her soil,
Seems proud of the reptile which crawld from her earth,
And for murder repays him with shouts and a smile.

Without one single ray of her genius, without
The fancy, the manhood, the fire of her race—
The miscreant who well might plunge Erin in doubt
If she ever gave birth to a being so base.

If she did—let her long-boasted proverb be hush'd,
Which proclaims that from Erin no reptile can spring—
See the cold-blooded serpent, with venom full flush'd,
Still warming its folds in the breast of a king!

Shout, drink, feast, and flatter! Oh! Erin, how low
Wert thou sunk by misfortune and tyranny, till
Thy welcome of tyrants hath plunged thee below
The depth of thy deep in a deeper gulf still.

My voice, though but humble, was raised for thy right,
My voice as a freeman's, still voted thee free,

This hand, though but feeble, would arm in thy fight,
And this heart, though outworn, had a throb still for thee!

Yev, I loved thee and thine, though thou art not my land,
I have known noble hearts and great souls in thy sons,
And I wept with the world o'er the patriots band
Who are gone, but I weep them no longer as once.

For nappy are they now reposing afar,—
Thy Grattan, thy Curran, thy Sheridan, all
Who, for years, were the chiefs in the eloquent war,
And redeem'd, if they have not retarded, thy fall.

Yes, happy are they in their cold English graves!
Their shades cannot start to thy shouts of to-day—
Nor the steps of enslavers and chain-kissing slaves
Be stamp'd in the turf o'er their fetters clay.

Till now I had envied thy sons and their shore,
Though their virtues were hunted, their liberties fled;
There was something so warm and sublime in the core
Of an Irishman's heart, that I envy—thy dead.

Or, if aught in my bosom can quench for an hour
My contempt for a nation so servile, though sore,
Which though trod like the worm will not turn upon power,
'Tis the glory of Grattan, and genius of Moore

STANZAS

TO HER WHO CAN BEST UNDERSTAND THEM.

Be it so! we part for ever!
Let the past as nothing be;—
Had I only loved thee, never Hadst thou been thus dear to me.

Had I loved, and thus been slighted,
That I better could have borne;—
Love is quell'd, when unrequited,
By the rising pulse of scorn.

Pride may cool what passion heated,
Time will tame the wayward will;
But the heart in friendship cheated
Throbs with wo's most maddening thrill.

Had I loved, I now might hate thee,
In that hatred solace seek,
Might exult to execrate thee,
And, in words, my vengeance wreak.

But there is a silent sorrow,
Which can find no vent in speech,
Which disdains relief to borrow
From the heights that song can reach.

Like a dankless chain enthralling,—
Like the sleepless dreams that mock,—
Like the frigid ice-drops falling
From the surf-surrounded rock.
Such the cold and sickening feeling
   Thou hast caused this heart to know,
Stabbed the deeper by concealing
   From the world its bitter wo.

Once it fondly, proudly, deemed thee
   All that fancy's self could paint,
Once it honored and esteemed thee
   As its idol and its saint!

More than woman thou wast to me;
   Not as man I looked on thee;—
Why like woman thea unde me?
   Why "heap man's worst curse on me?"

Wast thou but a fiend, assuming
   Friendship's smile, and woman's art,
And, in borrow'd beauty blooming,
   Trifling with a trusted heart?

By that eye which once could listen
   With opposing glance to thee;—
By that ear which once could listen
   To each tale I told to thee;—

By that lip, its smile bestowing,
   Which could soften sorrow's gush;—
By that cheek, once brightly glowing
   With pure friendship's well-feigned blush;

By all those false charms united,— Thou hast wrought thy wanton will,
And, without compunction, blighted
   What "thou would'st not kindly kill."

Yet I curse thee not in sadness,
   Still, I feel how dear thou wert;
Oh! I could not—'t on madness—
   Doom thee to thy just desert!

Love! and when my life is over,
   Should thine own be lengthened long,
Thou may'st then, too late, discover,
   By thy feelings, all my wrong.

When thy beauties all are faded,
   When thy flatterers fawn no more,—
Ere the solemn shroud hath shaded
   Some regardless reptile's store,—

Ere that hour, false syren, hear me!
   Thou may'st feel what I do now,
While my spirit, hovering near thee,
   Whispers friendship's broken vow.

But 'tis useless to upbraid thee
   With thy past or present state;
What thou wast, my fancy made thee,
   What thou art, I know too late.

STANZAS

WRITTEN ON THE ROAD BETWEEN FLORENCE AND PISA.

Oh, talk not to me of a name great in story;
   The days of our youth are the days of our glory;
And the myrtle and ivy of sweet two-and-twenty
   Are worth all your laurels, though ever so plenty.

What are garlands and crowns to the brow that is wrinkled?
   'Tis but as a dead flower with May-dew besprinkled
Then away with all such from the head that is hoary
   What care I for the wreaths that can only give glory i

Oh Fame! if I 'er took delight in thy praises,
   'Twas less for the sake of thy high-sounding ph. ases,
Than to see the bright eyes of the dear one discover
   She thought that I was not unworthy to love her.

There chiefly I sought thee, there only I found thee;
   Her glance was the best of the rays that surround thee;
When it sparkled o'er aught that was bright in my story,
   I knew it was love, and I felt it was glory.                December, 1821.

IMPROPTU,

ON LADY BLESSINGTON EXPRESSING HER INTENTION OF TAKING THE VILLA CALLED "IL PARA DISO," NEAR GENOA.

Beneath Blessington's eyes
   The reclain'd Paradise
Should be free as the former from evil;
   But if the new Eve
For an apple should grieve,
   What mortal would not play the Devil?*

April, 1823.

TO THE COUNTESS OF BLESSINGTON.

You have ask'd for a verse:—the request
   In a rhymer 'twere strange to deny;
But my Hippocrene was but my breast,
   And my feelings (its fountain) are dry.

Were I now as I was, I had sung
   What Lawrence had painted so well;
But the strain would expire on my tongue,
   And the theme is too soft for my shell.

I am ashes where once I was fire,
   And the hard in my bosom is dead;
What I loved I now merely admire,
   And my heart is as gray as my head.

My life is not dated by years—
   There are moments which act as a plough,
And there is not a furrow appears
   But is deep in my soul as my brow.

Let the young and the brilliant aspire
   To sing what I gaze on in vain;
For sorrow has torn from my lyre
   The string which was worthy the strain.

* The Genoese who had already applied this shorelure just to himself;
Taking them their hands that the villa had "been fixed on for his own residence they said, "Il Diavolo a sacro monte in Parmeze."—Moore.
ON THIS DAY I COMPLETE MY THIRTY-SIXTH YEAR.

'Tis time this heart should be unmoved,
Since others it hath ceased to move!
Yet, though I cannot be beloved,
Still let me love!

My days are in the yellow leaf;
The flowers and fruits of love are gone;
The worm, the canker, and the grief
Are mine alone!

The fire that on my bosom preys
Is lone as some volcanic isle:
No torch is kindled at its blaze—
A funeral pile

The hope, the fear, the jealous care,
The exalted portion of the pain
And power of love, I cannot share,
But wear the chain.

But 'tis not thus—and 'tis not here—
Such thoughts would shake my soul, nor now,
Where glory decks the hero's bier,
Or binds his brow.

The sword, the banner, and the field,
Glory and Greece around me see!
"The Spartan, borne upon his shield,
Was not more free.

Awake! (not Greece—she is awake!)
Awake, my spirit! Think through whom Thy life-blood tracks its parent lake,
And then strike home!

Tread those reviving passions down,
Unworthy manhood!—unto thee
Indifferent should the smile or frown
Of beauty be.

It thou regret'st thy youth, why live?
The land of honorable death
Is here:—up to the field, and give Away thy breath!

Seek out—less often sought than found—
A soldier's grave, for thee the best;
Then look around, and choose thy ground,
And take thy rest.

Missolonghi, Jan. 22, 1824.

TO A LADY WHO PRESENTED THE AUTHOR WITH THE VELVET BAND WHICH BOUND HER TRESSES.*

This Band, which bound thy yellow hair,
Is mine, sweet girl! thy pledge of love;
It claims my warmest, dearest care,
Like relics left of saints above.

* This and the following poems from manuscripts collected after the death of Lord Byron were first published in London in 1833.

Oh! I will wear it next my heart,
'Twill bind my soul in bonds to thee;
From me again 'twill ne'er depart,
But mingle in the grave with me.

The dew I gather from thy lip
Is not so dear to me at this;
That I but for a moment sip,
And banquet on a transient bliss:

This will recall each youthful scene,
E'en when our lives are on the wane;
The leaves of Love will still be green
When Memory bids them bud again.

Oh! little lock of golden hue,
In gently waving ringlet curl'd,
By the dear head on which you grew,
I would not lose you for a world.

Not though a thousand more adorn
The polish'd brow where once you shone,
Like rays which gild a cloudless morn,
Beneath Columbia's fervid zone.

REMEMBRANCE.

'Tis done!—I saw it in my dreams;
No more with Hope the future beams;
My days of happiness are few:
Chill'd by misfortune's wintry blast,
My dawn of life is overcast;
Love, Hope, and Joy, alike adieu:—
Would I could add Remembrance too.

THE ADIEU.

WRITTEN UNDER THE IMPRESSION THAT THE AUTHOR WOULD SOON DIE.

Adieu, thou Hill!* where early joy
Spread roses o'er my brow
Where Science seeks each loitering boy
With knowledge to endow.
Adieu my youthful friends or foes,
Partners of former bliss or woe;
No more through Ida's paths we stray;
Soon must I share the gloomy cell,
Whose ever slumbering inmates dwell,
Unconscious of the day.

Adieu, ye hoary Regal Fanes,
Ye spires of Granta's vale,
Where Learning robed in sable reigns,
And Melancholy pale.
Ye comrades of the jovial hour,
Ye tenants of the classic bower,
On Cama's verdant margin placed,
Adieu! while memory still is mine,
For, offerings on Oblivion's shrine
These scenes must be effaced.

* Harrow.
Adieu, ye mountains of the clime
Where grew my youthful years;
Where Loch na Garr in snows sublime
His giant summit rears.
Why did my childhood wander forth
From you, ye regions of the North,
With sons of pride to roam?
Why did I quit my Highland cave,
Marr's dusky heath, and Dee's clear wave.
To seek a Sothern home?

Hall of my Sires! * a long farewell—
Yet why to thee adieu?
Thy vaults will echo back my knell,
Thy towers my tomb will view:
The faltering tongue which sung thy fall,
And former glories of thy Hall,
Forgets its wonted simple note—
But yet the Lyre retains the strings,
And sometimes on Æolian wings
In dying strains may float.

Fields, which surround you rustic cot,
While yet I linger here,
Adieu! you are not now forgot,
To retrospection dear.
Streamlet *† along whose rippling surge,
My youthful limbs were wont to urge,
At noontide heat their piant course;
Plunging with ardor from the shore,
Thy springs will have these limbs no more,
Deprived of active force.

And shall I here forget the scene,
Still nearest to my breast?
Rocks rise, and rivers roll between
The spot which passion blest;
Yet, Mary,‡ all thy beauties seem
Fresh as in Love's bewitching dream,
To me in smiles display'd;
Till slow disease resigns his prey
To Death, the parent of decay,
Thine image cannot fade.

And thou! my Friend! § whose gentle love
Yet thrills my bosom's chords,
How much thy friendship was above
Description's power of words!
Still near my breast thy gift I wear,
Which sparkled once with Feeling's tear
Of Love the pure, the sacred gem;
Our souls were equal, and our lot
In that dear moment quite forgot;
Let pride alone condemn!

All, all, is dark and cheerless now?
No smile of Love's deceit,
Can warm my veins with wonted glow,
Can bid Life's pulses beat:
Not e'en the hope of future fame
Can wake my faint, exhausted frame,
Or crown with fancied wreaths my head.
Mine is a short inglorious race—
To humble in the dust my face,
And mingle with the dead.

Oh Fame! thou goddess of my heart
On him who gains thy praise,
Pointless must fall the Spectre's dart
Consumed in Glory's blaze,
But me she beckons from the earth,
My name obscure, unmark'd my birth,
My life a short and vulgar dream;
Lost in the dull, ignoble crowd,
My hopes recline within a shroud,
My fate is Lethe's stream.

When I repose beneath the sod,
Unheeded in the clay,
Where once my playfell footsteps trod,
Where now my head must lay;
The meed of pity will be shed
In dew-drops o'er my narrow bed,
By nightly skies and storms alone;
No mortal eye will deign to steep
With tears the dark sepulchral deep,
Which hides a name unknown.

Forget this world, my restless sprite
Turn, turn thy thoughts to Heaven.
There must thou soon direct thy flight,
If errors are forgiven.
To bigots and to sects unknown,
Bow down beneath the Almighty's Throne;
To Him address thy trembling prayer:
He, who is merciful and just,
Will not reject a child of dust,
Although his meanest care.

Father of Light! to Thee I call,*
My soul is dark within:
Thou, who canst mark the sparrow's fall,
Avert the death of sin.
Thou, who canst guide the wandering star,
Who calm'st the elemental war,
Whose mantle is yon boundless sky,
My thoughts, my words, my crimes forgive,
And since I soon must cease to live,
Instruct me how to die.

TO A VAIN LADY.

Ah, heedless girl, why thus disclose
What ne'er was meant for other ears?
Why thus destroy thine own repose,
And dig the source of future tears?

Oh, thou wilt weep, unprudent maid,
While lurking envious foes will smile,
For all the follies thou hast said,
Of those who spoke but to beguile.

Vain girl! thy ling'ring woes are nigh,
If thou believest what striplings say;
Oh, from the deep temptation fly,
Nor fall the specious spoiler's prey.

Dost thou repeat, in childish boast,
The words man utter to deceive?
Thy peace, thy hope, thy all is lost
If thou canst venture to believe.

BYRON'S WORKS.

TO ANNE.

Oh, Anne! your offences to me have been grievous; I thought from my wrath no atonement could save you; but woman is made to command and deceive us—I look'd in your face, and I almost forgave you.

I vowed I could ne'er for a moment respect you, Yet thought that a day's separation was long: When we met, I determined again to suspect you—Your smile soon convinced me suspicion was wrong.

I swore, in a transport of young indignation, With fervent contempt evermore to disdain you: I saw you—my anger became admiration; And now, all my wish, all my hope, 's to regain you.

With beauty like yours, oh, how vain the contention! Thus lowly I sue for forgiveness before you;—At once to conclude such a fruitless dissection, Be false, my sweet Anne, when I cease to adore you!

January 16, 1807.

TO THE SAME.

Oh say not, sweet Anne, that the Fates have decreed The heart which adores you should wish to dis- sever; Such Fates were to me most unkind ones indeed,—To bear me from love and from duty for ever.

Your frowns, lovely girl, are the Fates which alone Could bid me from fond admiration refrain; By these, every hope, every wish were o'erthrown, Till smiles should restore me to rapture again.

As the ivy and oak, in the forest entwined, The rage of the tempest united must weather My love and my life were by nature design'd To flourish alike, or to perish together.

Then say not, sweet Anne, that the Fates have decreed, Your lover should bid you a lasting adieu; Till Fate can ordain that this bosom shall bleed, His soul, his existence, are centred in you.

January 15, 1807.

TO THE AUTHOR OF A SONNET BEGINNING

"SAD IS MY VERSE, YOU SAY, AND YET NO TEAR."

Thy verse is "sad" enough, no doubt; A devilish deal more sad than witty! Why we should weep, I can't find out, Unless for thee we weep in pity.

Yet there is one I pity more; And much, alas! I think he needs it: For he, I'm sure will suffer sore, Who, to his own misfortune, reads it.

The rhymes, without the aid of magic, May once be read—but never after; Yet their effect's by no means tragic, Although by far too dull for laughter.

But would you make our bosoms bleed, And of no common pang complain— If you would make us weep indeed, Tell us, you'll read them o'er again.

ON FINDING A FAN.

In one who felt as once he felt, This might, perhaps, have fann'd the flame, But now no more his heart will melt, Because that heart is not the same.

As when the ebbing flames are low, The aid which once improved the light, And made them burn with fiercer glow, Now quenches all their blaze in night,

Thus has it been with passion's fires— As many a boy and girl remembers— While every hope of love expires, Extinguish'd with the dying embers.

The first, though not a spark survive, Some careful hand may teach to burn; The last, alas! can ne'er survive; No touch can bid its warmth return.

Or, if it chance to wake again, Not always doomed its heat to soothe, It sheds (so wayward fates ordain) Its former warmth around another.

1807.
Farewell to the Muse.

They Power! who hast ruled me through infancy's days,
Young offspring of Fancy, 'tis time we should part;
Then rise on the gale the last of my lays,
The coldest effusion which springs from my heart.

This bosom, responsive to rapture no more,
Shall hush thy wild notes, nor implore thee to sing;
The feelings of childhood, which taught thee to soar,
Are wafted far distant on Apathy's wing.

Though simple the themes of my rude flowing Lyre,
Yet even those themes are departed for ever;
No more beam the eyes which my dream could inspire,
My visions are flown, to return,—alas, never!

When drain'd is the nectar which gladdens the bowl,
How vain is the effort delightful to prolong!
When cold is the beauty which dwell in my soul,
What magic of Fancy can lengthen my song?

Can the lips sing of Love in the desert alone,
Of kisses and smiles which they now must resign;
Or dwell with delight on the hours that are flown?
Ah, no! for those hours no longer be mine.

Can they speak of the friends that I lived but to love?
Ah, surely affection ennobles the strain!
But how can my numbers in sympathy move,
When I scarcely can hope to behold them again?

Can I sing of the deeds which my Fathers have done,
And raise my loud harp to the fame of my Sires?
For glories like theirs, oh, how faint is my tone!
For Heroes exploits how unequal my fires!

Untouch'd then, my Lyre shall reply to the blast—
'Tis hush'd; and my feeble endeavors are o'er:
And those who have heard it will pardon the past,
When they know that its murmurs shall vibrate no more.

And soon shall its wild erring notes be forgot,
Since early affection and love is o'ercast;
Oh! blest had my fate been, and happy my lot,
Had the first strain of love been the dearest, the last.

Farewell, my young Muse! since we now can ne'er meet;
If our songs have been languid, they surely are few:
Let us hope that the present at least will be sweet—
The present—which seals our eternal adieu.

1807.

To an Oak at Newstead.*

Young Oak! when I planted thee deep in the ground,
I hoped that thy days would be longer than mine;
That thy dark-waving branches would flourish around,
And ivy thy trunk with its mantle entwine.

Such, such was my hope; when, in infancy's years,
On the land of my fathers I reared thee with pride;
They are past, and I water thy stem with my tears,—
Thy decay not the weeds that surround thee can hide.

I left thee, my Oak, and since that fatal hour,
*A stranger has dwelt in the hall of my sire;
Till manhood shall crown me, not mine is the power.
But his whose neglect may have made thee expire

Oh! hardy thouwert—even now little care
Might revive thy young head, and thy wounds gently heal;
But thouwert not fated affection to share—
For who could suppose that a stranger would feel?

Ah, droop not, my Oak! lift thy head for awhile;
Ere twice round you Glory this planet shall run,
The hand of thy Master will teach thee to smile.
When Infancy's years of probation are done.

Oh, live then, my Oak; tow'r aloft from the weeds,
That clog thy young growth, and assist thy decay,
For still in thy bosom are life's early seeds,
And still may thy branches their beauty display.

Oh! yet, if maturity's years may be thine,
Though I shall lie low in the cavern of death,
On thy leaves yet the day-beam of ages may shine
Uninjured by time, or the rude winter's breath.

For centuries still may thy boughs lightly wave
O'er the corse of thy lord in thy crapefury laid;
While the branches thus gratefully shelter his grave,
The chief who survives may recline in thy shade.

And as he with his boys shall revisit this spot,
He will tell them in whispers more softly to tread
Oh! surely, by these I shall ne'er be forgot:
Remembrance still hallows the dust of the dead.

And here, will they say, when in life's glowing prime
Perhaps he has poured forth his young simple lay
And here he must sleep, till the moments of time
Are lost in the hours of Eternity's day.

1807.

Lines.

On hearing that Lady Byron was ill.*

And thou wert sad—yet I was not with thee;
And thou wert sick, and yet I was not near;
Methought that joy and health alone could be
Where I was not—and pain and sorrow here!
And is it thus?—is it as I foretold,
And shall be more so; for the mind recoils
Upon itself, and the wreck'd heart feels cold,
While heaviness collects the shattered spoils.
It is not in the storm nor in the strife
We feel benumb'd and wish to be no more,
But in the after-silence on the shore,
When all is lost, except a little life.

* See Fragment, page 566.

* See Fragment, page 571.
I am too well avenged—but 'twas my right;
Whate'er my sins might be, thou wert not sent
To be the Nemesis who should requite—
Nor did Heaven choose so near an instrument.

Mercy is for the merciful!—If thou
Hast been of such, 'twill be accorded now.
Thy nights are banish'd from the realms of sleep—
Yes! they may flatter thee, but thou must feel
A hollow agony which will not heal,
For thou art pillow'd on a curse too deep;
Thou hast sown in my sorrow, and must reap
The bitter harvest in a wo as real!
I have had many foes, but none like thee;
For 'gainst the rest myself I could defend,
And be avenged, or turn them into friend;
But thou in safe implacability
Hast nought to dread—in thine own weakness
shieded,
And in my love, which hath but too much yielded,
And spared, for thy sake, some I should not spare—
And thus upon the world—trust in thy truth—
And the wild fame of my unworl'd youth—
On things that were not, and on things that are—
Even upon such a basis hast thou built
A monument, whose cement hath been guilt!
The moral Clytemnestra of thy lord,
And hew'd down, with an unsuspected sword,
Fame, peace, and hope—and all the better life
Which, but for this cold treason of thy heart,
Might still have risen from out the grave of strife,
And found a nobler duty than to part.
But of thy virtues diest thou make a vice,
Trafficking with them in a purpose cold,
For present anger and for future gold—
And buying other's grief at any price.
And thus once enter'd into crooked ways,
The early truth, which was thy proper praise,
Did not still walk beside thee—but at times,
And with a breast unknowing its own crimes,
Deceit, avarice incompatible,
Equivocations, and the thoughts which dwell
In Janus-spirits—the significant eye
Which learns to lie with silence—the pretext
Of Prudence, with advantages annex'd—
The acquiescence in all things which tend,
No matter how, to the desired end—
All found a place in thy philosophy,
The means were worthy, and the end is won—
I would not do by thee as thou hast done!

STANZAS.

"COULD LOVE FOR EVER."

Could Love for ever
Run like a river,
And Time's endeavor
Be tried in vain—
No other pleasure
With this could measure;
And like a treasure
We'd hug the chain.
But since our sighing
Ends not in dying,
And, form'd for flying,

Love plumes his wing
Then for this reason
Let's love a season,
But let that season be only Spring.

When lovers parted
Feel broken-hearted
And all hopes are thwarted,
Expect to die;
A few years older,
Ah! how much colder
They might behold her
For whom they sigh.
When link'd together,
In every weather,
They pluck Love's feather
From out his wing—
He'll stay for ever,
But sadly shiver
Without his plumage, when past the Spring.

Like Chiefs of Faction
His life is action—
A formal passion
That curbs his reign,
Obscures his glory,
Despots, hence, he
Such terr'd but the
Quits w— but vain.
Still, stillly no ming
With ban too du'hcing,
His pow'r cing,
He musea on—
Repose but cloys him,
Retreat destroys him,

Love brooks not a degraded throne

Wait not, fond lover:
Till years are over,
And then recover,
As from a dream.
While each bewailing
The other's falling,
With wrath and railing
All hideous seem—
While first decreasing,
Yet not quite ceasing,
Wait not till teazing
All passion blight:
If once diminish'd
Love's reign is finish'd—
Then part in friendship,—and bid good night.

So shall Affection,
To recollection
The dear connection
Bring back with joy;
You had not waited
Till, tired or hâ'ted,
Your passions sated
Began to cloy.
Your last embraces
Leave no cold traces—
The same fond faces
As through the past:
And eyes, the mirrors
Of your sweet errors
Reflect but rapture—not least though last.
Our English maids are long to woo,
And frigid even in possession:
And if their charms be fair to view,
Their lips are slow at Love's confession:
But born beneath a brighter sun,
For love ordain'd the Spanish maid is,
And who,—when fondly, fairly won,— Enchants you like the girl of Cadiz?

The Spanish maid is no coquette,
Nor joys to see a lover tremble,
And if she love, or if she hate,
Alike she knows not to disguise.
Her heart can ne'er be bought or sold—
How'er it beats, 'tis beats sincerely;
And, though it will not bend to gold,
'Twill love you long and love you dearly.

The Spanish girl that meets your love,
Ne'er taunts you with a mock denial,
For every thought is bent to prove
Her passion in the hour of trial.
When thro'ning foemen menace Spain,
She dares the deed and shares the danger
And should her lover press the plain,
She hurls the spear, her love's avenger.

And when, beneath the evening star,
She mingles in the gay Bolo'o
Or sings to her attuned guitar
Of Christian knight or Moorish hero,
Or counts her beads with fairy hand
Beneath the twinkling rays of Hesper,
Or joins devotion's choral band,
To chant the sweet and hallow'd vesper.

In each her charms the heart must move
Of all who venture to behold her
Then let not maids less fair reprove
Because her bosom is not colder;
Through many a clime 'tis mine to roam
Where many a soft and melting maid is,
But none abroad, and few at home,
May match the dark-eyed girl of Cadiz.

THE THIRD ACT OF MANFRED,
IN ITS ORIGINAL SHAPE, AS FIRST SENT TO THE PUBLISHER.

SCENE I.

A Hall in the Castle of Manfred.

Manfred and Herman.

Man. What is the hour?

Her. It wants but one till sunset
And promises a lovely twilight.

Man. Say,
Are all things so disposed of in the tower
As I directed?

Her. All, my lord, are ready:
Here is the key and casket.

Man. It is well.
Thou may'st retire.

Her. My lord, the Abbot of St. Maurice craves
To greet your presence.

Exit the Abbot of St. Maurice.

Abbot. Peace be with Count Manfred!

Man. Thanks, holy father! welcome to these walls;
Thy presence honors them, and bless those
Who dwell within them.

Abbot. Would it were so, Count; but I would fain confer with thee alone.

Man. Herman retire. What would my reverend guest?

Abbot. Thus, without prelude,—Age and zeal thy office,
And good intent, must plead my privilege:
Our near, though not acquainted, neighborhood.
May also be my herald: Rumors strange,
And of unholy nature, are abroad,
And busy with thy name—a noble name
For centuries; may he who bears it now
Transmit it unimpaired!

Man. Proceed,—I listen.

Abbot. 'Tis said thou holdest converse with the things
Which are forbidden to the search of man;
That with the dwellers of the dark abodes,
The many evil and unheavenly spirits
Which walk the valley of the shade of death,
Thou communest. I know that with mankind,
Thy fellows in creation, thou dost rarely Exchange thy thoughts, and that thy solitude
Is as an anchorite's, were it but holy.

Man. And what are they who do avouch these things?

Abbot. My pious brethren—the scared peasantry—
Even thy own vassals—who do look on thee
With most unquiet eyes. Thy life's in peril.

Man. Take it.

Abbot. I come to save, and not destroy—
I would not pry into thy secret soul;
But if these things be sooth, there still is time
For penitence and pity: reconcile thee
With the true church, and through the church to heaven.

Man. I hear thee. This is my reply; whate'er
I may have been, or am, doth rest between Heaven and myself.—I shall not choose a mortal
To be my mediator. Have I sinn'd Against your ordinances? prove and punish! *

Abbot. Then, hear and tremble! for the head
Of him who in the mail of innate hardihood
Would shield himself, and battle for his sins,
There is the stake on earth, and beyond earth eternal—

Man. Charity, most reverend father,
Becomes thy lips so much more than this menace,
That I would call thee back to: it but say,
What wouldst thou with me?

Abbot. Things that would shake thee—but I keep them back,
And give thee till to-morrow to repent.
Then if thou dost not all devote thyself
To penitence, and with gift of all thy lands
To the monastery—

Man. I understand thee,—well.

Abbot. Expect no mercy; I have warned thee.

Man. (opening the casket.) Stop—
There is a gift for thee within this casket.

[Manfred opens the casket, strikes a light,
And burns some incense.

Ho! Asharoth!
The Demon Asharoth appears, singing as fol-

ows:

Abbot. I fear thee not,—hence—

Avaunt thee, evil one!—help, ho! without there!

Man. Convey this man to the Shreckhorn—to its peak—
To its extreme peak—watch with him there
From now till sunrise; let him gaze, and know
He ne'er again will be so near to heaven,
But harm him not; and when the morrow breaks,
Set him down safe in his cell—away with him!

Ash. Had I not better bring his brethren too,
Convent and all to bear him company?

Man. No, this will serve for the present. Take him up.

Ash. Come, friar! now an exorcism or two,
And we shall fly the lighter.

[Ashtaroth disappears with the Abbot, singing as follows:

A prodigal son and a maid undone,
And a widow re-wedded within the year;
And a worldly monk and a pregnant nun,
Are things which every day appear.

MANFRED alone.

Man Why would this fool break in on me, and force
My art to pranks fantastical?—no matter,
It was not of my seeking. My heart sickens
And weighs a fix’d foreboding on my soul;
But it is calm—calm as a sullen sea
After the hurricane; the winds are still,
But the cold waves swell high and heavily,
And there is danger in them. Such a rest
Is no repose. My life hath been a combat,
And every thought a wound, till I am scar’d
In the immortal part of me.—What now?

* Re-enter HERMAN.

Herr My lord, you bade me wait on you at sunset;
He sinks behind the mountain.

Man. Doth he so?
I will look on him.

[MANFRED advances to the window of the hall.
Glorious orb!* the idol
Of early nature, and the vigorous race
Of undisposed mankind, the giant sons
Of the embraces of angels, with a sex
More beautiful than they, which did draw down
The erring spirits who can ne’er return.—
Most glorious orb! that were a worship, ere
The mystery of thy making was reveal’d!
Thou earliest minister of the Almighty,
Which gladden’d, on their mountain tops, the hearts
Of the Chaldean shepherds, till they pour’d
Themselves in orisons! thou material God!
And representative of the Unknown—
Who chose thee for his shadow! thou chief star!
Centre of many stars! which mak’st our earth
Endurable, and temperest the hues
And hearts of all who walk within thy raves!
Sire of the seasons! Monarch of theclimes,
And those who dwell in them! for, near or far,
Our inborn spirits have a tint of thee,
Even as our outward aspects;—thou dost rise,
And shine, and set in glory! Fare thee well!
I ne’er shall see thee more. As my first glance
Of love and wonder for thee, then take
My latest look: thou wilt not beam on one
To whom the gifts of life and warmth have been
Of a more fatal nature. He is gone:
I follow.

[Exit MANFRED.

SCENE II.

The Mountains.—The Castle of Manfred at some distance.—A Terrace before a Tower.—Time, Twilight.

HERMAN, MANUEL, and other Dependants of MANFRED.

Her. Tis strange enough; night after night, for years,
He hath pursed long vigil in this tower,
Without a witness. I have been within it,—
So have we all been ofttimes; but from it,
Or its contents, it were impossible
To draw conclusions absolute of aught
His studies tend to. To be sure, there is

One chamber where none enter; I would give
The fee of what I have to come these three years,
To pore upon its mysteries.

Manuel. "Twere dangerous;
Content thyself with what thou know’st already.
Her. Ah! Manuel! thou art elderly and wise,
And couldst say much; thou hast dwelt within the castle—
How many years is’t?

Manuel. Ere Count-Manfred’s birth
I served his father, whom he nought resembled.
Her. There be more sons in like predicament
But wherein—do they differ?

Manuel. I speak not
Of features or of form, but mind and habits;
Count Sigismund was proud,—but gay and free,—
A warrior and a reveller; he dwelt not
With books and solitude, nor made the night
A gloomy vigil, but a festal time,
Merrier than day, he did not walk the rocks
And forests like a wolf, nor turn aside
From men and their delights.

Her. Beshrew the hour,
But those were jocund times! I would that such
Would visit the old walls again; they look
As if they had forgotten them.

Manuel. These walls
Must change their chieftain first. Oh! I have seen
Some strange things in these few years.*

Her. Come, be friendly;
Relate us some, to while away our watch:
I’ve heard thee darkly speak of an event
Which happen’d hereabouts, by this same tower.
Manuel. That was a night indeed! I do remember
’Twas twilight, as it may be now, and such Another evening:—yon red cloud, which rests
On Eigheer’s pinnacle, so rested then,—
So like it that it might be the same; the wind
Was faint and gusty, and the mountain sways
Began to glitter with the climbing moon;
Count Manfred was, as now, within his tower,—
How occupied, we knew not, but with him
The sole companion of his wanderings
And watchings—her, whom of all earthly things
That lived, the only thing seem’d to love,
As he, indeed, by blood was bound to do,
The lady Astarte, his—

Her. Look—look—the tower—
The tower’s on fire. Oh, heavens and earth! what sound,
What dreadful sound is that?

[A crash like thunder.

Manuel. Help, help, there!—to the rescue of the Count,
The Count’s in danger,—what ho! thre, approach! [The Servants, Vassals, and Peasantry approach, stupefied with terror.
If there be any of you who have heart
And love of human kind, and will to aid
Those in distress—pause not—but follow me—
The portal’s open, follow. [MANUEL goes in
Her. Come—Who follows?
What, none of ye?—ye recreants! shiver then
Without. I will not see old Manuel risk
His few remaining years unaided.

[HERMAN goes in

* Altered, in the present form to "Some strange things in them, Herman."
Hark!—

No—al is silent—not a breath—the flame
Which shot forth such a blaze is also gone:
What may this mean? Let's enter!

Faith, not I,—

Not that, if one, or two, or more, will join,
I then will stay behind; but, for my part,
I do not see precisely to what end.

Come.

Cease your vain prating—come.

I hear a word

Or two—but indistinctly—what is next?

What's to be done? let's bear him to the castle.

He changes rapidly.

'Twill soon be over.

Oh! what a death is this! that I should live
To shake my gray hairs over the last chief
Of the house of Sigismund.—And such a death!

Alone—we know not how—unshrived—untended—

With strange accompaniments and fearful signs—

I shudder at the sight—but must not leave him.

Old man! 'tis not so difficult to die.

He departs

Whither? I dread to think—but he is gone!

DEDICATION.

I.

SOUTHBY You're a poet—Poet-laureate,
And representative of all the race,
Although 'tis true that you turned out a Tory at Last,—yours has lately been a common case,—
And now, my Epic Renegade! what are ye at?
With all the Lakers, in and out of place?
A nest of tuneful persons, to my eye
Like "four and twenty Blackbirds in a pye!

II.

"Which pye being open'd they began to sing,"
(This old song and new simile holds good,)
"A dainty dish to set before the King;"
Or Regent, who admires such kind of food:—
And Coleridge, too, has lately taken wing,
But like a hawk encumber'd with his hood,—
Explaining metaphysics to the nation—
I wish he would explain his Explanation.*

III.

You, Bob! are rather insolent, you know,
At being disappointed in your wish
To supersede all warblers here below,
And be the only Blackbird in the dish;
And then you overstrain yourself, or so,
And tumble downward like the flying fish
Gaspimg on deck, because you soar too high, Bob,
And fall, for lack of moisture quite a dry, Bob!

IV.

And Wordsworth, in a rather long "Excursion;"
(I think the quarto holds five hundred pages,) Has given a sample from the stavy version
Of his new system to perplex the sages
'Tis poetry—at least by his assertion,
And may appear so when the dog-star rages—
And he who understands it would be able
To add a story to the Tower of Babel.

V.

You—Gentlemen! by dint of long secession
From better company, have kept your own
At Keswick, and, through still continued fusion
Of one another's minds, at last have grown
To deem as a most logical conclusion,
That Poesy hath wreathes for you alone
There is a narrowness in such a notion,
Which makes me wish you'd change your lakes for ocean.

VI.

I would not imitate the petty thought,
Nor coin my self-love to so base a vice,
For all the glory your conversion brought,
Since gold alone should not have been its price.
You have your salary; wasn't for that you wrought!
And Wordsworth has his place in the Excise.*
You're shabby fellows—true—but poets still,
And duly seated on the immortal hill.

VII.

Your bays may hide the boldness of your knees—
Perhaps some virtuous blushes,—let them go—
To you I envy neither fruit nor boughs—
And for the fame you would engross below,
The field is universal, and allows
Scope to all such as feel the inherent glow:—
Scott, Rogers, Campbell, Moore, and Crabbe will Gainst you the question with posterity.

VIII.

For me, who, wandering with pedestrian Muses,
Contend not with you on the winged steed,
I wish your fate may yield ye, when she chooses
The fame you envy, and the skill you need;

* Wordsworth's place may be in the Customs,—it is, I think, in that of the Excise—besides another at Lord Leisestile's table, where this poetical character and political parasite lists up the crumbs with a heartless alacrity; we converted Jacobus to long subsided into the churlish symphonist of the worst prejucice of the aristocracy.
And recollect a poet nothing loses
In giving to his brethren their full meed
Of merit, and complaint of present days
Is not the certain path to future praise.

IX.
He that reserves his laurels for posterity
(Who does not often claim the bright reversion)
Has generally no great crop to spare it, he Being only injured by his own assertion;
And although here and there some glorious rarity
Arise like Titan from the sea's immersion,
The major part of such appellants go
To—God knows where—for no one else can know.

X.
If, fallen in evil days on evil tongues,
Milton appeal'd to the Avenger, Time,
If Time, the Avenger, execrates his wrongs,
And makes the word "Miltonic" mean "sublime:"
He deign'd not to belle his soul in songs,
Nor turn his very talent to crime;
He did not loose the Sire to laud the Son,
But closed the tyrant-hater he began.

XI.
Think'st thou, could he—the blind Old Man arise
Like Samuel from the grave, to freeze once more
The blood of monarchs with his prophecies,
Or be alive again—again all hor
With time and trials, and those helpless eyes,
And heartless daughters—worn—and pale—and poor,
Would he adore a sultan? he obey
The intellectual ennui Castleragh!?&

XII.
Cold-blooded, smooth-faced, placid miscreant!
Dabbling its sleek young hands in Erin's gore,
And thus for wider carnage taught to pant,
Transferr'd to gorge upon a sister shore,
The vulgarast tool that Tyranny could want,
With just enough of talent, and no more,
To lengthen fetters by another fix'd,
And offer poison long already mix'd.

[Some text not transcribed due to illegibility or damage]

An orator of such set trash of phrase
Ineffably—legitimately vile,
That even its grossest flatterers dare not praise
Nor foes—all nations—condescend to smile.—
Not even a sprightly blinder's spark can blaze
From that Ixion grindstone's ceaseless toil,
That turns and turns to give the world a notion
Of endless torments and perpetual motion

XIV.
A bungler even in its disgusting trade,
And botching, patching, leaving still behind
Something of which its masters are afraid,
States to be curb'd, and thoughts to be confined,
Conspiracy or Congress to be made—
Cobbling at manacles for all mankind—
A tinkering slave-maker, who mends old chains,
With God and man's abhorrence for its gains.

XV.
If we may judge of matter by the mind,
Emasculated to the narrow it
Hath but two objects, how to serve, and bind,
Deeming the chain it wears even men may fit.
Eutropius of its many masters—blind
To worth as freedom, wisdom as to wit,
Fearless—because no feeling dwells in ice,
Its very courage stagnates to a vice.

XVI.
Where shall I turn me not to view its bonds,
For I will never feel them;—Italy!
Thy late reviving Roman soul despots [thee—
Beneath the lie this State—thing breath'd o'er
Thy clanking chain, and Erin's yet green wounds
Have tongues—tongues to cry aloud for me.
Europe has slaves—allies—kings—armies still,
And Soutrey lives to sing them very ill.

XVII.
Meantime—S. Laureate—I proceed to dedicate
In honest simple verse, this song to you.
And, if in flattering strains I do not predicate,
'Tis that I still retain my "buff and blue;"
My politics as yet are all to educate:
Apostasy so fashionable, too,
To keep one creed's a task grown quite Herculean
Is it not so, my Tory, ultra-Julian? +

  Ardashir, see Gibbon.

† I alias not to our friend Landor's heroic, the traitor Count Julian, but to Gibbon's hero, vulgarly called "The Apotheosis."
DON JUAN.

CANTO I.

I.
I WANT a hero—an uncommon want.
When every year and month sends forth a new one,
Till, after cloying the gazettes with cant,
The age discovers he is not the true one;
Of such as these I should not care to vaunt,
I'll therefore take our ancient friend Don Juan:
We all have seen him in the pantomime
Sent to the devil somewhat ere his time.

II.
Vernon, the butcher Cumberland, Wolfe, Hawke,
Prince Ferdinand, Cranby, Burgoyne, Keppel,
Evil and good, have had their tithe of talk, (Howe,
And fill'd their sign-posts then, like Wellesley now;
Each in their turn like Banquo's monarchs stalk,
Followers of fame, "ninearrow" of that sort:
France, too, had Buonapart and Dumourier
Recorded in the Moniteur and Courier.

III.
Barnave, Brissot, Condorcet, Mirabeau,
Petion, Clootz, Danton, Marat, La Fayette,
Were French, and famous people, as we know,
And there were others, scarce forgotten yet,
Joubert, Hoche, Marceau, Lannes, Desaix, Moreau,
With many of the military set,
Exceedingly remarkable at times,
But not at all adapted to my rhymes.

IV.
Nelson was once Britannia's god of war,
And still should be so, but the tide is turn'd;
There's no more to be said of Trafalgar,
'Tis with our hero quietly inurn'd:
Because the army's grown more populous,
At which the naval people are concern'd:
Besides, the prince is all for the land-service,
Forgetting Duncan, Nelson, Howe, and Jervis.

V.
Brave men were living before Agamennon,
And since, exceeding valorous and sage,
A good deal like him too, though quite the same none,
But then they shone not on the poet's page,
And so have been forgotten—I condemn none,
But can't find any in the present age
Fit for my poem, (that is, for my new one;) So, as I have said, I'll take my friend Don Juan.

VI.
Most epic poets plunge in "medias res;" (Horace makes this the heroic turnpike road,
And then your hero tells, where'er you please,
What went before—by way of episode,
While seated after dinner at his ease,
Beside his mistress in some soft abode,
Palace or garden, paradise or cavern,
Which serves the happy couple for a tavern.

VII.
That is the usual method, but not mine—
My way is to begin with the beginning:
The regularity of my design
Forbids all wanderings as the worst of sinning,
And therefore I shall open with a line,
(Although it cost me half an hour in spinning)
Narrating somewhat of Don Juan's father,
And also of his mother, if you'd rather.

VIII.
In Seville was he born, a pleasant city,
Famous for oranges and women—he
Who has not seen it will be much to pity,
So says the proverb—and I quite agree;
All of the Spanish towns is none more pretty,
Cadiz perhaps, but, that you soon may see—
Don Juan's parents lived beside the river,
A noble stream, and call'd the Guadalquivir.

IX.
His father's name was Jose—Don, of course
A true Hidalgo, free from every stain
Of Moor or Hebrew blood, he traced his source
Through the most Gothic gentlemen of Spain,
A better cavalier ne'er mounted horse,
'Or, being mounted, 'er got down again,
Than Jose who begot our hero, who Begot—but that's to come—Well, to renew—

X.
His mother was a learned lady, famed
For every branch of every science known—
In every Christian language ever named,
With virtues equall'd by her wit alone,
She made the cleverest people quite ashamed,
And even the good with inward envy groan,
Finding themselves so very much exceeded
In their own way by all the things that she did.

XI.
Her memory was a mine: she knew by heart
All Calderon and greater part of Lope,
So that if any actor miss'd his part,
She could have served him for the prompter's copy,
For her Feinagle's were an useless art,
And he himself obliged to shut up shop—he Could never make a memory so fine as
That which adorned the brain of Donna Inez.

XII.
Her favorite science was the mathematical,
Her noblest virtue was her magnanimity,
Her wit (she sometimes tried at wit) was Attic all,
Her serious sayings darken'd to sublimity;
In short, in all things she was fairly what I call
A prodigy—her morning dress was dimity,
Her evening silk, or, in the summer, muslin,
And other stuffs, with which I won't stay puzzling.

XIII.
She knew the Latin—that is, "the Lords prayer;" And Greek, the alphabet, I'm nearly sure;
She read some French romances here and there,
Although her mode of speaking was not pure.
For native Spanish she had no great care,
At least her conversation was obscure;
Her thoughts were theorems, her words a problem,
As if she deem'd that mystery would enable'em.
XIV.

She liked the English and the Hebrew tongue,
And said there was analogy between 'em;
She proved it somehow out of sacred song, [em;
But I must leave the proofs to those who've seen
But this I've heard her say, and can't be wrong, [em,
And all may think which way their judgments lean.
"Tis strange—the Hebrew noun which means 'I am,'
The English always use to govern d—n."

XV.

Some women use their tongues—she look'd a lecture,
Each eye a sermon, and her brow a homily,
An all-in-all sufficient self-director,
"Like the lamented late Sir Samuel Romily,
The Law's expounder, and the State's corrector,
Whose suicide was almost an anomaly—
One sad example more, that "All is vanity,"—
(The jury brought their verdict in "Insanity.")

XVI.

In short, she was a walking calculation, [covers
Miss Edgeworth's novels stepping from their Or Mrs. Trimmer's books on education,
"Or Gaiety's Wife" set out in quest of lovers,
Morality's prim personification,
In which not Envy's self a flaw discovers;
To others' share let "let female errors fall,"
For she had not even one—the worst of all.

XVII.

Oh! she was perfect past all parallel—
Of any modern female saint's comparison;
So far above the cunning powers of hell,
Her guardian angel had given up his garrison;
Even her minutest motions went as well
As those of the best piece-maid made by Harrison:
In virtues nothing earthily could surpass her,
Save thine "incomparable oil," Macasear.

XVIII.

Perfect she was, but as perfection is Insipid in this naughty world of ours,
Where our first parents never learn'd to kiss
Till they were exiled from their earlier bower's,
Where all was peace, and innocence, and bliss,
(I wonder how they got through the twelve hours,)
Don Jose, like a lineal son of Eve,
Went plucking various fruit without her leave.

XIX.

He was a mortal of the careless kind,
With no great love for learning or the learn'd,
Who chose to go where'er he had a mind,
And never dream'd his lady was concern'd;
The world, as usual, wickedly inclined
To see a kingdom or a house o'erturn'd,
Whisper'd he had a mistress, some said two;
But for domestic quarrels one will do.

XX.

Now Donna Inez had, with all her merit,
A great opinion of her own good qualities;
Neglect, indeed, requires a saint to bear it,
And such indeed she was in her moralities;
But then she had a devil of a spirit,
And sometimes mix'd up fancies with realities,
And let few opportunities escape
Of getting her liege lord into a scrape.

XXI.

This was an easy matter with a man
Oft in the wrong, and never on his guard,
And even the wisest, do the best they can,
Have moments, hours, and days, so unprepared,
That you might "brain them with their lady's fan."
And sometimes ladies hit exceeding hard,
And fans turn into faielines in fair hands,
And why and wherefore no one understands.

XXII.

'Tis a pity learned virgins over wod
With persons of no sort of education,
Or gentlemen who, though well-born and bred,
Grow tired of scientific conversation:
I don't choose to say much upon this head,
I'm a plain man, and in a single station,
But—oh! ye lords of ladies intellectual,
Inform us truly, have they not honpeck'd you a?

XXIII.

Don Jose and his lady quarrell'd—why
Not any of the many could divine,
Though several thousand people chose to try,
'Twas surely no concern of theirs nor mine:
I loathe that low vice, curiosity;
But if there's any thing in which I shine,
'Tis in arranging all my friends' affairs,
Not having, of my-own, domestic cares.

XXIV.

And so I interfered, and with the best
Intentions, but their treatment was not kind;
I think the foolish people were possess'd,
For neither of them could I ever find,
Although their porter afterwards confess'd—
But that's no matter, and the worst's behind,
For little Juan o' her me threw, down stairs,
A pail of housemaid's water unaware'd.

XXV.

A little curly-headed, good-for-nothing,
And mischief-making monkey from his birth;
His parents ne'er agreed except in doting
Upon the most unquiet imp on earth;
Instead of quarrelling had they been but both in neir sensel, they'd have sent young master fort7
7 school, or had him soundly whipp'd at home,
To teach him manners for the time to come.

XXVI.

Don Jose and the Donna Inez led
For some time an unhappy sort of life,
Wishing each-other, not divorced, but dead;
They lived respectably as man and wife,
Their conduct was exceedingly well-bred,
And gave no outward signs of inward strife,
Until at length the smother'd fire broke out,
And put the business past all kind of doubt.

XXVII.

For Inez call'd some druggists and physicians,
And tried to prove her loving lord was mad,
But as he had some lucid intermissions,
She next decided he was only bad;
Yet when they ask'd her for depostions,
No sort of explanation could be had,
Save that their duty both to man and God
Required this conduct—which seem'd very odd.
XXVIII.
She kept a journal, where his faults were noted,
And open'd certain trunks of books and letters,
All which might, if occasion served, be quoted;
And then she had all Seville for abettors,
Besides her good old grandmother, (who doted;) the hearers of her case became repeaters,
Then advocates, inquisitors, and judges,
Some for amusement, others for old grudges.

XXIX.
And then this best and meekest woman bore
With such serenity her husband's woes,
Just as the Spartan ladies did of yore,
Who saw their spouses kill'd, and nobly chose
Never to say a word about them more—
Calmly she heard each calumny that rose,
And saw his agonies with such sublimity,
That all the world exclaim'd, 'What magninimity!' XXX.
No doubt, this patience, when the world is damning
Is philosophic in our former friends; [as,
'Tis also pleasant to be deem'd magnanimous,
The more so in obtaining our own ends;
And what the lawyers call a "matus animus."
Conduct like this by-by no means comprehends;
Revenge in person's certainly no virtue,
But then 'tis not my fault if others hurt you.

XXXI.
And if our quarrels should rip up old stories,
And help them with a lie or two additional,
I'm not to blame, as you well know, no more is Any one else—they were become traditional;
Besides, their resurrection aids our glories
By contrast, which is what we just were wishing
And science profits by this resurrection—
Dead scandals form good subjects for dissection.

XXXII.
Their friends had tried a reconciliation,
Then their relations, who made matters worse;
'Twere hard to tell upon a like occasion
To whom it may be best to have recourse—
I can't say much for friend or yet relation:)
The lawyers did their utmost for divorce,
But scarce a fee was paid on either side
Before, unluckily, Don Jose died.

XXXIII.
He died: and most unluckily, because,
According to all hints I could collect
From counsel learned in those kind of laws,
(Although their talk's obscure and circumstinct,) his death contriv'd to spoil a charming cause;
A thousand pities also with respect
To public feeling, which on this occasion
Was manifested in a great sensation.

XXXIV.
But ah! he died; and buried with him lay
The public feeling and the lawyers' faces:
His house was sold, his servants sent away,
A Jew took one of his two mistresses,
A priest the other—at least so they say:
I ask'd the doctors after his disease—
He died of the slow fever called the tertian,
And left his widow to her own sverion.

XXXV.
Yet Jose was an honorable man,
That I must say, who knew him very well;
Therefore his frailties I'll no further scan,
Indeed there were not many more to tell;
And if his passions now and then outran
Discretion, and were not so peaceable
As Numas's, (who was also named Pompillius,) he had been ill brought up, and was bilious.

XXXVI.
What'er might be his worthlessness or worth,
Poor fellow! he had many things to wound him,
Let's own, since it can do no good on earth;
It was a trying moment that which found him,
Standing alone beside his desolate hearth, [him,
Where all his household gods lay shiver'd round
No choice was left his feelings or his pride,
Save death or Doctors' Commons—so he died.

XXXVII.
Dying intestate, Juan was sole heir
To a chancery-suit, and messages, and lands,
Which, with a long minority and care,
Promised to turn out well in proper hands;
Inez became sole guardian, which was fair,
And answer'd but to nature's just demands;
An only son left with an only mother
Is brought up much more wisely than another.

XXXVIII.
Sages of women, even of widows, she
Resolved that Juan should be quite a paragon,
And worthy of the noblest pedigrees,
(His sire was of Castile, his dam from Arragon:)
Then for accomplishments of chivalry,
In case our lord the king should go to war again,
He learn'd the arts of riding, fencing, gunnery,
And how to scale a fortress—or a nunnery

XXXIX.
But that which Donna Inez most desired,
And saw herself each day before all
The learned tutors whom for him she hired,
Was that his breeding should be strictly moral:
Much into all his studies she inquired,
And so they were submitted first to her, all,
Arts, sciences, no branch was made a mystery
To Juan's eyes, excepting natural history.

XL.
The languages, especially the dead,
The sciences, and most of all the abstruse,
The arts, at least all such as could be said
To be the most remote from common use
In all these he was much and deeply read;
But not a page of any thing that's loose,
Or hints continuation of the species,
Was ever suffered, lest he should grow vicious.

XLI.
His classic studies made a little puzzle,
Because of filthy loves of gods and goddesses,
Who in the earlier ages raised a bustle,
But never put on pantaloons or bodice;
His reverend tutors had at times a tussle,
And for their Æneas, Iliads, and Odysseys,
Were forced to make an odd sort of apology;
For Donna Inez dreading the mythology.
XLII.

Ovid’s a rake, as half his verses show him;
Anacreon’s morals are a still worse sample;
Catullus scarcely had a decent poem;
I don’t think Sappho’s Ode a good example,
Although Longinus tells us there is no hymn [p16];
Where the sublime soars forth on wings more am-
But Virgil’s songs are pure, except that horrid one Beginning with “For manis pastor Corydon.”

XLIII.

Lucrétius’ irreligion is too strong
For early stomachs, to prove wholesome food,
- can’t help thinking—might be wrong.
Although no doubt his real intent was good,
For speaking out so plainly in his song,
So much indeed as to be downright rude:
And then what proper person can be partial
To all those nauseous epigrams of Martial?

XLIV.

Juan was taught from out the best edition,
Expergurated by learned men, who place;
Judiciously, from out the schoolboy’s vision,
This greater part—but it could not be done.
Too much their modest bard by this omission,
And pitying sore his mutilated case,
They only add them in an appendix,*
Which saves, in fact, the trouble of an index;

XLV.

For there we have them all “at one fell swoop,”
Instead of being scatter’d through the pages;
They stand forth marshall’d in a handsome troop,
To meet the ingenuous youth of future ages,
I’ll some less rigid editor shall stoop
To call them back into their separate cages,
Instead of standing staring altogether,
Like garden gods—and not so decent, either.

XLVI.

The Missal too (it was the family Missal)
Was ornamented in a sort of way
Which ancient mass-books often are, and this all Kinds of grotesques illumined; and how they
Who saw those figures on the margin kiss all,
Could turn their optic to the text and pray,
Is more than I know—but Don Juan’s mother
Kept this herself, and gave her son another.

XLVII.

Sermons he read, and lectures he endured,
And homilies, and lives of all the saints;
To Jerome and to Chrysostom inured,
He did not take such studies for restraint;
But how faith is acquired, and then insured,
So well not one of the aforesaid pains
As Saint Augustine, in his fine Confessions,
Which made the reader envy his transgressions

XLVIII.

This, too, was a seal’d book to little Juan—
I can’t but say that his mamma was right,
If such an education was the true one.
She scarcely trusted him from out her sight;
Her maids were old, and if she took a new one,
You might be sure she was a perfect fright;
She did this during even her husband’s life—
I recommend as much to every wife.

XLIX.

Young Juan wax’d in goodness and grace
At six a charming child, and at eleven
With all the promise of as fine a face
As c’er to man’s maturer growth was given:
He studied steadily, and grew space,
And seemed, at least, in the right road to heaven
For half his days were pass’d at church, the other
Between his tutors, confessor, and mother,

L.

At six, I said he was a charming child,
At twelve, he was a fine, but quiet boy
Although in infancy a little wild
They tamed him down among them: to destroy
His natural spirit not in vain they toil’d,
At least it seemed so; and his mother’s joy
Was to declare how sage, and still, and steady,
Her young philosopher was grown already.

L.

I had my doubts, perhaps I have them still.
But what I say is neither here nor there;
I knew his father well, and have some skill
In character—but it could not be fair
From sure to son to augur good or ill;
He and his wife were an ill-sorted pair—
But scandal’s my aversion—I protest
Against all evil speaking, even in jest.

LII.

For my part I say nothing—nothing—but
This I will say—my reasons are my own—
That if I had an only son to put
To school (as God be praised that I have none)
’Tis not with Donna Inez I would shut
Him up to learn his catechism alone;
No—no—I’d send him out betimes to college,
For there it was I pick’d up my own knowledge

LIII.

For there one learns—’tis not for me to boast,
Though I acquired—but I pass over that,
As well as all the Greek I since have lost:
I say that there’s the place—but “Verum rat.
I think I pick’d up, too, as well as most,
Knowledge of matters—but, no matter what—
I never married—but, I think, I know
That sons should not be educated so.

LIV.

Young Juan now was sixteen years of age,
Tall, handsome, slender, but well knit; he seemed Active, though not so sprightly, as a page;
And every body but his mother deem’d
Him almost man; but she flew in a rage,
And bit her lips (for else she might have screamed)
If any said so, for to be precious
Was in her eyes a thing the most atrocious.

LV.

Among her numerous acquaintance, all
Selected for discretion and devotion,
There was the Donna Julia, whom to call
Pretty were but to give a feeble notion
Of many charms, in her as natural
As sweetness to the flower, or salt to ocean,
Her zone to Venus, or his bow to Cupid,
(But this last simile is trite and stupid.)
LVI.
The darkness of her oriental eye
Accorded with her Moorish origin:
(Her blood was not all Spanish, by the by;
In Spain, you know, this is a sort of sin.)
When proud Grenada fell, and, forced to fly,
Debadild wept, of Donna Julia's kin
Some went to Africa, some stay'd in Spain,
Her great-great-grandmamma chose to remain.

LVII.
She married (I forget the pedigree)
With an Hidalgo, who transmitted down
His blood less noble than such blood should be:
At such alliances his sires would frown,
In that point so precise in each degree
That they bred in and in, as might be shown,
Marrying their cousins—nay, their aunts and nieces,
Which always spoils the breed, if it increases.

LVIII.
This heathenish cross restored the breed again,
Ruin'd its blood, but much improved its flesh;
For, from a root, the ugliest in Old Spain,
Sprung up a 'planch as beautiful as fresh,
The sons no more were short, the daughters plain;
But there's a rumor which I fain would hush—
'Tis said that Donna Julia's grandmamma
Produced her Don more heirs at love than law.

LIX.
However this might be, the race went on Improving still through every generation
Until it centered in an only son,
Who left an only daughter; my narration
May have suggested that this single one
Could be but Julia, (who on this occasion
I shall have much to speak about,) and she
Was married, charming, chaste, and twenty-three.

LX.
Her eye (I'm very fond of handsome eyes)
Was large and dark, suppressing half its fire
Until she spoke, then, through its soft disguise
Flash'd an expression more of pride than ire,
And love than either; and there would arise
A something in them which was not desire,
But would have been, perhaps, but for the soul
Which struggled through and chasten'd down the whole.

LXI.
Her glossy hair was cluster'd o'er a brow
Bright with intelligence, and fair and smooth;
Her eyebrow's shape was like the aerial bow,
Her cheek all purple with the beam of youth,
Mounting at times to a transparent glow,
As if her veins ran lightning; she, in sooth,
Possess'd an air and grace by no means common:
Her stature tall—I hate a dumpy woman.

LXII.
Wedded she was some years, and to a man
Of fifty, and such husbands are in plenty;
And yet, I think, instead of such a one,
'Twere better to have two of five-and-twenty,
Especially in countries near the sun:
And now I think on't, "mi vien in mente,"
Ladies (of) the most uneasy virtue,
Prefer a spouse whose age is short of thirty.

LXIII.
'Tis a sad thing, I cannot choose but say,
And all the fault of that indescent sun,
Who cannot leave alone our helpless clay,
But will keep baking, broiling, burning on,
That, howsoever people fast and pray,
The flesh is frail, and so the soul undone:
What men call gallantry, and gods adultery,
Is much more common where the climates are sultry.

LXIV.
Happy the nations of the moral north!
Where all is virtue, and the winter season
Sends sin without a rag on, shivering forth.
('Twas snow that brought St. Anthony to reason;
Where juries cast up what a wife is worth,
By laying whate'er sum, in mulct, they please on
The lover, who must pay a handsome price,
Because it is a marketable vice.

LXV.
Alfonso was the name of Julia's lord,
A man well looking for his years, and who
Was neither much beloved nor yet abhor'd:
They lived together as most people do,
Suffering each others' foibles by accord,
And not exactly either one or two;
Yet he was jealous, though he did not show it
For jealousy dislikes the world to know it.

LXVI.
Julia was—yet I never could see why—
With Donna Inez quite a favorite friend;
Between their tastes there was small sympathy,
For not a line had Julia ever penn'd:
Some people whisper (but no doubt they lie,)
For malice still imputes some private end
That Inez had, ere Don Alfonso's marriage,
Forgot with him her very prudent carriage;

LXVII.
And that, still keeping up the old connexion,
Which time had lately render'd much more chaste
She took his lady also in affection,
And certainly this course was much the best.
She flatter'd Julia with her sage protection,
And complimented Don Alfonso's taste,
And if she could not (who can?) silence scandal,
At least she left it a more slender handle.

LXVIII.
I can't tell whether Julia saw the affair
With other people's eyes, or if her own
Discoveries made, but none could be aware
Of this, at least no symptom e'er was shown;
Perhaps she did not know, or did not care,
Indifferent from the first or callous grown:
I'm really puzzled what to think or say,
She kept her counsel in so close a way.

LXIX.
Juan she saw; and, as a pretty child,
Caress'd him often, such a thing might be Quite innocently done, and harmless styled
When she had twenty years, and thirteen he,
But I am not so sure I should have smiled
When he was sixteen, Julia twenty-three:
These few short years make wondrous alterations
Particularly among sun-burnt nations.
LXX.
Whate'er the cause might be, they had become Changed; for the dame grew distant, the youth shy;
Their looks cast down their greetings almost dumb.
And much embarrassment in either eye;
There surely will be little doubt with some
That Donna Julia knew the reason why,
But as for Juan, he had no more motion
Than he who never saw the sea of ocean.

LXXI.
Yet Julia's very coldness still was kind,
And tremulously gentle her small hand
Withdraw itself from his, but left behind
A little pressure, thrilling, and so bland
And slight, so very slight, that to the mind
'Twas but a doubt; but ne'er magician's wand
Wrought change with all Armida's fiery art
Like what this light touch left on Juan's heart.

LXXII.
And if she met him, though she smiled no more,
She looked a sadness sweeter than her smile,
As if her heart had deeper thoughts in store
She must not own, but cherish'd more the while,
For that compression in its burning bore
Even innocence itself has many a wile,
And will not dare to trust itself with truth,
And love is taught hypocrisy from youth.

LXXIII.
But passion most dissembles, yet betrays
Even by its darkness; as the blackest sky
Foretells the heaviest tempest, it displays
Its working through the vainly-guarded eye,
And in whatever aspect it arrays
Itself, 'tis still the same hypocrisy;
Coldness or anger, even disdain or hate
Are marks it often wears, and still too late.

LXXIV.
Then there were sighs, the deeper for suppression,
And stolen glances, sweeter for the theft,
And burning blushes, though for no transgression,
Tremblings when met, and restlessness when left;
All these are little preludes to possession,
Of which young passion cannot be bereft,
And merely tend to show how greatly love is Embrass'd at first starting with a novice.

LXXV.
Poor Julia's heart was in an awkward state
She felt it going, and resolved to make
The noblest efforts for herself and mate,
For honor's, pride's, religion's, virtue's sake:
Her resolutions were most truly great,
And almost might have made a Tarquin quake—
She pray'd the Virgin Mary for her grace,
As being the best judge of a lady's case.

LXXVI.
She vow'd she never would see Juan more,
And next day paid a visit to his mother,
And look'd extremely at the opening door,
Which, by the Virgin's grace, let in another;
Grateful she was, and yet a little sore—
Again it opens, it can be no other,
'Tis surely Juan now!—No! I'm afraid
That night the Virgin was no further pray'd.

LXXVII.
She now determined that a virtuous woman
Should rather face and overcome temptation,
That flight was base and dastardly, and no man
Should ever give her heart the least sensation,
That is to say a thought, beyond the common
Preference that we must feel upon occasion
For people who are pleasanter than others,
But then they only seem so many brothers.

LXXVIII.
And even if by chance—and who can tell?
The devil's so very sly—she should discover
That all within is not so very well,
And if, still free, that such or such a lover
Might please perhaps, a virtuous wife can quell
Such thoughts, and be the better when they're over
And, if the man should ask, 'tis but de. jial.
I recommend young ladies to make trial.

LXXIX.
And then there are such things as love divine,
Bright and immaculate, unmixed and pure
Such as the angels think so very fine,
And matrons, who would be no less secure,
Platonic, perfect, "just such love as mine;"
Thus Julia said—and thought so, to be sure,
And so I'd have her think, were I the man
On whom her reveries celestial ran.

LXXX.
Such love is innocent and may exist
Between young persons without any danger;
A hand may first, and then a lip be kissed;
For my part, to such doings I'm a stranger,
But hear these freedoms for the utmost list
Of all o'er which such love may be a ranger:
If people go beyond, 'tis quite a crime
But not my fault—I tell them all in time.

LXXXI.
Love, then, but love within its proper limits,
Was Julia's innocent determination
In young Don Juan's favor, and to him its Exertion might be useful on occasion;
And, lighted at too pure a shrine to dim its Etherial lustre, with what sweet persuasion
He might be taught, by love and her together—
I really don't know what, nor Julia either.

LXXXII.
Fraught with this fine intention, and well fenced
In mail of proof—her purity of soul,
She, for the future, of her strength convinced,
And that her honor was a rock, or mole,
Exceeding sagely from that hour dispensed
With any kind of troublesome control.
But whether Julia to the task was equal
Is that which must be mentioned in the sequel.

LXXXIII.
Her plan she deemed both innocent and feasible,
And, surely, with a stippling of sixteen ble
Not scandal's sages could fix on much that's seis.
Or, if they did so, satisfied to mean
Nothing but what was good, her breast was peaceable
A quiet conscience makes one so serene!
Christians have burned each other, quite persuaded
That all the apostles would have done as they did.
LXXXIV.
And if, in the mean time, her husband died,
But heaven forbid that such a thought should cross
Her brain, though in a dream, (and then she sigh’d!)
Never could she survive that common loss;
But just suppose that moment should betide,
I only say suppose it—inter nos.
(Which should be entre nous, for Julia thought
In French, but then the rhyme would go for nought.)

LXXXV.
I only say suppose this supposition:
Juan, being then grown up to man’s estate,
Would fully suit a widow of condition;
Even seven years hence it would not be too late;
And in the interim (to pursue this vision)
The mischief, after all, could not be great,
For he would learn the rudiments of love
I mean the seraph way of those above.

LXXXVI.
So much for Julia. Now we’ll turn to Juan,
Poor little fellow! he had no idea
Of his own case, and never hit the true one;
In feelings quick as Ovid’s Miss Medea,
He puzzled over what he found a new one,
But not as yet imagined it could be a
Thing quite in course, and not at all alarming,
Which, with a little patience, might grow charming.

LXXXVII.
Silent and pensive, idle, restless, slow,
His home deserted for the lonely wood,
Tormented with a wound he could not know,
His, like all deep grief, plunged in solitude:
I’m fond myself of solitude or so,
But then I beg it may be understood
By solitude I mean a sultan’s, not
A hermit’s, with a harem for a grot.

LXXXVIII.
“Ah love! in such a wilderness as this,
Where transport and security entwine,
Here is the empire of thy perfect bliss,
And here thou art a god indeed divine.”
The bard I quote from does not sing amiss;
With the exception of the second line,
For that same twining “transport and security”
Are twisted to a phrase of some obscurity.

LXXXIX.
The poet meant, no doubt, and thus appeals
To the good sense and senses of mankind,
The very thing which every body feels,
As all have found on trial, or may find,
That no one likes to be disturbed at meals
Or love—I won’t say more about, “entwined”
Or “transport,” as we know all that before,
But beg “security” will bolt the door.

XC.
Young Juan wander’d by the glassy brooks,
Thinking unutterable things: he threw
Himself at length within the leafy nooks
Where the wild branch of the cork forest grew;
There poets find materials for their books,
And every now and then we read them through,
So that their plan and prosody are eligible,
Unless, like Wordsworth, they prove unintelligible.

XCI.
He, Juan, (and not Wordsworth,) so pursued
His self-communion with his own high soul,
Until his mighty heart, in its great mood,
Had mitigated part, thought not the whole
Of its disease; he did the best he could
With things not very subject to control,
And turn’d, without perceiving his condition,
Like Coleridge, into a metaphysician.

XCII.
He thought about himself, and the whole earth
Of man the wonderful, and of the stars,
And how the deuce they ever could have birth;
And then he thought of earthquakes and of wars
How many miles the moon might have in girth,
Of air balloons, and of the many bars
To perfect knowledge of the boundless skies;
And then he thought of Donna Julia’s eyes.

XCIII.
In thoughts like these true wisdom may discern
Longings sublime, and aspirations high,
Which some are born with, but the most part learn
To plague themselves withal, they know not why
Twas strange that one so young should thus concern
His brain about the action of the sky;
If you think ‘twas philosophy that this did,
I can’t help thinking puberty assisted.

XCIV.
He pored upon the leaves, and on the flowers,
And heard a voice in all the winds; and then
He thought of wood-nymphs and immortal bowers,
And how the goddesses come down to men:
He miss’d the pathway, he forgot the hours,
And, when he looked upon his watch again,
He found how much old Time had been a winner—
He also found that he had lost his dinner.

XCV.
Sometimes he turn’d to gaze upon his book
Boscan, or Garcilasso,—by the wind
Even as the page is rustled while we look,
So by the poesy of his own mind
Over the mystic leaf his soul was shook,
As if ‘twere one wherein magicians bind
Their spells, and give them to the passing gale
According to some good old woman’s tale.

XCVI.
Thus would he while his lonely hours away,
Discontented, nor knowing what he wanted;
Nor glowing reverie, nor poet’s lay,
Could yield his spirit that for which it panted,
A bosom whereon he his head might lay,
And hear the heart beat with the love it granted
With—several other things, which I forget,
Or which, at least, I need not mention yet

XCVII.
These lonely walks and lengthening reveries
Could not escape the gentle Julia’s eyes;
She saw that Juan was not at his ease;
But that which chiefly may and must surprise
Is, that the Donna Inez did not tease
Her only son with question or surmise;
Whether it was she did not see, or would not.
Or, like all very clever people, could not
This may seem strange, but yet 'tis very common; For instance—gentlemen, whose ladies take Leave to o'erstep the written rights of woman, And break the—which commandment is't they (I have forgot the number, and think no man (break? Should rashly quote, for fear of a mistake.) I say, when these same gentlemen are jealous, They make some blunder, which their ladies tell us.

A real husband always is suspicious, But still no less suspects in the wrong place, Jealous of some one who had no such wishes, Or pandering blindly to his own disgrace, By harboring some dear friend extremely vicious; The last indeed's infallibly the case: And when the spouse and friend are gone off wholly, He wonders at their vice, and not his folly.

Thus parents also are at times shortsighted; Though watchful as the lynx, they ne'er discover The while the wicked world beholds, delighted, Y young Hopeful's mistress, or Miss Fanny's lover, Till some confounded escapade has blighted The plan of twenty years, and all is over; And then the mother cries, the father swears, And wonders why the devil he got heirs.

But Inez was so anxious, and so clear Of sight, that I must think on this occasion, She had some other motive much more near For leaving Juan to this new temptation; But what that motive was, I shan't say here; Perhaps to finish Juan's education, Perhaps to open Don Alfonso's eyes, In case he thought his wife too great a prize.

It was upon a day, a summer's day; Summer's indeed a very dangerous season, And so is spring about the end of May; The sun no doubt, is the prevailing reason, But whatsoever the cause is, one may say, And stand convicted of more truth than treason, That there are months which nature grows more merry in; March has its hares, and May must have its heroine.

'Twas on a summer's day—the sixth of June: I like to be particular in dates, Not only of the age, and year, but moon; They are a sort of posthouse, where the Fates Change horses, making history change its tune, Then spur away o'er empires and o'er states, Leaving at last not much besides chronology, Excepting the post-obits of theology.

'Twas on the sixth of June, about the hour Of half-past six—perhaps still nearer seven, When julia sat within as pretty a bower As ere held houri in that heathenish heaven Described by Mahomet, and Anaereon Moore, To whom the lyre and laurels have been given, With all the trophies of triumphant song— He won them well, and may he wear them long

She sate, but not alone; I know not well How this same interview had taken place, And even if I knew, I should not tell— People should hold their tongues in any case— No matter how or why the thing befell, But there were she and Juan face to face— When two such faces are so, 'twould be wise, But very difficult, to shut their eyes.

How beautiful she looked! her conscious heart Glo'ed in her cheek, and yet she felt no wrong; Oh love! how perfect is thy mystic art, [strag Strengthening the weak and trampling on the How self-deceitful is the sagest part Of mortals whom thy lure hath led along; The precipice she stood on was immense— So was her creed in her own innocence.

She thought of her own strength, and Juan's youth And of the folly of all prudish fears, Victorious virtue, and domestic truth, And then of Don Alfonso's fifty years: I wish these last had not occur'd, in sooth, Because that number rarely much endears, And through all climes, the snowy and the sunny, Sounds ill in love, whate'er it may in money.

When people say, "I've told you fifty times," They mean to scold, and very often do; When poets say, "I've written fifty rhymes," They make you dread that they'll recite them too, In gangs of fifty, thieves commit their crimes; At fifty, love for love is rare, 'tis true; But then, no doubt, it equally as true is, A good deal may be bought for fifty Louis.

Julia had honor, virtue, truth and love, For Don Alfonso; and she inly swore, By all the vows below to powers above, She never would disgrace the ring she wore, Nor leave a wish which wisdom might reprieve: And while she ponder'd this, besides much more, One hand on Juan's carelessly was thrown, Quite by mistake—she thought it was her own;

Unconsciously she lean'd upon the other, Which play'd within the tangles of her hair; And to contend with thoughts she could not smoother She seem'd, by the distraction of her air 'Twas surely very wrong in Juan's mother To leave together this imprudent pair, She who for many years had watch'd her son so— I'm very certain mine would not have done so

The hand which still held Juan's, by degrees Gently, but palpably, confirm'd its grasp, As if it said "detain me, if you please!" Yet there's no doubt she only meant to clasp His fingers with a pure Platonic squeeze: She would have shrunk as from a toad or sap Had she imagined such a thing could roce A feeling dangerous to a prudent spouse.
CXII.
I cannot know what Juan thought of this,
But what he did is much what you would do;
His young lip thank'd it with a grateful kiss,
And then, abash'd at his own joy, withdrew
In deep despair, lest he had done amiss,
Love is so very timid when 'tis new:
She blush'd and frown'd not, but she strove to speak,
And held her tongue, her voice was grown so weak.

CXIII.
The sun set, and up rose the yellow moon,
The devil's in the moon for mischief; they
Who call'd her chaste, methinks, began too soon
Their nomenclature: there is not a day,
The longest, not the twenty-first of June,
Sees half the business in a wicked way
On which three single hours of moonshine smile—
And then she looks so modest all the while.

CXIV.
There is a dangerous stillness in that hour,
A stillness which leaves room for the full soul
To open all itself, without the power
Of calling wholly back its self-control;
The silver light which, hallowing tree and tower,
Sheds beauty and deep softness o'er the whole,
Breathes also to the heart, and o'er it throws
A loving languor which is not repose.

CXV.
And Julia sate with Juan, half embraced,
And half retiring from the glowing arm,
Which trembled like the bosom where 'twas placed:
Yet still she must have thought there was no harm,
Or else 'twere easy to withdraw her waist;
But then the situation had its charm,
And then—God knows what next—I can't go on;
I'm almost sorry that I ever begun.

CXVI.
Oh, Plato! Plato! you have paved the way,
With your confounded fancies, to more immoral conduct by the fancied sway.
Your system feigns o'er the controlless core
Of human hearts, than all the long array
Of poets and romancers:—You're a bore,
A charlatan, a coxcomb—and have been,
At best, no better than a go-between.

CXVII.
And Julia's voice was lost, except in sighs,
Until too late for useful conversation:
The tears were gushing from her gentle eyes,
I wish, indeed, they had not had occasion;
But who, alas! can love, and then be wise?
Not that remorse did not oppose temptation,
A little still she strove, and much repented,
And whispering "I will ne'er consent," consented.

CXVIII.
Tis said that Xerxes offer'd a reward
To those who could invent him a new pleasure;
Methinks the requirition's rather hard,
And must have cost his majesty a treasure;
For my part, I'm a moderate-minded bard,
Pond of a little love, (which I call leisure;)
I care not for new pleasures, as the old
Are quite enough for me, so they but hold.

CXIX.
Oh Pleasure! you're indeed a pleasant thing,
Although one must be damn'd for you, no doubt
I make a resolution every spring
Of reformation ere the year run out,
But, somehow, this my vestal vow takes wing,
Yet still, I trust, it may be kept throughout:
I'm very sorry, very much ashamed,
And mean, next winter, to be quite reclaim'd.

CXX.
Here my chaste muse a liberty must take—
Start not! I still chaster reader,—she'll hencebrace
Forward, and there is no great cause to quake.
This liberty is a poetical license
Which some irregularity may make
In the design, and as I have a high sense
Of Aristotle and the Rules, 'tis fit
To beg his pardon when I err a bit.

CXXI.
This license is to hope the reader will Suppose from June the sixth, (the fatal day,
Without whose epoch my poetic skill,
For want of facts would all be thrown away,)
But keeping Julia and Don Juan still
In sight, that several months have pass'd; we'll see;
'Twas in November, but I'm not so sure
About the day—the era's more obscure.

CXXII.
We'll talk of that anon—'Tis sweet to hear,
At midnight on the blue and moonlit deep,
The song and siren of Adria's gondolier,
By distance mellow'd, o'er the waters sweep;
'Tis sweet to see the evening star appear;
'Tis sweet to listen as the night-winds creep
From leaf to leaf; 'tis sweet to view on high
The rainbow, based on ocean, span the sky;

CXXIII.
'Tis sweet to hear the watch-dog's honest bark
Bay deep-mouth'd welcome as we draw near home
'Tis sweet to know there is an eye will mark
Our coming, and look brighter when we come;
'Tis sweet to be awakened by the lark,
Or lull'd by falling waters; sweet the hum
Of bees, the voice of girls, the song of birds,
The lisp of children, and their earliest words.

CXXIV.
Sweet is the vintage, when the showering grapes
In Bacchanal profusion reel to earth
Purple and gushing: sweet are our escapes
From civic revelry to rural mirth;
Sweet to the miser are his glittering heaps,
Sweet to the father is his first-born's birth,
Sweet is revenge—especially to women,
Pillage to soldiers, prize-money to seamen.

CXXV.
Sweet is a legacy; and passing sweet
The unexpected death of some old lady
Or gentleman of seventy years complete,
Who've made "us youth" wait too—too long
For an estate, or cash, or country-seat,[already]
Still breaking, but with stamina so steady,
That all the Israelites are fit to mob its Next owner for their double-damned poet-ebits
CXXXVII.

But sweeter still than this, than these, than all,
Is first and passionate love—it stands alone,
Like Adam's recollection of his fall;

The trees of knowledge have been pluck'd—all's
And life yields nothing further to recall
Worthy of this ambrosial sin so shown,
No doubt in fable, as the unforgiven
Fire which Prometheus filch'd for us from heaven.

CXXXVIII.

Man's a strange animal, and makes strange use
Of his own nature and the various arts,
And likes particularly to produce
Some new experiment to show his parts:
This is the age of oddities let loose,
Where different talents find their different marts;
You'd best begin with truth, and when you've lost
Labor, there's a sure market for imposture. [your

CXXXIX.

What opposite discoveries we have seen!
(Signs of true genius, and of empty pockets:)
One makes new noses, one a guillotine; [sockets;
One breaks your bones, one sets them in their
But vaccination certainly has been
A kind antithesis to Congreve's rock-sts,
With which the Doctor paid off an old ox,
By borrowing a new one from an ox.

CXXX.

Bread has been made (indifferent) from potatoes,
And galvanism has set some corpses grinning,
But has not answer'd like the apparatus
Of the humane Society's beginning,
By which men are unsuffocated gratis; [spinning.
What wondrous new machines have late been
I said the small-pox has gone out of late;
Perhaps it may be follow'd by the great.

CXXXI.

'Tis said the great came from America;
Perhaps it may set out on its return,—
The population there so spreads, they say,
'Tis grown high time to thin it in its turn,
With war, or plague, or famine, any way,
So that civilization they may learn;
And which in ravage the more loathsome evil is—
Their real lues, or our pseudo-aphilys?

CXXXII.

This is the patent age of new inventions
For killing bodies and for saving souls,
All propagated with the best intentions:
Sir Humphry Davy's lantern, by which coals
Are safely mined for in the mode he mentions;
Timbuctoo travels, voyages to the Poles,
Are ways to benefit mankind, as true,
Perhaps, as shooting them at Waterloo.

CXXXIII.

Man's a phemonon, one knows not what,
And wonderful beyond all wondrous measure;
'Tis pity, though, in this sublime world, that Pleasure's a sin, and sometimes sin's a pleasure
Few mortals know what end they would be at,
But whether glory, power, or love, or pleasure
The path is through perplexing ways, and when
The goal is gain'd, we die, you know—and then—

CXXXIV.

What then?—I do not know, no more do you—
And so good night.—Return we to our story:
'Twas in November, when fine days are few,
And the far mountains wax a little hoary,
And slip a white cap on their mantles blue;
And the sea dashes round the promontory,
And the loud breaker boils against the rock,
And sober suns must set at five o'clock.

* CXXXV.

'Twas, as the watchmen say, a cloudy night;
No moon, no stars, the wind was low or loud
By gusts, and many a sparkling hearth was bright
With the piled wood, round which the family crow'd
There's something cheerful in that sort of light,
Even as a summer sky's without a cloud;
I'm fond of fire, and crickets, and all that,
A lobster salad, and champagne, and chat.

CXXXVI.

'Twas midnight—Donna Julia was in bed,
Sleeping, most probably,—when at her door
Arose a clatter might awake the dead,
If they had never been awake before—
And that they have been so we all have read,
And are to be so, at the least, once more—
The door was fasten'd, but, with voice and flat;
First knockes were heard, then "Madam—M. ambist:

CXXXVII.

"For God's sake, Madam,—Madam—here's my
With more than half the city at his back—[master
Was ever heard of such a cursed disaster?
'Tis not my fault—I kept good watch—Alack! I
Do, pray, undo the bolt a little faster—
They're on the stair just now, and in a crack
Will all be here; perhaps he yet may fly—
Surely the window's not so very high!"

CXXXVIII.

By this time Don Alfonso was arrived,
[ber
With torches, friends, and servants in great maz
The major part of them had long been wived,
And therefore paused not to disturb the slumber
Of any wicked woman, who contrived
By stealth her husband's temples to encumber:
Examples of this kind are so contagious,
Were one not punish'd, all would be outrageous.

CXXXIX.

I can't tell how, or why, or what suspicion
Could enter into Don Alfonso's head;
But for a cavalier of his condition
It surely was exceedingly ill-bred,
Without a word of previous admonition,
To hold a levee round his lady's bed,
And summon lackeys, arm'd with fire and sword,
To prove himself 'the thing he most abhor'd
CXLI.

Poor Donna Julia! starting as from sleep.
(Mind—that I do not say—she had not slept.)
Began at once to scream, and yawn, and weep;
Her maid Antonia, who was an adept,
Constrained to sling the bedclothes in a heap,
As if she had just now from out them crept:
I can't tell why she should take all this trouble
To prove her mistress had been sleeping double.

CXLI.

But Julia mistress, and Antonia maid,
Appeard like two poor harmless women, who
Of goblins, but still more of men, afraid,
Had thought one man might be deter'd by two,
And therefore side by side were gently laid,
Until the hours of absence should run through,
And truant husband should return and say,
'My dearest, I was the first who came away.'

CXLI.

Now Julian found at length a voice, and cried, [mean?]
"In Heaven's name, Don Alfonso, what d'ye
Has madness seized you? would that I had died
Ere such a monster's victim I had been!
What may this midnight violence befriend,
A sudden fit of drunkenness or spasm?
Dare you suspect me, whom the thought would kill?
Search, then, the room!"—Alfonso said, "I will."

CXLI.

It's search'd, they search'd, and rummaged every where,
Closet and clothes-press, chest and window-seat,
And found much linen, lace, and several pair
Of stockings, slippers, brushes, combs, complete;
With other articles of ladies fair,
To keep them beautiful, or leave them neat:
Arras they prick'd and curtains with their swords,
And wounded several smutters, and some boards.

CXLI.

Under the bed they search'd, and there they found—
No matter what—it was not that they sought;
They open'd windows, gazing if the ground
Had signs or foot-marks, but the earth said nought:
And then they stared each other's faces round:
'Tis odd, not one of all these seekers thought,
And seems to me almost a sort of blunder,
Of looking in the bed as well as under.

CXLI.

During this inquisition Julia's tongue— [cried.
Was not asleep—'Yes, search and search,' she "Insult on insult heap, and wrong on wrong!
It was for this that I became a bride!
For this in silence I have suffer'd long
A husband like Alfonso at my side:
But now I'll bear no more, nor here remain,
If there be law, or lawyers, in all Spain.

CXLI.

"Yes, Don Alfonso, husband now no more,
If ever you indeed deserved the name,
Is't worthy for your years?—you have thousands,
Fifty, or sixty—it is all the same
 Isn't wise or fitting causeless to explore
For facts against a virtuous woman's fame?
Ungrateful, perjured, barbarous Don Alfonso!
How dare you think your lady would go on so?

CXLII.

"Is it for this I have disdain'd to hold
The common privileges of my sex?
That I have chosen a confessor so old
And deaft, that any other it would vex,
And never once he has had cause to scold,
But found my very innocence perplex
So much, he always doubted I was married—
How sorry you will be when I've miscarried!

CXLIII.

"Was it for this that no Cortezo e'er
I yet have chosen out the youth of Sevillia
Is it for this I scarce went any where,
Except to bull-fights, mass, play, rout, and revel
Is it for this, whate'er my suitors were,
I favor'd none—nay, was almost uncivil?
Is it for this that General Count O'Reily,
Who took Algiers, declares I used him vilely?

CXLIV.

"Did not the Italian Musico Cazzani
Sing at my heart six months at least in vain?
Did not his countryman, Count Corniani,
Call me the only virtuous wife in Spain?
Were there not also Russians, English, many?
The Count Strongstroganoff I put in pain,
And Lord Mount Coffe-house, the Irish peer,
Who kill'd himself for love (with wine) last year.

CXLV.

"Have I not had two bishops at my feet,
The Duke of Ichar, and Don Fergan Nunez?
And is it thus a faithful wife you treat?
I wonder in what quarter now the mean is:
I praise your vast forbearance not to be at Me also since the time so opporune—
Oh, valiant man! with sword drawn and cock'd tiro
Now, tell me, don't you cut a pretty figure?

CXLVI.

"Was it for this you took your sudden journey,
Under pretence of business indispensable,
With that sublime of rasca! your attorney,
Whom I see standing there, and looking sensible
Of having play'd the fool? though both I spurn, he Deserves the worst, his conduct's less defendable,
Because, no doubt, 'twas for his dirty fee
And not for any love to you or me.

CXLIX.

"If he comes here to take a deposition,
By all means let the gentleman proceed;
You've made the apartment in a fit condition.
There's pen and ink for you, sir, when you need
Let every thing be noted with precision,
I would not you for nothing should be fee'd—
But, as my maid's undress'd, pray turn your spies out.
Oh!' sob'd Antonia, "I could tear their eyes out."

CL.

"There is the closet, there the toilet, there
The antechamber—search them under, over.
There is the sofa, there the great arm-chair,
The chimney—which would really hold a lover
I wish to sleep, and beg you will take care
And make no further noise till you discover
The secret cavern of this lurking treasure—
And, when 'tis found, let me, too, have that pleasure
CLIV.

"And now, Hidalgo! now that you have thrown Double upon me, confusion over all,
Pray have the courtesy to make it known
Who is the man you search for? how dy'e call him? what's his lineage? let him but be shown—
I hope he's young and handsome—is he tall?
Tell me—and be assured, that since you stain
My honor thus, it shall not be in vain.

CLV.

"At least, perhaps, he has not sixty years—
At that age he would be too old for slaughter,
Or for so young a husband's jealous fears.—
(Antonia! let me have a glass of water.)
I am ashamed of having shed these tears,
They are unworthy of my father's daughter;
My mother dream'd not in my natal hour
That I should fall into a monster's power.

CLVI.

"Perhaps 'tis of Antonia you are jealous,
You saw that she was sleeping by my side
When you broke in upon us with your followers:
Look where you please—we've nothing, sir, to hide;
Only another time, I trust, you'll tell us,
Or for the sake of decency abide
A moment at the door, that we may be Dress'd to receive so much good company.

CLVII.

"And now, sir, I have done, and say no more;
The little I have said may serve to show
The guileless heart in silence may grieve o'er
The wrongs to whose exposure it is slow—
I leave you to your conscience as before,
'Twill one day ask you why you used me so?
God grant you feel not then the bitterest grief—
Antonia! where's my pocket-handkerchief?"

CLVIII.

She ceased, and turn'd upon her pillow; pale
She lay, her dark eyes flashing through their tears
Like skies that rain and lighten; as a veil
The guileless heart in silence may grieve o'er
The wrongs to whose exposure it is slow:
I leave you to your conscience as before,
'Twill one day ask you why you used me so?
God grant you feel not then the bitterest grief—
Antonia! where's my pocket-handkerchief?"

CLIX.

The Senhor Don Alfonso stood confused;
Antonia bustled round the ransack'd room,
And, turning up her nose, with looks abused
Her master, and his myrmidons, of whom
Not one, except the attorney, was amused;
His, like Achates, faithful to the tomb,
So there were quarrels, cared not for the cause,
Knowing they must be settled by the laws.

CLX.

With prying snub-nose, and small eyes, he stood,
Following Antonia's motions here and there,
With much suspicion in his attitude;
For reputation, he had little care;
So that a suit or action were made, quick,
Small pity had he for the young and fair,
And n'er believd in negatives, till these
Were proved by competent false witnesses.

CLXI.

But Don Alfonso stood with downcast looks,
And, truth to say, he made a foolish figure;
When, after searching in five hundred nooks,
And treating a young wife with so much rigor,
He gain'd no point, except some self rebukes,
Added to those his lady with such vigor
Had pour'd upon him for the last half hour,
Quick, thick, and heavy—as a thunder-showers

CLXII.

At first he tried to hammer an excuse,
To which the sole reply was tears and sobs,
And indications of hysterics, whose
Prologue is always certain throses and throbs,
Gasps, and whatever else the owners choose—
Alfonso saw his wife, and thought of Job's;
He saw, too, in perspective, her relations,
And 'twas he tried to muster all his patience.

CLXIII.

He stood in act to speak, or rather stammer,
But sage Antonia cut him short before
The anvil of his speech received the hammer,
With "Pray, sir, leave the room, and say no more
Or madam dies."—Alfonso mutter'd "D—n her,"
But nothing else, the time of words was o'er;
He cast a rueful look or two, and did,
He knew not wherefore, that which he was bid

CLXIV.

With him retir'd his "posse comitatus,"
The attorney last, who linger'd near the door,
Reluctantly, still tarrying there as late as Antonia let him—not a little sore
At this most strange and unequall'd "hiatus"
In Don Alfonso's facts, which just now wore
An awkward look; as he revolved the case,
The door was fasten'd in his legal face.

CLXV.

No sooner was it bolted, than—Oh shame!
Oh sin! oh sorrow! and oh wondrous kind
How can you do such things and keep your fame,
Unless this world, and 't other too, be blind?
Nothing so dear as an unfrich'd good name!
But to proceed—for there is more behind:
With much heart-felt reluctance be it said,
Young Juan sipp'd, half smother'd, from the bed.

CLXVI.

He had been hid—I don't pretend to say
How, nor can I indeed describe the where—
Young, slender, and pack'd easily, he lay,
No doubt, in little compass, round or square,
But pity him I neither must nor may
His suffocation by that pretty pair;
'Twere better, sure, to die so, than be shut,
With mauvin Clarence, in his Malwiney butt.

CLXVII.

And, secondly, I pity not, because
He had no business to commit a sin,
Forbid by heavenly, fined by human, laws,—
At least 'twas rather early to begin;
But at sixteen the conscience rarely graws
So much as when we call our old debts in
At sixty years, and draw the accounts of evil,
And find a deuced balance with the devil.
CLXVIII.
Of his position I can give no notion:
’Tis written in the Hebrew Chronicle,
How the physicians, leaving pill and potion,
Prescribed, by way of blister, a young belle,
When old King David’s blood grew dull in motion,
And that the medicine answer’d very well;
Perhaps ’twas in a different way applied,
For David lived, but Juan nearly died.

CLXIX.
What’s to be done? Alfonso will be back
The moment he has sent his fools away.
Antonia’s skill was put upon the rack,
But no device could be brought into play—
And how to parry the renew’d attack?
Besides, it wanted but few hours of day:
Antonia puzzled: Julia did not speak,
But press’d her bloodless lip to Juan’s cheek.

CLXX.
He turn’d his lip to hers, and with his hand
Call’d back the tangles of her wandering hair;
Even then their love they could not all command,
And half forgot their danger and despair:
Antonia’s patience now was at a stand—
“Come, come, ’tis no time now for fooling there,
She whispered in great wrath—’I must deposit
This pretty gentleman within the closet:

CLXXI.
“Pray keep your nonsense for some luckier night—
Who can have put my master in this mood?
What will become on’t?—I’m in such a fright!
The devil’s in the urchin, and no good—
Is this a time for giggling? this a plight?
Why don’t you know that it may end in blood?
You’ll lose your life, and I shall lose my place,
My mistress all, for that half-girlish face.

CLXXII.
Had it but been for a stout cavalier
Of twenty-five or thirty—(come make haste)—
But for a child, what piece of work is here!—
I really, madam, wonder at your taste—
(Of course, sir, get in)—my master must be near.
There, for the present at least he’s fast,
And, if we can but till the morning keep
Our counsel—(Juan, mind you must not sleep.”)

CLXXIII.
Now, Don Alfonso entering, but alone,
Closed the oration of the trusty maid:
See loiter’d, and he told her to be gone,
An order somewhat sullenly obey’d;
However, present remedy was none,
And no great good seem’d answer’d if she stay’d:
Regarding both with slow and sidelong view,
She snuff’d the candle, curtsied, and withdrew.

CLXXIV.
Alfonso paused a minute—then began
Some strange excuses for his late proceeding:
He would not justify what he had done,
To say the best, it was extreme ill-breeding:
But there were ample reasons for it, none.
Of which he specified in this nis pleasing:
His speech was a fine sample, on the whole,
Of rhetoric, which the learned call “rigmarole.”

CLXXV.
Julia said nought; though all the while there rose
A ready answer, which at once enables
A matron, who her husband’s foible knows,
By a few timely words to turn the tables.
Which, if it does not silence, still must pose,
Even if it should comprise a pack of fables;—
’Tis to retort with firmness, and when he Suspends with one, do you reproach with three

CLXXVI.
Julia, in fact, had tolerable grounds,
Alfonso’s loves with Inez were well known,
But whether ’twas that one’s own guilt confounds
But that can’t be, as has been often shown:
A lady with apologies abounds:
It might be that her silence sprang alone
From delicacy to Don Juan’s ear,
To whom she knew his mother’s fame was dear.

CLXXVII.
There might be one more motive, which makes two.
Alfonso ne’er to Juan had alluded,
Mention’d his jealousy, but never who
Had been the happy lover, he concluded
Conceal’d among his premises: ’tis true,
His mind the more o’er this its mystery brooded
To speak of Inez now were, one may say,
Like throwing Juan in Alfonso’s way

CLXXVIII.
A hint, in tender cases, is enough;
Silence is best, besides there is a tact
(That modern phrase appears to me sad stuff,
But it will serve to keep my verse compact)
Which keeps, when push’d by questions rather
A lady always distant from the fact—[rough
The charming creatures lie with such a grace,
There’s nothing so becoming to the face

CLXXIX.
They blush, and we believe them; at least I
Have always done so; ’tis of no great use,
In any case, attempting a reply,
For then their eloquence grows quite profuse;
And when at length they’re out of breath, they sigh
And cast their languid eyes down, and let loose
A tear or two, and then we make it up
And then—and then—and then—sit down and sup

CLXXX.
Alfonso closed his speech, and begged her pardon
Which Julia half withheld, and then half granted
And laid conditions he thought very hard on Denying several little things he wanted:
He stood, like Adam, lingering near his garden,
With useless penitence perplex’d and haunted.
Beseeking she no further would refuse,
When lo! he stumbled o’er a pair of shoes.

CLXXXI.
A pair of shoes!—what then? not much, if they Are such as fit with lady’s feet, but these
(No one can tell how much I grieve to say)
Were masculine: to see them and to seize
Was but a moment’s art—Ah! well—a-day
My teeth begin to chatter, my veins freeze—
Alfonso first examined well their fashion
And then flew out into another passion
CLXXXI.

He left the room for his relinquish'd sword,
And Julia instant to the closet flew;
'Fly, Juan, fly! for Heaven's sake—not a word;
The door is open—you may yet slip through
The passage you so often have explored—
Here is the garden-key—fly—fly—adiéu!—
Haste—haste!—I hear Alfonso's hurrying feet—
Day has not broke—there's no one in the street.'

CLXXXIII.

None can say that this was not good advice,
The only mischief was, it came too late;
Of all experience 'tis the usual price,
A sort of income-tax laid on by fate:
Juan had reach'd the room-door in a trice,
And might have done so by the garden-gate,
But met Alfonso in his dressing-gown,
Who threaten'd death—so Juan knock'd him down.

CLXXXIV.

Díre was the scuffle, and out went the light,
Antonia cried out "Rape!" and Julia "Fire!"
But not a servant stirr'd to aid the fight.
Alfonso, pommell'd to his heart's desire,
Sware lustily he 'd been revenged this night;
And Juan, too, blasphemed an octave higher;
His blood was up; though young, he was a Tartar,
And not at all disposed to prove a martyr.

CLXXXV.

Alfonso's sword had dropp'd he could draw it,
And they continued battling hand to hand,
For Juan very luckily ne'er saw it;
His temper not being under great command,
If at that moment he had chance to claw it,
Alfonso's days had not been in the land
Much longer.—Think of husbands', lovers' lives,
And how you may be doubly widows—wives!

CLXXXVI.

Alfonso grappled to detain the foe,
And Juan threttled him to get away,
And blood ('twas from the nose) began to flow;
At last, as they more faintly wrestling lay,
Juan contriv'd to give an awkward blow,
And then his only garment quite gave way;
He fled, like Joseph, leaving it—but there,
I doubt, all likeness ends between the pair.

CLXXXVII.

Lights came at length, and men and maids, who found
An awkward spectacle their eyes before;
Antonia in hysterics, Julia swoon'd,
Alfonso leaning, breathless, by the door;
Some half torn drapery scatter'd on the ground,
Some blood, and several footsteps, but no more;
Juan the gate gain'd, tur'd the key about,
And, liking not the inside, lock'd the out.

CLXXXVIII.

Here ends this canto.—Need I sing or say,
How Juan, naked, favor'd by the night,
(Who favors what she should not,) found his way,
And reach'd his home in an unseenly plight?
The pleasant scandal which arose next day,
The nine days' wonder which was brought to light,
And how Alfonso sued for a divorce,
Were in the English newspapers, of course.

CLXXXIX.

If you would like to see the whole proceedings
The depositions, and the cause at full,
The names of all the witnesses, the pleadings
Of counsel to nonsuit or to annul,
There's more than one edition, and the readings
Are various, but they none of them are dull,
The best is that in short hand, tal'en by Gurney,
Who to Madrid on purpose made a journey.

CXG.

But Donna Inez, to divert the train
Of one of the most circulating scandals
That had for centuries been known in Spain,
At least since the retirement of the Vandals,
First vow'd (and never had she vow'd in vain)
To Virgin Mary several pounds of candles;
And then, by the advice of some old ladies,
She sent her son to be shipp'd off from Cadiz.

CXCI.

She had resolved that he should travel through
All European climes by land or sea,
To mend his former morals, and get new,
Especially in France and Italy,
(At least this is the thing most people do.)
Julia was bent into a convent; she Grieved, but perhaps, her feelings may be better
Shown in the following copy of her letter:

CXCII.

"They tell me 'tis decided, you depart:
'Tis wise—'tis well, but not the less a pain:
I have no further claim on your young heart,
Mine is the victor, and would be again:
To love too much has been the only art
I used;—I write in haste, and if a stain
Be on this sheet, 'tis not what it appears—
My eyeballs burn and throb, but have no tears.

CXCIII.

"I loved, I love you; for this love have lost
State, station, heaven, mankind's, my own esteem
And yet cannot regret what it hath cost,
So dear is still the memory of that dream;
Yet, if I name my guilt, 'tis not to boast,—
None can deem haliber of me than I deem:
I trace this scrawl because I cannot rest—
I've nothing to reproach or to request.

CXCIV.

"Man's love is of man's life a thing apart,
'Tis woman's whole existence; man may range
The court, camp, church, the vessel, and the mart
Sword, gown, gown, glory, offer in exchange
Pride, fame, ambition, to fill up his heart,
And few there are whom these cannot estrange
Men have all these resources, we but one—
To love again, and be again undone.

CXCV.

"You will proceed in pleasure and in pride,
Beloved and loving many; all is o'er
For me on earth, except some years to hide
My shame and sorrow deep in my heart's core
These I could bear, but cannot cast aside
The passion, which still—ages as before,
And so farewell—forgive me, love me—Ne,
That word is idle now—but let it go.
CXCVI.

My breast has been all weakness, is so yet;
But still, I think, I can collect my mind;
My blood still rushes where my spirit's set,
As roll the waves before the settled wind;
My heart is feminine, nor can forget—
To all, except one image, madly blind:
So shakes the needle, and so stands the pole,
As vibrates my fond heart to my fix'd soul.

CXCVII.

"I have no more to say, but linger still,
And dare not set my seal upon this sheet,
And yet I may as well the task fulfill,
My misery can scarce be more complete:
I had not lived till now, could sorrow kill;
Death shuns the wretch who fain the blow would
And I must even survive this last adieu, [meet,
And bear with life, to love and pray for you!"

CXCVIII.

This note was written upon gilt-edged paper,
With a neat little crow-quot, slight and new:
Her small white hand could hardly reach the taper,
It trembled as magnetic needles do,
And yet she did not let one tear escape her;
The seal a sunflower; "Elle vous suit partout,
The motto cut upon a white cornelian,
The wax was superfine, its hue vermillion.

CXCVIX.

This was Don Juan's earliest scrape; but whether I shall proceed with his adventure is Dependent on the public altogether:
We'll see, however, what they say to this,
(Their favor in an author's cap's a feather,
And no great mischief's done by their caprice;)
And, if their approbation we experience,
Perhaps they'll have some more about a year hence.

CC.

My poem's epic, and is meant to be Divided in twelve books, each book containing,
With love, and war, a heavy gale at sea,
A list of ships and captains, and kings reigning,
New characters; the episodes are three:
A panorama view of hell's in training,
After the style of Virgil and of Homer,
So that my name of epic's no misnomer.

CCI.

All these things will be specified in time,
With strict regard to Aristotle's Rules,
The code mecum of the true sublime,
Which makes so many poets and some fools;
'Prose poets like blank-verse—I'm fond of rhyme—
Good workmen never quarrel with their tools;
I've got new mythological machinery,
And very handsome supernatural scenery.

CCII.

There's only one slight difference between
Me and my epic brethren gone before,
And here the advantage is my own, I ween,
(Not that I have not several merits more;) But this will more peculiarly be seen;
They so embellish, that 'tis quite a bore
Their labyrinth of fables to thread through,
Whereas this story's actually true.
CCX

I sent it in a letter to the editor,

Who thank’d me duly by return of post—

I’m for a handsome article his creditor;

Yet, if my gentle Muse he please to roast,

And break a promise after having made it her,

Denying the receipt of what it cost,

And smear his page with gall instead of honey,

All I can say is—that he had the money.

CCXI.

I think that with this holy new alliance

I may insure the public, and defy

All other magazines of art or science,

Daily, or monthly, or three-monthly; I

Have not essay’d to multiply their clients,

Because they tell me ’twere in vain to try,

And that the Edinburgh Review and Quarterly

Treat a dissenting author very martly.

CCXII.

"Non ego hoc ferrem callida juventa Consule Plancio," Horace said, and so

Say I, by which quotation there is meant a

Hint that some six or seven good years ago,

(Long ere I dreamt of dating from the Brenta,) I

Was most ready to return a blow,

And would not brook at all this sort of thing.

In my hot youth—when George the Third was King.

CCXIII.

But now, at thirty years, my hair is gray,—

(I wonder what it will be like at forty?

I thought of a peruke the other day,) My heart is not much greener; and, in short, I

Have squander’d my whole summer while ’twas May, And feel no more the spirit to retort; I

Have spent my life, both interest and principal, And deem not, what I deem’d, my soul invincible.

CCXIV.

No more—no more—Oh! never more on me

The freshness of the heart can fall like dew,

Which out of all the lovely things we see

Extracts emotions beautiful and new,

Hived in our bosoms like the bag o’ the bee: Think’st thou the honey with those objects grew? Alas! ’twas not in them, but in thy power, To double even the sweetness of a flower.

CCXV.

No more—no more—Oh! never more, my heart,

Canst thou be my sole world, my universe! Once all in all, but now a thing apart, Thou canst not be my blessing or my curse: The illusion’s gone for ever, and thou art Insensible, I trust, but none the worse; And in thy stead I’ve got a deal of judgment, Though Heaven knows how it ever found a lodgment.

CCXVI.

My days of love are over—me no more?
The charms of maid, wife, and still less of widow, Can make the fool of which they made before— In short, I must not lead the life I did do: The credulous hope of mutual minds is o’er; The copious use of clarét is forbid, too; So, for a good old gentlemanly vice, I think I must take up with sav’ce.

CCXVII.

Ambition was my idol, which was broken

Before the shrines of Sorrow and of Pleasure;

And the two last have left me many a token

O ‘er which reflection may be made at leisure;

Now, like Friar Bacon’s brazen head, I’ve spoken,

"Time is, time was, time’s past," a chymic treasure

Is glittering youth, which I have spent betimes— My heart in passion, and my head on rhymes.

CCXVIII.

What is the end of fame? ’tis but to fill

A certain portion of uncertain paper;

Some liken it to climbing up a hill,

Whose summit, like all hills, is lost in vapor;

For this men write, speak, preach, and heroes kill,

And bards burn what they call their "midnight To have, when the original is dust, [tape;]

A name, a wretched picture, and worst bust.

CCXIX.

What are the hopes of man? old Egypt’s king,

Cheops, erected the first pyramid

And largest, thinking it was just the thing To keep his memory whole, and mummy hid: But somebody or other, rummaging, Burglariously broke his coffin’s lid; Let not a monument give you or me hopes, Since not a pinch of dust remains of Cheops.

CCXX.

But I, being fond of true philosophy,

Say very often to myself, "Ah! all things that have been born were born to die,

Which death mows down to hay is grass You’ve pass’d your youth not so unpleasantly, And if you had it o’er again—t’would pass So thank your stars that matters are no worse, And read your Bible, sir, and mind your purse.

CCXXI.

But for the present, gentle reader! and Still gentle purchaser! the bard—that’s I— Must, with permission, shake you by the hand, And so your humble servant, and good bye! We meet again, if we should understand Each other; and if not, I shall not try Your patience further than by this short sample— ‘Twere well if others follow’d my example

CCXXII.

"Go, little book, from this my solitude! I cast thee on the waters, go thy ways! And if, as I believe, thy vein be good, The world will find thee after many days.

When Southey’s read, and Wordsworth understood.

I can’t help putting in my claim to praise—

The four first rhymes are Southey’s, every line:

For God’s sake, reader! take them not for mine.
CANTO II.

I.
John ye! who teach the ingenuous youth of nations, Holland, France, England, Germany or Spain, I pray ye flog them upon all occasions, It mend their morals: never mind the pain: The best of mothers and of educations, In Juan's cause, were but employ'd in vain, Since in a way, that's rather of the oddest, he became divested of his native modesty.

II.
Had he but been placed at a public school, In the third form, or even in the fourth, His daily task had kept his fancy cool, At least had he been nurtured in the north ; Spain may prove an exception to the rule, But then exceptions always prove its worth— A lad of sixteen causing a divorce Puzzled his tutors very much of course.

III.
I can't say that it puzzles me at all, If all things be consider'd: first, there was His lady mother, mathematical, A—, never mind; his tutor, an old ass; A pretty woman,—(that's quite natural, Or else the thing had hardly come to pass;) A husband rather old, not much in unity With his young wife—a time, and opportunity.

IV.
Well—well, the world must turn upon its axis, And all mankind turn out with it, heads or tails, And live and die, make love, and pay our taxes, And as the veering wind shifts, shift our sails; The king commands us, and the doctor quacks us, The priest instructs, and so our life exhales, A little breath, love, wine, ambition, fame, Fighting, devotion, dust—perhaps a name.

V.
I said, that Juan had been sent to Cadiz— A pretty town, I recollect it well— Tis there the mart of the colonial trade is, (Or was, before Peru learn'd to rebel;) And such sweet girls—I mean such graceful ladies, Their very waist would make your bosom swell; I can't describe it, though so much it strike, Nor liken it—I never saw the like:

VI.
An Arab horse, a stately stag, a Barb New broke, a camelsopard, a gazelle, No—none of these will do;—and then their garb! Their veil and petticoat—Alas! to dwell Upon such things would very near absorb A canto—then their feet and ankles!—well, Thank Heaven I've got no metaphor, quite ready, And so, my sober Muse—come let's be steady—

VII.
Chaste Muse!—well, if you must, you must!—the well Thrown back a moment, with the glancing hand, While the overpowering eye, that turns you pale, Flashes into the heart:—all sunny land Of love! when I forgot you, may I fail [plan't To—say my prayers—but never was there A dress through which the eyes give such a volley Exceeding the Venetian Fazzoli.

VIII.
But to our tale: the Donna Inez seat Her son to Cadiz only to embark; To stay there had not answer'd her intent, But why?—we leave the reader in the dark— 'Twas for a voyage that the young man was meant, As if a Spanish ship were Noah's ark, To wean him from the wickedness of earth, And send him like a dove of promise forth

IX.
Don Juan bade his valet pack his things According to direction, then received A lecture and some money: for four springs He was to travel; and, though Inez grieved, (As every kind of parting has its stings,) She hoped he would improve—perhaps believed A letter, too, she gave (he never read it) Of good advice—and two or three of credit.

X.
In the mean time, to pass her hours away, Brave Inez now set up a Sunday-school For naughty children, who would rather play (Like truant rogues) the devil or the fool; Infants of three years old were taught that day Dunces were whipp'd or set upon a stool; The great success of Juan's education Spurr'd her to teach another generation.

XI.
Juan embark'd—the ship got under weigh, The wind was fair, the water passing rough; A devil of a sea rolls in that bay, As I, who've cross'd it oft, know well enough: And, standing upon deck, the dashing spray Flies in one's face, and makes it weather-tough And there he stood to take, and take again, His first—perhaps his last—farewell of Spain.

XII.
I can't but say it is an awkward sight To see one's native land recoiling through The growing waters—it unmans one quite: Especially when life is rather new: I recollect Great Britain's coast looks white, But almost every other country's blue, When, gazing on them, mystified by distance, We enter on our nautical existence.

XIII.
So Juan stood bewilderd on the deck: The wind sung, cordage strain'd, and sailors swear And the ship crack'd, the town became a speck From which away so far and fast they bore. The best of remedies is a beef-steak Against sea-sickness; try it, sir, before You sneer, and I assure you this is true, For I have found it answer—so may you.
XIV.
Don Juan stood, ar, a, gazing from the stern,
Beheld his native Spain receding far:
First partings form a lesson hard to learn,
Even nations feel this when they go to war;
There is a sort of unexpress’d concern,
A’kind of shock that sets one’s heart ajar.
At leaving even the most unpleasant people
And places, one keeps looking at the steeple.

XV.
But Juan had got many things to leave—
His mother, and a mistress, and no wife,
So that he had much better cause to grieve
Than many persons more advanced in life;
And, if we now and then a sigh must have
At quitting even those we quit in strife,
No doubt we weep for those the heart endears—
That is, till deeper griefs congeal our tears.

XVI.
So Juan wept, as wept the captive Jews
By Babel’s waters, still remembering Sion:
I’d weep, but mine is not a weeping muse,
And such light griefs are not a thing to die on;
Young men should travel, if but to amuse
Themselves; and the next time their servants tie on Behind their carriages their new portmanteau,
Perhaps it may be lined with this my canto.

XVII.
And Juan wept, and much he sigh’d, and thought,
While his salt tears drop’t into the salt sea,
“Sweets to the sweet!” (I like so much to quote;
You must excuse this extract, ’tis where she,
The Queen of Denmark, for Ophelia brought Flowers to the grave,) and sobbing often, he Reflected on his present situation,
And seriously resolved on reformation.

XVIII.
“Farewell, my Spain! a long farewell!” he cried,
“Perhaps I may revisit thee no more,
But die, as many an exiled heart hath died,
Of its own thirst to see again thy shore:
Farewell, where Guadaluquir’s waters glide!
Farewell, my mother! and, since all is o’er,
Farewell, too, dearest Julia!”—(here he drew
Her letter out again, and read it through.)

XIX.
“And oh! if e’er I should forget, I swear—
But that’s impossible, and cannot be—
Sooner shall this blue ocean melt to air,
Sooner shall earth resolve itself to sea,
Than I resign thine image, oh! my fair!
Or think of any thing excepting thee;
A mind diseased no remedy can physi—
(Here the ship gave a lurch, and he grew sea-sick.)

XX.
“Sooner shall heaven kiss earth—(here he fell
Oh, Julia! what is every other wo!— [sicker]—
(For God’s sake, let me have a glass of liquor—Pedro! Baptista help me down below.)
Julia, my love!—(you raiseal, Pedro, quicker)
Oh, Julia!—(this cursed vessel pitches so)—
Beloved Julia! hear me still beseeching—
(Here he grew inarticulate with retching.)

XXI.
He felt that chilling heaviness of heart,
Or rather stomach, which, alas! attends,
Beyond the best apothecary’s art,
The loss of love, the treachery of friends,
Or death of those we doat on, when a part
Of us dies with them, as each fond hope ends.
No doubt he would have been much more pathetically,
But the sea acted as a strong emetic.

XXII.
Love’s a capricious power; I’ve known it hold
Out through a fever caused by its own heat.
But be much puzzled by a cough and cold,
And find a quiney very hard to treat:
Against all noble maladies he’s bold,
But vulgar illnesses don’t like to meet,
Nor that a sneeze should interrupt his sigh;
Nor inflamations redd’n his blind eye.

XXIII.
But worst of all is nausea, or a pain
About the lower regions of the bowels;
Love, who heroically breathes a vein,
Shrinks from the application of hot towels,
And purgatives are dangerous to his reign,
Sea-sickness death: his love was perfect, how else
Could Juan’s passion, while the billows roar,
Resist his stomach, ne’er at sea before?

XXIV.
The ship, called the most holy “Trinidad,”
Was steering duly for the port Leghorn;
For there the Spanish family Moncada
Were settled long ere Juan’s sire was born;
They were relations, and for them he had a Letter of introduction, which the morn
Of his departure had been sent him by
His Spanish friends for those in Italy.

XXV.
His suite consisted of three servants and
A tutor, the licentiate Pedrillo,
Who several languages did understand,
But now lay sick and speechless on his pillow,
And, rocking in his hammock, long’d for land,
His headache being increased by every billow
And the waves oozing through the port-hole made
His berth a little damp, and him afraid.

XXVI.
’Twas not without some reason, for the wind
Increased at night, until it blew a gale;
And though ’twas not much to a naval mind,
Some landmen would have look’d a little pale,
For sailors are, in fact, a different kind;
At sunset they began to take in sail,
For the sky show’d it would come on to blow,
And carry away, perhaps, a mast or so.

XXVII.
At one o’clock, the wind with sudden shift
Threw the ship right into the trough of the sea,
Which struck her aft, and made an awkward rift,
Started the stern-post, also shatter’d the Whole of her stern frame, and, ere she could lift
Herself from out her present jeopardy,
The rudder tore away; ’twas time to sound
The pumps, and there were four feet water found.
XXVIII.
The gang of people instantly was put
Upon the pumps, and the remainder set
To get up part of the cargo, and what not,
But they could not come at the leak as yet;
At last they did get at it really, but Still their salvation was an even bet:
The water rush'd through in a way quite puzzl'g, While they thrust sheets, shirts, jackets, bales of muslin,

XXIX.
Into the opening; but all such ingredients [down]
Would have been vain, and they must have gone
Despite of all their efforts and expedients,
But for the pumps: I'm glad to make them known
To all the brother-tars who may have need hence,
For fifty tons of water were upthrown
By them per hour, and they had been all undone.
But for the maker Mr. Mann, of London.

XXX.
As day advanced, the weather seemed to abate,
And then the leak they reckon'd to reduce,
And keep the ship afloat, though three feet yet
Kept two hard and one chain pump still in use.
The wind blew fresh again: as it grew late [loose],
A squall came on, and, while some guns broke
A gust—which all descriptive power transcends—
Laid with one blast the ship on her beam-ends.

XXXI.
There she lay motionless, and seemed up:
The water left the hold, and wash'd the decks,
And shake a scene men do not soon forget;
For they remember battles, fires, and wrecks,
Or any other thing that brings regret,
Or breaks their hopes, or hearts, or heads, or necks,
Thus drownings are much talk'd of by the divers
And swimmers who may chance to be survivors.

XXXII.
Immediately the masts were cut away,
Both main and mizzen; that the mizen went,
The mainmast follow'd: but the ship still lay
Like a mere log, and baffled our intent.
Foremast and bowsprit were cut down, and they Eased her at last, (although we never meant fo part with all till every hope was blighted,)
And then with violence the old ship righted.

XXXIII.
It may be easily supposed, while this
Was going on, some people were unquiet;
That passengers would find it much amiss
To lose their lives, as well as spoil their diet;
That even the able seamen, deeming his Days nearly o'er, might be disposed to riot,
As upon such occasions tars will ask
For grog, and sometimes drink rum from the cask.

XXXIV.
There's nought, no doubt, so much the spirit calms
As rum and true religion; thus it was, [psalms, some plunder'd, some drunk spirits, some sung
The high wind made the treble, and as bass,
The hoarse harsh waves kept time, fright cured the quarrels
Of all the luckless landsmen's sensick maws:
Strange sounds of wailing, blasphemy, devotion,
Lament'd in chorus to the roaring ocean.

XXXV.
Perhaps more mischief had been done, but for
Our Juan, who, with sense beyond his years,
Got to the spirit-room, and stood before
It with a pair of pistols; and their fears,
As if Death were more dreadful by his door
Of fire than water, spite of oaths and tears,
Kept still aloof the crew, who, ere they sunk,
Thought it would be becoming to die drunk.

XXXVI.
"Give us more grog," they cried, "for it will be
All one an hour hence." Juan answer'd, "No!
Tis true that death awaits both you and me,
But let us die like men, not sink below
Like brutes;"—and thus his dangerous post kept he,
And none liked to anticipate the blow;
And even Pedrillo, his most revered tutor,
Was for some rum a disappointed suitor.

XXXVII.
The good old gentleman was quite aghast
And made a loud and pious lamentation;
Repented all his sins, and made a last
Irrevocable vow of reformation;
Nothing should tempt him more (this peril past)
To quit his academic occupation
In cloisters of the classic Salamanca,
To follow Juan's wake like Sancho Panca.

XXXVIII.
But now there came a flash of hope once more,
Day broke, and the wind full'd: the masts were gone,
The leak increased; shoals round her, but no shore
The vessel swam, yet still she held her own.
They tried the pumps again, and though before
Their desperate efforts seem'd all useless grown,
A glimpse of sunshine set some hands to bale—
The stronger pump'd, the weaker thrum'd a sail.

XXXIX.
Under the vessel's keel the sail was pass'd,
And for the moment it had some effect;
But with a leak, and not a stick of mast
Nor rag of canvas, what could they expect?
But still 'tis best to struggle to the last,
'Tis never too late to be wholly wreck'd:
And though 'tis true that man can only die once,
'Tis not so pleasant in the Gulf of Lyons.

XL.
There winds and waves had hurl'd them, and from thence
Without their will, they carried them away;
For they were forced with steering to dispense,
And never had as yet a quiet day
On which they might repose, or even commence
A jury-mast or rudder, or could say
The ship would swim an hour, which, by good luck
Still swam—though not exactly like a duck.

XLI.
The wind, in fact, perhaps was rather less,
But the ship labor'd so, they scarce could hope
To weather out much longer; the distress
Was also great with which they had to cope
For want of water, and their solid meal
Was scant enough; in vain the telescope
Was used—nor sail nor shore appear'd in sight,
Nought but the heavy seas, and coming night.
XLII.

Again the weather threaten'd—again blew
A gale, and in the fore and after hold
Water appear'd; yet, though the people knew
All this, the most were patient, and some bold,
'\text{\textquoteleft}til the chains and leathers were worn through
Of all our pumps—a wreck complete she roll'd,
At mercy of the waves, whose mercies are Like human beings during civil war.

XLIII.

Then came the carpenter, at last, with tears
In his rough eyes, and told the captain he Could do no more; he was a man in years,
And long had voyaged through many a stormy sea,
And if he wept at length, they were not tears
That made his eyelids as a woman's be,
But he, poor fellow, had a wife and children,
Two things for dying people quite bewildering.

XLIV.

The ship was evidently settling now
Fast by the head; and, all distinction gone,
Some went to prayers again, and made a vow
Of candles to their saints—but there were none
To pay them with; and some look'd o'er the bow,
Some hoisted out the boats: and there was one
That begg'd Pedrillo for absolution,
Who told him to be damn'd—in his confusion.

XLV.

Some lash'd them in their hammocks, some put on
Their best clothes as if going to a fair;
Some cursed the day on which they saw the sun,
And gnash'd their teeth, and, howling, tore their
And others went on, as they had begun, [hair]
Getting the boats out, being well aware
That a tight boat will live in a rough sea,
Unless with breakers close beneath her lee.

XLVI.

The worst of all was, that in their condition,
Having been several days in great distress,
'Twas difficult to get out such provision
As now might render their long suffering less:
Men, even when dying, dislike inanimation;
Their stock was damaged by the weather's stress:
Two casks of biscuit and a keg of butter
Were all that could be thrown into the cutter.

XLVII.

But in the long-boat they contrived to stow
Some pounds of bread, though injured by the wet;
Water, a twenty-gallon cask or so;
Six flasks of wine; and they contrived to get
A portion of their beef up from below,
And with a piece of pork, moreover, met,
But scarce enough to serve them for a luncheon;
Then there was rum, eight gallons in a puncleon.

XLVIII.

The other boats, the yawl and pinnace, had
Been stover in the beginning of the gale;
And the long-boat's condition was but bad,
As there were but two blankets for a sail,
And one oar for a mast, which a young lad
Threw in by good luck over the ship's rail;
And two coasts could not hold, far less be stored,
To save one half the people then on board.

XLIX.

'Twas twilight, for the sunless day went down
Over the waste of waters; like a veil,
Which, if withdrawn, would but disclose the frown.
Of one whose hate is masked but to assail;
Thick to their hopeless eyes the night was shown,
And grimly darkled o'er their faces pale
And the dim desolate deep—twelve days had Fenn
Been their familiar, and now Death was here.

L.

Some trial had been making at a raft,
With little hope in such a rolling sea,
A sort of thing at which one would laugh at,
If any laughter at such times could be,
Unless with people who too much have quaff'd,
And have a kind of wild and horrid glee
Half epileptic, and half hysterical:
Their preservation would have been a miracle

LI.

At half-past eight o'clock, booms, hen-coops, spars
And all things, for a chance, had been cast loose
That still could keep afloat the struggling tars,
For yet they strove, although of no great use:
There was no light in heaven but a few stars;
The boats put off o'er crowded with their crews;
She gave a heel, and then a lurch to port,
And, going down head-foremost—sunk, in short.

LII.

Then rose from sea to sky the wild farewell,
Then shriek'd the timid, and stood still the brave,
Then some leap'd overboard with dreadful yell,
As eager to anticipate their grave;
And the sea yawnd around her like a hell,
And down she sunk with her the whirling wave
Like one who grapples with his enemy,
And strives to strangle him before he die.

LIII.

And first one universal shriek there rush'd,
Louder than the loud ocean, like a crash
Of echoing thunder; and then all was hush'd,
Save the wild wind and the remorseless dash
Of billows; but at intervals there gush'd,
Accompanied with a convulsive splash,
A solitary shriek—the bubbling cry
Of some strong swimmer in his agony.

LIV.

The boats, as stated, had got off before,
And in them crowded several of the crew;
And yet their present hope was hardly more
Than what it had been, for so strong it blew,
There was slight chance of reaching any shore,
And then they were too many, though so few—
Nine in the cutter, thirty in the boat,
Were counted in them when they got afloat.

LV.

All the rest perish'd; near two hundred souls
Had left their bodies; and, what's worse, also
When over Catholick the ocean rolls,
They must wait several weeks, before a mass
Takes off one peck of purgatorial coals,
Because, till people know what's come to pass,
They won't lay out their money on the dead—
It costs three francs for every mass that's said.
DON JUAN.

LVI.

A man got into the long-boat, and there
Contrived to help Pedro to a place;
It seemed as if they had exchanged their care,
For Juan wore the magisterial face.

Who courage gives, while poor Pedrillo's pair
Of eyes were crying for their owner's case;
Battista (though a name call'd shortly Tita)
Was lost by getting at some aqua-vita.

LVII.

Pedro, his valet, too, he tried to save;
But the same cause, conducive to his lose,
Left him so drunk, he jump'd into the wave,
As o'er the cutter's edge he tried to cross.

And so he found a wine-and-watery grave:
They could not rescue him, although so close,
Because the sea ran higher every minute,
And for the boat—the crew kept crowding in it.

LVIII.

A small old spider,—which had been Don Jose's,
His father's, whom he loved, as ye may think,
For on such things the memory reposeth
With tenderness—stood howling on the brink,

Knowing, (dogs have such intellectual noses!)
No doubt the vessel was about to sink;
And Juan caught him up, and, ere he stepp'd Off, threw him in, then after him he leapt.

LIX.

He also staff'd his money where he could
About his person, and Pedrillo's too,
Who let him do, in fact, whate'er he would,
Not knowing what himself to say or do,

As every rising wave his dread renew'd;
But Juan, trusting they might still get through,
And deeming there were remedies for any ill,
Thus recumb'd his tutor and his spaniel.

LX.

I was a rough night, and blew so stiffly yet,
That the sail was becalm'd between the seas,
Though on the wave's high top much to set,
They dared not take it in for all the breeze.

Each sea curl'd o'er the stern, and kept them wet,
And made them bale without a moment's ease,
So that themselves as well as hopes were damp'd,
And the poor little cutter quickly swam'd.

LXI.

Nine souls more went in her; the long-boat still Kept above water, with an oar for mast,
I wo blankets stitch'd together, answering ill
Instead of sail, were to the oar made fast;

Though every wave roll'd menacing to fill,
And present peril all before surpass'd,
I hey grief'd for those who perish'd with the cutter,
And also for the biscuit-casks and butter.

LXII.

The sun rose red and fiery a sure sign
Of the continuance of the gale: to run
Before the sea, until it should grow fine,
Was all that for the present could be done:

A few teaspoonfuls of their rum and wine
Was serv'd out to the people, who began
To faint, and damaged bread wet through the bags,
And most of them had little clothes but rags.

LXIII.

They counted thirty, crowded in a space
Which left scarce room for motion or exertion:
They did their best to modify their case,
[ion,
One half sate up, though numb'd with the inner

While t'other half were laid down in their place,
At watch and watch; thus, shivering like the ter-

A gue in its cold fit, they fill'd their boat, [ia

With nothing but the sky for a great-coat.

LXIV.

'Tis very certain the desire of life
Frolongs it; this is obvious to physicians,

When patients, neither plagued with friend nor wife
Survive through very desperate conditions,

Because they still can hope, nor shives the knifeNor shears of Atropos before their visions.

Despair of all recovery spoils longevity,
And makes men's miseries of alarming brevity.

LXV.

'Tis said that persons living on annuities
Are longer lived than others,—God knows why
Unless to plague the grantors,—yet so true it is
That some, I really think, do never die:

Of any creditors the worst a Jew it is,
And that's their mode of furnishing supply:

In my young days they lent me cash that way,
Which I found very troublesome to pay.

LXVI.

'Tis thus with people in an open boat,
They live upon the love of life, and bear
More than can be believed, or even thought, [tes:
And stand, like rocks, the tempest's wear and

And hardships still has been the sailor's lot,
Since Noah's ark went cruising here and there
She had a curious crew as well as cargo,
Like the first old Greek privateer, the Argo.

LXVII.

But man is a carnivorous production,
And must have meals, at least one meal a day;
He cannot live, like woodcocks, upon suction,
But, like the shark and tiger, must have prey.

Although his anatomical construction
Bears vegetables in a grumbling way,
Your laboring people think, beyond all question,
Beef, veal, and mutton, better for digestion.

LXVIII.

And thus it was with this our hapless crew;
For on the third day there came on a calm,
And though at first their strength it might renew
And, lying on their weariness like balm,

Did them like tarts sleeping on the blue
Of ocean, when they woke they felt a qualm
And fell all ravenously on their provision,
Instead of hoarding it with due precision.

LXIX.

The consequence was easily foreseen—
They ate up all they had, and drank their wine
In spite of all remonstrances, and then

On what, in fact, next day were they to dine?
They hoped the wind would rise, these foolish men
And carry them to shore: these hopes were fine,
But as they had but one oar, and that brittle,
It would have been more wise to save their victual
LXX.
The fourth day came, but not a breath of air,
And ocean slumber'd like an unwaken'd child:
The fifth day, and their boat lay floating there,
The sea and sky were blue, and clear, and mild—
With their one oar (I wish they had had a pair)
What could they do? and hunger's rage grew wild,
So Juan's spainiel, spite of his entreating,
Was kill'd and portion'd out for present eating.

LXXI.
On the sixth day they fed upon his hide,
And Juan, who had still refused, because
The creature was his father's dog that died,
Now feeling all the vulture in his jaws,
With some remorse received, (though first denied,) As a great favor, one of the fore-paws,
Which he divided with Pedrillo, who Devour'd it, longing for the other too.

LXXII.
The seventh day, and no wind—the burning sun
Blister'd and scorch'd; and stagnant on the sea,
They lay like carcases; and hope was none,
Save in the breeze that came not; savagely
They glare'd upon each other—all was done,
Water, and wine, and food,—and you might see
The longings of the cannibal arise
Although they spoke not) in their wolfish eyes.

LXXIII.
At length one whisper'd his companion, who Whisper'd another, and thus it went round, And then into a hoarser murmur grew,
An ominous, and wild, and desperate sound;
And when his comrades thoughts each sufferer knew 'Twas but his own, suppress'd till now, he found:
And out they spoke of lots for flesh and blood,
And who should die to be his fellows' food.

LXXIV.
But ere they came to this, they that day shared Some leathern caps, and what remain'd of shoes; And then they look'd around them, and despair'd, And none to be the sacrifice would choose;
At length the lots were torn up and prepared, But of materials that must shock the muse— Having no paper, for the want of better, They took by force from Juan Julia's letter.

LXXV.
The lots were made, and mark'd, and mix'd, and In silent horror, and their distribution [handed Lull'd even the savage hunger which demanded, Like the Prometheus vulture, this pollution; None in particular had sought or plan'd it, 'Twas nature gnaw'd them to this resolution, By which none were permitted to be neutral— And the lot fell on Juan's luckless tutor.

LXXVI.
He but requests to be bled to death; The surgeon had his instruments, and bled Pedrillo, and so gently ebb'd his breath, You hardly could perceive when he was dead. He died, as born, a Catholic in faith, Like most in the belief in which they're bred, At first a little credulous he kis'd, and then hold'd out his jugular and wrist.

LXXVII.
The surgeon, as there was no other fee, Had his first choice of morsels for his pains; But being thirstiest at the moment, he Prefer'd a draught from the fast-flowing veins Part was divided, part thrown in the sea, And such things as the entrails and the brains Regaled two sharks, who follow'd o'er the bilow— The sailors ate the rest of poor Pedrillo.

LXXVIII.
The sailors ate him, all save three or four, Who were not quite so fond of animal food: To these was added Juan, who, before Refusing his own spainiel, hardly could Feel now his appetite increased much more; 'Twas not to be expected that he should, Even in extremity of their disaster, Dine with them on his pastor and his master.

LXXIX.
'Twas better that he did not; for, in fact, The consequence was awful in the extreme; For they, who were most ravenous in the act, Went raging mad—Lord! how they did blaspheme And foam and roll, with strange convulsions rack'd, Drinking salt water like a mountain-stream, Tearing and grinning, howling, screeching, swear. And, with hyaena laughter, died despairing. [ing,

LXXX.
Their numbers were much thin'd by this infliction, And all the rest were thin enough, heaven knows; And some of them had lost their recollection, Happier than they who still perceived their woes But others ponder'd on a new dissection, As if not warn'd sufficiently by those Who had already perish'd, suffering madly, For having used their appetites so sadly.

LXXXI.
And next they thought upon the master's mate, As fattert; but he saved himself, because, Besides being much averse from such a fate, There were some other reasons: the first was, He had been rather indisposed of late, And that which chiefly proved his saving clause, Was a small present made to him at Cadiz, By general subscription of the ladies.

LXXXII.
Of poor Pedrillo something still remain'd, But it was used sparingly,—some were afraid, And others still their appetites constrain'd, Or but at times a little supper made; All except Juan, who throughout abstain'd, Chewing a piece of bamboo, and some leas; At length they caught two boobies and a nodd'y, And then they left off eating the dead body.

LXXXIII.
And if Pedrillo's fate should shocking be, Remember Ugolino condescends To eat the head of his arch-enemy The moment after he politely ends His tale; if foes be food in hell, at sea 'Tis surely fair to dine upon our friends, When shipwright's short allowed fare grows too scanty Without being much more horrible than Dante.
LXXXIV.

And the same night there fell a shower of rain,
For which their mouths gaped, like the cracks of earth
When dried to summer dust; till taught by pain,
Men really know not what good water's worth;
If you had been in Turkey or in Spain,
Or with a furnish'd boat's crew, born by your birth,
Or in the desert heard the camel's bell,
You'd wish yourself where Truth is—in a well.

LXXXV.

It pour'd down torrents, but they were no richer,
Until they found a ragged piece of sheet,
Which served them as a sort of spongy pitcher,
And when they deemed its moisture was complete,
They wrung it out, and, though a thirsty ditcher
Might not have thought the scanty draught so
As a full pot of porter, to their thinking
They ne'er, till now, had known the joys of drinking.

LXXXVI.

And their baked lips, with many a bloody crack,
Suck'd in the moisture, which like nectar stream'd;
Their throats were ovens, their swoln tongues were black
As the rich man's in hell, who vainly scream'd
To beg the beggar, who could not, rain back
A drop of dew, when every drop had seem'd
To taste of heaven—if this be true, indeed,
Some Christians have a comfortable creed.

LXXXVII.

There were two fathers in this ghastly crew,
And with them their two sons, of whom the one
Was more robust and hardy to the view,
But he died early; and when he was gone,
His nearest messmate told his sire, so threw
One glance on him, and said, "Heaven's will be,
I can do nothing!" and he saw him thrown abroad;
Into the deep, without a tear or groan.

LXXXVIII.

The other father had a weaker child,
Of a soft cheek, and aspect delicate;
But the boy bore up long, and with a mild
And patient spirit, held aloof his fate;
Little he said, and now and then he smiled,
As if to win a part from off the weight
He saw increasing on his father's heart,
With the deep deadly thought, that they must part.

LXXXIX.

And o'er him bent his sire, and never raised
His eyes from off his face, but wiped the foam
From his pale lips, and ever on him gazed; [come,
And when the wish'd-for shower at length was
And the boy's eyes, which the dull film half glaz'd,
Brighten'd, and for a moment seem'd to resem
He squee'd from out a rag some drops of rain
Into his dying child's mouth—but in vain.

XC.

The boy expired—the father held the clay,
And look'd upon it long, and when at last
Death left no doubt, and the dead burden lay
Stiff on his heart, and pulse and hope were past,
He watch'd it wistfully, until away
'Twas borne by the rude wave wherein 'twas cast;
Then he himself sunk down, a. dumb and shivering,
And gave no signs of life, save his limbs quiver.

XCI.

Now overheard a rainbow, bursting through sea,
The scattering clouds, shone, spanning the dark
Resting its bright base on the quivering blue:
And all within its arch appear'd to be
Clearer than that without, and its wide hue
Wax'd broad and waving, like a banner free,
Then chang'd like to a bow that's bent, and then
Forsook the dim eyes of these shipwreck'd men.

XCII.

It chang'd, of course; a heavenly chameleon,
The airy child of vapor and the sun,
Brought forth in purple, cradled in vermilion,
Baptized in molten gold, and swathed in dun,
Glittering like crescents o'er a Turk's pavilion,
And blending every color into one,
Just like a black eye in a recent smudge.
(For sometimes we must box without the muzzle.)

XCIII.

Our shipwreck'd seamen thought it a good omen—
It is as well to think so, now and then;
'Twas an old custom of the Greek and Roman,
And may become of great advantage when
Folks are discouraged; and most surely no men
Had greater need to nerve themselves again
Than these, and so this rainbow look'd like hope—
Quite a celestial kaleidoscope.

XCIV.

About this time, a beautiful white bird,
Web-footed, not unlike a dove in size
And plumage, (probably it might have err'd
Upon its course,) pass'd off before their eyes,
And tried to perch, although it saw and heard
The men within the boat, and in this guise
It came and went, and flutter'd round them till Night fell:—this seem'd a better omen still.

XCV.

But in this case I also must remark,
'Twas well this-bird of promise did not perch
Because the tackle of our shatter'd bark
Was not so safe for roosting as a church;
And had it been the dove from Noah's ark,
Returning there from her successful search,
Which in their way that moment chance to fail,
They would have eat her, olive-branch and all.

XCVI.

With twilight it again came on to blow,
But not with violence; the stars shone out,
The boat made way; yet now they were so low,
'They knew not where nor what they were about;
Some fancied they saw land, and some said "No!"
The frequent fog-banks gave them cause to doubt—
Some swore that they heard breakers, others guns,
And all mistook about the latter once.

XCVII.

As morning broke, the light wind died away,
When he who had the watch sung out, and swore
If 'twas not land that rose with the sun's ray
He wish'd that land he never might see more.
And the rest rubb'd their eyes, and saw a bay,
Or thought they saw, and shaped their course to
For shore it was, and gradually grew Distinct and high, and palpable to view shore

XCVIII.
And then of these some part burst into tears,
And others, looking with a stupid stare,
Could not yet separate their hopes from fears,
And seem'd as if they had no further care;
While a few pray'd—(the first time for some years)—
And at the bottom of the boat three were Asleep; they shook them by the hand and head,
And tried to awaken them, but found them dead.

XCIX.
The day before, fast sleeping on the water,
They found a turtle of the hawks-bill kind,
And by good fortune, gliding softly, caught her,
Which yielded a day's life, and to their mind
Proved even still a more nutritious matter,
Because it left encouragement behind:
They thought that in such perils, more than chance
Had sent them this for their deliverance.

C.
The land appear'd, a high and rocky coast,
And higher grew the mountains as they drew,
Set by a current, toward it; they were lost
In various conjectures, for none knew
To what part of the earth they had been tossed,
So changeable had been the winds that blew;
Some thought it was Mount Ætna, some the high-
Of Candia, Cyprus, Rhodes, or other islands. [lands

CI.
Meantime the current, with a rising gale,
Still set them onwards to the welcome shore,
Like Charon's bark of spectres, dull and pale:
Their living freight was now reduced to four;
And three dead, whom their strength could not avail
To heave into the deep with those before,
Though the two sharks still follow'd them, and dash'd
The spray into their faces as they splash'd.

CII.
Famine, despair, cold, thirst, and heat had done
Their work on them by turns, and thinn'd them to Such things, a mother had not known her son
Amidst the skeletons of that gaunt crew;
By night chill'd, by day scorched, thus one by one
They perish'd, until wither'd to these few,
But chiefly by a species of self-slaughter,
In washing down Pedrillo with salt water.

CIII.
As they drew nigh the land, which now was seen,
Unequal in its aspect here and there,
They felt the freshness of its growing green,
That waved in forest tops, and smooth'd the air,
And fell upon their glazed eyes as a screen
From glistening waves, and skies so hot and bare—
Lovely seem'd any object that should sweep
Away the vast, salt, drear, eternal deep.

CIV.
The shore look'd wild, without the trace of man,
And girt by formidable waves; but they
Were mad for land, and thus their course they ran,
Though right ahead the roaring breakers lay:
A reef between them also now began
To show its boiling surf and bounding spray;
But, finding no place for their landing better—
They ran the boat for shore, and overcast her

CV.
But in his native stream, the Guadalquivir,
Juan to love his youthful limbs and heart;
And, having learn'd to swim in that sweet river,
Had oft turn'd the art to some account.
A better swimmer you could scarce see ever,
He could, perhaps, have pass'd the Hellespont
As once, (a feat on which ourselves we prided,) Leander, Mr. Ekenhead, and I did.

CVI.
So, here, though faint, exequiated, and stark,
He bury'd his boyish limbs, and strove to ply
With the quick wave, and gain, ere it was dark
The beach which lay before him, high and dry.
The greatest danger here was from a shark.
That carried off his neighbor by the thigh;
As for the other two, they could not swim,
So nobody arrived on shore but him.

CVII.
Nor yet had he arrived but for the oar,
Which, providentially for him, was wash'd
Just as his feeble arms could strike no more;
And the hard wave o'whelm'd him as 'twas dash'd
Within his grasp; he clung to it, and sore
The waters beat while he thereto was lashed;
At last, with swimming, wading, scrambling, he Roll'd on the beach, half senseless, from the sea:

CVIII.
There, breathless, with his digging nails he clung
Fast to the sand, lest the returning wave,
From whose reluctant roar his life he wrung
Should suck him back to her insatiate grave;
And there he lay, full-length, where he was flung
Before the entrance of a cliff-worn cave,
With just enough of life to feel its pain,
And deem that it was saved, perhaps in vain.

CIX.
With slow and staggering effort he arose,
But sunk again upon his bleeding knee,
And quivering hand; and then he look'd for those
Who long had been his mates upon the sea,
But none of them appear'd to share his woes;
Save one, a corpse from out the famish'd three,
Who died two days before, and now had found
An unknown barren beach for burial ground.

CX.
And, as he gazed, his dizzy brain spun fast,
And down he sunk, and, as he sunk, the sand
Swam round and round, and all his senses pass'd:
He fell upon his side, and his stretch'd hand
Drapp'd dripping on the oar, (their jury mast,)
And, like a wither'd lily, on the land
His slender frame and pallid aspect lay,
As fair a thing as 'er was form'd of clay.

CXI.
How long in his damp trance young Juan lay
He knew not, for the earth was gone for him,
And time had nothing more of night nor day
For his congealing blood, and senses dim.
And how this heavy faintness pass'd away
He knew not, till each painful pulse his limb
And tingling vein, seem'd throbbing back to life.
For Death, though vanquish'd, still retir'd with stra
CXII.
His eyes he open'd, shut, again unclosed,
For all was doubt and disinterest: he thought
He still was in the boat, and had but dozed.
And felt again with his despair o'erwrongt,
And wish'd it death in which he had reposed;
And then once more his feelings back were brought,
And slowly by his swimming eyes was seen
A lovely female face of seventeen.

CXIII.
'Twas bounding close o'er his, and the small mouth
S'med almost prying into his for breath;
And chasing him, the soft warm hand of youth
Recall'd his answering spirits back from death.
And, bathing his chill temples, tried to sooth
Each pulse to animation, till beneath
Its gentle touch and trembling care, a sigh
To these kind efforts made a low reply.

CXIV.
Then was the cordial pour'd, and mantle flung
Around his scarce-clad limbs; and the fair arm
Rais'd higher the faint head which o'er it hung;
And her transparent cheek, all pure and warm,
Pillow'd his death-like forehead; then she wrung
His dewy curls, long drench'd by every storm;
And watch'd with eagerness each throb that drew
A sigh from his heaved bosom—and hers too.

CXV.
And lifting him with care into the cave,
The gentle girl, and her attendant,—one
Young yet her older, and of brow less grave,
And more robust of figure,—then begun
To kindle fire, and as the new flames gave Light to the rocks that roof'd them, which the sun
Had never seen, the maid, or whatso'ere
She was, appear'd distinct, and tall, and fair.

CXVI.
Her brow was overhung with coins of gold,
That sparkled o'er the auburn of her hair,
Her clustering hair, whose longer locks were roll'd
In braids behind, and, though her stature were Even of the highest for a female mould,
They nearly reach'd her heel; and in her air
There was a something which bespoke command,
As one who was a lady in the land.

CXVII.
Her hair, I said, was auburn; but her eyes
Were black as death, their lashes the same hue,
Of downcast length, in whose silk shadow lies
Deepest attraction, for when to the view
Forth from its raven fringe the full glance flies,
Ne'er with such force the swiftest arrow flew;
'Tis as the snake, late coil'd, who pours his length,
And hurst at once his venom and his strength.

CXVIII.
Her brow was white and low, her cheeks' pure dye
Like twilight rosy still with the set sun;
Short upper lip—sweet lips! that make us sigh
Ever to have seen such; for she was one
Fit for the model of a statuary.
(A race of mere impostors, when all's done:
I've seen much finer women, ripe and real,
Than all the nonsense of their stone ideal.)

CXIX.
I'll tell you why I say so, for 'tis just
One should not rail without a decent cause.
There was an Irish lady, to whose bust
I never saw justice done, and yet she was
A frequent model; and if e'er she must Yield to stern Time and Nature's wrinkling jaws
They will destroy a face which mortal thought
Ne'er compass'd, nor less mortal chisel wrought.

CXI.
And such was she, the lady of the cave:
Her dress was very different from the Spanisn,
Simpler, and yet of colors not so grave;
For, as you know, the Spanish women banish
Bright hues when out of doors, and yet, while wave
Around them (what I hope will never vanish)
The basquina and the mantilla, they Seem at the same time mystical and gay.

CXXI.
But with our damsel this was not the case:
Her dress was many color'd, finely spun;
Her locks curl'd negligently round her face,
But through them gold and gems profusely shone
Her girdle sparkled, and the richest lace
Flow'd in her veil, and many a precious stone
Flash'd on her little hand; but, what was shocking
Her small snow feet had slippers, but no stocking.

CXXII.
The other female's dress was not unlike,
But of inferior materials: she
Had not so many ornaments to strike:
Her hair had silver only, bound to be
Her dowry; and her veil, in form alike,
Was coarser; and her air, though firm, less free;
Her hair was thicker, but less long; her eyes
As black, but quicker, and of smaller size.

CXXIII.
And these two tended him, and cheer'd him both
With food and rainment, and those soft attentions
Which are (as I must own) of female growth,
And have ten thousand delicate inventions;
They made a most superior mess of broth,
A thing which poesy but seldom mentions.
But the best dish that e'er was rock'd since Homer's
Achilles order'd dinner for new comers.

CXXIV.
I'll tell you who they were, this female pair,
Lest they should seem princesses in disguise;
Besides I hate all mystery, and that air
Of clap-trap, which your poets prize;
And so, in short, the girls they really were
They shall appear before your curious eyes,
Mistress and maid; the first was only daughter
Of an old man who lived upon the water.

CXXV.
A fisherman he had been in his youth,
And still a sort of fisherman was he;
But other speculations were, in sooth,
Added to his connexion with the sea,
Perhaps, not so respectable in truth;
A little smuggling, and some piracy,
Left him, at last, the sole of many masters
Of an ill-gotten million of piaster.
CXXVI.
A fisher, therefore, was he—though of men,
Like Peter the Apostle,—and he fish'd
For wandering merchant vessels, now and then,
And sometimes caught as many as he wish'd;—
The cargoes he confiscated, and gain
He sought in the slave-market too, and dish'd
Full many a morsel for that Turkish trade,
By which, no doubt, a good deal may be made.

CXXVII.
He was a Greek, and on his isle had built
(One of the wild and smaller Cyclades)
A very handsome house from out his guilt,
And there he lived exceedingly at ease;
Heaven knows what cash he got, or blood he spilt,
A sad old fellow was he, if you please,
But this I know, it was a spacious building,
Full of barbaric carving, paint, and gilding.

CXXVIII.
He had an only daughter, call'd Haidee,
The greatest heiress of the Eastern isles;
Besides so very beautiful was she,
Her dowry was as nothing to her smiles:
Still in her teens, and like a lovely tree
She grew to womanhood, and between whiles
Rejected several suitors, just to learn
How to accept a better in his turn.

CXXIX.
And walking out upon the beach below
The cliff, towards sunset, on that day she found,
Insensible,—not dead, but nearly so,—
Don Juan, almost famish'd, and half drown'd;
But, being naked, she was shock'd, you know,
Yet deem'd herself in common pity bound,
As far as in her lay, "to take him in,
A stranger," dying, with so white a skin.

CXXX.
But taking him into her father's house
Was not exactly the best way to save,
But like conveying to the cat the mouse,
Or people in a trance into their grave;
Because the good old man had so much "wra'f,
Unlike the honest Arab thieves so brave,
He would have hospitably cured the stranger,
And sold him instantly when out of danger.

CXXXI.
And therefore, with her maid, she thought it best
(A virgin always on her maid relies)
To place him in the cave for present rest:
And when, at last, he open'd his black eyes,
Her charity increased about their guest.
And their compassion grew to such a size,
It open'd half the turnpike-gates to heaven—
(Saint Paul says 'tis the toll which must be given.)

CXXXII.
They made a fire, but such a fire as they Upon the moment could contrive with such Materials as were cast up round the bay,
Some broken planks and oars, that to the touch
Were nearly tinder, since so long they lay,
A mast was almost crumbled to a crutch;
But, 'by God's grace,' here wrecks were in such plenty,
That there was fuel to have furnish'd twenty.

CXXXIII.
He had a bed of furs and a pelisse
For Haidee stripp'd her sables off to make
His couch; and that he might be more at ease,
And warm, in case by chance he should awake
They also gave a petticoat apiece,
She and her maid, and promise'd by daybreak
To pay him a fresh visit, with a dish,
For breakfast, of eggs, coffee, bread, and fish.

CXXXIV.
And thus they left him to his lone reposè
Juan slept like a top, or like the dead,
Who sleep at last, perhaps, (God only knows,)—
Just for the present, and in his hul'd head
Not even a vision of his former woes
Spread'd in accur'd dreams, which sometimes
Unwelcome visions of our former years,
Till the eye, cheated, open'd thick with tears.

CXXXV.
Young Juan slept all dreamless;—but the maid
Who smooth'd his pillow, as she left the den,
Look'd back upon him, and a moment stay'd,
And turn'd, believing that he call'd again.
He slumber'd; yet she thought, at least she said,
(The heart will slip even as the tongue and pen.)
He had pronounced her name—but she forgot
That at this moment Juan knew it not.

CXXXVI.
And pensive to her father's house she went,
Enjoining silence strict to Zoe, who
Better than she knew what, in fact, she meant,
She being wiser by a year or two:
A year or two 's an age when rightly spent,
And Zoe spent hers as most women do,
In gaining all that useful sort of knowledge
Which is acquired in nature's good old college.

CXXXVII.
The morn broke, and found Juan slumbering still!
Fast in his cave, and nothing clash'd upon
His rest; the rushing of the neighboring rill,
And the young beams of the excluded sun,
Troubled him not, and he might sleep his fill;
And need he had of slumber yet, for none
Had suffer'd more—his hardships were comparative
To those related in my grand-dad's "Narrative."

CXXXVIII.
Not so Haidee; she sadly toss'd and tumbled,
And started from her sleep, and, turning o'er,
Dream'd of a thousand wrecks, o' er which she stumbled,
And handsome corpses strew'd upon the shore;
And woke her maid so early that she grumbled,
And call'd her father's old slaves up, who swore
In several oaths—Armenian, Turk, and Greek,—
They knew not what to think of such a freak.

CXXXIX.
But up she got, and up she made them get,
With some pretence about the sun, that makes
Sweet skies just when he rises, or is set;
And 'tis, no doubt, a sight to see when breaks
Bright Phæbus, while the mountains still are waxed
With mist, and every bird with him awakes,
And night is flung off like a mourning suit
Worn for a husband,—or some other brute
CXL.
I say, the s.n is a most g'orious sight.
I've seen him rise full fit, indeed of late
I have set up on purpose all the night,
Which hastens, as physicians say, one's fate;
And so all ye, who would be in the right
In health and purse, begin your day to date
From day-break, and when coffin'd at fourscore,
Engrave upon the plate, you rose at four.

CXLII.
And Haidee met the morning face to face;
Her own was freshest, though a feverish flush
Had dyed it with the headlong blood, whose race
From heart to check is cur'd into a blush,
Like to r torrent which a mountain's base,
That o'er uppowers some Alpine river's rush,
Checks to a lake, whose waves in circles spread,
Or the Red Sea—but the sea is not red.

CXLIII.
And down the cliff the island virgin came,
And near the cave her quick light footsteps drew,
While the sun smiled on her with his first flame,
And young Aurora kiss'd her lips with dew,
Taking her for a sister; just the same
Mistake you would have made on seeing the two,
Although the mortal, quite as fresh and fair,
Had all the advantage too of not being air.

CXLIV.
And thus, like to an angel o'er the dying
Who die in righteousness, she lean'd; and there
All tranquilly the shipwreck'd boy was lying,
As o'er him lay the calm and stillst air;
But Zoé the meantime some eggs was frying,
Since, after all, no doubt the youthful pair
Must breakfast, and betimes—lest they should ask it,
She drew out her provision from the basket.

CXLV.
She knew that the best feelings must have victual,
And that a shipwreck'd youth would hungryst be;
Besides, being less in love, she yawn'd a little,
And felt her veins chill'd by the neighboring sea;
And so, she cook'd their breakfast to a tittle;
I can't say that she gave them any tea,
But there were eggs, fruit, coffee, bread, fish, honey,
With Scio wine—and all for love, not money.

CXLVI.
And Zoé, when the eggs were ready, and
The coffee made, would fain have waken'd Juan;
But Haidee stopp'd her with her quick small hand,
And without word, a sign her finger drew on
Her lip, which Zoé needs must understand;
And, the first breakfast spoil'd, prepared a new one,
Because her mistress would not let her break
That sleep which seem'd as it would ne'er awake.

CXLVII.
For still he lay, and on his thin worn cheek
A purple hectic play'd, like dying day
On the snow-tops of distant hills; the streak
Of sufferance yet upon his forehead lay, [weak,
Where the blue veins look'd shadowy, shrunk, and lif,
And his black curls were dewy with the spray,
Which weigh'd upon them yet, all damp as a suit
Mix'd with the stony vapors of the vault.

CXLVIII.
And she bent o'er him, and he lay beneath,
Hush'd as the babe upon its mother's breast,
Droop'd as the willow when no winds can breathe;
Lull'd like the depth of ocean when at rest,
Fair as the crowning rose of the whole wreath,
Soft as the callow eyneget in its nest;
In short he was a very pretty fellow,
Although his woe's had turn'd him rather yellow.

CXLIX.
He woke and gazed, and would have slept again,
But the fair face which met his eyes, forbade
Those eyes to close, though weariness and pain
Had further sleep a further pleasure made:
For woman's face was never form'd in vain
For Juan, so that even when he pray'd,
He turn'd from grisly saints, and martyrs hairly,
To the sweet portraits of the Virgin Mary.

CL.
And thus upon his elbow he arose,
And look'd upon the lady in whose cheek
The pale contented with the purple rose,
As with an effort she began to speak;
Her eyes were eloquent, her words would pose
Although she told him, in good modern Greek
With an Ionian accent, low and sweet,
That he was faint, and must not talk, but eat.

CLI.
Now Juan could not understand a word,
Being no Grecian; but he had an ear,
And her voice was the warble of a bird,
So soft, so sweet, so delicately clear,
That finer, simpler music ne'er was heard;
The sort of sound we echo with a tear,
Without knowing why—an overpowering tone,
Whence melody descends, as from a throne.

CLII.
And Juan gaz'd, as one who is awake
By a distant organ, doubting if he be
Not yet a dreamer, till the spell is broke
By the watchman, or some such reality,
Or by one's early valet's cursed knock;
At least it is a heavy sound to me,
Who like a morning slumber—for the night
Shows stars and women in a better light.

CLIII.
And Juan, too, was help'd out from his dream,
Or sleep, or whatsoever it was, by feeling
A most prodigious appetite: the steam
Of Zoé's cookery no doubt was stealing
Upon his senses, and the kindling beam
Of the new fire which Zoé kept up kneeling
To stir her viands, made him quite awake
And long for food, but chiefly a beef-steak.
CLIV.
But beef is rare within these oxless isles;
Goats' flesh there is, no doubt, and kid, and mutton,
And when a holiday upon them smiles,
A joint upon their barbarous spits they put on:
But this occurs but seldom, between whiles,
For some of these are rocks with scarce a hut on,
Others are fair and fertile, among which,
This, though not large, was one of the most rich.

CLV.
I say that beef is rare and can't help thinking
That the old fable of the Minotaur—
From which our modern morals rightly shrinking.
Condemn the royal lady's taste who wore
A cow's shape for a mask—was only (sinking
The allegory) a mere type, no more—
That Pasiphaë promoted breeding cattle,
To make the Cretans bloodier in battle.

CLVI.
For we all know that English people are Fed upon beef—I won't say much of beer,
Because 'tis liquor only, and being far
From this my subject, has no business here:—
We know, too, they are very fond of war,
A pleasure—like all pleasures—rather dear,
So were the Cretans—from which I infer
That beef and battles both were owing to her.

CLVII.
But to resume. The languid Juan raised
His head upon his elbow, and he saw
A sight on which he had not lately gazed,
As all his latter meals had been quite raw,
Three or four things for which the Lord be praised,
And, feeling still the famish'd vulture gnaw,
He fell upon whatever was offer'd, like
A priest, a shark, an alderman, or pike.

CLVIII.
He ate, and he was well supplied; and she,
Who watch'd him like a mother, would have fed
Him past all bounds, because she smiled to see
Such appetite in one she had deem'd dead:
But Zoë, being older than Haidee,
Knew (by tradition, for she ne'er had read)
That famish'd people must be slowly nursed,
And fed by spoonfuls, else they always burst.

CLIX.
And so she took the liberty to state,
Rather by deeds than words, because the case
Was urgent, that the gentleman, whose fate
Had made her mistress quit her bed to trace
He seashore at this hour, must leave his plate,
Unless he wish'd to die upon the place—
She snatch'd it, and refused another morsel,
Saying, he had gorged enough to make a horse ill.

CLX.
Next they—he being naked, save a tatter'd
Pair of scarce decent trousers—went to work,
And in the fire his recent rags they scatter'd,
And dress'd him, for the present, like a Turk,
Or Greek—that is, although it not much matter'd,
Omitting turban, slippers, pistols, dirk,—
They furnish'd him, entire except some stitches,
With a clean shirt, and very spacious breeches.

CLXI.
And then fair Haidee tried her tongue at speaking
But not a word could Juan comprehend,
Although he listen'd so that the young Greek in
Her earnestness would never have made an end.
And, as he interrupted not, went eking
Her speech out to her protégé and friend,
Till, pausing at the last her breath to take,
She saw he did not understand Romæic.

CLXII.
And then she had recourse to nods, and signs,
And smiles, and sparkles of the speaking eye
And read (the only book she could) the lines
Of his fair face, and found, by sympathy,
The answer eloquent, where the soul shines
And darts in one quick glance a long reply;
And thus in every look she saw express'd
A world of words, and things at which she guess'd.

CLXIII.
And now, by dint of fingers and of eyes,
And words repeated after her, he took
A lesson in her tongue; but by surprise,
No doubt, less of her language than her look:
As he who studies fervently the skies
Turns oftener to the stars than to his book,
Thus Juan learn'd his alpha beta better
From Haidee's glance than any graven letter.

CLXIV.
'Tis pleasing to be school'd in a strange tongue
By female lips and eyes—that is, I mean,
When both the teacher and the taught are young,
As was the case, at least where I have been;
They smile so when one's right, and when one's wrong
They smile still more, and then there intervene
Pressure of hands, perhaps even a chaste kiss;—
I learn'd, the little that I know by this:

CLXV.
That is, some words of Spanish, Turk, or Greek,
Italian not at all, having no teachers,
Much English I cannot pretend to speak;
Learning that language chiefly from its preachers
Barrow, South, Tilletson, whom every week
I study, also Blair, the highest teachers
Of eloquence in piety and prose—
I hate your poets, so read none of those.

CLXVI.
As for the ladies, I have nought to say,
A wanderer from the British world of fashion,
Where I, like other "dogs, have had my day,"
Like other men, too, may have had my passion—
But that, like other things, has pass'd away;
And all her fows whom I could lay the lash on,
Foes, friends, men. women, now are nought to me
But dreams of what has been, no more to be.

CLXVII.
Return we to Don Juan. He began
To hear new words, and to repeat them; but
Some feelings, universal as the sun,
Were such as could not in his breast be shut
More than within the bosom of a nun:
He was in love—as you would be, no doubt.
With a young benefactress,—so was she
Just in the way we very often see.
CLXVIII.
And every day by daybreak—rather early
For Juan, who was somewhat fond of rest—
She came into the cave, but it was merely
To see her bird repose in his nest;
And she would softly stir his looks so curvily,
Without disturbing her yet slumbering guest,
Breathing all gently o'er his cheek and mouth,
As o'er a bed of roses the sweet south.

CLXIX.
And every morn his color freshlier came,
And every day help'd on his convalescence,
Was well, because health in the human frame
Is pleasant, besides being true love's essence,
For health and idleness to passion's flame
Are oil and gunpowder; and some good lessons
Are also learnt from Ceres and from Bacchus,
Without whom Venus will not long attack us.

CLXX.
While Venus fills the heart, (without heart really Love, though good always, is not quite so good,) Ceres presents a plate of vermicelli,
For love must be sustain'd like flesh and blood.—
While Bacchus pours out wine, or hands a jelly:
Eggs, oysters too, are amatory food;
But who is their purveyors from above
Heaven knows,—it may be-Neptune, Pan, or Jove.

CLXXI.
When Juan woke, he found some good things ready:
A bath, a breakfast, and the finest eyes
That ever made a youthful heart less steady,
Besides her maid's, as pretty for their size;
But I have spoken of all this already—
And repetition's tiresome and unwise.—
Well,—Juan, after bathing in the sea,
Came always back to coffee and Haidee.

CLXXII.
Both were so young, and one so innocent,
That bathing pass'd for nothing; Juan seem'd to her, as 'twere the kind of being sent,
Of whom these two years she had nightly dream'd,
A something to be loved, a creature meant
To be her happiness, and whom she deem'd
To render happy; all who joy would win
Must share it,—happiness was born a twin.

CLXXIII.
It was such pleasure to behold him, such Enlargement of existence to partake
Nature with him, to thrill beneath his touch,
To watch him slumbering, and to see him wake
To live with him for ever were too much;
But then the thought of parting made her quake:
He was her own, her ocean treasure, cost
Like a rich wreck—her first love and her last.

CLXXIV.
And thus a moon roll'd on, and fair Haidee
Paid daily visits to her boy, and took Such plentiful precautions, that still he Remain'd unknown within his craggy nook:
At last her father's prows put out to sea,
For certain merchantmen upon the look,
Not as of yore to carry off an Io,
But three Ragusan vessels, bound for Scio.

CLXXV.
Then came her freedman, for she had no mother,
So that, her father being at sea, she was Free'd as a married woman, or such other
Female, as where she likes may freely pass,
Without even the encumbrance of a brother,
The freest she that ever gazed on glass:
I speak of Christian lands in this comparison,
Where wives, at least, are seldom kept in garison.

CLXXVI.
Now she prologue'd her visits and her talk,
(For they must talk,) and he had learnt to say
So much as to propose to take a walk,—
For little had he wander'd since the day
On which, like a young flower snapp'd from the stalk
Dropping and dewy on the beach he lay,—
And thus they walk'd out in the afternoon,
And saw the sun set opposite the moon.

CLXXVII.
It was a wild and breaker-beaten coast,
With cliffs above, and a broad sandy shore,
Guarded by shoals and rocks as by a host,
With here and there a creek, whose aspect wore
A better welcome to the tempest-toss'd;
And rarely ceased the haughty billows' roar,
Save on the dead long summer days, which make
The outstretch'd ocean glitter like a lake.

CLXXVIII.
And the small ripple split upon the beach
Scarcely o'erpass'd the cream of your champagne
When o'er the brim the sparkling bums reach,
That springdew of the spirit! the heart's rain!
Few things surpass old wine; and they may preach
Who please,—the more because they preach in vain,—
Let us have wine and women, mirth and laughter,
Sermons and soda-water the day after.

CLXXIX.
Man, being reasonable, must get drunk;
The best of life is but intoxication:
Glory, the grape, love, gold, in these are sunk
The hopes of all men, and of every nation;
Without their sap, how branchless were the trunk
Of life's strange tree, so fruitful on occasion!
But to return,—get very drunk; and when
You wake with headache, you shall see what then.

CLXXX.
Ring for your valet—bid him quickly bring
Some hock and soda-water, then you'll know
A pleasure worthy Xeres the great king;
For not the blest sherbet, sublim'd with snow.
Nor the first sparkle of the desert-spring,
Nor Burgundy in all its sunset glow,
After long travel, ennui, love, or slaughter,
Was with that draught of hock and soda-water.

CLXXXI.
The coast—I think it was the coast that I
Was just describing,—Yes, it was the coast—
Lay at this period quiet as the sky,
The sands untumbled, the blue waves untoss'd
And all was stillness, save the sea-bird's cry,
And dolphin's leap, and little billow cross'd;
By some low rock or shelve that made it fret
Against the boundary it scarcely wet.
CLXXXII.
And forth they wander'd, her sire being gone,
As I have said, upon an expedition;
And mother, brother, guardian, she had none,
Save Zoe, who, although with due precision
She waited on her lady with the sun,
Thought daily service was her only mission,
Bringing warm water, wreathing her long tresses,
And asking now and then for cast-off dresses.

CLXXXIII.
It was the cooling hour, just when the rounded
Red sun sinks down behind the azure hill,
Which then seems as if the whole earth it bounded,
Circling all nature, hush'd, and dim, and still,
With the far mountain-crescent, half surrounded
On one side, and the deep sea calm and chill
Upon the other, and the rosy sky,
With one star sparkling through it like an eye.

CLXXXIV.
And thus they wander'd forth, and hand in hand,
Over the shining pebbles and the shells,
Glimed along the smooth and harden'd sand,
And in the worn and wild receptacles
Work'd by the storms, yet work'd as it were plan'd,
In hollow halls, with sparry roofs and cells,
They turn'd to rest; and, each clasp'd by an arm,
Yielded to the deep twilight's purple charm.

CLXXXV.
They look'd up to the sky, whose floating glow
Spread like a rosy ocean, vast and bright;
They gazed upon the glittering sea below,
Whence the broad moon rose circling into sight;
They heard the waves' splash, and the wind so low,
And saw each other's dark eyes staring light
Into each other—and, beholding this,
Their lips drew near, and clung into a kiss;

CLXXXVI.
A long, long kiss, a kiss of youth, and love,
And beauty, all concentrating like rays
Into one focus, kindled from above;
Such kisses as belong to early days,
When heart, and soul, and sense, in concert move,
And the blood's lava, and the pulse a blaze,
Each kiss a heart-quake,—for a kiss's strength,
I think it must be reckon'd by its length.

CLXXXVII.
by length I mean duration; theirs endured Heaven knows how long—no doubt they never reckon'd,
And if they had, they could not have secured
The sum of their sensations to a second:
They had not spoken; but they felt allured,
As if their souls and lips each other beckon'd,
Which, being join'd, like swelling bees they clung—
Their hearts the flowers from whence the honey sprang.

CLXXXVIII.
They were alone, yet not alone as they
Who, shut in chambers, think it loneliness;
The silent ocean, and the starlight bay,
The twilight gloom, which momentarily grew less,
The voiceless sands, and dropping caves, that lay
Around them, made them to each other press,
As if there were no life beneath the sky
Save theirs and that their life could never die.

CLXXXIX.
They fear'd no eyes nor ears on that lone beach
They felt no terrors from the night, they were
All in all to each other: though their speech
Was broken words, they thought a language there
And all the burning tongues the passions teach
Found in one sigh the best interpreter
Of nature's oracle—first love,—that all
Which Eve has left her daughters since her fall.

CXC.
Haidee spoke not of scruples, ask'd no vows,
Nor offer'd any; she had never heard
Of plight and promises to be a spouse,
Or perils by a loving maid incur'd;
She was all which pure ignorance allows,
And flew to her young mate like a young bird;
And, never having dreamt of falsehood, she
Had not one word to say of constancy.

CXCI.
She loved, and was believed—she ador'd,
And she was worshipp'd; after nature's fashion,
Their intense souls, into each other pour'd,
If souls could die, had perish'd in that passion,—
But by degrees their senses were restored,
Again to be o'ercome, again to dash on;
And, beating 'gainst his bosom, Haidee's heart
Felt as if never more to beat apart.

CXCI.
Alas! they were so young, so beautiful,
So lonely, loving, helpless, and the hour
Was that in which the heart is always full,
And, having o'er itself no further power,
Prompts deeds eternity cannot annul,
But pays off moments in an endless shower
Of hell-fire—all prepared for people giving
Pleasure or pain to one another living.

CXCI.
Alas! for Juan and Haidee! they were
So loving and so lovely—till then never,
Excepting our first parents, such a pair
'Had run the risk of being damn'd for ever;
And Haidee, being devout as well as fair,
Had, doubtless, heard about the Stygian river
And hell and purgatory—but forgot
Just in the very crisis she should not.

CXCV.
They look upon each other, and their eyes
Gleam in the moonlight; and her white arm clasp'd
Round Juan's head, and his around her lies
Half buried in the tresses which it grasps;
She sits upon his knee, and drinks his sighs,
He hers, until they end in broken gasps;
And thus they form a group that's quite antique,
Half naked, loving, natural, and Greek.

CXCV.
And when those deep and burning moments pass
And Juan sunk to sleep within her arms,
She slept not, but all tenderly, though fast,
Sustain'd his head upon her bosom's charms;
And now and then her eye to heaven is cast,
And then on the pale cheek her breast now warm;
Pillow'd on her overflowing heart, which pants
With all it granted, and with all it grants.
CXCVI.
An infant when it gazes on a light,
A child the moment when it drains the breast,
A devotee when soars the host in sight,
An Arab with a stranger for a guest,
A sailor, when the prize has struck in fight,
A miser filling his hoarded chest,
Feel rapture; but not such true joy are reaping
As they who watch o'er what they love while sleeping.

CXCVII.
For there it lies so tranquil, so beloved,
A! that it bathed of life with us is living;
So gentle, stillest, helpless, and unmoved,
And all unconscious of the joy 'tis giving,
All it hath felt, inflat ed, pass'd, and proved,
Hush'd into depths beyond the watch's diving;
There lies the thing we love with all its errors,
And all its charms, like death without its terrors.

CXCVIII.
The lady watch'd her lover—and that hour
Of Love's, and Night's, and Ocean's solitude,
O'erflow'd her soul with their united power;
Amidst the barren sand and rocks so rude,
She and her wave-worn love had made their bower,
Where nought upon their passion could intrude,
And all the stars that crowded the blue space,
Saw nothing happier than her glowing face.

CXCIX.
Alas! the love of women! it is known
To be a lovely and a fearful thing;
For all of theirs upon that die is thrown,
And if 'tis lost, life hath no more to bring
To them butmockeries of the past alone,
And their revenge is as the tiger's spring,
Deadly, and quick, and crushing: yet as real
Torture is theirs—what they inflict they feel.

CC.
They're right; for man, to man so oft unjust,
Is always so to women; one sole bond
Awaits them, treachery is all their trust;
Taught to conceal, their bursting hearts despand
O'er their idol, till some wealthier lust
Buys them in marriage—and what reists beyond?
A thankless husband, next a faithless lover,
Then dressing, nursing, praying, and all's o'er.

CCI.
Some take a lover, some take dramas or prayers,
Some mind their household; others dissipation,
Some run away, and but exchange their cares,
Losing the advantage of a virtuous station;
Few changes e'er can better their affairs,
Their's being an unnatural situation,
From the dull palace to the dirty hovel:
Some play the devil, and then write a novel.

CCII.
Hajdeed was nature's bride, and knew not this;
Hajdeed was passion's child, born where the sun
Showers triple light, and scorches even the kiss
Of his gazelle-eyed daughters; she was one
Made but to love, to feel that she was his
Who was her chosen: what was said or done
Elsewhere was nothing—She had nought to fear,
Hone, care, nor love beyond, her heart beat here.

CCIII.
And oh! that quickening of the heart, that beat!
How much it costs us, yet each rising throbb
Is in its cause as its effect so sweet,
That wisdom, ever on the watch to rob
Joy of its alchemy, and to repeat
Fine truths: even conscience, too, has a tough job
To make us understand each good old maxim,
So good—I wonder Castlereagh don't tax 'em.

CCIV.
And now 'twas done—on the lone shore were plighted
Their hearts; the stars, their nuptial torches, set!
Beauty upon the beautiful they lighted:
Ocean their witness, and the cave their bed,
By their own feelings hallow'd and united,
Their priest was solitude, and they were wed:
And they were happy, for to their young eyes
Each was an angel, and earth paradise.

CCV.
Oh love! of whom great Caesar was the suitor,
Titus the master, Antony the slave,
Horace, Catullus, scholars, Ovid tutor,
Sappho the sage blue-stock:'ing, in whose grave
All those may leap who rather would be nother—
(Lencadina's rock still overlooks the wave—
Oh Love! thou art the very god of evil,
For, after all, we cannot call thee devil.

CCVI.
Thou makest the chaste connubial state preeminent
And jestest with the brows of mightiest men:
Cæsar and Pompey, Mahomet, Belisarius,
Have much employed the muse of history's pen
Their lives and fortunes were extremely various,—
Such worthies time will never see again—
Yet to these four in three things the same luck holds
They all were heroes, conquerors, and cuckolds.

CCVII.
Thou makest philosophers: there's Epicurus
And Aristippus, a material crew.
Who to immortal courses would allure us
By theories, quite practicable too
If only from the devil they would insure us,
How pleasant were the maxim, (not quite new,)
"Eat, drink, and love, what can the rest avail us?"
So said the royal sage, Sardanapalus.

CCVIII.
But Juan! had he quite forgotten Julia?
And should he have forgotten her so soon?
I can't but say it seems to me most truly a
Perplexing question; but, no doubt, the moon
Does these things for us, and whenever newly a Palpitation rises, 'tis her boon,
Else how the devil is it that fresh features
Have such a charm for us poor human creatures?

CCIX.
I hate inconstancy—I loathe, detest,
Abhor, condemn, abjure the mortal mate
Of such quicksilver clay that in his breath,
No permanent foundation can be laid;
Love, constant love, has been my constant guest
And yet last night, being at a masquerade,
I saw the prettiest creature, fresh from Milan,
Which gave me some sensations like a villain.
CCX.

But soon Philosophy came to my aid,
And whisper'd, "Think of every sacred tie!"
"I will, my dear Philosophy!" I said,
"But thou her teeth, and then, oh heaven! her eye!"
I'll just inquire if she be wife or maid,
Or neither—out of curiosity."
"Stop!" cried Philosophy, with air so Grecian
(Though she was mask'd then as a fair Venetian)—

CCXI.

"Stop!" so I stopped.—But to return: that which Men call inconstancy is nothing more
Than admiration, due where nature's rich
Profusion with young beauty covers o'er
Some favor'd object; and as in the niche
A lovely statue we almost adore,
This sort of admiration of the real
Is but a heightening of the "beau ideal."

CCXII.

'Tis the perception of the beautiful,
A fine extension of the faculties,
Platonic, universal, wondrous,
Skies,
Drawn from the stars, and filter'd through the
Without which life would be extremely dull;
In short, it is the use of our own eyes,
With one or two small senses added, just
To hint that flesh is form'd of fiery dust.

CCXIII.

Yet 'tis a painful feeling, and unwilling,
For surely if we always could perceive
In the same object graces quite as killing
As when she rose upon us like an Eve,
'Twould save us many a heartache, many a shilling.
(For we must get them any how, or grieve,) Whereas, if one sole lady pleased for ever,
How pleasant for the heart, as well as liver!

CCXIV.

The heart is like the sky, a part of heaven,
But changes night and day too, like the sky;
Now 'er it clouds and thunder must be driven,
And darkness and destruction as on high; driven,
But when it hath been search'd, and pierced, and
Its storms expire in water-drops; the eye
Pours forth at last the heart's blood turn'd to tears,
Which make the English climate of our years.

CCXV.

The liver is the lazard of bile,
But very rarely executes its function,
For the first passion stays there such a while,
That all the rest creep in and form a junction,
Like knots of vipers on a dunghill's soil,
Rage, fear, hate, jealousy, revenge, compunction,
That all mischiefs spring up from this entail,
Like earthquakes from the hidden fire call'd "central."

CCXVI.

In the mean time, without proceeding more
In this anatomy, I've finish'd now
Two hundred and odd stanzas as before,
That being about the number I'll allow
Each canto of the twelve, or twenty-four;
And, laying down my pen, I make my bow
Leaving Don Juan and Haidee, to plead
For them and theirs with all who deign to read.

CANTO III.

HAII, Muse! et cetera.—We left Juan sleeping,
Pillow'd upon a fair and happy breast,
And watch'd by eyes that never knew weeping
And loved by a young heart too deeply bless'd
To feed the poison through her spirit creeping,
Or know who rested there; a foe to rest,
Had soil'd the current of her sinless years,
And turn'd her pure heart's purest blood to tears.

II.

Oh, love! what is it in this world of ours
Which makes it fatal to be loved? Ah, why
With cypress branches hast thou wreathed thy
And made thy best interpreter a sigh? (bowers,
As those who dote on odors pluck the flowers,
And place them on their breast—but place to die—
Thus the frail beings we would fondly cherish
Are laid within our bosoms but to perish.

III.

In her first passion woman loves her lover,
In all the others all she loves is love,
Which grows a habit she can ne'er get over,
And fits her loosely—like an easy glove,
As you may find where'er you like to prove her
One man alone at first her heart can move;
She then prefers him in the plural number,
Not finding that the additions much encumber.

IV.

I know not if the fault be men's or theirs;
But one thing's pretty sure; a woman planted,
Unless at once she plunges for life prayers,) After a decent time must be gallanted;
Although, no doubt, her first of love affairs
Is that to which her heart is wholly granted;
Yet there are some, they say, who have had none.
But those who have ne'er end with only one.

V.

'Tis melancholy, and a fearful sign
Of human frailty, folly, also crime,
That love and marriage rarely can combine,
Although they both are born in the same clime,
Marriage from love, like vinegar from wine—
A sad, sour, sober beverage—by time
Is sharpen'd from its high celestial flavor
Down to a very homely household savor.

VI.

There's something of antipathy, as 'twere,
Between their present and their future state;
A kind of flattery that's hard, y fair
Is used, until the truth arrives too late—
Yet what can people do, except despair?
The same things change their names at such rates
For instance—passion in a lover's glorious,
But in a husband is pronounced luxurion.
VII.

Men grow ashamed of being so very fond:
They sometimes get a little tired,
(But that, of course, is rare,) and then despond:
The same things cannot always be admired,
Yet 'tis "so nominated in the bond,"
That both are tied till one shall have expired.
And thought! to lose the spouse that was adorning
Our days, and put one's servants into mourning.

VIII.

There's doubtless something in domestic doings Which forms, in fact, true love's antithesis;
Romances paint at full length people's wooings, But only give a bust of marriages;
For no one cares for matrimonial coolings.
There's nothing wrong in a communal kiss;
Think you, if Laura had been Petrarch's wife, He would have written sonnets all his life?

IX.

All tragedies are finish'd by a death,
All comedies are cuted by a marriage;
The future states of both are left to faith,
For authors fear description might disparage
The worlds to come of both, or fall beneath, [riage,
And then both worlds would punish their miscar.
So leaving each their priest and prayer-book ready, They say no more of Death or of the Lady.

X.

The only two that in my recollection Have sung of heaven and hell, or marriage, are,
Dante and Milton, and of both the affection
Was hapless in their nuptials, for some bar
Of fault or temper ruin'd the connexion,—
(Such things, in fact, it don't ask much to mar;)
But Dante's Beatrice and Milton's Eve
Were not drawn from their spouses, you conceive.

XI.

Some persons say that Dante meant theology
By Beatrice, and not a mistress—I,
Although my opinion may require apology,
Decem this a commentator's phantasy,
Unless indeed 'twas from his own knowledge he Decided thus, and show'd good reason why;
I think that Dante's more abstruse ecasties
Meant to personify the mathematics.

XII.

Haidee and Juan were not married, but
The fault was theirs, not mine: it is not fair,
Chaste reader, then, in any way to put
The blame on me, unless you wish they were;
Then, if you'd have them wedded, please to shut
The book which treats of this erroneous pa,
Before the consequences grow too awful—
'Tis dangerous to read of loves unlawful.

XIII.

Yet they were happy—happy in the illicit Indulgence of their innocent desires;
But, more imprudent grown with every visit,
Haidee forgot the island was her sire's;
When we what we like, 'tis hard to miss it
At least in the beginning, ere one tires;
Thus she came often, not a moment losing
Whilst her piratical papa was cruising.

XIV.

Let not his mode of raising cash seem strange,
Although he fleeced the flags of every nation.
For into a prime minister but change
His title, and 'tis nothing but taxation;
But he, more modest, took an humbler range
Of life, and in an honest vocation
Pursued o'er the high seas his watery journey
And merely practised as a sea-attorney.

XV.

The good old gentleman had been detain'd
By winds and waves, and some important captures.
And, in the hope of more, at sea remain'd,
Although a squall or two had damped his raptures
By swamping one of the prizes; he had chain'd
His prisoners, dividing them like chapters,
In number'd lots; they all had cuffs and collars,
And averaged each from ten to a hundred dollars.

XVI.

Some he disposed of off Cape Matapan,
Among his friends the Mainots; some he sold
To his Tunis correspondents, save one man
Toss'd overboard unsaleable, (being old:)
The rest—save here and there some richer one,
Reserved for future ransom in the hold,—
Were link'd alike; as for the common people, he Had a large order from the Dey of Tripoli.

XVII.

The merchandise was served in the same way,
Pieced out for different marts in the Levant,
Except some certain portions of the prey,
Light classic articles of female want,
French stuffs, lace, tweezers, toothpicks, teapot, tra
Guitars and castanets from Alicant,
All which selected from the spoil he gathers,
Robb'd for his daughter by the best of fathers.

XVIII.

A monkey, a Dutch mastiff, a mackaw,
Two parrots, with a Persian cat and kittens,
He chose from several animals he saw—
A terrier too, which once had been a Briton's,
Who dying on the coast of Ithica,
The peasants gave the poor dumb thing a pittance
These to secure in this strong blowing weather,
He caged in one huge hamper altogether.

XIX.

Then having settled his marine affairs,
Despatching single cruisers here and there,
His vessel having need of some repairs,
He shaped his course to where his daughter fair
Continued still her hospitable cares:
But that part of the coast being shoal and bare,
And rough with reefs which ran out many a mile,
His port lay on the other side o' the isle.

XX.

And there he went ashore without delay,
Having no custom-house or quarantine
To ask him awkward questions on the way,
About the time and place where he had been:
He left his ship to be hove down next day,
With orders to the people to careen;
So that all hands were busy beyond measure,
In getting out goods, ballast, guns, and treasure
Arriving at the summit of a hill
Which overlook'd the white walls of his home,
He stopp'd.—What singular emotions fill
Their bosoms who have been induced to roam!
With fluttering doubts if all be well or ill—
With love for many, and with fears for some;
All feelings which o'erleap the years long lost,
And bring our hearts back to their starting-post.

The approach of home to husbands and to sires,
After long travelling by land or water,
Most naturally some small doubt inspires—
A female family's a serious matter;
(None tracts the sex more, or so much admires,
But they hate flattery, so I never flatter;)—
Wives in their husbands' absences grow subtler,
And daughters sometimes run off with the butler.

An honest gentleman at his return
May not have the good fortune of Ulysses:
Not all lone matrons for their husbands mourn,
Or show the same dislike to suitors' kisses;
The odds are that he finds a handsome urn
To his memory, and two or three young misses
Born to some friend, who holds his wife and riches,
And that his Argus bites him by—the breeches.

If single, probably his plighted fair
Has in his absence wedded some rich viser;
But all the better, for the happy pair
May quarrel, and the lady growing wiser,
He may resume his amatory care
As cavalier sermente, or despise her;
And, that his sorrow may not be a dumb one,
Writes odes on the inconstancy of woman.

And oh! ye gentlemen who have already
Some chaute liason of the kind— I mean
An honest friendship for a married lady—
The only thing of this sort ever seen
To last—of all connexions the most steady,
And the true Hymen (the first's but a screen)—
Yet for all that keep not too long away;
I've known the absent wrong'd four times a day.

Lambró, our sea-solicitor, who had Much less experience of dry land than ocean,
On seeing his own chimney smoke, felt glad;
But not knowing metaphysics, had no notion
Of the true reason of his not being sad,
Or that of any other strong emotion; [Her,
He loved his child, and would have wept the loss of
But knew the cause no more than a philosopher.

He saw his white walls shining in the sun,
His garden trees all shadowy and green;
He heard his rivulet's light bubbling run,
The distant dog-bark; and perceived between
The umbrage of the wood, so cool and dun,
The moving figures and the sparkling sheen
Of arms, (in the East, all arm,) and various dyes
Of color'd garbs, as bright as butterflies.

And as the spot where they appear he hears
Surprised at these unwonted signs of idling,
He hears—alas! no music of the spheres,
But an unhallow'd, earthy sound of fiddling!
A melody which made him doubt his ears.
The cause went past his guessing or unriddling;
A pipe too and a drum, and, shortly after,
A most unoriental roar of laughter.

And still more nearly to the place advancing,
Descending rather quickly the declivity,
Through the waved branches, o'er the greensward
'Midst other indications of festivity, [glancing,
Seeing a troop of his domestics dancing
Like dervises, who turn as on a pivot, he Perceived it was the Pyrrhic dance so martial,
To which the Levantines are very partial.

And further on a group of Grecian girls,
The first and tallest her white kerchief waving,
Were strung together like a row of pearls;
Link'd hand in hand, and dancing; each too having Down her white neck long floating auburn curls—
(The least of which would set ten poets raving.)
Their leader sang—and bounded to her song,
With choral step and voice, the virgin throng.

A band of children, round a snow-white ram,
There wreathe his venerable horns with flowers;
While peaceful as if still an unwean'd lamb,
The patriarch of the flock all gently cowers
His sober head, majestically tame,
Or eats from out the palm, or playful lowers
His brow is if in act to butt, and then,
Yielding to their small hands, draws back again.

Their classical profiles, and glittering dresses,
Their large black eyes, and soft seraphic cheeks,
Crimson as cleft pomegranates, their long tresses,
The gesture which enchants, the eye that speaks,
The innocence which happy childhood blesses,
Made quite a picture of these little Greeks;
So that the philosophical beholder
Sigh'd for their sakes—that they should e'er grow older.

Afar, a dwarf buffoon stood telling tales
To a sedate gray circle of old smokers,
Of secret treasures found in hidden vales,
Of wonderful replies from Arab jokers,
Of charms to make good gold and cure bad ails;
Of rocks bewitch'd that open to the knockers,
Of magic ladies, who, by one sole act,
Transform'd their lords to beasts, 'but that's a fact.
DON JUAN.

XXXV.
Here was no lack of innocent diversion
For the imagination or the senses,
Song, dance, wise, music, stories from the Persian,
All pretty pastime in which no offence is:
But Lambro saw all these things with aversion,
Perceiving in his absence such expenses,
Reading that climax of all human ills
The inflammation of his weekly bills.

XXXVI.
Ah, what is man? what peril still environ
The happiest mortals even after dinner—
A day of gold from out an age of iron
Is all that life allows the luckiest sinner;
Pleasure (where'er she sings, at least's) a siren,
That lures to flay alive the young beginner;
Lambro's reception at his people's banquet
Was such as fire accords to a wet blanket.

XXXVII.
He—being a man who seldom used a word
Too much, and wishing gladly to surprise
(In general he surprised men with the sword)
His daughter—had not sent before to advise
Of his arrival, so that no one stirred;
And long he paused to reassure his eyes,
In fact much more astonished than delighted,
To find so much good company invited.

XXXVIII.
He did not know (alas! how men will lie)
That a report (especially the Greeks)
Avouch'd his death, (such people never die,)
And put his house in mourning several weeks.
But now their eyes and also lips were dry;
The bloom, too, had return'd to Haidee's cheek;
Her tears, too, being return'd into their fount,
She now kept house upon her own account.

XXXIX.
Hence all this rice, meat, dancing, wine, and fiddling,
Which turn'd the isle into a place of pleasure;
The servants all were getting drunk or idling,
A life which made them happy beyond measure.
Her father's hospitality seem'd middling,
Compared with what Haidee did with his treasure;
'Twas wonderful how things went on improving,
While she had not one hour to spare from loving.

XL.
Perhaps you think in stumbling on this feast
He flew into a passion, and in fact
Here was no mighty reason to be pleased;
Perhaps you prophecy some sudden act,
The whip, the rack, or dungeon at the least,
To teach his people to be more exact,
And that, proceeding at a very high rate,
He shou'd the royal penchants of a pirate.

XLI.
You're wrong;—He was the mildest manner'd man
That ever scuttled ship or cut a throat;
With such true breeding of a gentleman,
You never could divine his real thought;
No courtier could, and scarcely woman can
Gird more deceit within a petticoat;
Pity he loved adventurous life's variety
He was so great a loss to good society

XLII.
Advancing to the nearest dinner-tray,
Tapping the shoulder of the highest guest,
With a peculiar smile, which, by the way,
Boded no good, whatever it express'd;
He ask'd the meaning of this holiday?
The vinous Greek to whom he had address'd
His question, much too merry to divine
The questioner, fill'd up a glass of wine,

XLIII.
And, without turning his facetious head,
Over his shoulder, with a Bœchant air,
Presented the o'erflowing cup, and said,
"Talking's dry work, I have no time to spare."
A second hiccup'd, "Our old master's dead,
You'd better ask our mistress, who's his heir.
"Our mistress"—quoth a third: "Our mistress is You mean our master—not the old, but new." [pooh

XLIV.
These rascals, being new comers, knew not whom
They thus address'd—and Lambro's visage fell—
And o'er his eye a momentary gloom
Pass'd, but he strove quite courteously to quell
The expression, and, endeavoring to resume
His smile, requested one of them to tell
The name and quality of his new patron,
Who seem'd to have turn'd Haidee into a matron.

XLV.
"I know not," quoth the fellow, "who or what
He is, nor whence he came—and little care;
But this I know, that this roast capon's fat,
And that good wine ne'er wash'd down better fare
And if you are not satisfied with that,
Direct your questions to my neighbor there,
He'll answer all for better or for worse,
For none likes more to hear himself converse"

XLVI.
I said that Lambro was a man of patience,
And certainly he shou'd the best of breeding,
Which scarce even France, the paragon of nations
E'er saw her most polite of sons exceeding;
He bore these sneers against his near relations,
His own anxiety, his heart, too, bleeding,
The insults, too, of every servile gluton,
Who all the time was eating up his mutton.

XLVII.
Now in a person used to much command—
To bid men come, and go, and come again—
To see his orders done, too, out of hand—
Whether the word was death, or but the chang
It may seem strange to find his manners bland;
Yet, such things are, which I cannot explain,
Though doubtless he who can command himself
Is good to govern—almost as a Guelf.

XLVIII.
Not that he was not sometimes rash or so,
But never in his real and serious mood;
Then calm, concentrated, and still, and slow
He lay col'd like the boa in the wood;
With him it never was a word and blow,
His angry word once o'er, he shed no blood,
But in his silence there was much to rue,
And his one blow left little work for too.
Alx.
He ask'd no further questions, and proceeded
On to the house, but by a private way,
So that the few who met him hardly heeded,
So little they expected him that day;
If love paternal in his bosom pleaded
For Haidee's sake, is more than I can say,
But certainly to one, deem'd dead, returning,
This reveal seem'd a curious mode of mourning.

l.
If all the dead could now return to life,
(Which God forbid,) or some, or a great many;
For instance, if a husband or his wife,
(Nuptial examples are as good as any,) No doubt what'eer might be their former strife,
The present weather would be much more rainy—
Tears shed into the grave of the connexion
Would share most probably its resurrection.

li.
He enter'd in the house, no more his home,
A thing to human feelings the most trying,
And harder for the heart to overcome
Perhaps, than even the mental pang of dying;
To find our heartstone turn'd into a tomb,
And round its once warm precincts palely lying
The ashes of our hopes, is a deep grief,
Beyond a single gentleman's belief.

lii.
He enter'd in the house—his home no more,
For without hearts there is no home—and felt
The solitude of passing his own door
Without a welcome; there he long had dwelt,
There his few peaceful days Time had swept o'er,
There his worn bosom and keen eye would melt
Over the innocence of that sweet child,
His only shrine of feelings undefiled.

liii.
He was a man of a strange temperament,
Of mild demeanour though of savage mood,
Moderate in all his habits, and content
With temperance in pleasure, as in food,
Quick to perceive, and strong to bear, and meant
For something better, if not wholly good;
His country's wrongs and his desir to save her
Had stung him from a slave to an enslaver.

liv.
The love of power, and rapid gain of gold,
The hardness by long habitude produced,
The dangerous life in which he had grown old,
The mercy he had granted oft abused,
The sights he was accustomed to behold,
The wild seas and wild men with whom he cruised,
Had cost his enemies a long repentance,
And made him a good friend, but bad acquaintance.

lv.
But something of the spirit of old Greece Flash'd o'er his soul a few heroic rays, such as lit onward to the golden fleece
His predecessors in the Colchian days:
Tis true he had no ardent love for peace;
Alas! his country show'd no path to praise:
Hate to the world and war with every nation
He waged, in reengeance of her degredation.

lvii.
Still o'er his mind the influence of the clime Shed its Ionian elegance, which showed'd Its power unconsciously full many a time,— A taste seen in the choice of his abode, A love of music and of scenes sublime, A pleasure in the gentle stream that low'd Past him in crystals, and a joy in flowers, Bedew'd his spirit in his calmer hours.

lviii.
But whatsoever he had of love, reposed On that beloved daughter; she had been The only thing which kept his heart uncurst Amidst the savage deeds he had done and seen. A lonely pure affection unprofess'd:
There wanted but the loss of this to wean His feelings from all milk of human kindness, And turn him, like the Cyclops, mad with blindness.

lix.
The cubless tigress in her jungle raging Is dreadful to the shepherd and the flock; The ocean when its yeasty war is waging Is awful to the vessel near the rock:
But violent things will sooner be assuag'd— Their fury being spent by its own shock— Than the stern, single, deep, and worldless ire Of a strong human heart, and in a sire.

lx.
It is hard, although a common case, To find our children running restive— they In whom our brightest days we would retrace, Our little selves reform'd in finer clay; Just as old age is creeping on apace; And clouds come o'er the sunset of our day, They kindly leave us, though not quite alone But in good company—the gout or stone.

lx.
Yet a fine family is a fine thing, (Provided they don't come in after dinner;) 'Tis beautiful to see a matron bring Her children up, (if nursing them don't thin her;) Like cherubs round an altar-piece they cling To the fireside, (a sight to touch a sinner;) A lady with her daughter or her nieces Shone like a guineas and seven shining pieces.

lx.
Old Lambro pass'd unseen a private gate, And stood within his hall at eventide, Meantime the lady and her lover sat At wasail in their beauty and their pride An ivory inlaid table spread with state Before them, and fair slaves on every side; Gems, gold, and silver, form'd the service mostly. Mother-of-pearl and coral the less costly.

The dinner made about a hundred dishes; Lamb and pistachio-nuts—in short, all meats, And saffron soups, and sweetbreads; and the fishes Were of the finest that e'er founded in nets, Dress'd to a Sybarite's most pamper'd wishes: The beverage was various sherbets Of raisin, orange, and pomegranate juice, [use. Squeezed through the rind which makes it best for
LXIII.

These were ungirded round, each in its crystal ever,
And its ardently date-bread loaves closed the repast,
And Mocha's berry, from Arabia pure,
In small fine China cups, came in at last—gold cups of filigree, made to secure.
The hand from burning, underneath them placed;
Cherries, cinnamon, and saffron too boil'd
Up with the coffee, which (I think) they spoil'd.

LXIV.

The kangles of the room were tapestry, made
Of velvet panels, each of different hue,
And thick with damask flowers of silk inlaid:
And round them ran a yellow border too;
The upper border, richly wrought, display'd,
Embroider'd delicately o'er with blue,
soft Persian sentences, in lilac letters,
From poets, or the moralists their better.

LXV.

These oriental writings on the wall,
Quite common in those countries, are a kind
Of monitors, adapted to recall,
Like skulls at Memphian banquets, to the mind
The words which shook Belshazzar in his hall,
And took his kingdom from him.—You will find,
Taught sages may pour out their wisdom's treasure,
There is no sterner moralist than pleasure.

LXVI.

A beauty at the season's close grown hectic,
A genius who has drunk himself to death;
A rake turn'd methodist or ecclectic—
(For that's the name they like to pray beneath)—
But most, an almanack struck apoplectic,
Are things that really take away the breath,
And show that late hours, wine and love, are able
To do not much less damage than the table.

LXVII.

Haidee and Juan carpeted their feet

On crimson satin, border'd with pale blue;
Their sofa occupied three parts complete
Of the apartment—and appear'd quite new;
The velvet cushions—for a throne more meet)—
Were scarlet, from whose glowing centre grew
A sun emboss'd in gold, whose rays of tissue,
Meridian-like, were seen all light to issue.

LXVIII.

Crystal and marble, plate and porcelain,
Had done their work of splendor, Indian mats
And Persian carpets, the heart bled to stain,
Over the floors were spread; gazelles and cats,
And dwarfs and blacks, and such like, things that gain
Their bread as ministers; and such like—(that's
To say, by gradation)—mingled there
As plentiful as in a court or fair.

LXIX.

There was no want of lofty mirrors, and
The tables, most of ebony inlaid
With mother-of pearl or ivory, stood at hand,
Or were of tossoine-shell or rare woods made,
Fretted with gold or silver: by command,
The greater part of these were ready spread
With viands, and sherbets in ice, and wine—
Kent for all comers, at all hours to dine.

LXX.

Of all the dresses I select Haidee's:
She wore two jellicks—one was of pale yellow;
Of azure, pink, and white, was her chemise—
'Neath which her breast heaved like a little billow
With buttons form'd of pearls as large as peas,
All gold and crimson shone her jellick's fellow,
And the striped white gauze bacean that bound her
Like fleecy clouds about the moon, flow'd round her

LXXI.

One large gold bracelet clasps each lovely arm,
Lockess—so pliable from the pure gold,
That the hand stretch'd and shut it without harm.
The limb which it adorn'd its only mould;
So beautiful—its very shape would charm,
And clinging as if loth to lose its hold,
The purest ore inclosed the whitest skin
That e'er by precious metal was hold in.]

LXXII.

Around, as princess of her father's land,
A like gold bar, above her instep roll'd;
Announced her rank: twelve rings were on her hand;
Her hair was star'd with gems; her veil's fine fold
Below her breast was fasten'd with a band
Of lavish pearls, whose worth could scarce be told;
Her orange silk full Turkish trousers fur'd
About the prettiest ankle in the world.

LXXIII.

Her hair's long auburn waves down to her heel
Flow'd like an Alpine torrent which the sun
Dyes with his morning light,—and would conceal
Her person if allow'd at large to run;
And stili they seem resolutely to feel
The silken fillet's curl, and sought to shun
Their bounds whose'er some zephyr caught began
To offer his young pinion as her fan

LXXIV.

Round her she made an atmosphere of life,
The very air seem'd lighter from her eyes,
They were so soft and beautiful, and rife
With all we can imagine of the skies,
And pure as Psyche ere she grew a wife—
Too pure even for the purest human ties;
Her overpowering presence made you feel
It would not be idolatry to kneel.

LXXV.

Her eyelashes, though dark as night, were tipted
(It is the country's custom,) but in vain;
For those large black eyes were so blackly tipted
The glossy rebels mock'd the jetty stin,
And in their native beauty stood avenged;
Her nails were touch'd with henna; but again
The power of art was turn'd to nothing, for
They could not look more rosy than before.

LXXVI.

The henna should be deeply dyed to make
The skin relieved appear more fairly fair:
She had no need of this—day ne'er will break
On mountain tops more heavenly white than her.
The eye might doubt if it were well awake,
She was so like a vision; I might err,
But Shakspeare also says 'tis very silly
'Tis gold refined, or paint the lily
BYRON'S WORKS.

LXXXVII.
Juan had on a shawl of black and gold,
But a white baraban, and so transparent,
The sparkling gems beneath you might behold,
Like small stars through the milky way apparent;
His turban, furl'd in many a graceful fold,
An emerald agniret with Haidee's hair in't,
Surmounted as its clasp—a glowing crescent,
Whose rays shone ever trembling, but incessant.

LXXXVIII.
And now they were diverted by their suite,
Dwarfs, dancing girls, black eunuch's, and a poet,
Which made their new establishment complete;
The last was of great fame, and liked to show it;
His verses rarely wanted their due fort—
And for his theme—he seldom sung below it,
de being paid to satirize or flatter,
As the psalm says, "inditing a good matter."

LXXX.
He praised the present and abused the past,
Reversing the good custom of old days,
An eastern anti-jacobin at last
He turn'd, preferring pudding to no praise—
For some few years his lot had been o'ercast
By his seeming independent in his lays,
But now he sung the Sultan and the Pacha,
With: truth like Southey, and with verse like Crashaw.

LXXXI.
He was a man who had seen many changes,
And always changed as true as any needle,
His polar star being one which rather ranges,
And not the fix'd—he knew the way to wheedle;
So vile he escap'd the doom which oft avenges;
And being fluent, (save indeed when fee'd ill,) He lie'd with such a fervor of intention—
There was no doubt he earn'd his lucrative pension.

LXXXII.
But he had genius—when a turncoat has it
The "vates irritabilis" takes care
That without notice few full moons shall pass it:
Even good men like to make the public stare—
But to my subject—let me see—what was it?
Oh!—the third canto—and the pretty par—
Their loves, and feasts, and house; and dress, and
Of living in their insular abode: [mode

LXXXIII.
Their port, a sad trimmer, but no less
In company a very pleasant fellow,
Had been the favorite of full many a mess [low;
Of men, and made them speeches when half mel-
And though his meaning they could rarely guess,
Yet still they desir'd to hiccoup or to bellow,
The glorious need of popular applause,
Of which the first ne'er knows the second cause.

LXXXIV.
He had travell'd 'mong the Arabs, Turks, and Franks
And knew the self-loves of the different nations
And, having lived with people of all ranks,
Had something ready upon most occasions—
Which got him a few presents and some thanks.
He varied with some skill his aditations;
To "do at Rome as Romans do," a piece
Of conduct was which he observed in Greece.

LXXXV.
Thus, usually, when he was ask'd to sing,
He gave the different nations something nations
"Twas all the same to him—"God save the King"
Or "Callira," according to the fashion all;
His muse made increment of any thing,
From the high lyrical to the low rational;
If Pindar sang horsemens, what should hinder
Himself from being as pliable as Pindar?

LXXXVI.
In France, for instance, he would write a chanson;
In England, a six-canto quarto tale;
In Spain, he'd make a ballad or romance
On the last war—much the same in Portugal;
In Germany, the Pegasus he'd prance on
Would be old Goethe's—(see what says de Staél)
In Italy, he'd ape the "Trecentisti;"
In Greece, he'd sing some sort of hymn like this t'ye

The isles of Greece! the isles of Greece!
Where burning Sappho loved and sung,
Where grew the arts of war and peace,—
Where Delos rose and Phœbus sprung!

Ethernal summer gilds them yet,
But all, except their sun, is set

The Scian and the Teian muse,
The hero's harp, the lover's lute,
Have found the fame your shores refuse;
Their place of birth alone is mute
To sounds which echo further west
Than your sires' "Islands of the Bless'd;"

The mountains look on Marathon—
And Marathon looks on the sea;
And musing there an hour alone,
I dream'd that Greece might still be free;
For, standing on the Persians' grave,
I could not deem myself a slave.

A king sate on the rocky brow
Which looks o'er sea-born Salamis;
And ships, by thousands, lay below,
And men in nations—all were his!
He count'd them at break of day—
And when the sun set, where were they?

And where are they! and where art thou,
My country! On thy voiceless shore
The heroic lay is timeless now—
The heroic bosom beats no more!
And must thy lyre, so long divine,
Degenerate into hands like mine?
Tis something, in the death of fame,
Though link'd among a fetter'd race,
To feel at least a patriot's shame,
Even as I sing, suffuse my face;
For what is left the poet here?
For Greeks a blush—for Greece a tear.

Must see but weep o'er days more blase'd?
Must we but blush?—Our fathers bled.
Earth! render back from out thy breast
A remnant of our Spartan dead!
Of the three hundred grant but three,
To make a new Thermopylae.

What, silent still? and silent all?
Ah! no;—the voices of the dead
Sound like a distant torrent's fall,
And answer, "Let one living head,
But one arise,—we come, we come!"
'Tis but the living who are dumb.

In vain—in vain: strike other chords;
Fill high the cup with Samian wine!
Leave battles to the Turkish hordes,
And shed the blood of Scio's vine!
Hark! rising to the ignoble call—
How answers each bold bacchanal!

You have the Pyrrhic dance as yet,
Where is the Pyrrhic phalanx gone?
Of two such lessons, why forget
The nobler and the manlier one?
You have the letters Cadmus gave—
Think ye he meant them for a slave?

Fill high the bowl with Samian wine!
We will not think of themes like these!
It made Anacreon's song divine;
He served—but served Polycrates—
A tyrant; but our masters then
Were still, at least, our countrymen.

The tyrant or the Chersonese
Was freedom's best and bravest friend;
That tyrant was Miltiades!
Oh! that the present hour would lend
Another despot of the kind!
Such chains as his were sure to bind.

Fill high the bowl with Samian wine!
On Suli's rock, and Parga's shore,
Exists the remnant of a line
Such as the Doric mothers bore;
And there, perhaps, some seed is sown,
The Heracleidan blood might own.

Trust not for freedom to the Franks—
They have a king who buys and sells;
In native swords, and native ranks,
The only hope of courage dwells:
But Turkish force, and Latin fraud,
Would break your shield, however broad.

Fill high the bowl with Samian wine!
Our virgins dance beneath the shade—
I see their glorious black eyes shine;
But, gazing on each glowing maid,
My own the burning tear-drop laves,
To think such breasts must suckle slaves.

Place me on Sunium's marble steep—
Where nothing, save the waves and I,
May hear our mutual murmurs sweep;
There, swan-like, let me sing and die;
A land of slaves shall ne'er be mine—
Dash down you cup of Samian wine!

LXXXVII.
Thus sung, or would, or could, or should have sung
The modern Greek, in tolerable verse;
If not like Orpheus quite, when Greece was young
Yet in these times he might have done much worse.
His strain display'd some feeling—right or wrong;
And feeling, in a poet, is the source
Of other's feeling; but they are such liars,
And take all colors—like the hands of dyers.

LXXXVIII.
But words are things, and a small drop of ink
Falling like dew upon a thought, produces things
That which makes thousands, perhaps millions
'Tis strange, the shortest letter which man uses,
Instead of speech, may form a lasting link
Of ages; to what straits old Time reduces
Frail man, when paper—even a rag like this,
Survives himself, his tomb, and all that's his.

LXXXIX.
And when his bones are dust, his grave a blank,
His station, generation, even his nation,
Become a thing, or nothing, save to rank
In chronological commemoration,
Some dull MS. oblivion long has sank,
Or graven stone found in a barrack's station,
In digging the foundation of a closet,
May turn his name up as a rare deposit.

XC.
And glory long has made the sages smile,
'Tis something, nothing, words, illusion, wind—
Depending more upon the historian's style
Than on the name a person leaves behind.
Troy owes to Homer what whist owes to Hoyle;
The present century was growing blind
To the great Marlborough's skill in giving knocks,
Until his late Life by Archdeacon Coxe.

XCI.
Milton's the prince of poets—so we say;
A little heavy, but no less divine;
An independent being in his days—
Learn'd, pious, temperate in love and wine;
But his life falling into Johnson's way,
We're told this great high priest of all the Nine
Was whipt at college—a harsh sire—odd spouse,
For the first Mrs. Milton left his house.

XCII.
All these are, certes, entertaining facts,
Like Shakespeare's stealing deer, Lora Bacon's
Like Titus' youth, and Caesar's earliest acts;
Like Burns, (whom Doctor Currie well describes);
Like Cromwell's pranks—but although truth exacts
These amiable descriptions from the scribes,
As most essential to their hero's story,
They do not much contribute to his glory.
XCIII.
All are not moralists like Southey, when
He prated to the world of "Pantisocracy;"
Or Wordsworth unexcised, unhired, who then
Season'd his pedlar poems with democracy;
Or Coleridge long before his flighty pen
Let to theMorning Post its aristocracy;
When he and Southey, following the same path,
Espoused two partners, (milliners of Bath.)

XCIV.
Such names at present cut a convict figure,
The very Botany Bay in moral geography;
Their loyal treason, renegado vigor,
Are good examples for their more bare biography.
Wordsworth's last quarto, by the way, is bigger
Than any since the birthday of typography:
A clumsy frowzy poem, call'd the "Excursion,"
Writ in a manner which is my aversion.

XCV.
He there builds up a formidable dyke
Between his own and others' intellect;
But Wordsworth's poem, and his followers, like
Joanna Southcote's Shiloh and her sect,
Are things which in this century don't strike
The public mind, so few are the elect;
And the new births of both their stale virginities
Have proved but dropses taken for divinities.

XCVI.
But let me to my story: I must own
If I have any fault, it is digression;
Leaving my people to proceed alone,
While I soliloquize beyond expression;
But these are my addresses from the throne,
Which put off business to the ensuing session:
Forgetting each omission is a loss to
The world, not quite so great as Aristost.

XCVII.
I know that what our neighbors call "longeurs",
(We've not so good a word, but have the thing
In that complete perfection, which ensures
An epile from Bob Southey every spring)—
Form not the true temptation which allure
The reader; but 'twould not be hard to bring
Some fine examples of the épopée,
To prove its grand ingredient is ennui.

XCVIII.
We learn from Horace, Homer sometimes sleeps,
We feel without him, Wordsworth sometimes
To show what complacency he creeps, [wakes,
With his dear "Wagons," around his lakes
He wishes for "a boat" to sail the deeps—
Of Ocean—no, of air; and then he makes Another outcry for "a little boat,
And drivels seas to set it well afloat.

XCIX.
If he must faint sweeps o'er the ethereal plain,
And Pegasus runs restive in his "wagon,"
Could he not beg the loan of Charles's wain?
Or pray Medea for a single dragon?
Or if, too classic for his vulgar brain,
He fear'd his neck to venture such a nag on,
And he must needs mount nearer to the moon,
Could not the blockhead ask for a balloon?

C.
"Pedlars," and "boats," and "wagon," Oh!
"Of Pope and Dryden, are we come to this? [shades
That trash of such sort not alone evades
Contempt, but from the bathos' vast abyss
Floats scum-like uppermost, and these Jack Cades
Of sense and song above your graves may hiss—
The "little boatman" and his 'Peter Bell'
Can sneer at him who drew "Achitoehel!"

CI
'T our tale,—The feast was over, the slaves gone,
The dwarfs and dancing girls had all retired;
The Arab lore and poet's song were done,
And every sound of revelry expired;
The lady and her lover, left alone,
The rosy flood of twilight sky admired;—
Ave Maria! o'er the earth and sea,
That heaviest hour of Heaven is worthiest

CII.
Ave Maria! blessed be the hour!
The time, the clime, the spot, where I so oft
Have felt that moment in its fullest power
Sink o'er the earth so beautiful and soft,
While swung the deep bell in the distant tower,
Or the faint dying day-hymn stole aloft,
And not a breath crept through the rosy air,
And yet the forest leaves seem stirr'd with prayer

CIII.
Ave Maria! 'tis the hour of prayer!
Ave Maria! 'tis the hour of love!
Ave Maria! may our spirits dare
Look up to thine and to thy Son's above!
Ave Maria! oh that face so fair!
Those downcast eyes beneath the almighty dome—
What though 'tis but a pictured image strike—
That painting is no idol, 'tis too like.

CIV.
Some kind casuists are pleased to say,
In nameless print—that I have no devotion,
But set those persons down with me to pray,
And you shall see who has the properest notion
Of getting into heaven the shortest way;
My altars are the mountains and the ocean,
Earth, air, stars,—all that springs from the great whole,
Who hath produced, and will receive the soul

CV.
Sweet hour of twilight!—in the solitude
Of the pine forest, and the silent shore
Which bounds Ravenna's immemorial wood,
Rooted where once the Adriatic wave flow'd o'er
To where the last Cesarion fortress stood,
Ever-green forest! which Boccaccio's lore
And Dryden's lay made haunted ground to me.
How have I loved the twilight hour and thee

CVI.
The shrill cicadas, people of the pine,
Making their summer lives one ceaseless song,
Were the sole echoes, save my steed's and mine,
And vesper-bell's that rose the boughs along;
The spectre huntsman of Onesti's line,
His hell-dogs, and their chase, and the fair throng
Which learn'd from this example not to fly
From a true lover, shadow'd my mind's eye
DON JUAN.

CIVIL.

Oh Hesperus, thou bringest all good things—
Home to the weary, to the hungry cheer,
To the young bird the parent’s brooding wings,
The welcome stall to the o’erlabor’d steer;
Whate’er of peace about our hearthstone clings,
Whate’er our household gods protect of dear,
Are gather’d round us by thy look of rest;
Thou bring’st the child, too, to the mother’s breast.

CVIII.

Soft hour! which wakes the wish and melts the tear
Of those who sail the seas, on the first day [heart
When they from their sweet friends are torn apart;
Or fills with love the pilgrim on his way,
As the far bell of vespers makes him start,
Seeming to weep the dying day’s decay;
Is this a fancy which our reason scorns?
Ah! surely nothing dies but something morns!

CIX.

When Nero perish’d by the justest doom
Which ever the destroyer yet destroy’d
Amid the roar of liberated Rome,
Of nations freed, and the world overjoy’d,
Some hands unseen strew’d flowers upon his tomb;
Perhaps the weakness of a heart not void
Of feeling for some kindness done, when power
Had left the wretch an uncorrupted hour.

CX.

But I’m digressing: what on earth has Nero,
Or any such like sovereign buffoons,
To do with the transactions of my hero, [moon’s?
More than such madmen’s fellow-man—the
Sure my invention must be down at zero,
And I grow one of many “wooden spoons”
Of verse, (the name with which we Cantabas please
To dub the last of honors in degrees.)

CXI.

I feel this tediousness will never do—
’Tis being too epic, and I must cut down
(In copying) this long canto into two:
They’ll never find it out, unless I own
The fact, excepting some experienced few;
And then as an improvement ’twill be shown:
I’ll prove that such the opinion of the critic is,
From Aristotle passim.—See Don Juan.

CANTO IV.

I.

NOTHING so difficult as a beginning
In poesy, unless perhaps the end:
For oftentimes when Pegasus seems winning
The race, he sprains a wing, and down we tend,
Like Lucifer when hurl’d from heaven for sinning;
Our sin the same, and hard as his to mend,
Being pride, which leads the mind to soar too far,
Till our own weakness shows us what we are.

II.

But time, which brings all beings to their level,
And sharp adversity, will teach at last
Man,—and, as we would hope,—perhaps the devil
That neither of their intellects are vast:
While youth’s hot wishes in our red veins revel,
We know not this—the blood flows on too fast;
But as the torrent widens towards the ocean,
We ponder deeply on each past emotion.

III.

As boy, I thought myself a clever fellow,
And wish’d that others held the same opinion:
They took it up when my days grew more mellow,
And other minds acknowledged my dominion:
Now my sere fancy “falls into the yellow Leaf,”
And imagination droops her pinion,
And the sad truth which hovers o’er my desk
Turns what was once romantic to burlesque.

IV.

And if I laugh at any mortal thing,
’Tis that I may not weep; and if I weep,
’Tis that our nature cannot always bring
Itself to apathy, which we must steep,
First in the icy depths of Lethe’s spring,
Ere what we least wish to behold will sleep:
Thetis baptized her mortal son in Styx;
A mortal mother would on Lethe fix.

V.

Some have accused me of a strange design
Against the creed and morals of the land,
And trace it in this poem every line:
I don’t pretend that I quite understand
My own meaning when I would be very fine;
But the fact is that I have nothing plann’d,
Unless it was to be a moment merry,
A novel word in my vocabulary.

VI.

To the kind reader of our sober clime,
This way of writing will appear exotic;
Pulci was sire of, the half-serious rhyme;
Who sung when chivalry was more Quixotic,
And revel’d in the fancies of the time,—[despotic
True knights, chase dames, huge giants, kings
But all these, save the last, being obsolete,
I chose a modern subject as more meet.

VII.

How I have treated it, I do not know—
Perhaps no better than they have treated me
Who nave imputed such designs as show,
Not what they saw, but what they wish’d to see;
But if it gives them pleasure, be it so.—
This is a liberal age, and thoughts are free:
Meantim: Apoll’ plucks me by the ear,
And tells me to resume my story here.

VIII.

Young Juan and his lady-love were left
To their own hearts’ most sweet society;
Even Time the pitiless in sorrow cleft
With his rude seythe such gentle bosoms; he Sigh’d to behold them of their hours bereft,
Though foe to love; and yet they could not Meant to grow old, but die in happy spring
Before one chum or hope had taken vine
IX.
Their faces were not made for wrinkles, their
Pure blood to stagnate, their great hearts to fail;
The blank gray was not made to blast their hair,
But, like the climes that know nor snow nor hail,
They were all summer: lightening might assail
And shiver them to ashes, but to trail
A long and snake-like life of dull decay
Was not for them—they had too little clay.

X.
They were alone once more; for them to be Thus was another Eden; they were never Weary, unless when separate: the tree
Cut from its forest root of years—the river
Damn'd from its fountain—the child from the knee
And breast maternal wean'd at once for ever,
Would wither less than these two torn apart;
Alas! there is no instinct like the heart—

XI.
The heart—which may be broken: happy they!
Thrice fortunate! who, of that fragile mould,
The precious porcelain of human clay.
Break with the first fall: they can ne'er behold
The long year link'd with heavy day on day,
And all which must be borne, and never told;
White life's strange principle will often lie
Deepest in those who long the most to die.

XII.
Whom the gods love die young," was said of yore,
And many deaths do they escape by this:
The death of friends, and that which slay's even,
The death of friendship, love, youth, all that is,
Except mere breath; and since the silent shore
Awaits at last even those whom longest miss
The old archer's shafts, perhaps the early grave
Which men weep over may be meant to save.

XIII.
Haidee and Juan thought not of the dead; [them:
The heavens, and earth, and air, seem'd made for
They found no fault with time, save that he fled;
They saw not in themselves ought to condemn;
Each was the other's mirror, and but read
Joy sparkling in their dark eyes like a gem,
And knew such brightness was but the reflection
Of their exchanging glances of affection.

XIV.
The gentle pressure, and the thrilling touch,
The least glance better understood than words,
Which still said all, and ne'er could say too much;
A language, too, but like to that of birds,
Known but to them, at least appearing such,
As but to lovers a true sense affords:
Sweet playful phrases, which would seem absurd:
'those who have ceased to hear such, or ne'er heard:

XV.
All these were theirs, for they were children still,
And children still they should have ever been;
They were not made in the real world to fill
A busy character in the dull scene;
But like two beings born from out a rill,
A nymph and her beloved, all unseen
To pass their lives in fountains and on flowers,
And never know the weight of human hours.

XVI.
Moons changing had roll'd on, and changeless found
Those their bright rise had lighted to such joys
As rarely they beheld throughout their round:
And these were not of the vain kind which cloys
For theirs were buoyant spirits, never bound
By the mere senses; and that which destroys
Most love, possession, unto them appear'd
A thing which each endurance more endure'd.

XVII.
Oh beautiful! and rare as beautiful!
But theirs was love in which the mind delights
To lose itself, when the whole world grows dull,
And we are sick of its hack sounds and sights,
Intrigues, adventures of the common school,
Its petty passions, marriages, and flights,
Where Hymen's torch but brands one strumpet more
Whose husband only knows her not a wh—re.

XVIII.
Hard words; harsh truth; a truth which many know
Enough.—The faithful and the fairy pair,
Who never found a single hour too slow,
What was it made them thus exempt from care?
Young innate feelings all have felt below,
Which perish in the rest, but in them were Inherent; what we mortals call romantic,
And always envy, though we deem it frantic.

XIX.
This is in others a factitious state,
An opium dream of too much youth and reading,
But was in them their nature or their fate;
No novels o'er had set their young hearts bleeding,
For Haidee's knowledge was by no means great,
And Juan was a boy of saintly breeding,
So that there was no reason for their loves,
More than for those of nightingales or doves.

XX.
They gazed upon the sunset; 'tis an hour
Dear unto all, but dearest to their eyes,
For it had made them what they were: the power
Of love had first o'erwhelm'd them from such
When happiness had been their only dower, [skies,
And twilight saw them link'd in passion's ties;
Charm'd with each other, all things charm'd that brought
The past still welcome as the present thought.

XXI.
I know not why, but in that hour to-night,
Even as they gazed, a sudden tremor came,
And swept, as 'twere, across their hearts' delight,
Like the wind o'er a harp-string, or a flame,
When one is shock'd in sound, and one in sight;
And thus some binding flush'd through either frame.
And call'd from Juan's breast a faint low sigh,
While one new tear arose in Haidee's eye.

XXII.
That large black prophet eye seem'd to dilate
And follow far the disappearing sun,
As if their last day of a happy date,
With his brow, bright, and dropping orb were Juan gazed on her as to ask his fate—
[gone
He felt a grief, but knowing cause for none,
His glance inquired of hers for some excuse
For feelings causeless, or at least abstruse.
XXIII.
Their lips to hers, and silenced him with this,
And then dismiss'd the omen from her breast,
And no doubt of all method's 'tis the best:
Some people prefer wine—'tis not amiss:
May choose between the headache and the heart-ache.

XXIV.
Juan would question further, but she press'd
With swimming looks of speechless tenderness,
All that the best can mingle and express,
And love too much, and yet can not love less;
But almost sanctify the sweet excess
By the immorta. wish and power to bless.

XXV.
Juan and Haidee gazed upon each other,
With swimming looks of speechless tenderness,
Which mix'd all feelings, friend, child, lover, brother,
For both sides I could many reasons show,
And then decide, without great wrong to either,
It was much better to have both than neither.

XXVI.
Mix'd in each other's arms, and heart in heart,
Why did they not then die?—they had lived too long;
Should an hour come to bid them breathe apart;
The world was not for them, nor the world's art
It was their very spirit—not a sense.

XXVII.
They should have lived together deep in woods,
Sees the nightingale; they were
Unseen by the thick solitude;
Flock o'er their carion, just as mortals do.

XXVIII.
New pillow'd, cheek to cheek, in loving sleep,
And Haidee and Juan their siesta took,
A gentle slumber, but it was not deep,
And shuddering o'er his frame would creep;
And Haidee's sweet lips murmur'd like a brook,
Stirr'd with her dream as rose-leaves with the air:

XXIX.
Or as the stirring of a deep clear stream
Walks over it, was she shaken by the dream,
The mystical surfer of the mind—
O'erpowering us to be what'er may seem
Good to the soul which we no more can bind:
Strange state of being! (for 'tis still to be,) Senseless to feel, and with seal'd eyes to see.

XXX.
She dream'd of being alone on the seashore,
Chain'd to a rock; she knew not how, but stir
She could not from the spot, and the loud roar
Grew, and each wave rose roughly, threatening.
And o'er her upper lip they seem'd to pour,
Unti until she sobb'd for breath, and soon they were Foaming o'er her lone head, so fierce and high Each broke to drown her, yet she could not die.

XXXI.
Anon—she was released, and then she stray'd
O'er the sharp shingles with her bleeding feet,
And stumbled almost every step she made;
And something roll'd before her in a sheet,
For she must still pursue howe'er afraid;
'Twas white and indistinct, nor stopp'd to meet Her glance nor grasp, for still she gazed and grasp'd
And ran, but it escaped her as she clasp'd.

XXXII.
The dream chang'd: in a cave she stood, its walls Were hung with marble icicles; the work Of ages on its water-fretted halls, and lurt;
Where waves might wash, and seals might breed her hair was dripping, and the very balls Of her black eyes seem'd turn'd to tears, and murk The sharp rocks look'd below each drop they caught, Which froze to marble as it fell, she thought.

XXXIII.
And wet, and cold, and lifeless at her feet,
Pale as the form that froth'd on his dead brow
Which she essay'd in vain to clear, (how sweet Were once her cares, how idle seem'd they now) Lay Juan, nor could aught renew the beat Of his quench'd heart; and the sea-dirges low Rang in her sad ears like a mermaid's song,
And that brief dream appear'd a life too long.

XXXIV.
And gazing on the dead, she thought his face Faded, or alter'd into something new— Like to her father's features, till each trace More like and like to Lambro's aspect grew— With all his keen worn look and Grecian grace; And starting, she awoke, and what to view! Oh! Powers of Heaven! what dark eye meets she 'Tis—'tis her father's—fixed upon the pair! (there!}

XXXV.
Haidee, and Juan their siesta took,
A gentle slumber, but it was not deep,
For ever and anon a something shook
Juan, and shuddering o'er his frame would creep;
And Haidee's sweet lips murmur'd like a brook,
A worldless music, and her face so fair
Stirr'd with her dream as rose-leaves with the air:
XXXVII.

Up Juan sprang to Haidee's bitter shriek,
And caught her failing, and from off the wall
Snatch'd down his sabre, in hot haste to wreak
Vengeance on him who was the cause of all:
Then Lambro, who till now forbore to speak,
Smiled scornfully, and said, "Within my call
A thousand scimitars await the word:
Put up, young man, put up your silly sword."

XXXVIII.

Aud Haidee clung around him; "Juan, 'tis-
Tis Lambro—'tis my father! Kneel with me—
He will forgive you, but gave no reply.
Oh! dearest father, in this agony
Of pleasure and of pain—even while I kiss
Thy garment's hem with transport, can it be
That doubt should mingle with my filial joy?
Deal with me as thou wilt, but spare this boy."

XXXIX.

High and inscrutable the old man stood,
Calm in his voice, and calm within his eye—
Not always signs with him of calmest mood:
He look'd upon her, but gave no reply.
Then turn'd to Juan, in whose cheek the blood
Oft came and went, as there resolv'd to die;
In arms, at least, he stood, in act to spring
On the first foe whom Lambro's call might bring.

XL.

"Young man, your sword;" so Lambro once more
Juan replied, "Not while this arm is free;" [said:
The old man's cheek grew pale, but not with dread,
And drawing from his belt a pistol, he Replied, "Your blood be then on your own head:"
Then look'd close at the flint, as if to see
Twas fresh—for he had lately used the lock—
And next proceeded quietly to cock.

XLI.

It has a strange quick jar upon the ear,
That cocking of a pistol, when you know
A moment more will bring the sight to bear
Upon your person, twelve yards off, or so;
A gentlemanly distance, not too near,
If you have got a friender friend for foe;
But after being fired at once, in twice,
The ear becomes more Irish, and less nice.

XLII.

Lambro presented, and one instant more
Had stopp'd this canto, and Don Juan's breath
When Haidee threw herself her boy before,
Stern as her sire: "On me" she cried, "let death
Descend—the fault is mine; this fatal shore
He found—but sought not. I have pledged my faith;
I love him—I will die with him: I knew
Your nature's firmness—know your daughter's too."

XLIII.

A minute past, and she had been all tears,
And tenderness and infancy: but now
She stood as one who champion'd human fears—
Pale, statue-like, and stern, she wou'd the blow:
And tall beyond her sex and their compères,
She drew up to her height, as if to show
A fairer mark; and with a fix'd eye scannd
Her father's face—but never stopp'd his hand.

XLIV.

He gazed on her, and she on him: 'twas strange
How like they look'd! the expression was the Serenely savage, with a little change [same
In the large dark eye's mutual-ardent flame,
For she too was as one who could avenge,
If cause should be—a lioness, though tame,
Her father's blood before her father's face
Boil'd up, and proved her truly of his race.

XLV.

I said they were alike, their features and
Their stature differing but in sex and years;
Even to the delicacy of their hair—yes.
There was resemblance, such as true blood wears
And now to see them, thus divided, stand
In fix'd ferocity, when joyous tears,
And sweet sensations, should have welcomed both,
Show what the passions are in their full growth.

XLVI.

The father paused a moment, then withdraw
His weapon, and replaced it; but stood still,
And looking on her, as to look her through,
"Not I," he said, "I have sought this stranger's ill;
Not I have made this desolation: few
Would bear such outrage, and forbear to kill;
But I must do my duty—how thou hast
Done thine, the present vouches for the past.

XLVII.

"Let him disarm; or, by my father's head,
His own shall roll before you like a ball!"
He rais'd his whistle, as the word he said,
And blew; another answer'd to the call,
And rushing in disorderly, though led.
And arm'd from boot to turban, one and all,
Some twenty of his train came, rank on rank:
He gave the word, "Arrest or slay the Frank."

XLVIII.

Then, with a sudden movement, he withdrew
His daughter; while compress'd within his grasp,
Twist her and Juan interposed the crew;
In vain she struggled in her father's grasp,—
His arms were like a serpent's coil: then flew
Upon their prey, as darts an angry sap,
The file of pirates; save the foremost, who
Had fallen, with his right shoulder half cut through

XLIX.

The second had his cheek laid open; but
The third, a wary, cool old swordsman, took
The blows upon his countlass, and then put
His own well in: so well, ere you could look;
His man was foon'd, and helpless at his foot,
With the blood running like a little brook
From two smart sabre gashes, deep and red—
One on the arm, the other on the head.

L.

And then they bound him where he fell, and bore
Juan from the apartment: with a sign
Old Lambro bade them take him to the shore,
Where lay some ships which were to sail at nine
They laid him in a boat, and plied the oar
Until they reach'd some galliots, placed in line;
On board of one of these, and under hatches,
They stow'd him, with strict orders to the watches
LI.
The world is full of strange vicissitudes,
And here was one exceedingly unpleasant:
A gentleman so rich in the world's goods,
Handsome and young, enjoying all the present,
Just at the very time when he least broods
On such a thing, is suddenly to sea sent,
Wounded and cha'n'd, so that he cannot move,
And all because a lady fell in love.

LII.
Her: I must leave him, for I grow pathetic,
Moved by the Chinese nymph of tears, green tea.
Than whom Cassandra was not more prophetic;
For if my pure libations exceed three,
I feel my heart become so sympathetic,
That I must have recourse to black Bohea:
'Tis pity wine should be so deleterious,
For tea and coffee leave us much more serious.

LIII.
Unless when qualified with thee, Cognac!
Sweet Nalaid of the Phlegthonitic rill!
Ah! why the liver wilt thou thus attack,
And make, like other nymphs, thy lover ill?
I would take refuge in weak punch, but rack,
(How each sense of the word,) whene'er I fill
My mild and midnight beakers to the brim,
Wakes me next morning with its synonym.

LIV.
I leave Don Juan for the present safe—
Not sound, poor fellow, but severely wounded;
Yet could his corporal pangs amount to half
Of those with which his Haidée's bosom bounded?
She was not one to weep, and rave, and chafe,
And then give way, subdued because surrounded;
Her mother was a Moorish maid, from Fez,
Where all is Eden, or a wilderness.

LV.
There the large olive rains its amber store
In marble fonts; there grain, and flower, and fruit,
Gush from the earth until the land runs o'er;
But there, too, many a poison-tree has root,
And midnight listens to the lion's roar,
And long, long deserts scorch the camel's foot,
Or, heaving, whelm the helpless caravan,
And as the soil is, so the heart of man.

LVI.
Afri' is all the sun's, and as her earth
Her human clay is kindled: full of power
For good or evil, burning from its birth,
The Moorish blood partakes the planet's hour,
And like the soil beneath it will bring forth:
Beauty and love were Haidée's mother's dower:
But her large dark eye show'd deep passion's force
Though sleeping like a lion near a source.

LVII.
Her daughter, temper'd with a milder ray,
Like summer clouds all silvery, smooth, and fair
Till slowly charged with thunder they display
Terror to earth, and tempest to the air,
Had held till now her soft and milky way;
But, overwrought with passion and despair,
The fire burst forth from her Numidian veins
Ever as the simoom sweeps the blasted plains.

LVIII.
The last sight which she saw was Juan's gore,
And he himself o'ermaster'd and cut down
His blood was running on the very floor
Where late he trod, her beautiful, her own.
Thus much she view'd an instant and no more,
Her struggles ceased with one convulsive groan
On her sire's arm, which until now scarce held
Her writhing fell she like a cedar fell'd

LIX.
A vein had burst, and her sweet lips' pure dyes,
Were dabbled with the deep blood which ran o'er;
And her head droop'd as when the lily lies
Bore
O'charged with rain; her summon'd am'ids
Their lady to her couch with gushing eyes;
Of herbs and cordials they produced their store,
But she defied all means they could employ,
Like one life could not hold, nor death destroy

LX.
Days lay she in that state unchanged, though chill
With nothing livid, still her lips were red;
She had no pulse, but death seem'd absent still;
No hideous sign proclaim'd her surely dead;
Corruption came not in each mind to kill
All hope; to look upon her sweet face bred
New thoughts of life, for it seem'd full of soul,
She had so much, earth could not claim the whole.

LXI.
The ruling passion, such as marble shows
When exquisitely chisel'd, still lay there,
But fix'd as marble's unchanged aspect throw'd
O'er the fair Venus, but for ever fair:
O'er the Laocoön's all eternal throes,
And ever-dying Gladiator's air,
Their energy like life forms all their fame,
Yet looks not life, for they are still the same.

LXII.
She woke at length, but not as sleepers wake,
Rather the dead, for life seem'd something new,
A strange sensation which she must partake
Perforce, since whatsoever met her view
Struck not on memory, though a heavy ache
Lay at her heart, whose earliest beat still true,
Brought back the sense of pain without the cause
For, for a while, the furies made a pause.

LXIII.
She look'd on many a face with vacant eye,
On many a token without knowing what;
She saw them watch her without asking why,
And reck'd not who around her pillow sat;
Not speechless, though she spoke not: not a sigh
Reveal'd her thoughts; dull silence and quick chat
Were tried in vain by those who served; she sate
No sign, save breath, of having left the grave.

LXIV.
Her handmaids tended, but she heed not;
Her father watch'd, she turn'd her eyes away;
She recognized no being, and no spot,
However dear or cherish'd in their day;
They changed from room to room, but all forgot
Gentle, but without memory, she lay;
And yet those eyes, which they would fain be wearing
Back to old thoughts, seem'd full of fearful meaning.
And then a slave bethought her of a harp; -
And tuned his instrument;
At the first notes, irregular and sharp,
On him her flashing eyes a moment bent,
Then to the wall she turn'd, as if to warp,
Her thoughts from sorrow through her heart re-
And he began a long low island song
Of ancient days, ere tyranny grew strong.

A non her thin wan fingers beat the wall
In time to his old tune; he changed the theme,
And sung of love—the fierce name struck through all
Her recollection; on her flash'd the dream
Of what she was, and is, if ye could call
To be so being; in a gushing stream
The tears rush'd forth from her o'erclouded brain,
Like mountain mists at length dissolved in rain.

Short solace, vain relief!—thought came too quick,
And whirl'd her brain to madness; she arose
As one who ne'er had dwelt among the sick,
And flew at all she met, as on her foes;
But no one ever heard her speak or shriek,
Although her path was now towards its close:
Here was a frenzy which disdain'd to rave,
Even when they smote her, in the hope to save.

Yet she betray'd at times a gleam of sense;
Nothing could make her meet her father's face,
Though on all other things with looks intense
She gazed, but none she ever could retrace;
Food she refused, and raiment; no pretence
Avail'd for either; neither change of place,
Nor time, nor skill, nor remedy, could give her
Senses to sleep—the power seem'd gone for ever.

Twelve days and nights she wither'd thus; at last,
Without a groan, or sigh, or glance, to show
A parting pang, the spirit from her pass'd;
And they who watch'd her nearest could not know
The very instant, till the change that east
Her sweet face into shadow, dull and slow,
Glazed o'er her eyes—the beautiful, the black—
Oh! to possess such lustre—and then lack!

She died, but not alone; she held within
A second principle of live, which might
Have dawnd a fair and sinless child of sin:
But closed its little being without light,
And went down to the grave unborn, wherein Illoosion and bough lie wither'd with one blight;
In vain the dews of heaven descend above
The bleeding flower and blasted fruit of love.

Thus lived—thus died she: never more on her,
Shall sorrow light or shame. She was not made
Through years or moons the inner weight to bear,
Which colder hearts endure till they are laid
By age in earth; her days and pleasures were Brief, but delightful—such as had not stay'd
Long with her destiny; but she slept well
By the sea-shore whereon she loved to dwell.

That isle is now all desolate and bare,
Its dwellings down, its tenants pass'd away
None but her own and father's grave is there,
And nothing outward tells of human clay:
Ye could not know where lies a thing so fair,
No stone is there to show, no tongue to say
What was; no dirge, except the hollow sea's,
Mourns o'er the beauty of the Cyclades.

But many a Greek maid in a loving song
Sighs o'er her name, and many an islander
With her sire's story makes the night less long;
Valor was his, and beauty dwelt with her;
If she loved rashly, her life paid for wrong—
A heavy price must all pay who thus err,
In some shape; let none think to fly the danger,
For soon or late Love is his own avenger.

But let me change this theme, which grows too sad
And lay this sheet of sorrow on the shelf;
I don't much like describing people mad,
For fear of seeming rather touch'd myself—
Besides, I've no more on this head to add;
And as my Muse is a capricious elf,
We'll put about and try another tack
With Juan, left half-kill'd some stanzas back.

Wounded and fetter'd, "cabin'd, cribb'd, confined,"
Some days and nights elapsed before that he Could altogether call the past to mind;
And when he did, he found himself at sea,
Sailing six knots an hour before the wind;
The shores of Ilion lay beneath their lee—
Another time he might have liked to see 'em,
But now was not much pleased with Cape Sigeum.

There, on the green and village-cotted hill, is (Flank'd by the Hellespont and by the sea)
Entomb'd the bravest of the brave, Achilles:
They say so—(Bryant says the contrary;)
And further downward, tall and towering, still is
The tumulus—of whom? Heaven knows; 't may Patroclus, Ajax, or Patroclus,—
All heroes, who if living still would slay us.

High barrows, without marble or a name,
A vast, until'd, and mountain-skirted plain,
And Ida in the distance, still the same,
And old Scamander (if 'tis he) remain;
The situation seems still form'd for fame—
A hundred thousand men might fight again
With ease; but where I sought for Ilion's walls,
The quiet sheep feeds, and the tortoise crawls;

Troops of untended horses: here and there
Some little hamlets, with new names uncouth;
Some shepherds, (unlike Paris,) led to stare
A moment at the European youth
Whom to the spot their schoolboy feelings bear;
A Turk, with beads in hand and pipe in mouth,
Extremely taken with his own religion,
Are what I found there—but the devil a Phrygian
LXXXIX.

Don Juan, here permitted to emerge
From his dull cabin, found himself a slave;
Forlorn, and gazing on the deep blue surge,
O'ershadow'd there by many a hero's grave:
Weak still with loss of blood, he scarce could urge
A few brief questions; and the answers gave
No very satisfactory information
About his past or present situation.

LXXX.

He saw some fellow-captives, who appear'd
To be Italians—as they were, in fact;
From them, at least; their destiny he heard,
Which was an odd one; a troop going to act
In Sicily—all singers, duly rear'd
In their vocation,—had been attack'd,
In sailing from Livorno, by the pirate,
But sold by the impresario at no high rate.

LXXXI.

By one of these, the buffo of the party,
Juan was told about their curious case;
For, although destined to the Turkish mart, he Still kept his spirits up—at least his face;
The little fellow really look'd quite hearty,
And bore him with some gaiety and grace,
Showing a much more reconciled d'menour
Than did the prima donna and the tenor.

LXXXII.

In a few words he told their hapless story,
Saying, "Our Machiavelian impresario,
Making a signal off some promontory,
Hail'd a strange brig; Corso di Caio Mario!
We were transferr'd on-board her in a hurry,
Without a single scudo of salario;
But, if the sultan has a taste for song,
We will revive our fortunes before long.

LXXXIII.

"The prima donna, though a little old,
And haggard with a dissipated life,
And subject, when the house is thin, to cold,
Has some good notes; and then the tenor's wife,
With no great voice is pleasing to behold;
Last carnival she made a deal of strife,
By carrying off Count Cassare Cicogna,
From an old Roman princess at Bologna.

LXXXIV.

"And then there are the dancers; there's the Nini,
With more than one profession, gains by all;
Then there's that laughing slut, the Pelegrini,
She too was fortunate last carnival,
And made at least five hundred zecchini,
But spends so fast, she has not now a paul;
And then there's the Grotesca—such a dancer!
Where men have souls or bodies, she must answer.

LXXXV.

"As for the figurant, they are like
The rest of all that tribe; with here and there
A pretty person, which perhaps may strike,
The rest are hardly fitted for a fair;
There's one, though tall, and stiffer than a pike,
Yet has a sentimental kind of air,
Which might go far, but she don't dance with vigor,
The more's the pity, with her face and figure.

LXXXVI.

"As for the men, they are a medling set;
The music is but a crack'd old basin,
But, being qualified in one way yet,
May the seraglio do to set his face in,
And as a servant some preferment get;
His singing I no further trust can place in;
From all the pope's makes yearly, 'twould perplex
To find three perfect pipes of the theò sex.

LXXXVII.

"The tenor's voice is spoilt by affectation,
And for the bass, the beast can only bellow,
In fact, he had no singing education
An ignorant, noteless, timeless, tun. less fellow
But being the prima donna's near relation,
Whose voice was very rich and mellow,
They hired him, though to hear him you'd believe
An ass was practising recitative.

LXXXVIII.

"Twould not become myself to dwell upon
My own merits, and though young—I see, sir—you
Have got a travell'd air, which shows you one
To whom the opera is by no means new;
You've heard of Raucocanti?—I'm the man;
The time may come when you may hear me too,
You was not last year at the fair of Lugo,
But next, when I'm engaged to sing there—do go.

LXXXIX.

"Our baritone I almost had forgot,
A pretty lad but bursting with conceit
With graceful action, science not a jot,
A voice of no great compass, and not sweet
He always is complaining of his lot,
Forsooth, scarce fit for ballads in the street,
In lovers' parts, his passion more to breathe,
Having no heart to show, he shows his teeth."

XC.

Here Raucocanti's eloquent recital
Was interrupted by the pirate crew,
Who came at stated moments to invite all
The captives back to their sad berths; each there
A rueful glance upon the waves, (which bright all,
From the blue skies derived a double blue,
Dancing all free and happy in the sult.,)
And then went down the hatchway one by one.

XCI.

They heard, next day, that in the Dardanelle
Waiting for his sublimity's firman—
The most imperative of sovereign spells,
Which every body does without who can,—
More to secure them in their naval cells,
Lady to lady, well as man to man,
Were to be chained and lotted out per couple,
For the slave-market of Constantinople.

XCII.

It seems when this allotment was made out,
There chanced to be an odd male and odd female
Who (after some discussion and some doubt
If the sopranos might be seem'd to be male,
They placed him o'er the women as a scout)
Were link'd together, and it happen'd the male
Was Juan, who—an awkward thing at his age—
Pair'd off with a Bacchante's blooming visage
XIII.
With Raucoesanti lucklessly was chain’d
The tenor; these two hated with a hate
Found only on the stage, and each more pain’d
With this his tuneful neighbor than his fate;
Sad strife arose, for they were so cross-grain’d,
Instead of hearing up without debate.
That each pull’d different ways with many an oath,
‘Areades ambo,’ id est—blackguards both.

XCV.
But all that power was wasted upon him,
For sorrow o’er each sense held stern command;
Her eye might flash on his, but found it dim;
And though thus chain’d, as natural her hand
Touched his arm, nor—nor any handsome limb
(And she had some not easy to withstand)
Could stir his pulse, or make his faith feel brittle,
Perhaps his recent wounds might help a little.

XCVI.
No matter; we should ne’er too much inquire,
But facts are facts: no knight could be more true.
And firmer faith no ladye-love desire;
We will omit the proofs, save one or two:
‘Tis said no one in hand ‘can a fire
By thought of frosty Caucasus;’ but few,
I really think; yet Juan’s then ordeal
Was more triumphant, and not much less real.

XCVII.
Here I might enter on a chaste description,
Having withstood temptation in my youth,
But hear that several people take exception
At the first two books having too much truth;
Therefore I’ll make Don Juan leave the ship soon,
Because the publisher declares, in sooth,
Through needles’ eyes it easier for the camel is
To pass, than those two cantos into families.

XCVIII.
Tis all the same to me; I’m fond of yielding,
And therefore leave them to the purer page
Of Smollet, Prior, Ariosto, Fielding,
Who say strange things for so correct an age;
I once had great alacrity in wielding
My pen, and liked poetic war to wage,
And recollect the time when all this cant
Would have provoked remarks which now it shan’t.

XCIX.
As boys love rows, my boyhood liked a squabble;
But at this hour I wish to part in peace,
Leavi’g such to the literary rabble,
Whit’er my verse’s fame be doom’d to cease
While the right hand which wrote it still is able,
Or of some centuries to take a lease:
The grass upon my grave will grow as long,
And sigh to midnight winds, but not to song.

CI.
And so great names are nothing more than criminal
And love of glory’s but an airy lust,
Too often in its fury overcoming all
Who would as ‘twere identify their dust.
From out the wide destruction, which, entombing all Leaves nothing till “the coming of the just”
Save change: I’ve stood upon Achilles’ tomb,
And heard Troy doubted; time will doubt of Rome.

CII.
The very generations of the dead
Are swept away, and tomb inherits tomb,
Until the memory of an age is fled,
And, buried, sinks beneath its offspring’s doom.
Where are the epitaphs our father’s read?
Save a few gleam’d from the sepulchral gloom
Which once-named myriads nameless lie beneath
And lose their own in universal death.

CIV.
I canter by the spot each afternoon
Where perish’d in his fame the horo-boy,
Who lived too long for men, but died too soon
For human vanity, the young De Foix!
A broken pillar, not uncouthly hewn,
But which neglect is hastening to destroy,
Records Ravenna’s carnage on its face,
While weeds and ordure raddle round the base.

CV.
With human blood that column was cemented,
With human filth that column is defiled,
As if the peasant’s coarse contempt were vented
To show his loathing of the spot he spoli’d;
Thus is the trophy used, and thus lamented
Should ever be those bloodhounds, from whose wild
Instinct of gore and glory earth has known
Those sufferings Dante saw in hell alone.

CVL.
Yet there will still be bards; though fame is smoke
Its fumes are frankincense to human thought,
And the unquiet feelings which first woke
Song in the world, will seek what then they sought
As on the beach the waves at last are broke,
Thus to their extreme verge the passions brought
Dash into poetry, which is but passion,
Or at least was so ere it grew a fashion.
Don Juan

Canto V

I.

When amatory poets sing their loves
In liquid lines mellifluously bland,
And pair their rhymes as Venus yokes her doves
They little think what mischief is in hand;
The greater their success the worse it proves,
As Ovid's verse may make you understand:
Even Petrarch's self, if judged with due severity
Is the Platonic pimp of all posterity.

II.

I therefore do denounce all amorous writing
Except in such a way as not to attract;
Plain—simple—short, and by no means inviting,
But with a moral to each error tack'd,
For I'd rather for instructing than delighting,
And with all passions in their turn attack'd;
Now, if my Pegasus should not be shod ill,
This poem will become a moral model.
III.
The European with the Asian shore
Sprinkled with palaces; the ocean stream,
Here and there studded with a seventy-four
Sophia's cupola with golden gleam;
The cypress groves; Olympus high and hoar;
The twelve isles, and the more than I could dream,
Far less describe, present the very view
Which charm'd the charming Mary Montagu.

IV.
I have a passion for the name of "Mary,"
For once it was a magic sound to me,
And still it half calls up the realms of fairy,
Where I beheld what never was to be;
All feelings change, but this was last to vary,
A spell from which even yet I am not quite free:
But I grow sad—and let a tale grow cold,
Which must not be pathetically told.

V.
The wind swept down the Euxine, and the wave
Broke foaming o'er the blue Symplegades,
'Tis a grand sight, from off "the Giants's Grave,"
To watch the progress of those rolling seas
Between the Bosphorus, as they lash and lave
Europe and Asia, you being quite at ease;
There's not a sea the passenger e'er pukes in Turns up more dangerous breakers than the Euxine.

VI.
Twas a raw day of Autumn's bleak beginning,
When nights are equal, but not so the days;
The Parce then cut short the further spinning
Of seamen's fates, and the loud tempests raise
The waters, and repentance for past sinning
In all who o'er the great deep take their ways:
They now to amend their lives, and yet they don't;
Because if drown'd, they can't—if spared, they won't.

VII.
A crowd of shivering slaves of every nation,
And age, and sex, were in the market ranged;
Each bery with the merchant in his station:
Poor creatures! their good looks were sadly changed.
All save the blacks seem'd jaded with vexation,
From friends, and home, and freedom far estranged;
The negroes more philosophy display'd,—
Used to it, no doubt, as cels are to flay'd.

VIII.
I am was juvenile, and thus was full,
As most at his age are, of hope, and health;
Yet I must own he look'd a little dull,
And now and then a tear stole down by stealth;
Perhaps his recent loss of blood might pull
His spirit down; and then the loss of wealth,
A mistress, and such comfortable quarters,
To be put up for auction among Tartars.

IX.
Were things to shake a stoic; nevertheless,
From the time the carriage was sent
His figure, and the splendor of his dress,
Of which some gilded remnants still were seen,
Crew all eyes on him, giving them to guess
He was above the vulgar by his mien;
And then though pale, he was so very handsome
And then—they calculated on his ransom.

X.
Like a backgammon-board the place was dotted
With whites and blacks, in groups on show for sale,
Though rather more irregularly spotted.
Some bought the jet, while others chose the pale
It chanced, among the other people lotted,
A man of thirty, rather stout and pale,
With resolution in his dark gray eye,
Next Juan stood, till some might choose to buy

XI.
He had an English look; that is, was square
In make, of a complexion white and ruddy
Good teeth, with curling rather dark brown hair,
And, it might be from thought, or toil, or study,
An open brow, a little marked with care;
One arm had on a bandage rather bloody;
And there he stood with such sang froid, that great
Could scarce been shown even by a mere spectator

XII.
But seeing at his elbow a mere lad,
Of high spirit evidently, though
At present weigh'd down by a doom which had O'erthrown even men, he soon began to show
A kind of blunt compassion for the sad
Lot of so young a partner in the wo,
Which for himself he seem'd to deem no worse
Than any other scrape, a thing of course.

XIII.
"My boy!"—said he, "amid this motley crew
Of Georgians, Russians, Nubians, and what not,
All ragamuffins differing but in hue,
With whom it is our luck to cast our lot,
The only gentlemen seem I and you,
So let us be acquainted, as we ought;
If I could yield you any consolation,
"Twould give me pleasure.—Pray, what is your nation?

XIV.
When Juan answer'd "Spanish!" he replied,
"I thought, in fact, you could not be a Greek;
Those servile dogs are not so proudly eyed:
Fortune has play'd you here a pretty freak,
But that's the way with all men till they're tried;
But never mind,—she'll turn, perhaps, next week,
She has served me also much the same as you,
Except I have found it nothing new."

XV.
"Pray, sir," said Juan, "if I may presume, [rare—
What brought you here?"
"Oh nothing very Six Tartars and a drag-chain—"—"To this doom
But conducted, if the question's fair,
Is that which I would learn."—"I served for some Months with the Russian army here and there,
And taking lately, by Suvarrow's bidding,
A town, was ta'en myself instead of Widdin."

XVI.
"Have you no friends?"—"I had—but, by God's Blessing,
Have not been troubled with them lately. Now
I have answer'd all your questions without pressing,
And you an equal courtesy should show."
"Alas!" said Juan, 'twere a tale distressing,
And long besides."—"Oh! if 'tis really so
You're right on both accounts to hold your tongue
A sad tale saddens doubly when 'tis long.
XVII.
But dross not.
"Fortune, at your time of life, although a female moderately sickle, will hardly leave you (as she's not your wife)
For any length of days in such a pickle.
To strive, too, with our fate were such a strife
As if the corn-sheaf should oppose the sickle;
Men are the sport of circumstances, when
The circumstances seem the sport of men."

XVIII.
"Tis not," said Juan, "for my present doom
I warm, but for the past—'I loved a maid':"
He paused, and his dark eye grew full of gloom;
A single tear upon his eyelash stood
A moment, and then dropped; "but to resume,
'Tis not my present lot, as I have said,
Which I deplore so much; for I have borne
Hardships which have the hardest overworn,

On the rough deep. But this last blow—" and here
He stopp'd again, and turn'd away his face.
'Ay," quoth his friend, "I thought it would appear
That there had been a lady in the case;
And these are things which ask a tender tear,
Such as I, too, would shed, if in your place:
I cried upon my first wife's dying day,
And also when my second ran away:

'Your third'—"Your third!" quoth Juan, turning round;
"You scarcely can be thirty; have you three?"
'No—only two at present above ground;—
Surely 'tis nothing wonderful to see
One person thrice in holy wedlock bound!" [she?
"Well, then, your third," said Juan; "what did
She did not run away, too,—did she, sir?"
"No, faith."—"What then?"—"I ran away from her."

You take things coolly, sir," said Juan. "Why?"
Replied the other, "what can a man do?
There still are many rainbows in your sky,
But mine have vanish'd. All, when life is new,
Commence with feelings warm, and prospects high;
But time strips our illusions of their hue,
And one by one in turn, some grand mistake
Casts off its bright skin yearly, like the snake.

"Tis true, it gets another bright and fresh,
Or fresher, brighter; but, the year gone through,
This skin must go the way, too, of all flesh,
Or sometimes, only wear a week or two.
Love's the first net which spreads its deadly mesh;
Ambition, avarice, vengeance, glory, glare
The glittering lime-twigs of our latter days,
Where still we flutter on for pence or praise."

"All this is very fine, and may be true,"
Said Juan; "but I really don't see how It better presents times with me or you."
"No!" quoth the other; "yet you will allow,
By setting things in their right point of view,
Knowledge, at least, is gain'd; for instance, now,
We know what slavery is, and our disasters
May teach us better to behave when masters

XXIV.
"Would we were masters now, if but to try
Their present lessons on our pagan friends here,
Said Juan—swallowing a heart-turning sigh:
"Heav'n help the scholar whom his fortune sends Perhaps we shall be one day, by and by, [here!]
Rejoin'd the other, "when our bad luck mends
Meantime (you old black eunuch seems to eye us)
I wish to G—d that somebody would buy us!

"But after all, what is our present state?
'Tis bad, and may be better—all men's lot:
Most men are slaves, none more so than the great,
To their own whims and passions, and what not:
Society itself, which should create
Kindness, destroys what little we had got:
To feel for none is the true social art
Of the world's stoics—men without a heart."

XXVI.
Just now a black old neutral personage
Of the third sex stepp'd up, and peering over
The captives, seemed to mark their looks, and age,
And capabilities, as to discover
If they were fitted for the purpose'd cage:
No lady e'er is ogled by a lover,
Horse by a blackleg, broadcloth by a tailor
Fee by a counsel, felon by a jailer,

As is a slave by his intended bidder.
"Tis pleasant purchasing our fellow-creatures;
And all are to be sold, if you consider
Their passions, and are dext'rous; some by features
Are bought up, others by a warlike leader,
Some by a place—as tend their years or natures;
The most by ready cash—but all have prices,
From crowns to kicks, according to their vices.

The eunuch, having eyed them o'er with care,
Turn'd to the merchant, and began to bid,
First, but for one, and after, for the pair;
They bargained, wrangled, swore, too—so they did!
As though they were in a mere Christian fair,
Cheaping an ox, an ass, a lamb, or k.d.
So that their bargain sounded like a battle
For this superior yoke of human cattle.

At last they settled into simple grumbling,
And pulling out reluctant purses, and
Turning each piece of silver o'er, and tumbling
Some down, and weighing others in their hand.
And by mistake sequins with paras jumbling,
Until the sum was accurately scan'd,
And then the merchant, giving change and Receipts in full, began to think of dining.

I wonder if his appetite was good;
Or, if it were, if also his digestion.
Methinks at meals some odd thoughts might intrude
And conscience ask a curious sort of question,
About the right divine, how far we should Sell flesh and blood. When dinner has oppress'd
I think it is, perhaps, the gloomiest hour
Which turns up out of the sad twenty-four.
Voïtaire says, "No:" he tells you that Candide
And life most tolerable after meals;
He's wrong—unless man was a pig, indeed,
Repulsion rather adds to what he feels;
Unless he's drunk, and then, no doubt, he's freed
From his own brain's oppression while it reels.
Of food I think with Philip's son, or rather Ammon's, (ill pleased with one world and one father;)

I think with Alexander, that the act
Of eating, with another act or two,
Makes us feel our mortality in fact
Redoubled; when a roast and a ragout,
And fish and soup, by some side-dishes back'd,
Can give us either pain or pleasure, who
Would plique himself on intellects, whose use
Depends so much upon the gastric juice?

The other evening, ( 'twas on Friday last)—
This is a fact, and no poetic fable—
Just as my great coat was about me cast,
My hat and gloves still lying on the table,
I heard a shot— 'twas eight o'clock scarce past—
And running out as fast as I was able, I Found the military commandant
Stretch'd in the street, and able scarce to pant.

I gazed upon him, for I knew him well;
And, though I have seen many corpses, never Saw one, whom such an accident befell, (and liver,
So calm; though pierced through stomach, heart,
He seemed to sleep, for you could scarcely tell
(As he bled inwardly, no hideous river
Of gore divulged the cause) that he was dead:—
So as I gazed on him, I thought or said—

"Can this be death? then what is life or death?
Speak!" bu' he spoke not: "wake!" but still he
But yesterday, and who had mightier breath? I slept;
A thousand warriors by his word were kept
In awe: he said, as the centurion saith,
'Go,' and he goeth; 'come,' and forth he stepp'd.
The trump and bugle till he spake were dumb—
And now nought left him but the muffled drum.

And they who waited once and worshipp'd— they
With their rough faces throng'd about the bed,
To gaze once more on the commanding clay
Which for the last, though not the first, time bled;
And such an end! that he who many a day
Had faced Napoleon's foes until they fled,—
The foremost in the charge or in the sally,
Should ne'er be utter'd in a civic alley.

The scars of his old wounds were near his brow,
Those honor'd scars which brought him fame;
And horrid was the contrast to the view—
But let me quit the theme, as such things claim
Perhaps, even more attention than is due
From me: I gazed (as oft I have gazed the same,
To try if I could waken ought out of death,
Which should confirm, or shake, or make a faith;

But it was all a mystery. Here we are,
And there we go—but where? five bits of lead,
Or three, or two, or one, send very far!
And is this blood, then, form'd but to be shed
Can every element our elements mar?
And air—earth—water—fire live—and we dead?
We, whose minds comprehend all things? No more:
But let us to the story as before.

Here there conductor tapping at the wicket
Of a small iron door, 'twas open'd, and
He led them onward, first through a low thicket,
Flank'd by large groves which tower'd on either hand:
They almost lost their way, and had to pick it—
For night was closing ere they came to land.
The eunuch made a sign to those on board,
Who row'd off, leaving them without a word.

As they were plodding on their winding way,
Through orange bowers, and jasmine, and so forth,
(Of which I might have a good deal to say,
There being no such profusion in the North Of oriental plants, "et cetera."
But that of late your scribblers think it worth
Their while to rear whole hotbeds in their works;
Because one poet travel'd 'mongst the Turks:)

As they were threading on their way, there came Into Don Juan's head a thought, which he Whisper'd to his companion:— 'twas the same
Which might have then occur'd to you or me.
"Mothinks,"—said he;—"it would be no great shame
If we should strike a stroke to set us free;
Let's knock that old black fellow on the head,
And march away—'twere easier done than said."

"Yes," said the other, "and when done, what then?
How get out? how the devil got we in?
And when we once were fairly out, and when .
From Saint Bartholomew we have saved our skin.
To-morrow did we see in some other den,
And worse off than we hitherto have been;
Besides, I'm hungry, and just now would take.
Like Esau, for my birthright a beef-steak
XLV.

* We must be near some place of man's abode;
For the old negro's confidence in creeping,
With his two captives, by so queer a road,
Shows that he thinks his friends have not a road.
A single cry would bring the mail abroad: *sleeping;
'Tis therefore better looking before leaping—
And there, you see, this turn has brought us through,
By Jove, a noble palace!—lighted, too.*

XLVI.

It was indeed a wide extensive building
Which open'd on their view, and o'er the front
There seem'd to be bespren a deal of gilding
And various hues, as is the Turkish wont,—
A gaudy taste; for they are little skill'd in
The arts of which these lands were once the font:
Each villa on the Bosphorus looks a screen
New painted, or a pretty opera-scene.

XLVII.

And nearer as they came, a genial savor
Of certain stews, and roast meats, and pilmaus,
'Hings which in hungry mortals' eyes find favor,
Made Juan in his harsh intentions pause,
And put himself upon his good behavior:
His friend, too, adding a new saving clause,
Said, "In Heaven's name let's get some supper now,
And then I'm with you, if you're for a row."

XLVIII.

Some talk of an appeal unto some passion,
Some to men's feelings, others to their reason;
The last of these was never much the fashion,
For reason thinks all reasoning out of season.
Some speakers whine, and others lay the lash on,
But more or less continue still to tease on,
With arguments according to their "forte:;"
But no one ever dreams of being short.

XLIX.

But I digress: of all appeals,—although
I grant the power of paths, and of gold,
Of beauty, flattery, threats, a shilling,—no
Method's more sure at moments to take hold
Of the best feelings of mankind, which grow
More tender, as we every day behold,
Than that all-soften ing, overpowering knoll,
The tocsin of the soul—the dinner-bell.

L.

Turkey contains no bells, and yet men dine:
And Juan and his friend, albeit they heard
No Christian knoll to table, saw no line
Of Jacquemus usher to the feast prepared,
Yet smelt roast-meat, beheld a huge fire shine,
And cooks in motion with their clean arms bare,
And gazed around them to the left and right
With the prophetic eye of appetite.

LI.

And giving up all notions of resistance,
They follow'd close behind their sable guide,
Who little thought that his own knack'd existence
Was on the point of being set aside;
He motion'd them to stop at some small distance,
And knocking at the gate, 'twas open'd wide,
And a magnificent large hall display'd
The Asian pomp of Ottoman parade.

LII.

I won't describe; description is my forte;
But every fool describes in these bright days
His wond'rous journey to some foreign court,
And swarms his quarto, and demands your praise—
Death to his publisher, to him 'tis sport;
While nature, tortured twenty thousand ways,
Resigns herself with exemplary patience
To guide-books, rhymes, tours, sketches, illustration.

LIII.

Along this hall, and up and down, some, squatted
Upon their hams, were occupied at chess;
Others in monosyllable talk chatted,
Dressed, and some seem'd much in love with their own
And divers smoked superb pipes decorated
With amber mouths of greater price or less;
And several stratted, others slept, and some Prepared for supper with a glass of rum."

LIV.

As the black eunuch enter'd with his brace
Of purchased infidels, some raised their eyes
A moment without slackening from their pace;
But those who sate ne'er stir'd in any wise:
One or two stared the captives in the face,
Just as one views a horse to guess his price:
Some nodded to the negro from their station.
But no one troubled him with conversation.

LV.

He leads them through the hall, and, without stop—
On through a farther range of goodly rooms
Splendid but silent, save in one, where, dropping
A marble fountain echoes, through the glooms
Of night, which robe the chamber, or where popping
Some female head most curiously presumes
To thrust its black eyes through the door or lattice
As wondering what the devil noise that is.

LVI.

Some faint lamps gleaming from the lofty walls
Gave light enough to hint their farther way,
But not enough to show the imperial halls,
In all the flashing of their full array;
Perhaps there's nothing—I'll not say appalls,
But saithens more by night as well as day
Than an enormous room without a soul
To break the lifeless splendor of the whole.

LVII.

Two or three seem so little, one seems nothing;
In deserts, forests, crowds, or by the shore,
There solitude, we know, has her full growth in
The spots which were her realms for evermore:
But in a mighty hall or gallery, both in
More modern buildings and those built of yore,
A kind of death comes o'er us all along,
Seeing what's meant for many with but one.

LVIII.

A neat, snug study on a winter's night,
A book, friend, single lady, or a glass
Of claret, sandwich, and an appetite,
Are things which make an English evening pass
Though certain by no means so grand a sight
As is a theatre lit up by gas.
I pass my evenings in long galleries solely,
And that's the reason I'm so melancholy.
LIX.

Alas. ma’am makes that great which makes him little;— grant you in a church ‘tis very well;
what speaks of Heaven should by no means be brittle.
But strong and lasting, till no tongue can tell
Their names who reared it; but huge houses fit—
And huge tombs worse—mankind, since Adam fell.
Methinks the story of the tower of Babel
Might teach them this much better than I’m able.

LX.

Babel was Nimrod’s hunting-seat, and then
A town of gardens, walls, and wealth amazing,
Where Nebuchadnezzar, king of men,
Reign’d, till one summer’s day he took to grazing,
And Daniel tamed the lions in their den,
The people’s awe and admiration raising;
Twas famous, too, for Thisbe, and for Pyramus,
And the calumniated Queen Semiramis.

LXI.

That injured Queen, by chroniclers so coarse,
Has been accused (I doubt not by conspiracy)
Of an improper friendship for her horse,
(Love, like religion, sometimes runs to heresy:)
This monstrous tale had probably its source
(For such exaggerations here and there I see)
In writing “Courser” by mistake for “Courrier”:
I wish the case could come before a jury here.

LXII.

But to resume,—should there be, (what may not be in these days?) some infidels, who don’t,
Because they can’t find out the very spot
Of that same Babel, or because they won’t,
(Though Claudius Rich, esquire, some bricks has got, and written lately two memoirs upon ’t.)
Believe the Jews, those unbelievers, who Must be believed, though they believe not you—

LXIII.

Yet let them think that Horace has express’d
Shortly and sweetly the masonic folly
Of those, forgetting the great place of rest,
Who give themselves to architecture wholly;
We know where things and men must end at last,
A mori (like all morals) melancholy,
And “Et sepulcri immemor struis domos”
Shows that we build when we should but entomb us.

LXIV.

At last they reach’d a quarter most retired,
Where echo woke as if from a long slumber:
Though full of all things which could be desired,
One wonder’d what to do with such a number
Of articles which nobody required;
Here wealth had done its utmost to encumber
With furniture an exquisite apartment,
Which puzzled nature much to know what art meant.

LXV.

It seem’d, however, but to open on
A range or suit of further chambers, which Might lead to, heaven knows where; but in this one
The moveables were prodigally rich;
Sofas ‘twas half a sin to sit upon,
So costly were they; carpets every stitch
Of workmanship so rare, that made you wish
You could glide o’er them like a golden fish.

LXVI.

The black, however, without hardly deign’d,
A glance at that which rapt the slaves in wonder
Trampled what they scarce trod for fear of staining
As if the milky way their feet was under
With all its stars: and with a stretch attaining
A certain press or cupboard, niched in yonder
In that remote recess which you may see—
Or if you don’t, the fault is not in me:

LXVII.

I wish to be perspicuous: and the black,
I say, unlocking the recess, pull’d forth
A quantity of clothes, fit for the back
Of any Mussulman, whate’er his worth,
And of variety there was no lack—
And yet, though I have said there was no depth,
He chose himself to point out what he thought
Most proper for the Christians he had bought.

LXVIII.

The suit he thought most suitable to each
Was, for the elder and the stoutest, first
A Candiate cloak, which to the knee might reach,
And trowsers not so tight that they would burst.
But such as fit an Asiatic breech;
A shawl, whose folds in Cashmere had been nest;
Slippers of saffron, dagger rich and handy;
In short, all things which form a Turkish Dandy

LXIX.

While he was dressing, Baba, their black friend,
Hinted the vast advantages which they Might probably attain both in the end,
If they would but pursue the proper way
Which fortune plainly seem’d to recommend,
And then he added, that he needs must say,
"Twould greatly tend to better their condition,
If they would condescend to circumcision.

LXX.

"For his own part, he really should rejoice
To see them true believers, but no less
Would leave his proposition to their choice."
The other, thanking him for this excess
Of goodness in thus leaving them a voice
In such a tryst, scarcely could express
"Sufficiently (he said,) his approbation
Of all the customs of this polish’d nation.

LXXI.

"For his own share—he saw but small objection
To so respectable an ancient rite,
And after swallowing down a slight reflection,
For which he own’d a present appetite,
He doubted not a few hours of reflection
Would reconcile him to the business quite—
"Will it?" said Juan, sharply; "Strike me dead,
But they as soon shall circumcise my head—

LXXII.

"Cut off a thousand heads, before—"—"Now
Replied the other, "do not interrupt: [pray,]
You put me out in what I had to say.
Sir,—as I said, as soon as I have supp’d,
I shall perpend if your proposals may
Be such as I can properly accept;
Provided always your great goodness still Remit the matter to our own free-will."
LXXXIII.

Baba eyed Juan, and said, "Be so good As dress yourself"—and pointed out a suit In which a princess with great pleasure would Array her limbs; but Juan standing mute, As not being in a masquerading mood, Gave it a slight kick with his Christian foot; And when the old negro told him to "Get ready," Replied, "Old gentleman, I'm not a lady."

LXXXIV.

"What you may be, I neither know nor care," Said Baba, "but pray do as I desire, I have no more time nor many words to spare."

"At least," said Juan, "sure I may inquire The cause of this odd travesty?"—"Forbear," Said Baba, "to be curious: 'twill transpire, No doubt, in proper place, and time, and season: I have no authority to tell the reason."

LXXXV.

"Then if I do," said Juan, "I'll be—" "Hold!"

Rejoin'd the negro, "pray be not provoking This spirit's well, but it may wax too bold, And you will find us not too fond of joking." "What, sir," said Juan, "shall it e'er be told That I unseck'd my dress?" But Baba, stroking The things down, said—"Incense me, and I call Those who will leave you of no sex at all."

LXXXVI.

"I offer you a handsom suite of clothes: A woman's truce; then there is a cause Why you should wear them."—"What, though my soul loathes The effeminate garb?"—Thus, after a short pause, Sigh'd Juan, muttering also some slight oaths, "What the devil shall I do with all this gauze?" Thus he profanely term'd the finest lace Which e'er set off a marriage-morning face.

LXXXVII.

And then he swore; and, sighing, on he slipp'd A pair of trowsers of flesh-color'd silk; Next with a virgin zone he was equip'y'd, Which girt a slight chemise as white as milk, But tugging on his petticoat, he tripp'd. Which—as we say—or, as the Scotch say, whilk, (The rhyme obliges me to this:—sometimes Kings are not more imperious than rhymes)—

LXXXVIII.

Whilk, which (or what you please) was owing to His garment's novelty, and his being awkward: And yet at last he managed to get through His toilet, though no doubt a little backward; The negro Baba help'd a little too, When some untoward part of raiment stuck hard; And, wrestling both his arms into a gown, He paused and took a survey up and down.

LXXXIX.

One difficulty still remain'd,—his hair Was hardly long enough; but Baba found So many false long tresses all to spare, That soon his head was most completely crown'd, After the manner then in fashion there; And this addition with such gems was bound As suited the ensemble of his toilet, While Baba made him comb his head and oil it.

LXXX.

And now being femininely all array'd, [tweezers, With some small aid from scissors, paint, and He look'd in almost all respects a maid, And Baba smilingly exclaim'd, "You see, sirs, A perfect transformation here display'd; [sirs, And now, then, you must come along with me,— That is—the lady:"—clapping his hands twice, Four blacks were at his elbow in a trice.

LXXXI.

"Yon, sir," said Baba nodding to the one, "Will please to accompany those gentlemen To supper; but you, worthy Christian nun, Will follow me: no trifling, sir: for when I say a thing, it must at once be done. What fear you? think you this a lion's den? Why, 'tis a palace; where the truly wise Anticipate the Prophet's paradise.

LXXXII.

"You fool! I tell you no one means you harm "So much the better," Juan said, "for them Else they shall feel the weight of this my arm, Which is not quite so light as you may deem. I yield thus far; but soon will break the charm If any take me for that which I seem; So that I trust, for every body's sake, That this disguise may lead to no mistake.

LXXXIII.

"Blockhead! come on, and see," quoth Baba; while Don Juan, turning to his comrade, who, [smile Though somewhat grieved, could scarce forbear a Upon the metamorphosis in view,— "Farewell!" they mutually exclaim'd: 'this soil Seems fertile in adventures strange and new; One's turn'd half Mussulman, and one a maid, By this old black enchanter's unsought aid.

LXXXIV.

"Farewell!" said Juan; "should we meet no more, I wish you a good appetite."—"Farewell!" Replied the other; "though it grieves me sore; When we next meet we'll have a tale to tell; We needs must follow when Fate puts from shore Keep your good name; though Eve herself once fell." [carry me, "Nay," quoth the maid, "the Sultan's self shan't Unless his highness promises to marry me."

LXXXV.

And thus they parted, each by separate doors; Baba led Juan onward, room by room, Through glittering galleries and o'er marble floors, Till a gigantic portal through the gloom, Haughty and huge, along the distance towers; And wafted far arose a rich perfume: It seem'd as though they came upon a shrine For all was vast, still, fragrant, and divine.

LXXXVI.

The giant door was broad, and bright, and high, Of gilded bronze, and carved in curious guise; Warriors thereon were battling furiously; Here stalks the victor, there the vanquish'd lies There captives led in triumph drop the eye, And in perspective many a squadron flies: It seems the work of times before the line Of Rome transplanted fell with Constantine
LXXXVII.
This massy portal stood at the wide close
Of a huge hall, and on its either side
Two little dwarfs, the least you could suppose,
Were sate, like ugly imps, as if allied
In mockery to the enormous gate which rose
O'er them in almost pyramidal pride:
The gate so splendid was in all its features,
You never thought about these little creatures,

LXXXVIII.
Until you nearly trod on them, and then
You started back in horror to survey
The wondrous hideousness of those small men,
Whose color was not black, nor white, nor gray,
But an extraneous mixture, which no pen
Can trace, although perhaps the pencil may;
They were misshapen pignities, deaf and dumb—
Monsters, who cost a no less monstrous sum.

LXXXIX.
Their duty was—for they were strong, and though
They look'd so little, did strong things at times—
To ope this door, which they could really do,
The hinges being as smooth as Rogers' rhymes;
And now and then, with tough strings of the bow,
As is the custom of those eastern climes,
To give some rebel Pacha a cravat;
For mutes are generally used for that.

XC.
They spoke by signs—that is not spoke at all;
And, looking like two incubi, they glared
As Baba with his fingers made them fall
To heaving back the portal folds: it scared
Juan a moment, as this pair so small,
With shrinking serpent optics on him stared;
It was as if their little looks could poison
Or fascinate whome'er they fix'd their eyes on.

XCI.
Before they enter'd, Baba paused to hint
To Juan some slight lessons as his guide:
"If you could just contrive," he said, "to stint
That somewhat manly majesty of stride, (sn't)—
'Twould be as well, and—(though there's not much)
To swing a little less from side to side,
Which has, at times, an aspect of the oddest;
And also, could you look a little modest,

"'Twould be convenient; for these mutes have eyes
Like needles, which might pierce those petticoats;
And if they should discover your disguise,
You know how near us the deep Bosporus floats;
And you and I may chance, ere morning rise,
To find our way to Marmora without boats,
Stich'd up in sacks—a mode of navigation
A good deal practised here upon occasion."

XCII.
With this encouragement, he led the way
Into a room still nobler than the last;
A rich confusion form'd a disarray
In such sort, that the eye along it cast
Could hardly carry any thing away,
Object on object flash'd so bright and fast;
A dazzling mass of gems, and gold and glitter,
Magnificently mingled in a litter.

XCV.
Wealth had done wonders—taste not much; such Occur in orient palaces, and even
In the more chasten'd domes of western kings,
(Of which I've also seen some six or seven,)
Where I can't say or gold or diamond flings
Much lustre, there is much to be forgiven;
Groups of bad statues, tables, chairs, and pictures,
On which I cannot pause to make my strictures.

XCIII.
In this imperial hall, at distance lay
Under a canopy, and there reclined,
Quite in a confidential queenly way,
A lady; Baba stop'd, and kneeling, sign'd
To Juan, who, though not much used to pray,
Kneel'd down by instinct, wondering in his mind
What all this meant: while Baba bow'd and bended
His head, until the ceremony ended.

XCIV.
The lady, rising up with such an air
As Venus rose with from the wave, on them
Bent like an antelope a Paphian pair
Of eyes, which put out each surrounding gem;
And, raising up an arm as moonlight fair,
She sign'd to Baba, who first kiss'd the hem
Of her deep-purple robe, and, speaking low
Pointed to Juan, who remain'd below.

XCV.
Her presence was as lofty as her state;
Her beauty of that overpowering kind,
Whose force description only would abate.
I'd rather leave it much to your own mind,
Than lessen it by what I could relate
Of forms and features; it would strike you blind
Could I do justice to the full detail;
So, luckily for both, my phrases fail.

 XCVI.
This much however I may add—her years [springs,
Were ripe—they might make six-and-twenty
But there are forms which Time to touch forbear,
And turns aside his scythe to vulgar things,
Such as was Mary's, Queen of Scots; true—tears
And love destroy; and sapping sorrow wings
Charms from the chamber—yet some never grow
Ugly; for instance—Ninon de l'Enclos.

XCVI.
She spake some words to her attendants, who Composed a choir of girls, ten or a dozen,
And were all clad alike; like Juan, too,
Who wore their uniform, by Baba chosen.
They form'd a very nymph-like looking crew
Which might have call'd Diana's chorus "cousin,
As far as outward show may correspond;
I won't be baul'd for any thing beyond.

C.
They bow'd obedience and withdrew, retiring,
But not by the same door through which came
Baba and Juan, which last stood admiring,
At some small distance, all he saw within
This strange saloon, much fitted for inspiring
Marvel and praise: for both or none things win;
And I must say I ne'er could see the very Great happiness of the "Nil Admirari."
CI

‘Not to admire is all the art I know (Plain truth, dear Murray, needs few flowers of
To make men happy, or to keep them so;’

(So take it in the very words of Creech.)

Thus Horace wrote, we all know, long ago:
And thus Pope quotes the precept, to re-teach
From his translation: but had none admired,
Would Pope have sung, or Horace been inspired?

CII.

Baba, when all the damsels were withdrawn,
Motion’d to Juan to approach, and then
A second time desired him to kneel down
And kiss the lady’s foot, which maxim when
He heard repeated, Juan with a frown
Drew himself up to his full height again,
And said ‘It grieved him, but he could not stoop
To any shoe, unless it shod the Pope.’

CIII.

Baba, indignant at this ill-timed pride,
Made fierce remonstrances, and then a threat
He mutter’d (but the last was given aside)
About a bowstring—quite in vain; not yet [bride:
Would Juan stoop, though ’twere to Mahomet’s
There’s nothing in the world like etiquette,
In kingy chambers or imperial halls,
As also at the race and county balls.

CIV.

He stood like Atlas, with a world of words
About his cars, and nathless would not bend;
The blood of all his line’s Castilian lords
Boil’d in his veins, and rather than descend
To stain his pedigree, a thousand swords
A thousand times of him had made an end;
At length perceiving the ‘foot’ could not stand,
Baba proposed that he should kiss the hand.

CV.

Here was an honorable compromise;
A half-way house of diplomatic rest, [guise;
Where they might meet in much more peaceful
And Juan now his willingness express’d
To use all fit and proper courtesies,
Adding, that this was commonest and best,
For through the South the custom still commands
The gentleman to kiss the lady’s hands.

CVI.

And he advanced, though with but a bad grace,
Though on more thorough-bred’s or fairer fingers
No lips e’er left their transitory trace;
On such as these the lip too fondly lingers,
And for one kiss would fain imprint a brace,
As you will see, if she you love will bring her
In contact; and sometimes even a fair stranger’s
An almost twelvemonth’s constancy endangers.

CVII.

The lady eyed him o’er and o’er, and bade
Baba retire, which he obey’d in style,
As if well used to the retreating trade;
And taking hints in good part all the while,
He whisper’d Juan not to be afraid,
And, looking on him with a sort of smile,
Took leave with such a face of satisfaction,
As good men wear who have done a virtuous action.

CVIII.

When he was gone, there was a sudden change,
I know not what might be the lady’s thought,
But o’er her bright brow flash’d a tumult strange,
And into her clear cheek the blood was brought,
Blood-red as sunset summer clouds which range
The verge of heaven; and in her large eyes
A mixture of sensations might be scan’d, [wrought
Of half voluptuousness and half command.

CIX.

Her form had all the softness of her sex,
Her features all the sweetness of the devil,
When he put on the cherub to perplex
Eve, and paved (God knows how) the road to evil
The sun himself was scarce more free from specks
Than she from aught at which the eye could cavi
Yet somehow there was something somewhere want
As if she rather order’d than was granting.— [ing.

CX.

Something imperial, or imperious, threw
A chain o’er all she did; that is, a chain
Was thrown, as ’twere, about the neck of you,—
And rapture’s self will seem almost a palu
With aught which looks like despotism in view
Our souls at least are free, and ’tis in vain
We would against them make the flesh obey—
The spirit, in the end, will have its way

CXI.

Her very smile was haughty, though so sweet;
Her very nod was not an inclination;
There was a self-will even in her small feet, [th
As though they were quite conscious of her sta
They trod as upon necks; and to complete
Her state, (it is the custom of her nation,) a Poniard deck’d her girdle, as the sign
She was a sultan’s bride, (thank Heaven, not mine)

CXII.

“To hear and to obey” had been from birth
The law of all around her; to fulfil
All phantasies which yielded joy or birth,
Had been her slaves’ chief pleasure, as her will;
Her blood was high, her beauty scarce of earth;
Judge, then, if her caprices e’er stood still;
Had she but been a Christian, I’ve a notion
We should have found out the “perpetual motion.”

CXIII.

Whate’er she saw and coveted was brought;
Whate’er she did not see, if she supposed
It might be seen, with diligence was sought,
And when ’twas found straightforward the bargain
Closed:
There was no end unto the things she bought,
Nor to the trouble which her fancies caused;
Yet even her tyranny had such a grace,
The women pardon’d all except her face

CXIV.

Juan, the latest of her whims, had caught
Her eye in passing on his way to sale:
She order’d him directly to be bought,
And Baba, who had ne’er been known to fail
In any kind of mischief to be wrought,
Had his instructions where and how to deal:
She had no prudence, but he had; and this Explains the garb which Juan took amiss
CXV.

His youth and features favor'd the disguise,
And should you ask how she, a sultan's bride,
Could risk or compass such strange phantasies,
This I must leave sultanas to decide:
Emperors are only husbands in wives' eyes,
And kings and consorts oft are mystified.
As we may ascertain with due precision,
Some by experience, others by tradition.

CXVI.

But to the main point, where we have been tending:
She now conceived all difficulties past,
And deem'd herself extremely condescending
When being made her property at last,
Without more preface, in her blue eyes blending
Passion and power, a glance on him she cast,
And merely saying, "Christian, canst thou love?"
Conceived that phrase was quite enough to move.

CXVII.

And so it was, in proper time and place,
But Juan, who had still his mind o'erflowing
With Haidee's isle and soft Ionian face,
Felt the warm blood, which in his face was glowing,
Rush back upon his heart, which fill'd his space,
And left his cheeks as pale as snowdrops blowing:
These words went through his soul like Arab spears,
So that he spoke not, but burst into tears.

CXVIII.

She was a good deal shock'd; not shock'd at tears,
For women shed and use them at their liking;
But there is something when man's eye appears
Wet, still more disagreeable and striking:
A woman's tear-drop melts, a man's half tears,
Like molten lead, as if you thrust a pike in
His heart, to force it out, for (to be shorter)
To them 'tis a relief, to us a torture.

CXIX.

And she would have consol'd, but knew not how;
Having no equals, nothing which had e'er
Infected her with sympathy till now,
And never having dream'd what 'twas to bear
Aught of a serious sorrowing kind, although
There might arise some pouting petty care
To cross her brow, she wonder'd how so near
Her eyes another's eye could shed a tear.

CX.

But nature teaches more than power can spoil,
And when a strong although a strange sensation
Move—female hearts are such a genial soil
For tender feelings, whatsoever their nation,
They naturally pour the "wine and oil,"
Samaritans in every situation;
And thus Gulbeyaz, though she knew not why,
Felt an odd glistening moisture in her eye.

CXI.

But tears must stop like all things else; and soon
Juan, who for an instant had been moved
To such a sorrow by the intrusive tone
Of one who dared to ask if "he had loved,"
Call'd back the stoic to his eyes, which shone
Bright with the very weakness he reproved;
And although sensitive to beauty, he Felt most indignant still at not being free.

CXII.

Gulbeyaz, for the first time in her days,
Was much embarrass'd, never having met
In all her life with aught save prayers and praise:
And as she also risk'd her life to get Him whom she meant to tutor in love's ways
Into a comfortable tete-a-tete,
To lose the hour would make her quite a martyr,
And they had wasted now almost a quarter.

CXIII.

I also would suggest the fitting time,
To gentlemen in any such case like,
That is to say—in a meridian clime;
With us there is more law given to the case,
But here a small delay forms a great crime:
So recollect that the extremest grace
Is just two minutes for your declaration—
A moment more would hurt your reputation.

CXIV.

Juan's was good; and might have been still better
But he had got Haidee into his head:
However strange, he could not yet forget her,
Which made him seem exceedingly ill-bred.
Gulbeyaz, who look'd on him as her debtor
For having had him to the palace led,
Began to blush up to the eyes, and then
Grow deadly pale, and then blush back again.

CXV.

At length, in an imperial way, she said
Her hand on his, and bending on his eyes,
Which needed not an empire to persuade,
Look'd into his for love, where none replies:
Her brow grew black, but she would not upbraid,
That being the last thing a proud woman tries.
She rose, and, pausing one chaste moment, threw Herself upon his breast, and there she grew.

CXVI.

This was an awkward test, as Juan found,
But he was steel'd by sorrow, wrath, and pride;
With gentle force her white arms he unwound,
And seated her all drooping by his side.
Then rising haughtily he glanced around,
And looking coldly in her face, he cried,
"The prison'd eagle will not pair, nor I
Serve a sultana's sensual phantasy.

CXVII.

"Thou ask'st if I can love? be this the proof
How much I have loved—that I love not thee"
In this vile garb, the distaff, web, andwoof,
Were fitter for me: love is for the free!
I am not dazzled by this splendid roof;
Whate'er thy power, and great it seems to be—
Heads bow, knees bend, eyes watch around a trone
And hands obey—our hearts are still our own.

CXVIII.

This was a truth to us extremely trite,
Not so to her who ne'er had heard such things;
She deem'd her least command must yield delight,
Earth being only made for queens and kings.
If hearts lay on the left side or the right
She hardly knew, to such perfection brings Legitimacy its born votaries, when
Aware of their due royal rights o'er men.
CXXIX.

Besides, as has been said, she was so fair
As even in a much humbler lot had made
A kingdom or confusion any where;
And also, as may be presumed, she laid
Some stress upon those charms which seldom are
By the possessors thrown into the shade;—
She thought hers gave a double "right divine,"
And half of that opinion's also mine.

CXXX.

Remember, or (if you cannot) imagine,
Ye! who have kept your chastity when young,
While some more desperate dowager has been waging
Love with you, and been in the dog-days stung
By your refusal, recollect her raging!
Or recollect all that was said or sung
On such a subject: then suppose the face
Of a young downright beauty in the case.

CXXXI.

Suppose,—but you already have supposed,
The spouse of Potiphar, the Lady Booby.
Phadra, and all which story has disclosed
Of good examples; pity that so few by Poets and private tutores are exposed,
To educate—ye youth of Europe—you by!
But when you have supposed the few we know,
You can't suppose Gulbeyaz' angry brow.

CXXXII.

A tigress robb'd of young, a lioness,
Or any interesting beast of prey,
Are similes at hand for the distress
Of ladies, who can not have their own way;
But though my turn will not be served with less,
These don't express one half what I should say:
For what is stealing young ones, few or many,
To cutting short their hopes of having any?

CXXXIII.

The love of offspring's nature's general law,
From tigresses and cubs to ducks and ducklings;
There's nothing whets the beak, orarms the claw,
Like an invasion on their babies and sucklings;
And all who have seen a human nursery, saw
How mothers love their children's squalls and chucklings;
This strong extreme effect (to tire no longer
Your patience) shows the cause must still be stronger.

CXXXIV.

If I said fire flash'd from Gulbeyaz' eyes,
'Twere nothing—for her eyes flash'd always fire;
Or said her cheeks assumed the deepest dyes,
I should but bring disgrace upon the dyer,
So supernatural was her passion's rise;
For ne'er till now she knew a cheek'd desire:
Even ye who know what a check'd woman is,
(Enough, God knows!) would much fall short of this.

CXXXV.

Her rage was but a minute's, and 'twas well—
A moment's more had slain her; but the while
It lasted 'twas like a short glimpse of hell:
Nought's more sublime than energetic bile,
Though horrible to see yet grand to tell,
Like ocean warring 'gainst a rocky isle;
And the deep passions flashing through her form
Made her a beautiful crucified storm.

CXXXVI.

A vulgar tempest twere to a typhoon
To match a common fury with her rage,
And yet she did not want to reach the moon,
Like moderate Hotspur on the immortal page;
Her anger pitch'd into a lower tune,
Perhaps the fault of her soft sex and age—
Her wish was but to "kill, kill, kill," like Lear's,
And then her thirst of blood was quench'd in tears.

CXXXVII.

A storm it raged, and like the storm it pass'd,
Pass'd without words—in fact she could not speak
And then her sex's shame broke in at last,
A sentiment till then in her but weak,
But now it flow'd in natural and fast,
As water through an unexpected leak,
For she felt humbled—and humiliation
Is sometimes good for people in her station.

CXXXVIII.

It teaches them that they are flesh and blood,
It also gently hints to them that others,
Although of clay, are yet not quite of mud;
That urns and pipkins are but fragile brothers,
And works of the same pottery, bad or good,
Though not all born of the same sires and mothers
It teaches—Heaven knows only what it teaches,
But sometimes it may mend, and often reaches.

CXXXIX.

Her first thought was to cut off Juan's head,
Her second, to cut only his—acquaintance;
Her third, to ask him where he had been bred;
Her fourth, to rally him into repentance;
Her fifth, to call her maids and go to bed;
Her sixth, to stab herself; her seventh, to send
The lash to Baba—but her grand resource
Was to sit down again, and cry of course.

CXLI.

She thought to stab herself, but then she had
The dagger close at hand, which made it awk
For Eastern stays are little made to pad, [ward
So that a peniard pierces if 'tis struck hard:
She thought of killing Juan—but, poor lad!
Though he deserved it well for being so backward
The cutting off his head was not the art
Most likely to attain her aim—his heart.

CXL.

Juan was moved: he had made up his mind
To be impaled, or quarter'd as a dish
For dogs, or to be slain with pangs refined,
Or thrown to lions, or made baits for fish,
And thus heroically stood resign'd,
Rather than sin,—except to his own wish:
But all his great preparatives for dying
Dissolved like snow before a woman crying.

CXLII.

As through his palms Bob Acres' valor oozed,
So Juan's virtue eb'd, I know not how;
And first he wonder'd why he had refused;
And then, if matters could be made up now,
And next his savage virtue he accused,
Just as a friar may accuse his vow,
Or as a dame repents her of her oath,
Which mostly ends in some small breach of bota
So he began to stammer some excuses;
But words are not enough in such a matter,
Although you borrow'd all that e'er the muses
Have sung, or even a Dandy's dandiest chatter,
Or all the figures Castlereagh abuses;
Just as a languid smile began to flatter
His peace was making, but before he ventured
Further, old Baba rather briskly enter'd.

He saw with his own eyes the moon was round
Was also certain that the earth was square,
Because he had journey'd fifty miles, and found
No sign that it was circular any where;
His empire also was without a bound:
'Tis true, a little troubled here and there,
By rebel pachas, and encroaching gazours,
But then they never came to "the Seven Towers.

Except in shape of envoys, who were sent
To lodge there when a war broke out, according To the true law of nations, which ne'er meant
Those soundrels who have never had a sword in
Their dirty diplomatic hands, to vent
Their spleen in making strife, and safely wording
Their lies, yeolep despatches, without risk, or
The singing of a single inky whisker.

His sons were kept in prison till they grew
Of years to fill a bowstring or the throne,
One or the other, but which of the two
Could yet be known unto the Fates alone;
Meantime the education they went through
Was princely, as the proofs have always shown.
So that the heir apparent still was found
No less deserving to be hang'd than crown'd.

His majesty saluted his fourth spouse
With all the ceremonies of his rank,
Who clear'd her sparkling eyes and smooth'd her
As suits a matron who has play'd a prank:
These must seem doubly mindful of their vows,
To save the credit of their breaking bank;
To no men are such cordial greetings given
As those whose wives have made them fit for heaven.

His highness cast around his great black eyes,
And looking, as he always look'd, perceived
Juan among the damsels in disguise,
At which he seem'd no whit surpris'd, nor grieve'd
But just remark'd with air sedate and wise,
While still a fluttering sigh Gulbeyaz heaved
"I see you've bought another girl, 'tis pity
That a mere Christian should be half so pretty.

This compliment, which drew all eyes upon
The new-bought virgin, made her blush and shake
Her comrades, also, thought themselves undone:
Oh, Mahomet! that his majesty should take Such notice of a glazour, while scarce to one
Of them his lips imperial ever spoke!
There was a general whisper, toss, and wriggle,
But etiquette forbade them all to giggle.
CLVII.

The Turks do well to shut—at least, sometimes—
The women up—because, in sad reality,
Their chastity in these unhappy climes
Is not a thing of that astringent quality
Which in the North prevents precocious crimes;
And makes our snow less pure than our morality;
The sun, which yearly melts the polar ice,
Has quite the contrary effect on vice.

CLVIII.

Thus far our chronicle; and now we pause,
Though not for want of matter; but 'tis time,
According to the ancient epic laws,
To slacken sail, and anchor with our rhyme.
Let this fifth canto meet with due applause,
The sixth shall have a touch of the sublime;
Meanwhile, as Homer sometimes sleeps, perhaps You'll pardon to my muse a few short naps.

PREFACE

TO

CANTOS VI. VII. AND VIII.

The details of the siege of Ismail in two of the following cantos (i.e. the 7th and 8th) are taken from a French work, entitled, "Histoire de la Nouvelle Russie," Some of the incidents attributed to Don Juan really occurred, particularly the circumstance of his saving the infant, which was the actual case of the late Duc de Richelieu, then a young volunteer in the Russian service, and afterwards the founder and benefactor of Odessa, where his name and memory can never cease to be regarded with reverence. In the course of these cantos, a stanza or two will be found relative to the late Marquis of Londonderry, but written some time before his decease. Had that person's oligarchy died with him, they would have been suppressed; as it is, I am aware of nothing in the manner of his death or of his life to prevent the free expression of the opinions of all whom his whole existence was consumed in endeavoring to enslave. That he was an amiable man in private life, may or may not be true; but with this the public have nothing to do: and as to lamenting his death, it will be time enough when Ireland has ceased to mourn for his birth. As a minister, I, for one of millions, looked upon him as the most despotic in intention, and the weakest in intellect that ever tyrannized over a country. It is the first time, indeed, since the Normans, that England has been insulted by a minister (at least) who could not speak English, and that Parliament permitted to be dictated to in the language of Mrs. Malaprop.

Of the manner of his death little need be said, except that if a poor radical, such as Waddington or Watson, had cut his throat, he would have been buried in a cross-road, with the usual appurtenances of the stake and mallet. But the minister was an elegant lunatic—a sentimental suicide—he merely cut the "carotid artery" (blessings on their learning!)—and lo! the pageant, and the abbey, and the syllables of colo'r yelled forth" by the news-papers—and the harangue of the coroner in an eulogy, over the bleeding body of the deceased—(an Antony worthy of such a Caesar)—and the nauseous and atrocious cant of a degraded crew of conspirators against all that is sincere or honorable. In his death he was necessarily one of two things by the law—a felon or a madman—and in either case no great subject for panegyric. * In his life he was—what all the world knows, and half of it will feel for years to come, unless his death prove a "moral lesson" to the surviving Sejanit of Europe. It may at least serve as a consolation to the nations that their oppressors are not happy, and in some instances judge so justly of their own actions as to anticipate the sentence of mankind.—Let us hear no more of this man, and let Ireland remove the ashes of her Grattan from the sanctuary of Westminster. Shall the Patriot of Humanity repose by the Werther of Polities!*

With regard to the objections which have been made to an adoration to the already published cantos of this poem, I shall content myself with two quotations from Voltaire:

"La pudeur s'est ensuite des cours, et s'est refugie sur les lèvres."

"Plus les morts sont depauprées, plus les expressions deviennent mesurées; on croit regagner en langage ce qu'on a perdu en vertu."

This is the real fact, as applicable to the degraded and hypocritical mass which levans the present English generation, and is the only answer they deserve. The hackneyed and livished title of blasphemer, which, with radical, liberal, jacobin, reformer, &c., are the changes which the hirelings are daily ringing in the ears of those who will listen—should be welcome to all who recollect on whom it was originally bestowed. Socrates and Jesus Christ were put to death publicly as blasphemers, and so have been and may be many who dare to oppose the most notorious abuses of the name of God and the mind of man. But persecution is not refutation, nor even triumph: the wretched infidel, as he is called, is probably happier in his prison than he was in the state of his assailants. With his opinions I have nothing to do—they may be right or wrong—but he has suffered for them, and that very suffering for conscience' sake will make more proselytes to Deism than the example of heterodox prelates to Christianity, suicide statesmen to oppression, or over-pensioned h Jacobs to the impious alliance which insults the world with the name of "Holy!" I have no wish to trample on the dishonored or the dead; but it would be well if the adherents to the classes from whence some person may spring, should abate a little of the caust which is the crying sin of this double-dealing and false-speaking time of selfish spoilers, and—

* But the love of the land—the laws of humanity judge more greatly; but as the legitimate have always the law in their own mouths, let them save the most of it.

* From the number must be excepted Canning. Canning is a genius, almost a universal one: an orator, a writer, a poet, a statesman; and no man of talent can long pursue the path of his late predecessor, Lord G. If ever man saved his country, Canning can; but will he? I, for one, hope so.

* When Lord Sandwich said "he did not know the difference between orthodoxy and heresy,"—Washington, the bishop, replied, "Orthodoxy my lord, is my costly, and heresy is another man's doxy." A period of the present day has discovered, it seems, a third kind of doxy, which we not greatly social in the eyes of the idiot, but which Boylston only.

* Church of Englandman.
CANTO VI.

I.
"There is a tide in the affairs of men
Which, taken at the flood—_you know the rest;
And most of us have found it, now and then;
At least we think so, though but few have guess'd
The moment, till too late to come again.
But no doubt every thing is for the best—
Of which the surest sign is in the end;
When things are at the worst, they sometimes mend.

II.
There is a tide in the affairs of women [where!]
"Which, taken at the flood, leads—_God knows,
Those navigators must be able seamen
Whose charts lay down its currents to a hair;
Not all the reveries of Jacob Behmen
With its strange whirls and eddies can compare:
Men, with their heads, reflect on this and that—
But women, with their hearts, on heaven knows what.

III.
And yet a headlong, headstrong, downright she,
Young, beautiful, and daring—who would risk
A throne, the world, the universe, to be
Beloved in her own way, and rather whisk
The stars from out the sky, than not be free
As are the billows when the breeze is brisk—
Though such a she's a devil, (if that there be one,) Yet she would make full many a Manichean.

IV.
Thrones, worlds, _et cetera_, are so oft upset
By commonest ambition, that when passion
O'erthrews the same, we readily forget,
Or at the least forgive, the loving rash one.
If Antony be well remember'd yet,
'Tis not his conquests keep his name in fashion;
But Actium, lost for Cleopatra's eyes,
Outbalance all the Caesar's victories.

V.
He died at fifty for a queen of forty;
I wish their years had been fifteen and twenty,
For then wealth, kingdoms, worlds, are but a sport—I Remember when, though I had no great plenty
Of worlds to lose, yet still, to pay my court, I Gave what I had—a heart: as the world went, I Gave what was worth a world: for worlds could never Restore me those pure feelings, gone for ever.

VI.
Twas the boy's "mite," and like the "widow's.
Perhaps be weigh'd hereafter, if not now; [may
But whether such things do or do not weigh,
All who have loved, or love, will still allow Life has nought like it. God is love, they say,
And Love's a God, or was before the brow
Of earth was wrinkled by the sins and tears
Of—but Chronology best knows the years

VII.
We left our hero and third heroine in
A kind of state more awkward than uncommon.
For gentlemen must sometimes risk their skin
For that sad tempter, a forbidden woman:
Sultans too much abhor this sort of sin,
And don't agree at all with the wise Roman
Heroic, stoic Cato, the sententious,
Who lent his lady to his friend Hortensius.

VIII.
I know Gulbeyaz was extremely wrong;
I own it, I deplore it, I condemn it;
But I detest all fiction, even in song,
And so must tell the truth, however ye blame it
Her reason being weak, her passions strong,
She thought that her lord's heart (even could she)
Was scarce enough; for he had fifty-nine (claim it)
Years, and a fifteen-hundredth concubine.

IX.
I am not, like Cassio, "an arithmetician,"
But by "the bookish theorie" it appears,
If 'tis summ'd up with feminine precision,
That, adding to the account his highness' years
The fair Sultana er'd from inanition
For, were the Sultan just to all his dears,
She could but claim the fifteen-hundredth part
Of what should be monoply—the heart.

X.
It is observed that ladies are litigious
Upon all legal objects of possession,
And not the least so when they are religious, [sic].
Which doubles what they think of the transgress
With suits and prosecutions they besiege us,
As the tribunal shows through many a session,
When they suspect that any one goes shares
In that to which the law makes them sole heirs.

XI.
Now, if this holds good in a Christian land,
The heathens also, though with lesser latitude,
Are apt to carry things with a high hand,
And take what kings call "an imposing attitude;"
And for their rights connubial make a stand, [tude
When their liege husbands treat them with ingrati
And as four wives must have quadruple claims,
The Tigris hath its jealousies like Thames.

XII.
Gulbeyaz was the fourth, and (as I said)
The favorite; but what's his favor among four?
Polygamy may well be held in dread,
Not only as a sin, but as a _bore_:
Most wise men, with one moderate woman wed,
Will scarcely find philosophy for more;
And all (except Mahometans) forbear
To make the nuptial couch a "Bed of Ware."

XIII.
His highness, the sublimest of mankind,—
So styled according to the usual forms
Of every monarch, till they are consigned
To those sad hungry jacobins, the worms,
Who on the very loftiest kings have dined,—
His highness gazed upon Gulbeyaz' charms,
Expecting all the welcome of a lover,
(A "Highland welcome" all the wide world over
DON JUAN.

XIV.
Now here we should distinguish: for how'er
Kisses, sweet words, embraces, and all that,
May look like what is—not here nor there:
They are put on as easily as a hat,
Or rather bonnet, which the fair sex wear,
Trimm'd either heads or hearts to decorate,
Which form an ornament, but no more part
Of heads, than their caresses of the heart.

XV.
A slight blush, a soft tremor, a calm kind
Of gentle feminine delight, and shown
More in the eyelids than the eyes, resign'd
Rather to hide what pleaseth most unknown,
Are the best tokens (to a modest mind)
Of love, when scated on his loveliest throne,
A sincere woman's breast,—for over warm
Or over cold, annihilates the charm.

XVI.
For over warmth, if false, is worse than truth;
If true, 'tis no great lease of its own fire;
For no one, save in very early youth,
Would like (I think) to trust all to desire,
Which is but a precarious bond, in sooth,
And apt to be transferr'd to the first buyer
At a sad discount: while your over chilly
Women, on 'tother hand, seem somewhat silly.

XVII.
That is, we cannot pardon their bad taste,
For so it seems to lovers swift or slow,
Who fain would have a mutual flame confess'd,
And see a sentimental passion glow,
Even were St. Francis' paramour their guest,
In his monastic concubine of snow;
In short, the maxim for the armorous tribe is Horatian, "Medio tu tutissimus ibis."

XVIII.
The "tu" is too much,—but let it stand—the verse
Requires it, that's to say, the English rhyme,
And not the pink of old Hexameters;
But, after all, there's neither tune nor time
In the last line, which cannot well be worse,
And was thrust in to close the octave's chime.
I own no prosody can ever rate it
As a rule, but Truth may, if you translate it.

XIX.
If fair Gulbeyaz overdid her part,
I know not—it succeeded, and success
As much in most things, not less in the heart
Than other articles of female dress,
Self-love in man, too, beats all female art;
They lie, we lie, all lie, but love no less:
And no one virtue yet, except starvation,
Could stop that worst of vices—propagation.

XX.
We leave this royal couple to repose;
A bed is not a throne, and they may sleep,
What'ere their dreams be, if of joys or woes:
Yet disappointed joys are woes as deep
As any man's clay mixture undergoes.
Our least of sorrows are such as we weep;
Tis the vile daily drp on drop which wears
The soul out (like the stone) with petty cares.

XXI.
A scolding wife, a sullen son, a bill
To pay, unpaid, protested, or discounted
At a per-centage; a child cross, dog ill,
A favorite horse fallen lame just as he's mounted
A bad old woman making a worse will,
Which leaves you minus of the cash you count;
As certain,—these are paltry things, and yet
I've rarely seen the man they did not fret.

XXII.
I'm a philosopher: confound them all!
Bills, beasts, and men, and—no I not woman!
With one good hearty curse I vent my gall,
And then my stocicism leaves nought behind
Which it can either pain or evil call,
And I can give my whole soul up to mind;
Though what is soul or mind, their birth or growth,
Is more than I know—the deuce take them both.

XXIII.
So now all things are d—n'd, one feels at ease,
As after reading Athanasius' curse,
Which doth your true believer so much please:
I doubt if any now could make it worse
O'er his worst enemy when at his knees,
'Tis so sententious, positive, and terse,
And decorates the book of Common Prayer
As doth a rainbow the just clearing air.

XXIV.
Gulbeyaz and her lord were sleeping, or
At least one of them—Oh the heavy night
When wicked wives who love some bachelor
Lie down in dudgeon to sigh for the light
Of the gray morning, and look vainly for Its twinkle through the lattice dusky quite,
To toss, to tumble, doze, revive and quake,
Lest their too lawful bedfellow should wake.

XXV.
These are beneath the canopy of heaven.
Also beneath the canopy of beds,
Four-posted and silk-curtained, which are given
For rich men and their brides to lay their heads
Upon, in sheets white as what bards call "driven Snow."
Well! 'tis all hap-hazard when one weds
Gulbeyaz was an empress, but had been
Perhaps as wretched if a peasant's queen.

XXVI.
Don Juan, in his feminine disguise,
With all the damsels in their long array,
Had bow'd themselves before the imperial eye,
And, at the usual signal, ta'en their way
Back to their chambers, those long galleries
In the seraglio, where the ladies say
Their delicate limbs; a thousand bosoms there
Beating for love, as the caged bird's for air.

XXVII.
I love the sex, and sometimes would reverse
The tyrant's wish "that mankind only had
One neck, which he with one fell stroke might pierce;"
My wish is quite as wide, but not so bad,
And much more tender on the whole than fierce.
It being (not now, but only while a lad)
That womankind had but one rosy mouth,
To kiss them all at once from North to South.
BYRON'S WORKS.

XXVIII.

Oh vileable Briareus! with thy hands
And heads, if thou hadst all things multiplied
In such proportion!—But my muse withstands
The giant thought of being a Titan's bride,
Or travelling in Patagonian lands;
So let us back to Lilliput, and guide
Our hero through the labyrinth of love
In which we left him several lines above.

XXIX.

He went forth with the lovely Odalisques,
At the given signal join'd to their array;
And though he certainly ran many risks,
Yet he could not at times keep by the way.
(Although the consequences of such frikks
Are worse than the worst damages men pay
In moral England, where the thing's a tax,)...
XLII.

A kind of sleepy Venus seem’d Duddi,
Yet very fit to “murder sleep” in those
Who gazed upon her cheek’s transcendent hue,
Her Attic forehead, and her Phidian nose;
Few angles were there in her form, “tis true,
Thinner she might have been, and yet scarce lose;
Yet, after all, ’twould puzzle to say where
It would not spoil some separate charm to pare.

XLIII.

She was not violently lively, but
Stole on your spirit like a May-day breaking;
Her eyes were not too sparkling, yet, half shut,
They put beholders in a tender taking;
She look’d (this simile’s quite new) just cut
From marble, like Pygmalion’s statue waking,
The mortal and the marble still at strife,
And timidly expanding into life.

XLIV.

Lolah demanded the new damsel’s name—
“Juanna.”—Well, a pretty name enough.
Katinka ask’d her also whence she came—
“From Spain.”—“But where is Spain?”—“Don’t ask such stuff.
Nor show your Georgian ignorance—for shame!”
Said Lolah, with an accent rather rough,
To poor Katinka: “Spain’s an island near Morocco, betwixt Egypt and Tangier.”

XLV.

Duddi said nothing, but sat down beside
Juanna, playing with her veil or hair;
And looking at her steadfastly, she sigh’d,
As if she pitied her for being there,
A pretty stranger, without friend or guide,
And all abash’d, too, at the general stare
Which welcomes hapless strangers in all places,
With kind remarks upon their mien and faces.

XLVI.

But here the Mother of the Maids drew near,
With, “Ladies, it is time to go to rest.
I’m puzzled what to do with you, my dears,”
She added, to Juanna, their new guest:
“Your coming has been unexpected here,
And every couch is occupied; you had best
Partake of mine; but by to-morrow early
We will have all things settled for you fairly.”

XLVII.

Here Lolah interposed—“Mamma, you know
You don’t sleep soundly, and I cannot bear
That any body should disturb you; so
I’ll take Juanna; we’re a slenderer pair
Than you would make the half of;—don’t say no;
And I of your young charge will take due care .
But here Katinka interfered, and said,
‘She also had compassion and a bed.’

XLVIII.

‘Besides, I hate to sleep alone,’ quoth she.
The matron frown’d: “Why so?”—“For fear of Replied Katinka: “I am sure I see [ghosts,]
A phantom upon each of the four posts;
And then I have the worst dreams that can be, [ghosts.]”
Of Guebres, Gläours, and Ginns, and Goûls in
The dame repli’d, “Between your dreams and you,
I fear Juanna’s dreams would be but few.

XLIX.

“You, Lolah, must continue still: lie
Alone, for reasons which don’t matter; you
The same, Katinka, until by and by;
And I shall place Juanna with Duddi,
Who’s quiet, inoffensive, silent, shy,
And will not toss and chatter the night through.

What say you, child?” Duddi said nothing, as
Her talents were of the more silent class;

L.

But she rose up and kiss’d the matron’s brow
Between the eyes, and Lolah on both cheeks,
Katinka, too, and with a gentle bow,
(Certainties are neither used by Turks nor Greeks,
She took Juanna by the hand to show
Their place of rest, and left to both their piqûes.
The others pouting at the matron’s preference
Of Duddi, though they held their tongues from decency.

LI.

It was a spacious chamber, (Oda is
The Turkish title,) and ranged round the wall
Were couches, toilets—and much more than this
I might describe, as I have seen it all.
But it sufficed—little was amiss;
’Twas on the whole a nobly furnish’d hall,
With all things ladies want, save one or two,
And even those were nearer than they knew.

LII.

Duddi, as has been said, was a sweet creature,
Not very dashing, but extremely winning,
With the most regulated charms of feature,
Which painters cannot catch like faces sinning
Against proportion—the wild strokes of nature
Which they hit off at once in the beginning,
Full of expression, right or wrong, that strike,
And, pleasing or unpleasing, still are like.

LIII.

But she was a soft landscape of mild earth,
Where all was harmony, and calm, and quiet,
Luxuriant, budding; cheerful without mirth,
Which, if not happiness, is much more nigh it
Than are your mighty passions, and so forth, [it.
Which some call “the sublime;” I wish they’d try
I’ve seen your stormy seas and stormy women,
And pity lovers rather more than seamen.

LIV.

But she was pensive more than melancholy,
And serious more than pensive, and serene
It may be more than either—not unholy [been
Her thoughts, at least till now, appear to have
The strangest thing was, beauteous, she was wholly Unconscious; albeit turn’d of quick seventeen.
That she was fair, or dark, or short, or tall,
She never thought about herself at all.

LV.

And therefore was she kind and gentle as
The Age of Gold (when gold was yet unknown
By which its nomenclature came to pass;
Thus must appropriately has been shown
Lucas a non lucendo, “not what seen,
But what was not;” a sort of style that’s grown
Extremely common in this age, whose metal
The devil may decompose, but never settle:
LVI.
I think it may be of "Corinthian Brass;"
Which was a mixture of all metals, but
The brass uppermost.) Kind reader! pass
This long parenthesis: I could not shut
It sooner for the soul of me, and class
[put My faults even with your own! which meaneth,
A kind construction upon them and me:
But that you won't—then don't—I'm not less free.

LVII.
'Tis time we should return to plain narration,
And thus my narrative proceeds,—Dudu,
With every kindness sort of ostentation,
Show'd Juan, or Juanna, through and through
This labyrinth of females, and each station [few:
Described—what's strange, in words extremely
I have but one simile, and that's a blunder,
For worldless women, which is silent thunder.

LVIII.
And next she gave her (I say her, because
The gender still was epicene, at least
In outward show, which is a saving clause)
An outline of the customs of the East,
With all their chaste integrity of laws,
By which the more a haram is increased,
The stricter doubtless grow the vestal duties
Of any supernumerary beauties.

LIX.
And then she gave Juanna a chaste kiss:
Dudu was fond of kissing—which I'm sure
That nobody can ever take amiss,
Because 'tis pleasant, so that it be pure,
And between females means no more than this—
That they have nothing better near, or newer.
"Kiss" rhymes to "bliss" in fact as well as verse—
I wish it never led to something worse.

LX.
In perfect innocence she then unmade
Her toilet, which cost little, for she was
A child of nature, carelessly array'd;—
If fond of a chance ogle at her glass,
"Twas like the fawn which, in the lake display'd,
Beholds her own shy shadowy image pass,
When first she starts, and then returns to peep,
Admiring this new native of the deep.

LXI.
And one by one her articles of dress
Were laid aside; but not before she offer'd
Her aid to fair Juanna, whose excess
Of modesty declined the assistance proffer'd—
Which pass'd well off—as she could do no less:
Though by this politeness she rather suffer'd,
Pricking her fingers with those cursed pins,
Which surely were intended for our sins,—

LXII.
Making a woman like a porcupine,
Not to be rashly touch'd. But still more dread,
Oh ye! whose fate it is, as once 'twas mine,
In early youth to turn a lady's maid;—
I did my very boyish best to shine
In tricking her out for a masquerade:
The pins were placed sufficiently, but not
Stuck all exactly in the proper spot.

LXIII.
But these are foolish things to all the wise—
And I love Wisdom more than she loves me
My tendency is to philosophize.
On most things, from a tyrant to a tree;
But still the spouseless virgin, Knowledge, dies.
What are we? and whence came we? what shall be
Our ultimate existence? what's our present?
Are questions answerless, and yet incessant.

LXIV.
There was deep silence in the chamber: dim
And distant from each other burn'd the lights,
And shrank hot'st'd o'er each lovely limb
Of the fair occupants: if there be sprites, [trim,
They should have walk'd there in their spritelest
By way of change from their sepulchral sites,
And shown themselves as ghosts of better taste,
Than haunting some old ruin or wild waste

LXV.
Many and beautiful lay those around,
Like flowers of different hue, and clime, and root
In some exotic garden sometimes found,
With cost, and care, and warmth induced to shoot
One with her auburn tresses lightly bound,
And fair brows gently drooping, as the fruit
Nods from the tree, was slumbering with soft breath,
And lips apart, which show'd the pears beneath.

LXVI.
One, with her flush'd cheek laid on her white arm,
And raven ringlets gather'd in dark crowd
Above her brow, lay dreaming soft and warm; [cloud
And, smiling through her dream, as through a
The moon breaks, half unveil'd each further charm,
As, slightly stirring in her snowy shroud,
Her beauties seized the unconscious hour of night
All bashfully to struggle into light.

LXVII.
This is no bull, although it sounds so; for [said.
'Twas night, but there were lamps, as hath been
A third's all pallid aspect offer'd more
The traits of sleeping sorrow, and betray'd [shore
Through the heaved breast the dream of some far
Behold'd and deplored; while slowly stray'd
(As night dew, on the cypress glittering, tinges
The black bough) tear-drops through her eyes' dark

LXVIII.
A fourth, as marble, statue-like and still,
Lay in a breathless, hush'd, and stony sleep;
White, cold, and pure, as looks a frozen rill,
Or the snow minaret on an Alpine steep,
Or Lot's wife done in salt,—or what you will;—
My similes are gather'd in a heap,
So pick and choose—perhaps you'll be content
With a carved lady on a monument.

LXIX.
And lo! a fifth appears:—and what is she?
A lady of "a certain age," which means
Certainly aged—what her years might be
I know not, never counting past their teens;
But there she slept, not quite so fair to see,
As ere that awful period intervened,
Which lays both men and women on the shelf
To meditate upon their sins and self.
DON JUAN.

LXX.
But all this time how slept, or dream d, Dud d ?
With strict inquiry I could ne'er discover,
And scorn to add a syllable untrue;
 But ere the middle watch was hardly over,
Just when the fading lamps wan'd dim and blue,
And phantoms hover'd, or might seem to hover,
To those who like their company, about
The apartment, on a sudden she scream'd out;

LXXI.
And that so loudly, that upstart all
The Oda, in a general commotion:
Matron and maids, and those whom you may call
Neither, came crowding like the waves of ocean,
One on the other, throughout the whole ball, [tion,
All trembling, wondering, without the least no-
More than I have myself, of what could make
The calm Dud d so turbulently wake.

LXXII.
But wide awake she was, and round her bed,
With floating draperies and with flying hair,
With eager eyes, and light but hurried tread,
And bosoms, arms, and ankles glancing bare,
And bright as any meteor ever bred
By the North Pole,—they sought her cause of care,
For she seem'd agitated, flush'd, and frighten'd,
Her eye dilated and her color heighten'd.

LXXIII.
But what is strange—and a strong proof how great
A blessing is sound sleep, Juanna lay
As fast as ever husband by his flame
In holy matrimonio smores away.
Not all the clamor broke her happy state
Of slumber, ere they shook her,—so they say,
At least,—and then she too unclosed her eyes,
And yawn'd a good deal with discreet surprise.

LXXIV.
And now commenced a strict investigation,
Which, as all spoke at once, and more than once,
Conjecturing, wondering, asking a narration,
Alike might puzzle either wit or dunce
To answer in a very clear oration.
Dud d had never pass'd for wanting sense,
But being "no orator, as Brutus is,"
Could not at first expound what was amiss.

LXXV.
At length she said, that, in a slumber sound,
She dream'd a dream of walking in a wood—
A "wood obscure," like that where Dante found Himself in at the age when all grow good;
Life's half-way house, where dames with virtue crown'd;
Run much less risk of lovers turning rude;—
And that this wood was full of pleasant fruits,
And trees of goodly growth and spreading roots;

LXXVI.
And in the midst a golden apple grew,—
A most prodigious pippin,—but it hung
Rather too high and distant; that she threw
Her glances on it, and then, longing, flung Stones, and whatever she could pick up, to Bring down the fruit, which still perversely clung
To its own bough, and dangled yet in sight,
But was at a most provoking height—

LXXVII.
That on a sudden, when she least had hope,
It fell down of its own accord, before
Her feet; that her first movement was to stop
And pick it up, and bite it to the core;
That just as her young lip began to ope
Upon the golden fruit the vision bore,
A bee flew out and stung her to the heart,
And so,—she awoke with a great scream and start

LXXVIII.
All this she told with some confusion and Dismay, the usual consequence of dreams
Of the unpleasant kind, with none at hand
To expound their vain and visionary gleams
I've known some odd ones which seem'd really Prophetically, or that which one deems [plann'd
"A strange coincidence," to use a phrase
By which such things are settled now-a-days.

LXXIX.
The damsels, who had thoughts of some great harm
Began, as is the consequence of fear,
To scold a little at the false alarm
That broke for nothing on their sleeping ear
The matron, too, was wroth to leave her warm
Bed for the dream she had been obliged to hear
And chafed at poor Dud d, who only sigh'd,
And said that she was sorry she had cried

LXXX.
"I've heard of stories of a cock and bull;
But visions of an apple and a bee,
To take us from our natural rest, and pull
The whole Oda from their beds at half-past three
Would make us think the moon is at its full.
You surely are unwell, child! we must see
To-morrow, what his highness's physician
Will say to this hysterical of a vision.

LXXXI.
"And poor Juanna, too! the child's first night
Within these walls, to be broke in upon
With such a clamor—I had thought it right
That the young stranger should not lie alone,
And, as the quietest of all, she might
With you, Dud d, a good night's rest have known
But now I must transfer her to the charge
Of Lolah,—though her couch is not so large."

LXXXII.
Lolah's eyes sparkled at the proposition;
But poor Dud d, with large drops in her own
Resulting from the scolding or the vision,
Implied that present pardon might be shown
For this first fault, and that on no condition
(Shed she added in a soft and piteous tone)
Juanna should be taken from her, and
Her future dreams should all be kept in hand.

LXXXIII.
She promised never more to have a dream,
At least to dream so loudly as just now;
She wonder'd at herself how she could scream—
"Twas foolish, nervous, as she must allow,
A fond hallucination, and a theme
For laughter—but she felt her spirits low,
And begg'd they would excuse her; she'd get over
This weakness in a few hours, and recover
LXXXIV.
And here Juanna kindly interposed,
And said she felt herself extremely well
Where she then was, as her sound sleep disclosed,
When all around rang like a tocsin bell:
She did not find herself the least disposed
To quit her gentle partner, and to dwell
Apart from one who had no sin to show,
Save that of dreaming once "mal-o-propos."

LXXXV.
As thus Juanna spoke, Dudu turn’d round,
And hid her face within Juanna’s breast;
Her neck alone was seen, but that was found
The color of a budding rose’s crest.
I can’t tell why she blush’d, nor can expound
The mystery of this rupture of their rest:
All that I know is, that the facts I state
Are true as truth has ever been of late.

LXXXVI.
And so good night to them,—or, if you will,
Good morrow—for the cock had crowed, and light
Began to clothe each Asiatic hill,
And the mosque crescent struggled into sight
Of the long caravan, which in the chill
Of dewy dawn wound slowly round each height
That stretches to the stony belt which girds
Asia, where Kaff looks down upon the Kurds.

LXXXVII.
With the first ray, or rather gray of morn,
Gulbeyaz rose from restlessness; and pale
As Passion rises, with its bosom worn,
Array’d herself with mantle, gem, and veil.
The nightingale that sings with the deep thorn,
Which fable places in her breast of wail,
Is lighter of heart and voice than those Whose headlong passions form their proper woes.

LXXXVIII.
And that’s the moral of this composition,
If people would but see its real drift:—
But that they will not do without suspicion,
Because all gentle readers have the gift
Of closing ‘gainst the light their orbs of vision;
While gentle writers also love to lift
Their voices ‘gainst each other, which is natural—
The numbers are too great for them to flatter all.

LXXXIX.
Rose the sultana from a bed of splendor,—
Softer than the soft Sybarite’s, who cried
Aloud, because his feelings were too tender
To brook a ruffled rose-leaf by his side,—
So beautiful that art could little mend her,
Though pale with conflicts between love and pride:
So agitated was she with her error,
She did not even look into the mirror.

XC.
Also arose, about the self-same time,
Perhaps a little later, her great lord,
Master of thirty kingdoms so sublime,
And of a wife by whom he was abhor’d;
A thing of much less import in that clime—
At least to those of incomes which afford
The filling up their whole connubial cargo—
Then where two wives are under an embargo.

XCI.
He did not think much on the matter, nor
Indeed on any other: as a man,
He liked to have a handsome paramour
At hand, as one may like to have a fan,
And therefore of Circassians had good store,
As an amusement after the Divan;
Though an unusual fit of love, or duty,
Had made him lately bask in his bride’s beauty

XCII.
And now he rose: and after due ablutions,
Exacted by the customs of the East,
And prayers, and other pious evolutions,
He drank six cups of coffee at the least,
And then withdrew to hear about the Russians,
Whose victories had recently increased,
In Catharine’s reign, whom glory still adores
As greatest of all sovereigns and—

XCIII.
But oh, thou grand legitimate Alexander!
Her son’s son,—let not this last phrase offend
Thine ear, if it should reach,—and now rhymes wan:
Almost as far as Petersburg, and lend
A dreadful impulse to each loud meander
Of murmuring Liberty’s wide waves, which blend
Their roar even with the Baltic’s,—so you be
Your father’s son, ’tis quite enough for me.

XCV.
To call men love-begotten, or proclaim
Their mothers as the antipodes of Timon,
That hater of man, would be a shame,
A libel, or what’er you please to rhyme on:
But people’s ancestors are history’s game;
And if one lady’s slip could leave a crime on
All generations, I should like to know
What pedigree the best would have to show?

XCVI.
Had Catherine and the sultan understood
Their own true interest, which kings rarely know,
Until ’tis taught by lessons rather rude,
There was a way to end their strife, although Perhaps precarious, had they but thought good,
Without the aid of prince or plenipo:
She to dismiss her guards, and he his harem,
And for their other matters, meet and share ‘em.

XCVII.
But as it was, his highness had to hold
His daily council upon ways and means,
How to encounter with this martial scold,
This modern Amazon and queen of queens;
And the perplexity could not be told
Of all the pillars of the state, which leans
Sometimes a little heavy on the backs
Of those who cannot lay on a new tax.

Meantime Gulbeyaz, when her king was gone,
Retired into her boudoir, a sweet place
For love or breakfast; private, pleasing, lone,
And rich with all contrivances which grace
Those gay recesses,—many a precious stone
Sparkled along its roof, and many a vase
Of porcelain hold in the fitter’d flowers,
Those captive soothers of a captive’s hours.
XCVIII.

Mother of pearl, and porphry, and marble,
Vied with each other on this costly spot;
And singing birds without were heard to warble;
And the stain’d glass which lighted this fair grot
Varied each ray;—but all descriptions garble
The true effect, and so we had better not
Be too minute; an outline is the best,—
A lively reader’s fancy does the rest.

XCIX.

And here she summon’d Baba, and required
Don Juan at his hands, and information
Of what had pass’d since all the slaves retired,
And whether he had occupied their station;
If matters had been managed as desired,
And his disguise with due consideration
Kept up; and, above all, the where and how He had pass’d the night, was what she wish’d to know.

C.

Baba, with some embarrassment, replied
To this long catechism of questions, ask’d
More easily than answer’d,—that he had tried
His best to obey in what he had been task’d;
But there seem’d something that he wish’d to hide;
Which hesitation more betray’d than mask’d;
He scratch’d his ear, the infallible resource
To which embarrass’d people have recourse.

Cl.

Gulbeyaz was no model of true patience,
Nor much disposed to wait in word or deed;
She liked quick answers in all conversations;
And when she saw him stumbling like a steed
In his replies, she puzzled him for fresh ones;
And as his speech grew still more broken-kneed,
Her cheek began to flush, her eyes to sparkle,
And her proud brow’s blue veins to swell and darken.

CII.

When Baba saw these symptoms, which he knew
To bode him no great good, he deprecat’d
Her anger, and beseech’d she’d hear him through—
He could not help the thing which he related:
Then out it came at length, that to Dudu
Juan was given in charge, as hath been stated;
But not by Baba’s fault, he said, and swore on
The holy camel’s hump, besides the Koran.

CIII.

The chief dame of the Oda, upon whom
The discipline of the whole haram bore,
As soon as they reenter’d their own room,
For Baba’s function stopp’d short at the door,
Had settled all: nor could he then presume
(The aforesaid Baba) just then to do more,
Without exciting such suspicion as Might make the matter still worse than it was.

CIV.

He hoped, indeed he thought, he could be sure
Juan had not betray’d himself; in fact,
Twas certain that his conduct had been pure,
Because a foolish or imprudent act
Would not alone have made him insecure,
But ended in his being found out and sack’d,
And thrown into the sea.—Thus Baba spoke
Of all save Dudu’s dream, which was no joke.

CV.

This he discreetly kept in the back ground,
And talk’d away—and might have talk’d till now
For any further answer that he found,
So deep an anguish wrung Gulbeyaz’ brow;
Her cheek turn’d ashes, ears rung, brain whirl’d
As if she had received a sudden blow, [round,
And the heart’s dew of pain sprang fast and chilly
O’er her fair front, like morning’s on a lily.

CVI.

Although she was not of the fainting sort,
Baba thought she would faint, but there he err’d—
It was but a convulsion, which, though short,
Can never be described; we all have heard,
And some of us have felt thus “all amort,”
When things beyond the common have occur’d;
Gulbeyaz proved in that brief agony
What she could ne’er express—then how should I?

CVII.

She stood a moment, as a Pythoness
Stands on her tripod, agonized, and full
Of inspiration gather’d from delicious
When all the heart-strings like wild horses pull
The heart asunder;—then, as more or less
Their speed abated, or their strength grew dull,
She sunk down on her seat by slow degrees,
And bow’d her throbbing head o’er trembling knees

CVIII.

Her face declined, and was unseen; her hair
Fell in long tresses like the weeping willow
Sweeping the marble underneath her chair,
Or rather soft, (for it was all pillow,—
A low, soft ottoman,) and black despair
Stirr’d up and down her bosom like a billow,
Which rushes to some shore, whose shingles check
Its farther course, but must receive its wreck.

CIX.

Her head hung down, and her long hair in stooping
Conceal’d her features better than a veil;
And one hand o’er the ottoman lay drooping.
White, waxen, and as alabaster pale;
Would that I were a painter! to be grouping
All that a poet drags into detail!
Oh that my words were colors! but their tints
May serve, perhaps, as outlines or slight hints.

CX.

Baba, who knew by experience when to talk
And when to hold his tongue, now held it till
This passion might blow o’er, nor dared to balk
Gulbeyaz’ taciturn or speaking will.
At length she rose up, and began to walk
Slowly along the room, but silent still,
And her brow clear’d, but not her troubled eye—
The wind was down, but still the sea ran high.

CXI.

She stopp’d, and raised her head to speak—hesitated
And then moved on again with rapid pace;
Then slacken’d it, which is the march most caused
By deep emotion— you may sometimes trace
A feeling in each footstep, as disclosed
By Sallust in his Catiline, who, chased
By all the demons of all passions, show’d
Their work even by the way in which he trode
BYRON'S WORKS.

CXII.
Gulbeyaz stopp'd and beckon'd Baba:—"Slave:
Bring the two slaves!" she said, in a low tone,
But one which Baba did not like to brave,
And yet he shudder'd, and seem'd rather prone
To prove reluctant, and begg'd leave to crave
(Though he well knew the meaning) to be shown
What slaves her highness wish'd to indicate,
For fear of any error like the late.

CXIII.
"The Georgian and her paramour," replied
The imperial bride—and added, "Let the boat
Be ready by the secret portal's side: [throat,
You know the rest." The words stuck in her
Despite her injured love and fliry pride;
And of this Baba willingly took note,
And begg'd, by every hair of Mahomet's beard,
She would revoke the order he had heard.

CXIV.
'To hear is to obey," he said; "but still,
Sultana, think upon the consequence:
It is not that I shall not all fulfil
Your orders, even in their severest sense;
But such precipitation may end ill,
Even at your own imperative expense;
I do not mean destruction and exposure,
In case of any premature disclosure;

CXV.
"But your own feelings.—Even should all the rest
Be hidden by the rolling waves, which hide
Already many a once love-beaten breast
Deep in the caverns of the deadly tide—
You love this boyish, new seraglio guest,
And—if this violent remedy be tried—
Excuse my freedom, when I here assure you,
That killing him is not the way to cure you."

CXVI.
"What dost thou know of love or feeling?—wretch!
Begone!" she cried, with kindling eyes, "and do
My bidding!" Baba vanish'd; for to stretch
His own remonstrance further, he well knew,
Might end in acting as his own "Jack Ketch;"
And, though he wish'd extremely to get through
This awkward business without harm to others,
He still preferr'd his own neck to another's.

CXVII.
Away he went then upon his commission,
Growling and grumbling in good Turkish phrase
Against all women, of whate'er condition,
Especially sultanas and their ways;
Their obstinacy, pride, and indecision,
Their never knowing their own mind two days,
The trouble that they gave, their immorality,
Which made him daily bless his own neutrality.

CXVIII.
And then he call'd his brethren to his aid,
And sent one on a summons to the pair,
that they must instantly be well array'd,
And, above all, be comb'd even to a hair,
And brought before the empress, who had made
Inquiries after them with kindest care:
At which Dudu look'd strange, and Juan silly;
But go they must at once, and will I—nill I.

CXIX.
And here I leave them at their preparation
For the imperial presence, wherein whether Gulbeyaz show'd them both commiseration
Or got rid of the parties altogether—
Like other angry ladies of her nation,—
Are things the turning of a hair or feather,—
May settle; but far be 't from me to anticipate
In what way feminin caprice may dissipate.

CXX.
I leave them for the present, with good wishes,
Though doubts of their well-doing, to arrange
Another part of history; for the dishes
Of this our banquet we must sometimes change
And, trusting Juan may escape the fishes,
Although his situation now seems strange
And scarce secure, as such digressions are fair,
The muse will take a little touch at warfare.

CANTO VII.

I.
Oh love! Oh glory! what are ye? who art
Around us ever, rarely to alight:
There's not a meteor in the polar sky
Of such transcendent and more fleeting flight,
Chill, and chain'd to cold earth, we lift our sign
Our eyes in search of either lovely light;
A thousand and a thousand colors they Assume, then leave us on our freezing way.

II.
And such as they are, such my present tale is,
A nondescript and ever-varying rhyme,
A versified Aurora Borealis,
Which flashes o'er a waste and icy clime.
When we know what all are, we must bewail us,
But ne'ertheless, I hope it is no crime
To laugh at all things: for I wish to know
What, after all, are all things—but a show?

III.
They accuse me—me—the present writer of
The present poem, of—I know not what,—
A tendency to underrate and scoff
At human power and virtue, and all that;
And this they say in language rather rough;
Good God! I wonder what they would be at?
I say no more than has been said in Dante's
Verse, and by Solomon, and by Cervantes,

IV.
By Swift, by Machiavel, by Rochefoncenc
By Fénelon, by Luther, and by Plato;
By Tillotson, and Wesley, and Rousseau,
Who knew this life was not worth a potato.
'Tis not their fault, nor mine, if this be so—
For my part, I pretend not to be Cato,
Nor even Diogenes.—We live and die,
But which is best you know no more than L
V.
Necrotes said, our only knowledge was, [pleasant
"To know that nothing could be known;" a
Science enough, which levels to an ass
Each man of wisdom, future, past, or present.
Newton, (that proverb of the mind,) alas!
Declared, with all his grand discoveries recent,
That he himself felt only "like a youth
Picking up shells by the great ocean—Truth."

VI.
Ecclesiastes said, that all is vanity—
Most modern preachers say the same, or show it
By their examples of true Christianity;
In short, all know, or very soon may know it;
And in this scene of all-confess'd inanity,
By saint, by sage, by preacher, and by poet,
Must I restrain me, through the fear of strife,
From holding up the nothingness of life?

VII.
Dogs, or men! (for I flatter you in saying
That ye are dogs—your betters far)—ye may Read, or read not, what I am now essaying
To show ye what ye are in every way.
As little as the moon stops for the baying
Of wolves, will the bright Muse withdraw one ray
From out her skies;—then howl your idle wrath!—
While she still silvers o'er your gloomy path.

VIII.
"Fierce loves and faithless wars"—I am not sure
If this be the right reading—'tis no matter;
The fact's about the same; I am secure;—
I sing them both, and am about toatter
A town which did a famous siege endure,
And was beleaguer'd both by land and water
By Suvaroff, or Anglico Suwarrow,
Who loved blood as an alderman loves marrow.

IX.
The fortress is call'd Ismail, and is placed Upon the Danube's left branch and left bank,
With buildings in the ornamental taste,
But still a fortress of the foremost rank,
Or was, at least, unless 'tis since defaced,
Which with your conquerors is a common prank;
It stands some eighty verstas from the high sea,
And measures round of toises thousands three.

X.
Within the extent of this fortification
A borough is comprised, along the height
Upon the left, which, from its loftier station,
Commands the city, and upon its site
A Greek had raised around this elevation
A quantity of palisades upright,
So placed as to impede the fire of those
Who held the place, and to assist the foe's.

XI.
This circumstance may serve to give a notion
Of the high talents of this new Vauban:
But the town ditch below was deep as ocean,
The ramrart higher than you'd wish to hang:
But then there was a great want of precaution,
(Prithee, excuse this engineering slang.)
Nor would advanced, nor cover'd way was there,
To hint at least "Here is no thoroughfare."

XII.
But a stone bastion, with a narrow gorge,
And walls as thick as most skulls born as yet.
Two batteries, cap-a-pie, as our Saint George,
Case-mated one, and 'tether a "barbette,
Of Danube's bank took formidable charge;
While two-and-twenty cannon, dully set,
Rose o'er the town's right side, in bristling tier
Forty feet high, upon a cavalier.

XIII.
But from the river the town's open quite,
Because the Turks could never be persuaded
A Russian vessel e'er would heave in sight;
And such their credo was, till they were invaded
When it grew rather late to set things right.
But as the Danube could not well be waded,
They look'd upon the Museovite flotilla,
And only shouted, "Allah!" and "Dis Millah!"

XIV.
The Russians now were ready to attack;
But oh, ye goddesses of war and glory!
How shall I spell the name of each Cossack
Who were immortal, could one tell their story?
Alas! what to their memory can lack?
Achilles' self was not more grim and gory
Than thousands of this new and polish'd nation,
Whose names want nothing but—pronunciation.

XV.
Still I'll record a few, if but to increase
Our enphony—there was Strongenoff, and Strokó-
Meknop, Serge Lwow, Arseniew of modern Greece,
And Tschitshakoff, and Roguenoff, and Choke-
And others of twelve consonants apiece:—
And more might be found out, if I could poke
Enough into gazettes; but Fame, (capricious trumpeter!) It seems, has got an ear as well as trumpet,

XVI.
And cannot tune those discords of narration,
Which may be names at Moscow, into rhyme,
Yet there were several worth commemoration,
As e'er was virgin of a nuptial chime;
Soft words, too, fitted for the peroration
Of Londonderry, drawing against time,
Ending in "'schakin," "'ouskin," "Iskidy:
"'ouski;"
Of whom we can insert but Rousamouski,

XVII.
Scherematoft and Chrematoft, Koklophiti,
Koklobski, Kourakini, and Mouskin Pouskin
All proper men of weapons, as e'er scoff'd high,
Against a foe, or ran a sabre through skin.
Little cared they for Mahomet or Mutti.
Unless to make their kettle-drums a new skin
Out of their hides, if parchment had grown dear,
And no more handy substitute been near.

XVIII.
Then there were foreigners of much renown,
Of various nations, and all volunteers;
Not fighting for their country or its crown,
But wishing to be one day brigadiers;
Also to have the sacking of a town—
A pleasant thing to young men at their years;
"Mongst them were several Englishmen of pith,
Sixteen call'd Thompson, and nineteen named Smith
XIX.

Jack Thompson and Bill Thompson;—all the rest
Had been call’d "Jemmy," after the great bard;
I don’t know whether they had arms or crest,
But such a godfather’s as good a card.
Three of the Smiths were Peters; but the best
Among them all, hard blows to inflict or ward,
Was he, since so renown’d "in country quarters
At Halifax;" but now he served the Tartars.

XX.

The rest were Jacks and Gills, and Wills and Bills;
But when I’ve added that the elder Jack Smith
Was born in Cumberland among the hills,
And that his father was an honest blacksmith,
I’ve said all I know of a name that fills [smith,]
Three lines of the despatch in taking "Schmack-
A village of Moldaviá’s waste, wherein
He fell, immortal in a bulletin.

XXI.

I wonder (although Mars no doubt’s a god I Praise) if a man’s name in a bulletin
May make up for a bullet In his body?
I hope this little question is no sin,
Because, though I am but a simple noddy,
I think one Shakspeare puts the same thought in
The mouth of some one in his plays so doating,
Which many people pass for wits by quoting.

XXII.

Then there were Frenchmen, gallant, young, and
But I’m too great a patriot to record [gay:
Their Gallic names upon a glorious day;
I’d rather tell ten lies than say a word
Of truth;—such truths are treason: they betray
Their country, and, as traitors are abhor’d,
Who name the French and English, save to show
How peace should make John Bull the Frenchman’s foe.

XXIII.

The Russians, having built two batteries on
An isle near Ismáil, had two ends in view;
The first was to bombard it, and knock down
The public buildings, and the private too,
No matter what poor souls might be undone.
The city’s shape suggested this, ‘tis true;
Form’d like an amphitheatre, each dwelling
Presented a fine mark to throw a shell in.

XXIV.

The second object was to profit by
The moment of the general constellation,
To attack the Turk’s flotillas, which lay nigh,
Extremely tranquil, anchor’d at its station.
But a third motive was as probably
To frighten them into capitulation;
A phantasy which sometimes seizes warriors,
Unless they are game as bull-dogs and fox-terriers;

XXV.

A habit rather blameable, which is
That of despising those we combat with,
Common in many cases, was in this
The cause of killing Tchitchitzkoff and Smith,
One of the valorous “Smiths” whom we shall miss
Out of those nineteen who late rhymed to “pith;”
But ‘tis a name so spread o’er “Sir” and “Madam,”
That one would think the first who bore it “Adam.”

XXVI.

The Russian batteries were incomplete,
Because they were constructed in a hurry.
Thus, the same cause which makes a verse want rest
And throws a cloud o’er Longman and John Mur
When the sale of new books is not so fleet [raw
As they who print them think is necessary,
May like-wise put off for a time what story
Sometimes calls “muder,” and at others “glory.”

XXVII.

Whether it was their engineers’ stupidity,
Their haste, or waste, I neither know nor care,
Or some contractor’s personal cupidity,
Saving his soul by cheating in the ware
Of homicide; but there was no solidity
In the new batteries erected there;
They either miss’d, or they were never miss’d,
And added greatly to the missing list.

XXVIII.

A sad miscalculation about distance
Made all their naval matters incorrect;
Three fire-ships lost their amiable existence,
Before they reach’d a spot to take effect:
The match was lit too soon, and no assistance
Could remedy this lumberly defect;
They blew up in the middle of the river,
While, though ‘twas dawn, the Turks slept fast as ever.

XXIX.

At seven they rose, however, and survey’d
The Russ flotilla getting under way;
"Twas nine, when still advancing undismay’d,
Within a cable’s length their vessels lay
Off Ismáil, and commenced a cannonade,
Which was return’d with interest, I may say,
And by a fire of musquetry and grape,
And shells and shot of every size and shape.

XXX.

For six hours bore they without intermission
The Turkish fires; and, aided by their own [soon
Land batteries, work’d their guns with great preci-
At length they found mere cannonade alone
By no means would produce the town’s submission,
And made a signal to retreat at one.
One bark blew up; a second, near the works
Running aground, was taken by the Turks.

XXXI.

The Moslem, too, had lost both ships and men;
But when they saw the enemy retire,
Their Delhis mann’d some boats, and sail’d again.
And gall’d the Russians with a heavy fire,
And tried to make a landing on the main;
But here the effect fell short of their desire
Count Damas drove them back into the water
Pell-mell, and with a whole gazette of slaughter.

XXXII.

"If,” (says the historian here) "I could report
All that Russians did upon this day,
I think that several volumes would fall short,
And I should still have many things to say;
And so he says no more—but pays his court
To some distinguish’d strangers in that fray,
The Prince de Ligne, and Langeron, and Damas.
Names great as any that the roll of fame has
XXXIII.
This being the case, may show us what fame is:
For out of three "preux Chevaliers," how Many of common readers give a guess
That such existed? (and they may live now
For aught we know.) Renown's all hit or miss;
There's fortune even in fame, we must allow.
"Tis true the Memoirs of the Prince de Ligne
Have half withdrawn from him oblivion's screen.

XXXIV.
But here are men who fought in gallant actions
As gallantly as ever heroes fought,
But buried in the heap of such transactions—
Their names are seldom found, nor often sought.
Thus even good fame may suffer sad contractions,
And is extinguish'd sooner than she ought:
Of all our modern battles, I will bet
You can't repeat nine names from each gazette.

XXXV.
In short, this last attack, though rich in glory,
Show'd that somewhere, somehow, there was a fault;
And Admiral Ribas (known in Russian story)
Most strongly recommended an assault;
In which he was opposed by young and hoary,
Which made a long debate:—but I must halt;
For if I wrote down every warrior's speech,
I doubt few readers e'er would mount the breach.

XXXVI.
There was a man, if that he was a man,—
Not that his manhood could be call'd in question,
For, had he not been Herencles, his span
Had been as short in youth as indigestion
Made his last illness, when, all worn and wan,
He died beneath a tree, as much unbliss'd on
The soil of the green province he had wasted,
As e'er was locust on the land it blasted:—

XXXVII.
This was Potemkin—a great thing in days
When homicide and harlotry made great,
If, stars and titles could entail long praise,
His glory might half equal his estate.
This fellow, being six foot high, could raise
A kind of pantomime proportionate
In the then sovereign of the Russian people,
Who measured men as you would do a steeple.

XXXVIII.
While things were in abeyance, Ribas sent
A courier to the prince, and he succeeded
In ordering the matters after his own bent,
I cannot tell the way in which he pleaded,
But shortly he had cause to entertain.
In the mean time the batteries proceeded,
And fourscore cannon on the Danube's border
Were briskly fired and answer'd in due order.

XXXIX.
But on the thirteenth, when already part
Of the troops were embark'd, the siege to raise,
A courier on the spur inspired new heart
Into all panthers for newspaper praise,
As well as dilettanti in war's art,
By his despatches couched in Pathy phrase,
Anouncing the appointment of that lover of Battles to the command, Field-Marshal Suvaroff.

XL.
The letter of the prince to the same marshal
Was worthy of a Spartan, had the cause
Been one to which a good heart could be partial,
Defence of freedom, country, or of laws;
But as it was mere lust of power to o'er-arch all
With its proud brow, it merits slight applause.
Save for its style, which said, all in a trice,
"You will take Ismail, at whatever price."

XLI.
"Let there be light!" said God, "and there was light!"
"Let there be blood!" says man, and there's a sea.
The flat of this spoil'd child of the night
(For day ne'er saw his merits) could decreed
More evil in an hour, than thirty bright
Summers could renovate, though they should be Lovely as those which ripen'd Eden's fruit—
For war cuts up not only branch but root.

XLII.
Our friends the Turks, who with loud "Allah" now
Began to signalize the Russ retreat,
Were damnsably mistaken; few are slow
In thinking that their enemy is beat,
(Or beaten, if you insist on grammar, though
I never think about it in a heat;) But here I say the Turks were much mistaken.
Who, hating hogs, yet wish'd to save their bacon.

XLIII.
For, on the sixteenth, at full gallop drew
In sight two horsemen, who were deem'd Cossacks
For some time, till they came in nearer view.
They had but little baggage at their backs,
For there were but three shirts between the two,
But on they rode upon two Ukraine hacks,
Till, in approaching, were at length descried
In this plain pair, Suvaroff and his guide.

XLIV.
"Great joy to London now!" says some great fool
When London had a grand illumination,
Which, to that battle conjurer, John Bull,
Is of all dreams the first hallucination;
So that the streets of color'd lamps are full,
That sage (said John) surrenders at discretion
His purse, his soul, his sense, and even his nonsense
To gratify, like a huge moth, this one sense.

XLV.
'Tis strange that he should further "damn his eyes,
For they are damn'd: that once all-famous oath
Is to the devil now no further prize,
Since John has lately lost the use of both.
Debt he calls wealth, and taxes paradise;
And Famine, with her gaunt and bony growth,
Which stares him in the face, he won't examine.
Or swear that Ceres hath begotten Famine.

XLVI.
But to the tale. Great joy unto the camp!
To Russian, Tartar, English, French, Cossass
O'er whom Suvaroff shone like a gas lamp
Presaging a most luminous attack;
Or, like a wisp along the marsh so damp,
Which leads beholders on a boggy walk,
He flitted to and fro, a dancing light.
Which all who saw it follow'd, wrong or right.
XLVII.
But certes matters took a different face;
There was enthusiasm and much applause,
The fleet and camp saluted with great grace,
And all pressed good fortune to their cause.
Within a cannon-shot length of the place
They drew, constructed ladders, repair’d flaws
In former works, made new, prepared fascines,
And all kinds of benevolent machines.

XLVIII.
Tis thus the spirit of a single mind
Makes that of multitudes take one direction,
As roll the waters to the breathing wind,
Or roars the herd beneath the bull’s protection;
Or as a little dog will lead the blind,
Or a bellwether form the flock’s connection
By tinkling sounds, when they go forth to victual:
Such is the sway of your great men o’er little.

XLIX.
The whole camp rung with joy; you would have
That they were going to a marriage-feast, [thought
(This metaphor, I think, holds good as aught, Since there is discord after both at least.)
There was not now a luggage-boy but sought
Danger, and spoil with ardor much increased;
And why? because a little, odd, old man,
Stript to his shirt, was come to lead the van.

LI.
But so it was; and every preparation
Was made with all alacrity; the first
Detachment of three columns took its station,
And waited but for the signal’s voice to burst
Upon the foe; the second’s ordination
Was also in three columns, with a thrist
For glory gaping o’er a sea of slaughter:
The third, in columns two, attack’d by water.

LII.
New batteries were erected; and was hold
A general council, in which unanimity,
That stranger to most councils, here prevail’d,
As sometimes happens in a great extremity;
And every difficulty being dispell’d,
Glory began to dawn with due sublimity,
While Suvaroff, determined to obtain it,
Was teaching his recruits to use the bayonet. 1

LIII.
It is an actual fact, that he, commander-
In-chief, in proper person delign’d to drill
The awkward squad, and could afford to squander
His time, a corporal’s duties to fulfil;
Is as ye’d break a sucking salamander
To swallow flame, and never take it ill;
He shew’d them how to mount a ladder (which Was not like Jacob’s) or to cross a ditch.

LIV.
Most thingswere in this post’re on the eye
Of the assault, and all the camp was in
A stern repose: which you would scarce conceiv’t
Yet men, resolved to dash through thick and thin
Are very silent when they once believe
That all is settled:—there was little din,
For some were thinking of their home and friends,
And others of themselves and latter ends.

LV.
Suvarrow chiefly was on the alert,
Surveying, drilling, ordering, jesting, pondering
For the man was, we safely may assert,
A thing to wonder at beyond most wondering;
Hero, buffoon, half-demon, and half dirt,
Praying, instructing, desolating, blundering;
Now Mars, now Monus; and when bent to storm
A fortress, Harlequin in uniform.

LVI.
The day before the assault, while upon drill—
For this great conqueror play’d the corporal—
Some Cossacks, hovering like hawks round a hill,
Had met a party, towards the twilight’s fall,
One of whom spoke their tongue—or well or ill,
’Twas much that he was understood at all;
But whether from his voice or speech, or manner,
They found that he had fought beneath their banner

LVII.
Whereon, immediately at his request, [ters:
They brought him and his comrades to head-quar-
Their dress was Moslem, but you might have guess’d
That these were merely masquerading Tartars,
And that beneath each Turkish-fashioned vest
Lurk’d Christianity; who sometimes barters
Her inward grace for outward show, and makes
It difficult to shun some strange mistakes.

LVIII.
Suvarrow, who was standing in his shirt,
Before a company of Calmucks, drilling,
Exclaiming, fooling, swearing at the inert,
And lecturing on the noble art of killing,—
Fer, deeming human clay but common dirt,
This great philosopher was thus instilling
His maxims, which, to martial comprehension,
Proved death in battle equal to a pension—

LIX.
Suvarrow, when he saw this company
Of Cossacks and their prey, turn’d round and cast
Upon them his slow brow and piercing eye:—[last “Whence come ye?”—“From Constantinople
Captives just now escaped,” was the reply. [past
“What are ye?”—“What you see us.” Briefly
This dialogue; for he who answer’d knew
To whom he spoke, and made his words but few.

LX.
"Your names?"—"Mine’s Johnson, and my com-
rade’s Juan;
The other two are women, and the third
Is neither man nor woman.” The chief threw on
The party a slight glance, then said: “I have
Your name before, the second is a new one; [heard
To bring the other three here was absurd;
But let that pass:—I think I’ve heard your name
In the Nikolaiev regiment?—“The same."—
DON JUAN.

LXI.
You served at Widdin? — "Yes." — "You led the attack?"
"I did." — "What next?" — "I really hardly
You were the first of! the breach?" — "I was not
At least, to follow those who might be so." —
"What follow'd?" — "A shot laid me on my back,
And I became a prisoner to the foe." — [rounded]
"You shall have vengeance, for the town sur-
is twice as strong as that where you were wounded.

LXII.
"Where will you serve?" — "Where'er you please."
You like to be the hope of the forlorn, ["I know
And doubtless would be foremost on the foe
After the hardships you've already borne.
And this young fellow! say, what can he do? —
He with the beardless chin, and garments torn?"
"Why, general, if he hath no greater fault
To war than love, he had better lead the assault."

LXIII.
"He shall, if that he dare," Here Juan bow'd
Low as the compliment deserved. Suwarrow
Continued: "Your old regiment's allow'd,
By special providence, to lead to-morrow.
Or it may be to-night, the assault I've vow'd
To several saints, that shortly plough or harrow
Shall pass o'er what was Ismahl, and its sunk
Be unimpeded by the proudest mosque.

LXIV.
"So now, my lads, for glory!" — Here he turn'd,
And drill'd away in the most classic Russian,
Until each high, heroic bosom burn'd
For cash and conquest, as if from a cushion
A preacher had held forth, (who nobly spurn'd [on]
All earthly goods save tithes,) and bade them push
To slay the Pagans who resisted, battering
The armies of the Christian Empress Catherine.

LXV.
Johnson, who knew by this long colloquy,
Himself a favorite, ventured to address
Suwarrow, though engaged with accents high.
In his resumed amusement. "I confess
My debt, in being thus allow'd to die
Among the foremost; but if you'd express
Explicitly our several posts, my friend
And self would know what duty to attend." —

LXVI.
"Right! I was busy, and forgot. Why you
Will join your former regiment, which should be Now under arms. Ho! Katskoff, take him to (Here he call'd up a Polish orderly) —
His post, I meant the regiment Nikolaiow.
The stranger stripping may remain with me;
He's a fine boy. The women may be sent
To the other baggage, or to the sick tent."

LXVII.
But here a sort of scene began to ensue:
The ladies,—who by no means had been bred
To be disposed of in a way so new,
Although their haram education led
Doubtless to that of doctrines the most true,
Passive obedience,—now raised up the head,
With flashing eyes and starting tears, and flung
Their arms, a. hens their wings about their young,

LXVIII.
O'er the promoted couple of brave men
Who were thus honor'd by the greatest chief
That ever people shift with heroes slain,
Or plunged a province or a realm in grief.
Oh, foolish mortals! always taught in vain!
Oh, glorious laurel! since for one sole leaf
Of thine imaginary deathless tree,
Of blood and tears must flow the unebbing sea.

LXIX.
Suwarrow, who had small regard for tears,
And not much sympathy for blood, survey'd
The women with their hair about their ears,
And natural agonies, with a slight shade
Of feeling; for, however habit sears
Men's hearts against whole millions, when their
Is butchery, sometimes a single sorrow
Will touch even heroes—and such was Suwarrow

LXX.
He said—and in the kindest Calmuck tone—
"Why, Johnson, what the devil do you mean
By bringing women here? They shall be shown
All the attention possible, and seen
In safety to the wagons, where alone
In fact they can be safe. You should have been Aware this kind of baggage never thrives:
Save wed a year, I hate recruits with wives."

LXXI.
"May it please your excellency," thus replied
Our British friend, "these are the wives of others
And not our own. I am too qualified
By service with my military brothers,
To break the rules by bringing one's own bride
Into a camp; I know that nought so bothers
The hearts of the heroic on a charge,
As leaving a small family at large.

LXXII.
"But these are but two Turkish ladies, who
With their attendant aided our escape,
And afterwards accompanied us through
A thousand perils in this dubious shape.
To me this kind of life is not so new;
To them, poor things! it is an awkward step;
I therefore, if you wish me to fight freely,
Request that they may both be used gentlyly."

LXXIII.
Meantime, these two poor girls, with swimming eyes
Look'd on as if in doubt if they could trust
Their own protectors; nor was their surprise
Less than their grief (and truly not less just)
To see an old man, rather wild than wise
In aspect, plainly clad, besmeared with dust,
Strip'd to his waistcoat, and that not too clean,
More fear'd than all the sultans ever seen.

LXXIV.
For every thing seem'd resting on his nod.
As they could read in all eyes. Now to them
Who were accustom'd, as a sort of god,
To see the sultan, rich in many a gem,
Like an imperial peacock stalk abroad,
(That royal bird, whose tail's a ciadem,)
With all the pomp of power, it was a doubt
How power could condescend to do without
LXXV.
John Jonsson, seeing their extreme dismay,
Though little versed in feelings oriental,
Suggested some slight comfort in his way.
Don Juan, who was much more sentimental,
Swore they should see him by the dawn of day,
Or that the Russian army should repent all:
And, strange to say, they found some consolation
In this—for females like exaggeration.

LXXVI.
And then, with tears, and sighs, and some slight kisses,
They parted for the present—these to await,
According to the artillery's hits or misses,
What sages call Chance, Providence, or Fate—(Uncertainty is one of many blisses,
A mortgage on Humanity's estate)—
While their beloved friends began to arm,
To burn a town which never did them harm.

LXXVII.
Suarrow, who but saw things in the gross—
Being much too gross to see them in detail;
Who calculated life as so much dross,
And as the wind a widow'd nation's wall,
And cared as little for his army's loss
(So that their efforts should at length prevail)
As wife and friends did for the boils of Job—
What was 't to him to hear two women sob?

LXXVIII.
Nothing. The work of glory still went on,
In preparations for a cannonade
As terrible as that of Ilion,
If Homer had found mortar's ready made;
But now, instead of slaying Priam's son,
We only can but talk of escalade,
[bullets,
Bombs, drums, guns, bastions, batteries, bayonets,
Hard words which stick in the soft Muses' gullets.

LXXIX.
Oh, thou eternal Homer! who couldst charm
All ears, though long—all ages, though so short,
By merely wondring with poetic arm
Arms to which men will never more resort,
Unless gunpowder should be found to harm
Much less than is the hope of every court,
Which now is leagued young Freedom to annoy;
But they will not find Liberty a Troy—

LXXX.
Oh, thou eternal Homer! I have now
To paint a siege, wherein more men were slain,
With deadlier engines and a speedier blow,
Than in thy Greek gazette of that campaign,
And yet, like all men else, I must allow,
To 'vie with thee, would be about as vain
As for a brook to cope with ocean's flood;
But still we moderns equal you in blood—

LXXXI.
If not in poetry, at least in fact;
And fact is truth, the grand desideratum!
Of which, how'er the Muse describes each act,
There should be, ne'ertheless, a slight substratum.
But now the town is going to be attack'd;
Great deeds are doing—how shall I relate 'em?
Souls of immortal generals! Phoebus watches
To color up his rays from your despatches.

LXXXII.
Oh, ye great bulletin of Buonaparte!
Oh, ye less grand long lists of kill'd and wound'd
Shade of Leonidas! who fought so hearty, (confounded)
When my poor Greece was once, as now sur
Oh, Caesar's Commentaries! now impart ye,
Shadows of glory! (lest I be confounded)
A portion of your fading twilight hues,
So beautiful, so fleeting, to the Muse.

LXXXIII.
When I call "fading" martial immortality,
I mean, that every age and every year,
And almost every day, in sad reality,
Some sucking hero is compell'd to rear,
Who, when we come to sum up the totality
Of deeds to human happiness most dear,
Turns out to be a butcher in great business,
Afflicting young folks with a sort of dizziness.

LXXXIV.
Medals, ranks, ribbands, lace, embroidery, scarlet,
Are things immortal to immortal man,
As purple to the Babylonian harlot:
An uniform to boys is like a fan
To women: there is scarce a crimson varlet
But deems himself the first in glory's van,
But glory's glory; and if you would find
What that is—ask the pig who sees the wind!

LXXXV.
At least he feels it, and some say he sees,
Because he runs before it like a pig;
Or, if that simple sentence should displease,
Say that he sends before it like a brig,
A schooner, or—but it is time to ease
This canto, ere my Muse perceives fatigue.
The next shall ring a peal to shake all people,
Like a bob-major from a village steeple.

LXXXVI.
Hark! through the silence of the cold dull night
The hum of armies gathering rank on rank,
Lo! dusky masses steal in dubious sight
Along the leaguer'd wall and bristling bank
Of the arm'd river, while with straggling light
The stars peep through the vapors dim and dank
Which curl in curious wreaths—How soon the smoke
Of hell shall pall them in a deeper cloak!

LXXXVII.
Here pause we for the present—as even then
That awful pause, dividing life from death,
Struck for an instant on the hearts of men,
Thousands of whom were drawing their last breath
A moment—and all will be life again!
The march! the charge! the shouts of either faith
Hurra! and Allah! and—one moment more—
The death-cry drowning in the battle's roar.
CANTO VIII.

I.

On blood and thunder! and oh blood and wounds!
These are but vulgar oaths, as you may deem,
Too gentle reader! and most shocking sounds
And so they are; yet thus is Glory's dream
Unriddled, and as my true Muse expounds
At present such things, since they are her theme,
So be they the inspi rers! Call them Mars,
Sellors, what you will—they mean but wars.

II.

All was prepared—the fire, the sword, the men
To wield them in their terrible array.
The army, like a lion from his den,
March'd forth with nerve and sinews bent to slay,—
A human Hydra, issuing from his den
To breathe destruction on its winding way,
Whose heads were heroes, which cut off in vain,
Immed iately in others grew again.

III.

History can only take things in the gross;
But could we know them in detail, perchance
In balancing the profit and the loss,
War's merit it by no means might enhance,
To waste so much gold for a little dross,
As hath been done, mere conquest to advance.
The drying up a single tear has more
Of honest fame, than shedding seas of gore.

IV.

And why? because it brings self - approbation;
Whereas the other, after all its glare,
Shouts, bridges, arches, pensions from a nation—
Which (it may be) has not much left to spare—
A higher title, or a loftier station,
Though they may make Corruption gape or stare,
Yet, in the end, except in Freedom's battles,
Are nothing but a child of Murder's rattles.

V.

And such are they—and such they will be found.
Not so Leonidas and Washington,
Whose every battle-field is holy ground,
[done.
Which breathes of nations saved, not worlds un-
How sweetly on the ear such echoes sound!
While the mere victors may appal or stun
The servile and the vain, such names will be
A watchword till the future shall be free.

VI.

The night was dark, and the thick mist allow'd
Nought to be seen, save the artillery's flame,
Which arch'd the horizon like a fiery cloud,
And in the Danube's waters shone the same,
A mirror'd hell! The volleysing roar, and loud
Long booming of each peal on peal, o'ercame
The ear far more than thunder; for Heaven's flashes
Spare, or smite rarely—Man's make millions ashes!

VII.

The column order'd on the assault scarce pass'd
Beyond the Russian batteries a few toises,
When up the bristling Moslem rose at last,
Answering the Christian thunders with like voices
Then one vast fire, air, earth, and stream embraced
Which rock'd as 'twere beneath the mighty noises
While the whole rampart blazed like Etna, when
The restless Titan hiccups in his den.

VIII.

And one enormous shout of "Allah!" rose
In the same moment, loud as ever the roar
Of war's most mortal engines, to their foes
Hurling defiance: city, stream, and shore
Resounded "Allah!" and the clouds, which close
With thickening canopy the conflict o'er,
Vibrate to the Eternal name. Hark! through
All sounds it piercest, "Allah! Allah! Hu!"

IX.

The columns were in movement, one and all:
But, of the portion which attack'd by water,
Thicker than leaves the lives began to fall,
[ter,
Though led by Arseniev, that great son of slavagh-
As brave as ever faced both boom and ball.
"Carnage (so Wordsworth tells you) is God's daughter:"
If he speak truth, she is Christ's sister, and Just now behaved as in, the Holy Land.

X.

The Prince de Ligne was wounded in the knee;
Count Chapeau-Bras, too, had a ball between His cap and head, which proves the head to be Aristocratic as was ever seen,
Because it then received no injury
More than the cap; in fact the ball could mean
No harm unto a right legitimate head:
"Ashes to ashes"—why not lead to lead?

XI.

Also the General Markow, Brigadier,
Insisting on removal of the prince,
Amidst some groaning thousands dying near—
All common fellows, who might with thee and win—
And shriek for water into a deaf ear,—
The General Markow, who could thus evince
His sympathy for rank, by the same token,
To teach him greater, had his own leg broken.

XII.

Three hundred cannon threw up their émectic
And thirty thousand muskets flung their pills
Like hail, to make a bloody diuretic.
Mortality thou hast thy monthly bills;
Thy plagues, thy famines, thy physiologists, yea. ti k
Like the death-watch, within our ears the ill
Past, present, and to come—but all may yiel d
To the true portrait of one battle-field.

XIII.

There the still varying pangs, which multiply
Until their very number makes men hard
By the infinities of agony,
Which meet the gaze, what'er it may regard
The groan, the roll in dust, the all-white eye
Turn'd back within its socket,—these reward
Your rank and file by thousands, while the rest
May win, perhaps, a ribband at the breast!
XIV.

Yet I love glory; glory's a great thing;
Think what it is to be, in your old age,
Maintain'd at the expense of your good king!
A moderate pension shall suffice, for a sage,
And heroes are but made for hards to sing,
Which is still better; thus in verse to wage
Your wars eternally, besides, enjoying
Half-pay for life, makes mankind worth destroying.

XV.

The troops, already disembark'd, push'd on
To take a battery on the right; the others,
When landed lower down, their landing done,
Had set to work as briskly as their brothers—
Being grenadiers, they mounted, one by one,
Cheerful as children climb the breasts of mothers—
Or the entrenched and the palisade,
Quite orderly, as if upon parade.

XVI.

And this was admirable; for so hot
The fire was, that were red Veuvisius loaded,
Besides its lava, with all sorts of shot
And shells, or hells, it could not more have goaded.
Of horses, a third fell; then a third,
A thing which victory by no means boded
To gentlemen engaged in the assault:
Hounds, when the huntsman tumbles, are at fault.

XVII.

But here I leave the general concern,
To track our hero on his path of fame:
He must his laurels separately earn;
For fifty thousand heroes, name by name,
Though all deserving equally to turn
A complete, or an elegy to claim,
Would form a lengthy lexicon of glory,
And, what is worse still, a much longer story.

XVIII.

And therefore we must give the greater number
To the gazette—which doubtless fairly dealt
By the deceased, who lie in famous slumber
In ditches, fields, or wherever 'e they felt
Their clay for the last time their souls encumber;
Thrice happy he whose name has been well spelt
In the despatch: I knew a man whose loss
Was printed Grose, although his name was Grose.

XIX.

Juan and Johnson join'd a certain corps, [ing
And fought away with might and main, not know-
The way which they had never trod before,
And still less guessing where they might be going;
But on they march'd, dead bodies trampling o'er,
Firing and thrusting, slashing, swearing, glowing,
But fighting thoughtlessly enough to win,
To their two selves, one whole bright bulletin.

XX.

Thus on they wallow'd in the bloody mire
Of dead and dying thousands—sometimes gaining
A yard or two of ground, which brought them nigher,
To some odd angle for which all were straining;
At others times, repulsed by the close fire,
Which really pour'd as if all hell were raining,
Instead of heaven, they stumbled backwards o'er
A wounded comrade, sprawling in his gore.

XXI.

Though 'twas Don Juan's first of fields, and thought
The nightly muster and the silent march
In the chill dark, when courage does not glow
So much as under a triumphal arch,
Perhaps might make him shiver, yawn, or throw
A glance on the dull clouds (as thick as starch,
Which stiffen'd heaven) as if he wish'd for day;—
Yet for all this he did not run away.

XXII.

Indeed he could not. But what if he had?
There have been and are heroes who begin
With something not much better, or as bad:
Frederic the Great from Malwitz sign'd to run,
For the first and last time; for, like a pad
Or hawk, or bride, most mortals, after one
Warm bont, are broken into their new tricks,
And fight like fiends for pay or politics.

XXIII.

He was what Erin calls, in her sublime
Old Erse or Irish, or it may be Punic,
(The antiquarians who can settle time,
Which settles all things, Romans, Greek, or Runic,
Swear that Pat's language sprung from the same elinse
With Hannibal, and wears the Tyrian tunic
Of Dido's alphabet; and this is rational
As any other notion, and not national.)

XXIV.

But Juan was quite "a broth of a boy,
A thing of impulse, and a child of song.
Now swimming in the sentiment of joy,
Or the sensation, (if that phrase seem wrong,) And afterwards, if he must needs destroy,
In such good company as always strong
To battles, sieges, and that kind of pleasure,
No less delighted to employ his leisure;

XXV.

But always without malice. If he warr'd
Or loved, it was with what we call "the best Intentions," which form all mankind's trump cards,
To be produced when brought up to the test.
The statesman, hero, harlot, lawyer—ward
Off each attack when people are in quest
Of their designs, by saying they meant well;
'Tis pity "that such meaning should pave hell."

XXVI.

I almost lately have begun to doubt
Whether hell's pavement—if it be so paved—
Must not have latterly been quite worn out,
Not by the numbers good intent hath saved,
But by the mass who go below without
Those ancient good intentions, which once shone
And smooth'd the brimstone of that street of hell
Which bears the greatest likenesses to Pall Mall

XXVII.

Juan, by some strange chance, which oft divides
Warrior from warrior in their grim career,
Like chasteest wives from constant husbands' sides
Just at the close of the first bridial year,
By one of those odd turns of fortune's tides,
Was on a sudden rather puzzled here,
When, after a good deal of heavy firing,
He found himself alone, and friends retiring.
And, as he rush'd along, it came to pass he fell in with what was late the second column, under the orders of the General Lacey, but now reduced, as is a bulky volume, in an elegant extract (much less naysay) of heroism, and took his place with solemn air, 'mid the rest, who kept their valiant faces, and level'd weapons, still against the glacies.

And therefore, when he ran away, he did so upon reflection, knowing that behind he would find others who would face the world. Of idle apprehensions, which, like wind, trouble heroic stomachs. Though their sides sometimes were even closed, all heroes are not blind, but when they light upon immediate death, retire a little, merely to take breath.
XLII.

Egad! they found the second time what they
The first time thought quite terrible enough
To fly from, malgré all which people say
Of glory, and all that immortal stuff
Which fills a regiment, (besides their pay,
That daily shilling which makes warriors tough)—
They found on their return the self-same welcome,
Which made some think, and others know, a hell
come.

XLIII.

They fell as thick as harvests beneath hail,
Grass before scythes, or corn below the sickle,
Proving that trite old truth, that life’s as frail
As any other boon for which men stickle.
The Turkish batteries thrash’d them like a flail,
Or a good boxer, into a sad pickle,
Putting the very bravest, who were knock’d
Upon the head before their guns were cook’d.

XLIV.

The Turks, behind the traverses and banks
Of the next bastion, fired away like devils,
And swept, as gales sweep foam away, whole ranks:
However, Heaven knows how, the Fates who levels
Towns, nations, worlds, in her revolving pranks,
So order’d it, amid those sulphury revels,
That Johnson, and some few who had not scamper’d,
Reach’d the interior talus of the rampart.

XLV.

First one or two, then five, six, and a dozen,
Came mounting quickly up, for it was now
All neck or nothing, as, like pitch or rosin,
Flame was shower’d forth above as well’s below,
So that you scarce could say who best had chosen,—
The gentlemen that were the first to show
Their martial faces on the parapet,
Or those who thought it brave to wait as yet.

XLVI.

But those who scaled found out that their advance
Was favor’d by an accident or blunder:
The Greek or Turkish Cohorn’s ignorance
Had palpadoed in a way you’d wonder
To see in forts of Netherlands or France,
(Though these to our Gibraltar must knock under,) Right in the middle of the parapet
Just named, these palisades were primly set:

XLVII.

So that on either side some nine or ten
Paces were left, whereon you could contrive
To march; a great convenience to our men,
At least to all those who were left alive,
Who thus could form a line and fight again:
And that which further aided them to strive
Was, that they could kick down the palisades,
Which scarcely rose much higher than grass blades.

XLVIII.

Among the first,—I will not say the first,
For such precedence upon such occasions
Will oftentimes make deadly quarrels burst
Out between friends as well as allied nations;
The Briton must be bold who really durst
Put to such trial John Bull’s partial patience,
As say that Wellington at Waterloo
Was beaten,—though the Prussians say so too;—

XLIX.

And that if Buecher, Bulow, Gneisenau
And God knows who besides in “au” and “ow,”
Had not come up in time to cast an awe
Into the hearts of those who fought till now
As tigers combat with an empty claw,
The Duke of Wellington had ceased to show
His orders, also to receive his pensions,
Which are the heaviest that our history mentions.

L.

But never mind:—“God save the king!” and kings
For if he don’t, I doubt if men will longer.
I think I hear a little bird, who sings,
The people by and by will be the stronger:
The veriest jade will wince whose harness wrings
So much into the raw as quite to wrong he Beyond the rules of posting,—and the mob
At last fall sick of imitating Job.

LI.

At first it grumbles, then it swears, and then
Like David, flings smooth pebbles ’gainst a giant
At last it takes to weapons, such as men pliant;
Snatch when despair makes human hearts less
Then “comes the tug of war;” “twill come again,
I rather doubt; and I would fain say, “twiln’t,”
If I had not perceived that revolution
Alone can save the earth from hell’s pollution.

LII.

But to continue:—I say not the first,
But of the first, our little friend Don Juan Walk’d o’er the walls of Ismail, as if nursed some Amid such scenes—though this was quite a new
To him, and I should hope to most.
The thirst
Of glory, which so pierces through and through one.
Pervaded him—although a generous creature,
As warm in heart as feminine in feature.

LIII.

And here he was—who, upon woman’s breast
Even from a child, felt like a child; howe’er
The man in all the rest might be confess’d.
To him it was Elysium to be there;
And he could even withstand that awkward test
Which Rousseau points out to the dubious fair
“Observe your lover when he leaves your arms;”
But Juan never left them while they’d charms,

LIV.

Unless compell’d by fate, or wave, or wind,
Or near relations, who are much the same.
But here he was!—where each tie that can bind
Humanity must yield to steel and flame:
And he, whose very body was all mind,—
Flung here by fate or circumstance, which seems
The loftiest,—hurried by the time and place,—
Dash’d on like a spurr’d blood-horse in a race

LV.

So was his blood stirr’d while he found resistance,
As is the hunter’s at the five-bar gate,
Or double post and rail, where the existence
Of Britain’s youth depends upon their weight.
The lightest being the safest: at a distance
He hatred cruelty, as all men hate
Blood, until heated—and even there his own
At times would curl to o’er some heavy gown.
LVI.
The General Lasry, who had been hard press’d,
Seeing arrive an aid so opportune
As were some hundred youngsters all abreast,
Who came as if just dropp’d down from the moon,
To Juan, who was nearest him, address’d
His thanks, and hopes to take the city soon,
Not reckoning him to be a “base Bezonian,”
(As Pistol calls it,) but a young Livonian.

LVI.
Juan, to whom he spoke in German, knew
As much of German as of Sanscrit, and
In answer made an inclination to
The general who held him in command;
For, seeing one with ribbons black and blue,
Stars, medals, and a bloody sword in hand,
Addressing him in tones which seemed to thank,
He recognized an officer of rank.

LVIII.
Short speeches pass between two men who speak
No common language; and besides, in time
Of war and taking towns, when many a crime
Rings o’er the dialogue, and many a shriek
Is perpetrated ere a word can break
Upon the ear, and sounds of horror chime
In, like church-bells, with sigh, howl, groan, yell,
There cannot be much conversation there. [prayer,

LIX.
And therefore all we have related in
Two long octaves, pass’d in a little minute;
But in the same small minute, every sin
Contrived to get itself comprised within it.
The very cannon, deafen’d by the din,
Grew dumb, for you might almost hear a linnet,
As soon as thunder, ‘midst the general noise
Of human nature’s agonizing voice!

LX.
The town was enter’d. Oh eternity!—
“God made the country, and man made the town,”
So Cowper says—and I begin to be
Of his opinion, when I see cast down
Rome, Babylon, Tyre, Carthage, Nineveh—
All walls men know, and many never known;
And, pondering on the present and the past,
To deem the woods shall be our home at last.

LXI.
Of all men, saving Sylla the man-slayer,
Who passes for in life and death most lucky,
Of the great names, which in our faces stare,
The General Bonn, backwoodsman of Kentucky,
Was happiest among mortals any where;
For killing nothing but a bear or buck, he Enjoy’d the lonely, vigorous, harmless days
Of his old age in wilds of deepest maze.

LXII.
Crime came not near him—he is not the child
Of solitude; heath shrank not from him—for
Her home is in the rarely-trodden wild,
Where if men seek her not, and death be more
Their choice than life, forgive them, as beguiled
By habit to what their own hearts abhor—
In cities caged. The present case in point I Set is, that Bonn lived hunting up to ninety;

LXIII.
And what’s still stranger, left behind a name—
For which men vainly declamate the throng,—
Not only famous, but of that good fame
Without which glory’s but a tavern song—
Simple, serene, the antipodes of shame
Which hate or envy e’er could tinge with wrong
An active hermit, even in age the child
Of nature, or the Man of Ross run wild.

LXIV.
’Tis true he shrank from men, even of his nation
When they built up unto his darling trees,—
He moved some hundred miles off, for a station
Where there were fewer houses and more ease—
The inconvenience of civilization
Is, that you neither can be pleased nor please
But, where he met the individual man,
He show’d himself as kind as mortal can

LXV.
He was not all alone: around him grew
A sylvan tribe of children of the chase,
Whose young, unwaken’d world was ever new
Nor sword nor sorrow yet had left a trace
On her unbroken brow, nor could you view,
A frown on nature’s or on human face;—
The free-born forest found and kept them free,
And fresh as is a torrent or a tree.

LXVI.
And tall and strong, and swift of foot were they,
Beyond the dwarfing city’s pale abortions,
Because their thoughts had never been the prey
Of care or gain: the green woods were their por
No sinking spirits told them they grew gray; [tions
No fashion made them apes of her distortions;
Simple they were, not savage; and their rifles
Though very true, were not yet used for trifles.

LXVII.
Motion was in their days, rest in their slumbers,
And cheerfulness the handmaid of their toil;
Nor yet too many nor too few their numbers;
Corruption could not make their hearts her soil:
The lust which stings, the splendor which encom
With the free foresters divide no spoil;
Serene, not sullen, were the solitudes
Of this unsighing people of the woods

LXVIII.
So much for nature,—by way of variety,
Now back to thy great joys, civilization;
And the sweet consequence of large society,
War, pestilence, the despot’s desolation,
The kingly scourge, the lust of notoriety,
The millions slain by soldiers for their ration,
The scenes like Catherine’s boudoir at threecents
With Ismail’s storm to soften it the more.

LXIX.
The town was enter’d: first one column made
Its sanctuary way good—then another,
The reeking bayonet and the flashing blade.
Clash’d gainst the seimitar, and binte and mothe
With distant shriekers were heard heaven to upbrai
Still closer sulphur clouds began to smother
The breath of morn and man, where, foot by foot
The madden d Turks their city still dispute.
LXX.
Koutousow, he who afterwards beat back
(With some assistance from the frost and snow)
Napoleon on his bold and bloody track,
It happen'd was himself beat back just now.
He was a jolly fellow, and could crack
His jest alike in face of friend or foe,
Though life, and death, and victory were at stake—
But here it seem'd his jokes had ceased to take:

LXXI.
For, having thrown himself into a ditch,
Follow'd in haste by various grenadiers,
Whose blood the puddle greatly did enrich,
He climb'd to where the parapet appears;
But there his project reach'd its utmost pitch—
(‘Mong other deaths the General Ribauquier's
Was much regretted)—for the Moslem men
Threw them all down into the ditch again:

LXXII.
And, had it not been for some stray troops landing
They knew not where,—being carried by the stream
To some spot, where they lost their understanding,
And wander'd up and down as in a dream,
Until they reach'd, as daybreak was expanding,
That which a portal to their eyes did seem,—
The great and gaily Koutousow might have lain
Where three parts of his column yet remain:

LXXIII.
And, scrambling round the rampart, these same
After the taking of the “cavalier,” [troops,
Just as Koutousow's most “forlorn” of “hopes”
Took, like chameleons, some slight tinge of fear,
Open'd the gate call’d “Kilia” to the groups
Of baffled heroes who stood shyly near,
Sliding knee-deep in lately-frozen mud,
Now thaw'd into a marsh of human blood.

LXXIV.
The Koraks, or if so you please, Cossacks—
(I don't much pique myself upon orthography,
So that I do not grossly err in facts,
Statistics, tactics, politics, and geography)—
Having been used to serve on horses' backs,
And no great dilettanti in topography
Of fortresses, but fighting where it pleases
Their chiefs to order,—were all cut to pieces.

LXXV.
Their column, though the Turkish batteries thunder'd
Upon them, ne'ertheless had reach'd the rampart,
And naturally thought they could have plunder'd
The city, without being further hamper'd;
But, as it happens to brave men, they blunder'd—
The Turks at first pretended to have scamper'd,
Only to draw them 'twixt two bastion corners,
From whence they sallied on those Christian scorners.

LXXVI.
Then being taken by the tail—a taking Fatal to bishops as to soldiers—these Cossacks were all cut off as day was breaking,
And found their lives were let at a short lease
But perish'd without shivering or shaking,
Leaving as ladders their heap'd carcasses,
O'er which Lieutenant-Colonel Yesouskoi
March'd with the brave battalion of Polouski—

LXXX.
This valiant man kill'd all the Turks he met,
But could not eat them, being in his turn
Slain by some Mussulmans, who would not yet,
Without resistance, see their city burn.
The walls were won, but 'twas an even bet
Which of the armies would have cause to mourn
'Twas bow for blow, disputing inch by inch,
For one would not retreat, nor t'other flinch.

LXXVII.
Another column also suffer'd much:
And here we may remark with the historian,
You should but give few caricatures to such Troops as are meant to march with greatest glory
When matters must be carried by the touch
Of the bright bayonets, and they all should hurry on,
They sometimes, with a hankering for existence,
Keep merely firing at a foolish distance.

LXXVIII.
A junction of the General Meknop's men
(Without the General, who had fallen some time Before, being badly seconded just then) climb
Was made at length, with those who dared to
The death-disgorging rampart once again;
And, though the Turks' resistance was sublime,
They took the bastion, which the Seraskier
Defended at a price extremely dear.

LXXIX.
Juan and Johnson, and some volunteers,
Among the formost, offer'd him good quarter,
A word which little suits with Seraskiers,
Or at least suited not this valiant Twistar.—
He died, deserving well his country's aras,
A savage sort of military martyr.
An English naval officer, who wish'd To make him prisoner, was also dish'd.

LXXX.
For all the answer to his proposition
Was from a pistol-shot that laid him dead;
On which the rest, without more intermission,
Began to lay about with steel and lead,—
The pious metals most in requisition
On such occasions: not a single head
Was spared,—three thousand Moslem.S perish'd here
And sixteen bayonets pierced the Seraskier.

LXXXI.
The city's taken—only part by part—
And death is drunk with gore: there's not a street
Where fights not to the last some desperate heart
For those for whom it soon shall cease to beat.
Here War forgot his own destructive art
In more destroying nature; and the heat
Of carnage, like the Nile's sun-sodden slime,
Engender'd monstrous shapes of every crime.

LXXXII.
A Russian officer, in martial tread
Over a heap of bodies, felt his heel
Seized fast, as if 'twere by the serpent's head,
Whose fangs Eve taught her human seed to feel
In vain he kick'd, and swore, and writhed, and bled
And howl'd for help as wolves do for a meal—
The teeth still kept their gratifying hold,
As do the subtle snakes described of old.
A dying Moslem, who had felt the foot
Of a foe o'er him, snatch'd at it, and bit
The very tendon which is most acute—
(That which some ancient Muse or modern wit Named after thee, Achilles) and quite through 't
He made the teeth meet, nor relinquish'd it
Even with his life—for (but they lie) 'tis said
To the live leg still clung the sever'd head.

However this may be, 'tis pretty sure
The Russian officer for life was lamed,
For the Turk's teeth stuck faster than a skewer,
And left him 'nmid the invalid and main'd:
The regimental surgeon could not cure
His patient; and perhaps was to be blamed
More than the head of the inveterate foe,
Which was cut off, and scarce even then let go

But then the fact's a fact—and 'tis the part
Of a true poet to escape from fiction
Where'er he can; for there is little art
In leaving verse more free from the restriction
Of truth than prose, unless to suit the mart
For what is sometimes call'd poetic diction,
And that outrageous appetite for lies
Which Satan angles with for souls, like flies.

The city's taken, but not render'd—No
There's not a Moslem that hath yielded sword:
The blood may gush out as the Danube's flow
Rolls by the city wall; nor deed nor word
Acknowledge aught of dread or death of foe;
In vain the yell of victory is roar'd
By the advancing Muscovite—the groan
Of the last foe is echoed by his own.

The bayonet pierces and the sabre cleaves,
And human lives are lavish'd every where,
As the year closing whirls the scarlet leaves,
When the stripp'd forest bows to the bleak air,
And groans; and thus the peopled city grieves,
Shorn of its best and loveliest, and left bare;
But still it falls with vast and awful splinters,
As oaks blown down with all their thousand winters.

It is an awful topic—but 'tis not
My cue for any time to be terrific:
For checker'd as it seems our human lot
With good, and bad, and worse, alike prolific
Of melancholy merriment, to quote
Too much of one sort would be soporific;
Without, or with, offence to friends or foes,
I sketch your world exactly as it goes.

And one good action in the midst of crimes
Is "quite refreshing"—in the affected phrase
Of these ambrosial, Pharaonic times,
With all their pretty milk-and-water ways,—
And may serve therefore to bedew these rhymes,
A little scourch'd at present with the blaze
Of conquest and its consequences, which Make epic poetry so rare and rich.

Upon a taken bastion, where there lay
Thousands of slaughter'd men, a yet warm group
Of murder'd women, who had found their way
To this vain refuge, made the good heart droop
And shudder;—while, as beautiful as May,
A female child of ten years tried to stoop
And hide her little palpitating breast.
Among the bodies lull'd in bloody rest

Two villains Cossacks pursued the child
With flashing eyes and weapons; match'd with
The rudest brute that roams Siberia's wild
With feelings pure and polish'd as a gem,—
The bear is civilized, the wolf is mild:
And whom for this at last must we condemn?
Their natures? or their sovereigns, who employ
All arts to teach their subjects to destroy?

Their sabres glitter'd o'er her little head,
Whence her fair hair rose twining with alight,
Her hidden face was plunged amid the dead:
When Juan caught a glimpse of this sad sight
I shall not say exactly what he said,
Because it might not solace "ears polite;"
But what he did, was to lay on their backs,—
The readiest way of reasoning with Cossacks.

One's hip he slash'd, and split the other's shoulder;
And drove them with their brutal yells to seek
If there might be chirurgeon's who could solder
The wounds they richly merited, and shriek
Their baffled rage and pain; while waxing colder,
As he turn'd o'er each pale and gory cheek,
Don Juan rais'd his little captive from
The heap a moment more had made her tomb.

And she was chill as they, and on her face
A slender streak of blood announced how near
Her fate had been to that of all her race;
For the same blow which laid her mother here
Had scar'd her brow, and left its crimson trace
As the last link with all she had held dear;
But else unhurt, she open'd her large eyes.
And gaz'd on Juan with a wild surprise.

Just at this instant, while their eyes were fix'd
Upon each other, with dilated glance,
In Juan's look, pain, pleasure, hope, fear, mix'd
With joy to save, and dread of some mischance
Upon his protege; while hers, transfixed
With infant terrors, gazed as from a trance.
A pure, transparent, pale, yet radiant face,
Like to a lighted alabaster vase:—

Up came John Johnson—(I will not say "Jack,"
For that were vulgar, cold, and common place
On great occasions, such as an attack
On cities, as hath been the present case)—
Up Johnson came, with hundreds at his back
Exclaiming,—"Juan! Juan! On boy! brace
Your arm, and I'll bet Moscow to a dollar,
That you and I will win St. George's collar"
XCVIII.

"The Seraskier's knock'd upon the head,
But the stone bastion still remains, wherein
The old pacha sits among some hundreds dead
Smoking his pipe quite calmly, 'mid the din
Of our artillery and his own; 'tis said
Our kill'd, already piled up to the chin,
Till round the battery; but still it batters,
And grape in volleys, like a vineyard, scatters.

XCIX.

Then up with me!"—But Juan answer'd, "Look
Upon this child—I saw her—must not leave
Her life to chance; but point me out some nook
Of safety, where she less may shriek and grieve,
And I am with you."—Whereon Johnson took
A glance around—and shrugg'd—and twitch'd his (left);
And black silk neckcloth—and replied, "You're Poor thing! what's to be done? I'm puzzled quite."

C.

Said Juan,—"Whatsoever is to be Done, I'll not quit her till she seems secure
Of present life a good deal more than we."— Quoth Johnson,—"Neither will I quite insure
But at the least you may die gloriously!"
Juan replied,—"At least I will endure
Whatever is to be borne—but not resign
This child, who's parentless, and therefore mine."

CI.

Johnson said,—"Juan, we've no time to lose;
The child's a pretty child—a very pretty—
I never saw such eyes—but hark! now choose
Between your fame and feelings, pride and pity:
Hark! how the roar increases!—no excuse
Will serve when there is plunder in a city;
I should be loth to march without you, but,
By God! we'll be too late for the first cut."

CII.

But Juan was immovable; until
Johnson, who really loved him in his way,
Pick'd out among his followers with some skill
Such as he thought the least given up to prey:
And swearing if the infant came to ill
That they should all be shot on the next day,
But if she were delivered safe and sound,
They should at least have fifty rounds round,

CIII.

And all allowances besides of plunder
In fair proportion with their comrades,—then
Juan consented to march on through thunder,
Which thinn'd, at every step, their ranks of men:
And yet the rest rush'd eagerly—no wonder,
For they were heated by the hope of gain,
A thing which happens every where each day—
No hero trusteth wholly to half-pay.

CIV.

And such is victory! and such is man!
At last nine-tenths of what we call so:—
God
May have another name for half we scan
As human beings, or his ways are odd.
But to our subject: a brave Tartar Khan,—
Or 'sultan,' as the author (to whose nod
In presence I bend my humble verse) doth call
This sharifn—somehow would not yield at all:

CV.

But flank'd by free brave sons (such is polygamy,
That she spawns warriors by the score, where none
Are prosecuted for that false crime bigotry)
He never would believe the city won,
While courage clung but to a single twig.—Am i Describing Priam's, Pegasus', or Jove's son?
Neither,—but a good, plain, old, temperate man,
Who fought with his five children in the van.

CVI.

To take him was the point. The truly brave,
When they behold the brave oppress'd with odds,
Are touch'd with a desire to shield or save;
A mixture of wild beasts and demigods
Are they—now furious as the sweeping wave,
Now moved with pity: even as sometimes nads
The rugged tree unto the summer wind,
Compassion breathes along the savage mind.

CVII.

But he would not be taken, and replied
To all the propositions of surrender
By moving Christians down on every side,
As obstinate as Swedish Charles at Bender
His five brave boys no less the foe defied:
Whereon the Russian pathos grew less tender.
As being a virtue, like terrestrial patience,
Apt to wear out on trifling provocations.

CVIII.

And spite of Johnson and of Juan, who Expended all their Eastern phraseology
In begging him, for God's sake, just to show
So much less fight as might form an apology
For them in saving such a desperate foe—
He hew'd away, like doctors of theology
When they dispute with skeptics; and with curses
Struck at his friends, as babies beat their nurses.

CIX.

Nay, he had wounded, though but sligantly,—
Juan and Johnson, whereupon they rei——
The first with sighs, the second with an oath—
Upon his angry sultanhanship, pell-mell,
And all around were grown exceeding wroth
At such a pertinacious infidel,
And pour'd upon him and his sons like rain,
Which they resisted like a sandy plain,

CX.

That drinks and still is dry. At last they perish'd:
His second son was levell'd by a shot;
His third was sabred; and the fourth, most cherish'd
Of all the five, on bayonets met his lot;
The fifth, who, by a Christian mother nourish'd,
Had been neglected, ill-used, and what not,
Because deform'd, yet died all game and bottom,
To save a sire who blush'd that he begot him.

CXI.

The eldest was a true and blameless Tartar,
As great a scorners of the Nazarene
As ever Mahomet pick'd out for a martyr,
Who only saw the black-eyed girls in green,
Who make the beds of those who won't take quarter
On earth, in Paradise; and, when once seen,
Those hours, like all other pretty creatures,
Do just whate'er they please, by dint of features
CXII.
And what they pleased to do with the young Khan
In heaven, I know not, nor pretend to guess;
But doubtless they prefer a fine young man
To tough old heroes, and can do no less;
And that's the cause, no doubt, why, if we scan
A field of battle's ghastly wilderness,
For one rough, weather-beaten, veteran body,
You'll find ten thousand handsome coxcombs bloody.

CXIII.
Your hours also have a natural pleasure
In lopping off your lately married men
Before the bridal hours have danced their measure,
And the sad second moon grows dim again,
Or dull Repentance hath had dreary leisure
To wish him back a bachelor now and then.
And thus your hour (it may be) disputes
Of these brief blossoms the immediate fruits.

CXIV.
Thus the young Khan, with hours in his sight,
Thought not upon the charms of four young brides,
But bravely rush'd on his first heavenly night.
In short, how'er our better faith derides,
These black-eyed virgins make the Moslems' fight,
As though 'twere one heaven and none be
Whereas, if all be true we hear of heaven's sides:
And hell, there must at least be six or seven.

CXV.
So fully flash'd the phantom on his eye,
That when the very lance was in his heart,
He shouted "Allah!" and saw Paradise
With all its veil of mystery drawn apart,
And bright eternity without disguise
On his soul, like a ceaseless sunrise, dart,
With prophets, hours, angels, saints, deserted
In one voluptuous blaze,—and then he died.

CXVI.
But, with a heavenly rapture on his face,
The good old Khan—who long had ceased to see
Hours, or aught except his florid race,
Who grew like cedars round him gloriously—
When he beheld his latest hero grace
The earth, which he became like a fell'd tree,
Paused for a moment from the fight, and cast
A glance on that slain son, his first and last.

CXVII.
The soldiers, who beheld him drop his point,
Stopp'd as if once more willing to concede
Quarter, in case he bade them not "aryst!"
As he before had done. He did not heed
Their pause nor signs: his heart was out of joint,
And shook (till now unshaken) like a reed,
As he look'd down upon his children gone,
And felt—though done with life—he was alone.

CXVIII.
But 'twas a transient tremor:—with a spring
Upon the Russian steel his breast he flung,
As careless as huris the moth her wing
Against the light wherein she dies: he clung
Closer, that all the deadlier they might wring,
Unto the bayonets which had pierced his young
And throwing back a dim look on his sons,
In one wide wound pour'd forth his soul at once.

CXIX.
'Tis strange enough—the rough, tough soldiers, who Spared neither sex nor age in their career
Of carnage, when this old man was pierced through,
And lay before them with his children near,
Touch'd by the heroism of him they slew,
Were melted for a moment; though no tear
Flow'd from their blood-shot eyes. all red with strife
They honor'd such determined scorn of life

CXX.
But the stone bastion still kept up its fire,
Where the chief Pacha calmly held his post:
Some twenty times he made the Russ retire,
And bailed the assaults of all their host;
At length he condescended to inquire
If yet the city's rest were won or lost,
And, being told the latter, sent a Bey
To answer Ribas' summons to give way.

CXXI.
In the mean time, cross-legg'd, with great sang-froid,
Among the scorching ruins he sat smoking
Tobacco on a little carpet:—Troy
Saw nothing like the scene around;—yet, looking
With martial stoicism, nought seem'd to annoy
His stern philosophy: but gently stroking
His beard, he puff'd his pipe's ambrosial gales.
As if he had three lives, as well as tails.

CXXII.
The town was taken—whether he might yield
Himself or bastion, little matter'd now;
His stubborn valor was no future shield.
Isma'il's no more! The crescent's silver bow
Sunk, and the crimson cross glare'd o'er the field,
But red with no redeeming gore: the glow
Of burning streets, like moonlight on the water,
Was image'd back in blood, the sea of slaughters

CXXIII.
All that the mind would shrink from of excesses
All that the body perpetrates of bad;
All that we read, hear, dream, of man's distresses
All that the devil would do if run stark mad;
All that defies which pen expresses;
All by which hell is peopled, or as sad
As hell—mere mortals who their power abuse—
Was here (as heretofore and since) let loose.

CXXIV.
If here and there some transient trait of pity,
Was shown, and some more noble heart broke through
Its bloody bond, and saved perhaps some pretty Child, or an aged, helpless man or two—
What's this in one annihilated city,
Where thousand loves, and ties, and duties grew;
Cockneys of London! Muscadins of Paris!
Just ponder what a pious pastime war is.

CXXV.
Think how the joys of reading a gazette
Are purchased by all agonies and crimes:
Or, if these do not move you, don't forget
Such doom may be your own in after times.
Meantime the taxes, Castlereagh, and debt,
Are hints as good as sermons, or as rhymes.
Read your own hearts and Ireland's present story
Then feed her famine fat with Wellesley's glory
CXXVI.

But still there is unto a patriot nation,
Which loves so well its country and its king,
A subject of sublimest exultation—
Bear it, ye Muse's, on your brightest wing!
How'er the mighty locust, Desolation,
Strip your green fields, and to your harvests cling,
Gaunt Famine never shall approach the throne—
Though Ireland starve, great George weighs twenty stone.

CXXVII.

But let me put an end unto my theme:
There was an end of ismail—hapless town!
Far flash'd her burning towers o'er Danube's stream,
And redly ran his blushing waters down.
The horrid war-whoop and the shriller scream
Rose still; but fainter were the thunders grown;
Of forty thousand who had mann'd the wall,
Some hundreds breathed,—the rest were silent all!

CXXVIII.

In one thing, ne'ertheless, 'tis fit to praise
The Russian army upon this occasion,
A virtue much in fashion now-a-days,
And therefore worthy of commemoration:
The topic's tender, so shall be my phrase—
Perhaps the season's chill, and their long station
In winter's depth, or want of rest and victual,
Had made them chaste,—they ravish'd very little.

CXXIX.

Much did they sly, more plunder, and no less
Might here and there occur some violation
In the other line—but not to such excess
As when the French, that dissipated nation,
Take towns by storm: no causes can I guess,
Except cold weather and commissation;
'At all the ladies, save some twenty score,
Were almost as much virgins as before.

CXXX.

Some odd mistakes, too, happen'd in the dark,
Which show'd a want of lanterns, or of taste—
Indeed the smoke was such they scarce could mark
Their friends from foes,—besides, such things from Occur, though rarely, when there is a spark [haste
Of light to save the venerable chaste:—
But six old damsels, each of seventy years,
Were all delover'd by different grenadiers.

CXXXI.

But on the whole their continence was great,
So that some disappointment there ensued
To those who had felt the inconvenient state
Of "single blessedness," and thought it good (Since it was not their fault, but only fate,
To bear these crosses) for each waning pride
To make: Roman sort of Sabine wedding,
Without the expense and the suspense of bedding.

CXXXII.

Some voices of the luxum middle-aged
Were also heard to wonder in the din,
"Widows of forty were these birds long caged,"
"Wherefore the ravishing did not begin!"
But, while the thirst for gore and plunder raged,
There was small leisure for superfluous sin;
But whether they escaped or no, lies hid
In darkness—I can only hope they did.

CXXXIII.

Suwarrow now was conqueror—a match
For Timour or for Zinghis in his trade. [thatch
While mosques and streets, beneath his eyes, like
Blazed, and the cannon's roar was scarceelay'd,
With bloody hands he wrote his first despatch,
And here exactly follows what he said:—
"Glory to God and to the Empress!" (Powers Eternal! such names mingled!) "Ismail's ours!"

CXXXIV.

Methinks these are the most tremendous words,
Since "Mené, Mené, Tolèk," and "Upharm,
Which hands or pens have ever traced of swords.
Heaven help me! I'm but little of a parson:
What Daniel read was short-hand of the Lord's,
Severe, sublime; the prophets wrote no farce or
The fate of nations—but this Russ, so witty,
Could rhyme, like Nero, o'er a burning city.

CXXXV.

He wrote this Polar melody, and set it,
Duly accompanied by shrieks and groans,
Which few will sing, I trust, but none forget it—
For I will teach, if possible, the stones
To rise against earth's tyrants. Never let it
Be said, that we still truckle unto thrones;
But ye—our children's children! think how we Show'd what things were before the world was free.

CXXXVI.

That hour is not for us, but 'tis for you;
And as, in the great joy of your millennium,
You hardly will believe such things were true
As now occur, I thought that I would pen you cm
But may their very memory perish too!—
Yet, if perchance remember'd, still disdain you cm
More than you scorn the savages of yore,
Who painted their bare limbs, but not with gore.

CXXXVII.

And when you hear historians talk of thrones,
And those that sat upon them, let it be
As we now gaze upon the mammoth's bones,
And wonder what old world such things could see
Or hieroglyphics on Egyptian stones,
The pleasant riddles of futurity—
Guessing at what shall happily be hid,
As the real purpose of a pyramid.

CXXXVIII.

Reader! I have kept my word,—at least so far
As the first canto promised. You have now
Had sketches of love, tempest, travel, war—
All very accurate, you must allow,
And epic, if plain truth should prove no bar;
For I have drawn much less with a long bow
Than my forerunners. Carelessly I sing,
But Phoebus lends me now and then a string,

CXXXIX.

With which I still can harp, and carp, and fiddle.
What further hath befallen or may befall
The hero of this grand poetic riddle,
I by and by may tell you, if at all:
But now I choose to break off in the middle,
Worn out with battering Ismail's stubborn wall
While Juan is sent off with the despatch,
For which all Petersburg is on the watch.
CXL.

The special honor was conferred, because
He had behaved with courage and humanity;—
Which last men like, when they have time to pause
From their ferocities produced by vanity.
His little captive gain'd him some applause,
For saving her amid the wild insanity
Of carnage, and I think he was more glad in her Safety, than his new order of St. Vladimir.

CXLII.

The Moslem orphan went with her protector,
For she was homeless, houseless, helpless: all
Her friends, like the sad family of Hector,
Had perish'd in the field or by the wall:
Her very place of birth was but a spectre
Of what it had been: there the Muezzin's call
To prayer was heard no more!—and Juan wept,
And made 1 v to shield her, which he kept.

CANTO IX.

I.

Oh, Wellington! (or "Villainton"—for fame
Sounds the heroic syllables both ways;
France could not even conquer your great name,
But pun'd it down to this facetious phrase—
Beating or beaten she will laugh the same) —
You have obtain'd great pensions and much praise;
Glory like yours should any dare gain say,
Humac v would rise, and thunder. "Nay!" I

II.

I don't think that you used Kinsaird quite well
In Marinet's affair—in fact 'twas shabby,
And, like some other things, won't do to tell
Upon your tomb in Westminster's old abbey.
Upon the rest 'tis not worth while to dwell,
Such tales being for the tea hours of some tabby;
But though your years as man tend fast to zero,
In fact your grace is still but a young hero.

III.

Though Britain owes (and pays you too) so much,
Yet Europe doubtless owes you greatly more:
You have repair'd legitimacy's crutch—
A prop not quite so certain as before:
The Spanish, and the French, as well as Dutch,
Have seen, and felt, how strongly you restore;
And Waterloo has made the world your debtor—
(I wish your bards would sing it rather better.)

IV.

You are "the best of cut-throats;"—do not start;
The phrase is Shakespeare's, and not misapplied;
War's a brain-spattering, windpipe-slitting art,
Unless her cause by right be sanctified.
If you have acted once a generous part,
The world, not the world's masters, will decide,
And I shall be delighted to learn who,
Save you and yours, have gain'd by Waterloo?

V.

I am no flatterer—you've supp'd full of flattery;
They say you like it too—'tis no great wonder;
He whose whole life has been assault and battery,
At last may get a little tired of thunder;
And, swallowing cullage much more than satire, h.
May like being praised for every lucky blunder:
Call'd" Saviour of the Nations"—not yet savea,
And "Europe's Liberator"—still enslaved.

VI.

I've done. Now go and dine from off the plate
Presented by the Prince of the Brazils,
And send the sentinel before your gate;
A slice or two from your luxurious meals:
He fought, but has not fed so well of late,
Some hunger, too, they say the people feels:
There is no doubt that you deserve your ration—
But pray give back a little to the nation.

VII.

I don't mean to reflect—a man so great as
You, my Lord Duke! is far above reflection.
The high Roman fashion, too, of Cincinnatus
With modern history has but small connection;
Though as an Irishman you love potatoes,
You need not take them under your direction:
And half a million for your Sabine farm
Is rather dear!—I'm sure I mean no harm.

VIII.

Great men have always scorn'd great recompenaes
Epaminondas saved his Thebes, and died,
Not leaving even his funeral expenses:
George Washington had thanks and nought beside,
Except the all-cloudless glory (which few men is)
To free his country: Pitt, too, had his pride,
And, as a high-soul'd minister of state, is Renowned for ruining Great Britain, gratis.

IX.

Never had mortal man such opportunity,
Except Napoleon, or abused it more:
You might have freed fall'n Europe from the unity
Of tyrants, and been bless'd from shore to shore;
And none—what is your fame? Shall the Muse tune
It ye?
Now—that the rable's first vain shouts are o'er!
Go, hear it in your fanish'd country's cries!
Behold the world! and curse your victories!

X.

As these new cantos touch on warlike feats,
To you the unflattering Muse daigns to inscribe
Truths that you will not read in the gazettes,
But which, 'tis time to teach the hireling tribe
Who fatten on their country's gore and debts,
Must be recited, and—without a bribe:
You did great things; but, not being great in mind,
Have left undone the greatest—and mankind.

XI.

Death laughs—Go ponder o'er the skeleton
With which men image out the unknown thing
That hides the past world, like to a set sun
Which still elsewhere may rouse a brighter spring
Death laughs at all you weep for;—look upon
This hourly dread of all whose threaten'd sting
Turns life to terror, even though in its sheath!
Mark! how its lipless mouth grins without breath.
Mark! how it laughs and scorns at all you are!
And yet sees what you are: from ear to ear
It laughs not—there is now no flimsy bar
So call'd; the antic long hath ceased to hear.
But still he smiles; and whether near or far,
He strips from man that mantle—(far more dear than even the tailor's)—his incarnate skin,
White, black, or copper—the dead bones will grin.

And thus Death laughs,—it is sad merriment,
But still it is so—and with such example
Why should not Life be equally content,
With his superior, in a smile to trample
Upon the nothings which are daily spent
Like bubbles on an ocean much less ample
Than the eternal deluge, which devours
Suns as rays—worlds like atoms—years like ours?

"To be, or not to be! that is the question,
Says Shakspeare, who just now is much in fashion.
I am neither Alexander nor Heptesion,
Nor ever had for abstract fame much passion;
But would much rather have a sound digest,
Then Bonaparte's cancer: could I dash on Through fifty victories to shame or fame,
Without a stomach—what were a good name?

"Oh, durum illa messorum!"—"Oh, ye rigid guts of reapers!"—I translate
I or the great benefit of those who know
What indigestion—is that inward fate
Which makes all Styx through one small liver flow.
A peasant's sweat is worth his lord's estate:
Let this one toil for bread—that rack for rent,—
He who sleeps best may be the most content.

"To be, or not to be!"—Ste Evre decide,
I should be glad to know that which is being.
'Tis true we speculate both far and wide,
Deem, because we see, we are all-seeing:
For my part, I'll enlist on neither side,
Until I see both sides for once agreeing.
For me, I sometimes think that life is death,
Rather than life a mere affair of breath.

"Que scis je?" was the motto of Montaigne,
As also of the first academicians:
That all is doubtful which man may attain,
Was one of their most favorite positions.
Here's no such thing as certainty, that's plain
As any of mortality's conditions:
So little do we know what we're about in
This world, I doubt if doubt itself be doubting.

It is a pleasant voyage perhaps to float,
Like Pyrrho, on a sea of speculation;
But what if carrying sail capsize the boat?
Your wise men don't know much of navigation;
And swimming long in the abyss of thought
Is apt to tire: a calm and shallow station
[that gathers
Well nigh the shore, where one stoops down and
Some pretty shell, is best for moderate bathers.
DON JUAN

XXVI.
The consequence is, being of no party,
I shall offend all parties:—never mind!
My words, at least, are more sincere and hearty
Than if I sought to sail before the wind.
He who has nought to gain can have small art: he
Who neither wishes to be bound nor bind
May still expatiate freely, as will I,
Nor give my voice to slavery's jackal cry.

XXVII.
That's an appropriate simile, that jackal;
I've heard them in the Ephesian ruins howl!
By night, as do that mercenary pack all,
Power's base purveyors, who for pickings prowl,
And scent the prey their masters would attack all.
However, the poor jackals are less foul,
(As being the brave lion's keen providers)
Than human insects, catering for spiders.

XXVIII.
Raise but an arm! 'twill brush their web away,
And without that, their poison and their claws
Are useless. Mind, good people! what I say—
(Or rather peoples)—go on without pause!
The web of these tarantulas each day
Increases, till you shall make common cause;
None, save the Spanish fly and Attic bee,
As yet are strongly stinging to be free.

XXIX.
Don Juan, who had shone in the late slaughter,
Was left upon his way with the despatch,
Where blood was talk'd of as we would of water;
And carcasses that lay as thick as thatch
O'er silenced cities, merely served to flatter Fair Catherine's pastime—who look'd on the Between these nations as a main of cocks, [match
Wherein she liked her own to stand like rocks.

XXX.
And there in a kibitka he roll'd on,
(A cursed sort of carriage without springs,
Which on rough roads leaves scarcely a whole bone,)—
Pondering on glory, chivalry, and kings,
And orders, and on all that he had done—
And wishing that post-horses had the wings
Of Pegasus, or at the least post-chaises
Had feathers, when a traveller on deep ways is.

XXXI.
At every jolt—and there were many—still
He turn'd his eyes upon his little charge,
As if he wish'd that she should fare less ill
Than he, in these sad highways left at large
To ruts and flints, and lovely nature's skill,
Who is no pavir, nor admits a barge
On her canals, where God takes sea and land,
Fishery and farm, both into his own hand.

XXXII.
At least he pays no rent, and has best right
To be the first of what we used to call
"Gentlemen farmers"—a race worn out quite,
Since lately there have been no rents at all,
And "gentlemen" are in a piteous plight,
And "farmers" can't raise Ceres from her fall:
She fell with Bonaparte:—what strange thoughts
Arise, when we see emperors fall with oats!

XXXIII.
But Juan turn'd his eyes on the sweet child
Whom he had saved from slaughter,—what a trophy
Oh! ye who build up monuments, defiled
With gore, like Nadir Shah, that costive sophy
Who, after leaving Hindostan a wild,
And scarce to the Mogul a cup of coffee
To sooth his woes withal, was slain, the sinner
Because he could no more digest his dinner.

XXXIV.
Oh ye! or we! or she! or he! or reflect,
That one life saved, especially if young
Or pretty, is a thing to recollect
Far sweeter than the greenest laurels sprung
From the manure of human clay, though deck'd
With all the praises ever said or sung:
Though hymn'd by every harp, unless within
Your heart joins chorus, fame is but a din.

XXXV.
Oh, ye great authors luminous, voluminous!
Yet twice ten hundred thousand daily scribal
Whose pamphlets, volumes, newspapers illumine us
Whether you're paid by government in bribes,
To prove the public debt is not consuming us—
Or, roughly treading on the "courtier's kibes"
With clownish heel, your popular circulation
Feeds you by printing half the realm's starvation.

XXXVI.
Oh, ye great authors!—"Apropos des bottes"—
I have forgotten what I meant to say,
As sometimes have been greater sage's lots
'Twas something calculated to allay
All wrath in barracks, palaces, or cot's
Cerite it would have been but thrown away
And that's one comfort for my lost advice,
Although no doubt it was beyond all price.

XXXVII.
But let it go: it will one day be found
With other relics of "a former world,"
When this world shall be former, undergr. nd
Thrown topsy-turvy, twisted, crisp'd, and curl'd
Baked, fried, or burnt, turn'd inside out, or drown'd
Like all the worlds before, which have been hurl'd
First out of and then back again to chaos,
The superstratum which will overlay us.

XXXVIII.
So Cuvier says:—and then shall come again
Unto the new creation, rising out
From our old crash, some mystic, ancient straw
Of things destroy'd and left in airy doubt:
Like to the notions we now entertain
Of Titans, giants, fellows of about
Some hundred feet in height, not to say miles,
And mammnths, and your winged crocodiles

XXXIX.
Think if then George the Fourth should be dug up
How the new wordings of the then new East
Will wonder where such animals could sup!
(For they themselves will be but of the least:
Even worlds miscarry, when too off they pop.
And every new creation hath decreas'd
In size, from overworking the material—
Men are but maggots of some huge earth's outril.
XL.
How will—to these young people, just thrust out
From some fresh paradise, and set to plough,
And dig, and sweat, and turn themselves about;
And plant, and reap, and spin, and grind, and sow,
Till all the arts at length are brought about,
Especially of war and taxing—how,
I say, will these great relics, when they see 'em,
Look like the monsters of a new museum?

XLI.
Ext I am apt to grow too metaphysical:
"The time is out of joint,"—and so am I;
I quite forget this poem's merely quizzical,
And deviate into matters rather dry.
I ne'er decide what I shall say, and this I call
Much too poetical: men should know why
They write, and for what end; but, note or text,
I never know the word which will come next.

XLII.
So on I ramble, now and then narrating,
Now pondering:—it is time we should narrate:
I left Don Juan with his horses baiting—
Now we'll get o'er the ground at a great rate.
I shall not be particular of words all in a row.
His journey, we've so many tours of late:
Suppose him then at Petersburg; suppose
That pleasant capital of painted snows:

XLIII.
Suppose him in a handsome uniform;
A scarlet coat, black facings, a long plume,
Waving, like sails new shivered in a storm,
Over a cock'd hat in a crowded room,
And brilliant breeches, bright as a Cairn Gorme,
Of yellow kerseymere we may presume,
White stockings drawn, uncurled as new milk,
O'er limbs whose symmetry set off the silk:

XLIV.
Suppose him, sword by side, and hat in hand,
Made up by youth, fame, and an army tailor—
That great enhancer, at whose rod's command
Beauty springs forth, and nature's self turns paler,
Seeing how art can make her work more grand,
(When she don't pin men's limbs in line)
Behold him placed as if upon a pillar! He [jaile]
Seems Love turn'd a lieutenant of artillery.

XLV.
His bandage alip'd down into a cravat;
His wings subdued to cephalis: his quiver
Shrunk to a scabbard, with his arrows at
His side as a small-sword, but sharp as ever;
His bow converted into a cock'd hat;
But still so like, Psyche were more clever
1 can some wives (who make blunders no less stupid)
If she had not mistaken him for Cupid.

XLVI.
The courtiers stared, the ladies whisper'd, and
The empress smiled; the reigning favorite crown'd:
I quite forgot which of them was in hand
Just then, as they are rather numerous found,
Who took by turns that difficult command,
Since first her majesty was singly crown'd:
But they were mostly nervous six-foot fellows,
All fit to make a Pataganean jealous.

XLVII.
Juan was none of these, but sight and slim,
Blushing and beardless; and yet ne'ertheless
There was a something in his turn of limb,
And still more in his eye, which seem'd to express
That thought he look'd one of the seraphim,
There luck'd a man beneath the spirit's dress
Besides, the empress sometimes liked a boy,
And had just buried the fair-faced Lanskoj

XLVIII.
No wonder then that Yermoloff, or Momonoff,
Or Scherbatoff, or any other off,
Or one might dread her majesty had not room enough
Within her bosom (which was not too tough)
For a raw flame; a thought to cast off gloom enough
Along the aspect, whether smooth or rough,
Of him who, in the language of his station,
Then held that "high official situation."

XLIX.
Oh, gentle ladies! should you seek to know
The import of this diplomatic phrase,
Bid Ireland's Londonderry's Marquess show
His parts of speech; and in the strange displays
Of that odd string of words all in a row
Which none divine, and every one obeys,
Perhaps you may pick out some queer no-meaning;
Of that weak wordy harvest the sole gleaning.

L.
I think I can explain myself without
That sad inexplicable beast of prey—
That sphinx, whose words would ever be a doubt,
Did not his deeds unridge them each day—
That monstrous hieroglyphic—that long spout
Of blood and water, leaden Castlereagh!—
And here I must an anecdote relate,
But luckily of no great length or weight.

LI.
An English lady ask'd of an Italian,
What were the actual and official duties
Of the strange thing some women set a value on,
Which hovers o'er about some married beauties,
Call'd "Cavaller Servente"—"a Pygmalion
Whose statues warm (I fear, alas! too true'tis)
Beneath his art. The dame, pressed to disclose
Said—"Lady, I beseech you to suppose them." [them

LII.
And thus I supplicate your supposition,
And mildest, matron-like interpretation,
Of the imperial favorite's condition.
"Twas a high place, the highest in the nation
In fact, if not in rank; and the suspicion
Of any one's attaining to his station,
No doubt gave pain, where each new pair of shoulders
If rather broad, made stocks rise and their holders.

LIII.
Juan. I said, was a most beauteous boy,
And had retain'd his boyish look beyond
The usual histrionic seasons which destroy,
With beard and whiskers, and the like, the fond Purdue aspect, which upset all Troy
And founded Doctors' Commons: I have confide
The history of divorces, which, though check'd, do,
Calls Ilion's the first damages on record.
DON JUAN.

LIV.  The two first feelings ran their course complete,
And lighted first her eye and then her mouth:
The whole court look'd immediately most sweet,
Like flowers well water'd after a long drouth:—
But when on the lieutenant, at her feet,
Her majesty—who liked to gaze on youth
Almost as much as on a new despatch—
Glanced mildly, all the world was on the watch."

LXII.  Though somewhat large, exuberant, and truculent,
When wrath; waile pleased, she was as fine a figure
As those who like things rosy, ripe, and succulent
Would wish to look on, while they are in vigor
She could repay each amatory look you lent
With interest, and in turn was wont with rigor
To exact of Cupid's bills the full amount
At sight, nor would permit you to discount.

LXIII.  With her the latter, though at times convenient,
Was not so necessary: for they tell [lentient,
That she was handsome, and, though fierce, look'd
And always used her favours too well.
If once beyond her boudoir's precincts in ye went,
Your "fortune" was in a fair way "to swell
A man," as Giles says, & for, though she would widow
Nations, she liked man as an individual. [all

LXIV.  What a strange thing is man! and what a stranger
Is woman! What a whirlwind is her head,
And what a whirlpool full of depth and danger
Is all the rest about her! whether wed,
Or widow, maid, or mother, she can change her
Mind like the wind; whatever she has said
Or done, is light to what she'll say or do:—
The oldest thing on record, and yet new!

LXV.  Oh, Catherine! (for of all interjections
To thee both oh! and ah! belong of right
In love and war) how odd are the connections
Of human thoughts, which jostle in their flight!
Just now yours were cut out in different sections:
First, Ismail's capture caught your fancy quite;
Next, of new knights the fresh and glorious batch
And thirdly, he who brought you the despatch!

LXVI.  Shakspeare talks of "the herald Mercury
New lighted on a heaven-kissing hill;"
And some such visions cross'd her majesty,
While her young herald knelt before her stile.
'Tis very true the hill seem'd rather high
For a lieutenant to climb up; but skill [bazzng
Smooth'd even the Simpion's steep, and, by God'
With youth and health all kisses are "heaven-kiss

LXVII.  Her majesty look'd down, the youth look'd up
And so they fell in love;—she with his face,
His grace, his God-knows-what: for Cupid's cup
With the first draught intoxicates apace,
A quintessential laudanum or "black drop,"
Which makes one drunk at once, without the base
Expedient of full bursers; for the eye
In love drinks all life's fountains (save tears) dry.
LXVIII.

He, on the other hand, if not in love,
Fell into that no less imperious passion,
Self-love—which, when some sort of thing above
Ourselves, a singer, dancer, much in fashion,
Or duchess, princess, empress, "deigns to prove,"
(Tis Pope's phrase,) a great longing, though a
For one especial person out of many, [ rash one,
Makes us believe ourselves as good as any.

LXIX.

Besides, he was of that delighted age
'Which makes all female ages equal—when
We don't much care with whom we may engage,
As bold as Daniel in the lions' den,
So that we can native sun assuage
In the next ocean, which may flow just then,
To make a twilight in—just as Sol's heat is Quench'd in the lap of the salt sea, or Thetis.

LXX.

And Catherine (we must say thus much for Catherine)
Though bold and bloody, was the kind of thing
Whose temporary passion was quite flattering,
Because each lover look'd a sort of king,
Made up upon an amatory pattern—
A royal husband in all save the ring—
Which being the damn'dest part of matrimony,
Seem'd taking out the sting to leave the honey.

LXXI.

And when you add to this, her womanhood
In its meridian, her blue eyes, or gray—
(The last, if they have soul, are quite as good,
Or better, as the best examples say:
Napoleon's, Mary's, (Queen of Scotland,) should Lend to that color a transcendent ray;
And Pallas also sanctions the same hue—
Too wise to look through optics black or blue—

LXXII.

Her sweet smile, and her then majestic figure,
Her plumpness, her imperial condescension,
Her preference of a boy to men much bigger,
(Fellows whom Messalina's self would pension,)
Her prime of life, just now in juicy vigor,
With other extras which we need not mention.—
All these, or any one of these, explain
Enough to make a stirpling very vain.

LXXIII.

And that's enough, for love is vanity,
Selfish in its beginning as its end,
Except where 'tis a mere insanity,
A maddening spirit which would strive to blend itself with beauty's frail inanity,
On which the passion's self seems to depend:
And hence some heathenish philosophers
Make love the mainspring of the universe.

LXXIV.

Besides Platonic love, besides the love
Of God, the love of sentiment, the loving
Of faithful pairs—(I needs must rhyme with dove,
That good old steamboat which keeps verses mov-
Gainst reason—reason ne'er was hand-and-glove (ing
With rhyme, but always lean'd less to improving
The sound than sense)—besides all these pretences to love, there are those things which words name senses;

LXXV.

Those movements, those improvements in our bodies
Which make all bodies anxious to get out
Of their own sandpits to mix with a goddess—
For such all women are at first, no doubt.
How beautiful that moment! and how odd is
That fever which precedes the languid rout
Of our sensations! What a curious way
The whole thing is of clothing souls in clay.

LXXVI.

The noblest kind of love is love Platonical.
To end or to begin with; the next grand
Is that which may be christen'd love canonical,
Because the clergy take the thing in hand;
The third sort to be noted in our chronicle,
As flourishing in every Christian land,
Is, when chaste matrons to their other ties
Add what may be call'd marriage in disguise

LXXVII.

Well, we won't analyze—our story must Tell for itself: the sov'reign was smitten,
Juan much flatter'd by her love, or lust—
I cannot stop to alter words once written,
And the two are so mix'd with human dust,
That he who names one, both perechance may hit on
But in such matters Russia's mighty empress
Behaved no better than a common sempstress.

LXXVIII.

The whole court melted into one wide whisper,
And all lips were applied unto all ears!
The elder ladies' wrinkles curl'd much crisper
As they held up to alter words once leers
On one another, and each lovely lisper
Smil'd as she talk'd the matter o'er; but tears
Of rivalry rose in each clotted eye
Of all the standing army who stood by.

LXXIX.

All the ambassadors of all the powers
Inquired, who was this very new young man,
Who promised to be great in some few hours?
Which is full soon, (though life is but a span.)
Already they beheld the silver showers
Of roubles rain, as fast as specie can,
Upon his cabinet, besides the presents
Of several ribbands and some thousand peasants.

LXXX.

Catherine was generous,—all such ladies are;
Love, that great opener of the heart and all
The ways that lead there, be they near or far:
Above, below, by turnpikes great or small,—
Love—(though she had a cursed taste for war,
And was not the best wife, unless we call
Such Clytemnestra; though perhaps 'tis better
That one should die, than two drug on theetter)

LXXXI.

Love had made Catherine make each lover's fortune,
Unlike our own half chaste Elizabeth,
Whose avarice all disbursements did importune,
If history, the grand liar, ever saith [shorten,
The truth; and though grief her old age might
Because she put a favorite to death,
Her vile ambiguous method of dishartation,
And stinginess, disgrace her sex and station
LXXXII.

But when the levee rose, and all was bustle
In the dissolving circle, all the nations' Ambassadors began as 'twere to bustle
Round the young man with their congratulations.
Also the softer silks were heard to rustle
Of gentle dames, among whose recreations It is to speculate on handsome faces, Especially when such lead to high places.

LXXXIII.

Juan, who found himself, he knew not how,
A general object of attention, made
His answers with a very graceful bow,
As if born for the ministerial trade.
Though modest, on his unembarrass'd brow
Nature had written "Gentleman." He said Little, but to the purpose; and his manner Flung hovering graces o'er him like a banner.

LXXXIV.

An order from her majesty consign'd
Our young lieutenant to the genial care Of those in office: all the world look'd kind, (As it will look sometimes with the first stare, Which youth would not act ill to keep in mind;) As also did Miss Protasoff then there, Named, from her mystic office, "l'Éprouveuse," A term inexplicable to the Muse.

LXXXV.

With her, then, as in humble duty bound, Juan retired,—and so will I, until My Pegasus shall tire of touching ground. We have just lit on a "heaven-kissing hill," So lofty that I feel my brain turn round, And all my fancies whirling like a mill; Which is a signal to my nerves and brain To take a quiet ride in some green lane.

CANTO X.

I.

When Newton saw an apple fall, he found
In that slight startle from his contemplation—
Tis said (for I'll not answer above ground For any sage's creed or calculation)—
A mode of proving that the earth turn round In a most natural whirl, call'd "gravitation;"
And this is the sole mortal who could grapple, Since Adam, with a fall or with an apple.

II.

Man fell with apples, and with apples rose,
If this be true; for we must deem the mode In which Sir Isaac Newton could disclose, Through the then unpaved stars, the turnpike road, A thing to counterbalance human woes;
For, ever since, immortal man hath glow'd With all kinds of mechanisms, and full soon Steam engines will conduct him to the moon.

III.

And wherefore this exordium?—Why just now, In taking up this paltry sheet of paper, My bosom underwent a glorious glow, And my internal spirit cut a caper: And though so much inferior, as I know, To those who, by the dint of glass and vapor, Discover stars, and sail in the wind's eye, I wish to do as much by poesy.

IV.

In the wind's eye I have sail'd, and sail; but for The stars, I own my telescope is dim;
But at the least I've shunn'd the common shore, And, leaving land far out of sight, would skim The ocean of eternity: the roar Of breakers has not daunted my slight, trim, But still sea-worthy skiff; and she may float Where ships have founder'd, as doth many a boat.

V.

We left our hero, Juan, in the bloom Of favoritism, but not yet in the blush; And far be it from my Muses to presume (For I have more than one Muse at a push) To follow him beyond the drawing-room:
It is enough that fortune found him flush Of youth and vigor, beauty, and those things Which for an instant clip enjoyment's wings

VI.

But soon they grow again, and leave their nest. "Oh!" saith the Psalmist, "that I had a dove's Pinions, to flee away and be at rest!" And who, that recollects young years and loves,— Though hoary now, and with a withering breast, And palesd fancy, which no longer roves [rather Beyond its dimm'd eye's sphere,—but would much Sigh like his son, than cough like his grandfather?

VII.

But sighs subside, and tears (even widow's) shrink Like Arno, in the summer, to a shallow, So narrow as to shame their wintry brink, Which threatens inundations deep and yellow! Such difference doth a few months make. You'd think Grief a rich field which never would lie fallow; No more it doth, its ploughs but change their boys, Who furrow some new soil to sow for joys.

VIII.

But coughs will come when sighs depart—and now And then before sighs cease; for oft the one Will bring the other, ere the lake-like brow Is ruffled by a wrinkle, or the sun Of life reach ten o'clock: and while a glow, Hectic and brief as summer's day nigh done, O'erspreads the cheek which seems too pure for clay, Thousands blaze, love, hope, die—how happy they?

IX.

But Juan was not meant to die so soon. We left him in the focus of such glory As may be won by favor of the moon, Or ladies' fancies—rather transitory Perhaps: but who would scorn the month of June Because December, with his breath so hoary, Must come? Much rather should he court the ray, To hoard up warmth against a wintry day
X.
Besides, he had some qualities which fix
Middle-aged ladies even more than young: [chicks
The former know what's what; while new fledg'd
Know little more of love than what is sung
In rhymes, or dream'd, (for fancy will play tricks,)
In visions of those skies from whence love sprung.
Some reckon women by their suns or years—
I rather think the moon should date the dears.

XI.
And why? because she's changeable and chaste.
I know no other reason, whatsoever:
Suspicious people, who find fault in haste,
May choose to tax me with; which is not fair,
Nor flattering to "their temper or their taste,"
As my friend Jeffrey writes with such an air:
However, I forgive him, and I trust
He will forgive himself;—if not, I must

XII.
Old enemies who have become new friends
Should so continue—"tis a point of honor;
And I know nothing which could make amends
For a return to hatred: I would shun her
Like garlic, howsoever she extends
Her hundred arms and legs, and fan out run her.
Old flames, new wives, become our bitterest foes—
Converted foes should scorn to join with those.

XIII.
This were the worst desertion: renegadoes,
Even shuffling Southerny—that incarne lie—
Would scarcely join again the "reformadoes,"
Whom he forsook to fill the laureate's sty:—
And honest men, from Iceland to Barbadoes,
Whether in Caledon or Italy,
Should not ne'er round with every breath, nor seize
To pain, the moment when you cease to please.

XIV.
The lawyer and the critic but behold
The baser sides of literature and life,
And nought remains unseen, but much untold,
By those who scour those double vales of strife.
While common men grow ignorantly old,
The lawyer's brief is like the surgeon's knife,
Dissecting the whole inside of a question,
And with it all the process of digestion.

XV.
A legal broom's a moral chimney-sweeper,
And that's the reason he himself's so dirty;
The endless soot bestows a tint far deeper Than can be hid by altering his shirt:—he Retains the sable stains of the dark creeper—
At least some twenty-nine, do out of thirty,
In all their habits: not so you, I own;
As Cæsar wore his robe you wear your gown.

XVI.
And all our little feuds, at least all mine,
Dear Jeffrey, once my most redoubted foe,
(As far as rhyme and criticism combine
To make such puppets of us things below,)
Are over: Here's a health to "Auld Lang Syne!"
I do not know you, and may never know
Your face—but you have acted on the whole
Most kindly, and I own it from my soul.

XVII.
And when I use the phrase of "Auld Lang Syne!
'Tis not address'd to you—the more's the pity
For me, for I would rather take my wine
With you, than aught (save Scott) in your proud
But somehow,—it may seem a schoolboy's whine,
And yet I seek not to be grand nor witty,
But I am half a Scot by birth, and bred
A whole one, and my heart dies to my head:

XVIII.
As "Auld Lang Syne" brings Scotland one and all, Scotch plaid, Scotch scoffs; the blue hills, and clear streams,
The Dee, the Don, Balgounie's Brig's black wall,
All my boy feelings, all my gentler dreams
Of what I then dream'd, clothed in their own pall,
Like Banquo's offspring—floating past me seems
My childhood in this childishness of mine:
I care not—"tis a glimpse of "Auld Lang Syne."

XIX.
And though, as you remember, in a fit
Of wrath and rhyme, when juvenile and curly.
I rail'd at Scots to show my wrath and wit,
Which must be own'd was sensitive and surly,
Yet 'tis in vain such sallies to permit;
They cannot quench young feelings fresh and early;
I "sootch'd, not kill'd," the Scotchman in my blood,
And love the land of "mountain and of flood."

XX.
Don Juan, who was real or ideal,—
For both are much the same, since what men think
Exists when the once thinkers are less real,
Than what they thought, for mind can never sink.
And 'gainst the body makes a strong appeal;
And yet 'tis very puzzling on the brink
Of what is call'd eternity, to stare,
And know no more of what is here than there:

XXI.
Don Juan grew a very polish'd Russian—
How we won't mention, why we need not say
Few youthful minds can stand the strong concussion
Of any slight temptation in their way;
But his just now were spread as is a cushion
Smooth'd for a monarch's seat of honor: gay
Damsels, and dances, revels, ready money,
Made ice seem paradise, and winter sunny.

XXII.
The favor of the empress was agreeable;
And though the duty wax'd a little hard,
Young people at his time of life should be able
To come off handomely in that regard.
He was now growing up like a green tree, able
For love, war, or ambition, which reward
Their luckier votaries, till old age's edium
Make some prefer the circulating medium.

XXIII.
About this time, as might have been anticipated,
Seduced by youth and dangerous examples,
Don Juan grew, I fear, a little dissipated;
Which is a sad thing, and not only tramples
On our fresh feelings, but—as being participated
With all kinds of incorrigible samples
Of frail humanity—must make us selfish,
And shut our souls up in us like a shell-fish.
DON JUAN.

XXIV.
This we pass over. We will also pass
The usual progress of intrigues between Unequal matches, such as are, alas!
A young lieutenant's with a not old queen,
But one who is not so youthful as she was
In all the royalty of sweet seventeen.
Sovereigns may sway materials, but not matter,
And wrinkles (the d—d democrats) won't flatter.

XXV.
And Death, the sovereign's sovereign, though the Gracchus of all mortality, who levels [great
With his Agrarian laws, the high estate
Of him who feasts, and fights, and roars, and revels,
To or small grass-grown patch (which must await Corruption for its crop) with the poor devils
Who never had a foot of land till now,—
Death's a reformer, all men must allow.

XXVI.
He lived (not Death, but Juan) in a hurry [glitter,
Of waste, and haste, and glare, and gloss, and
In this gay clime of bear-skins black and furry—
Which (though I hate to say a thing that's bitter)
Peep out sometimes, when things are in a flurry,
Through all the "purple and fine linen," flutter
For Babylon's [he Russia's royal harlot—
And neutralize her outward show of scarlet.

XXVII.
And this same state we won't describe: we could
Perhaps from hearsay, or from recollection;
But getting nigh grim Dante's "obscure wood,"
That horrid equinox, that hateful section
Of human years, that half-way house, that rude
Hut, whence wise travellers drive with circumspec-
Life's sad post-horses o'er the dreary frontier (tion
Of age, and, looking back to youth, give one tear;—

XXVIII.
I won't describe—that is, if I can help
Description; and I won't reflect—that is,
If I can stave off thought, which—as a whelp
Clings to its test—sticks to me through the abyss
Of this odd labyrinth; or as the kelp
Holds by the rock; or as a lover's kiss
Drains its first draught of lips: but, as I said,
I won't philosophise, and will be read.

XXIX.
Juan, instead of courting courts, was courted,
A thing which happens rarely; this he owed
Much to his youth, and much to his reported
Valor; much also to the blood he show'd,
Like a racehorse: much to each dress he sported,
Which set the beauty off in which he glow'd,
As purple clouds befog the sun; but most
He owed to an old woman and his post.

XXX.
He wrote to Spain:—and all his near relations,
Perceiving he was in a handsome way
Of getting on himself, and finding stations
For cousins also, answ'er'd the same day.
Several prepared themselves for emigrations;
And, eating ices, were o'erheard to say,
That with the addition of a slight pelisse,
Madrid's and Moscow's climes were of a piece.

XXXI.
His mother, Donna Inez, finding, too,
That in the lieu of drawing on his banker,
Where his assets were waxing rather few, [chor
He had brought his spending to a handsome an Replied, "that she was glad to see him through Those pleasure after which wild youth will hang
As the sole sign of man's being in his senses
Is, learning to reduce his past expenses.

XXXII.
"She also recommended him to God,
And no less to God's Son, as well as Mother,
Warn'd him against Greek worship, which looks odd
In Catholic eyes; but told him too to smoother
Outward disliking, which don’t look well abroad
Inform'd him that he had a little brother
Born in a second wedlock; and above
All, praised the empress's maternal love.

XXXIII.
"She could not too much give her approbation
Unto an empress, who preferr'd young men
Whose age, and, what was better still, whose . . . tion
And climate, stopp'd all scandal, (now and then:)
At home it might have given her some vexation;
But where thermometers sunk down to ten,
Or five, or one, or zero, she could never
Believe that virtue th'ad before the river.

XXXIV.
Oh, for a forty-parson power to chant
Thy praise, hypocrisy! Oh for a hymn
Loud as the virtues thou dost loudly vaunt,
Not practise! Oh for trumps of cherubim
Or the ear-trumpet of my good old aunt,
Who, though her spectacles at last grew dim,
Drew quiet consolation through its hint
When she no more could read the pious print.

XXXV.
She was no hypocrite, at least, poor soul!
But went to heaven in as sincere a way
As any body on the elected roll,
Which portions out upon the judgment day
Heaven's freeholds, in a sort of doomsday roll,
Such as the Conqueror William did repay
His knights with, lotting others' properties
Into some sixty thousand new knights' fees.

XXXVI.
I can't complain, whose ancestors are the Erneis, Radulphus—eight and forty manors
(If that my memory doth not greatly err)
Were their reward for following Billy's banne
And, though I can't help thinking 'twas scarce fair
To strip the Saxons of their Aydes, like tanners
Yet as they founded churches with the produce,
You'll deem, no doubt, they put it to a good use.

XXXVII.
The gentle Juan flourish'd, though at times
He felt like other plants—call'd sensitive,
Which shrink from touch, as monarchs do from
Save such as Southey can afford to give. [rhymes
Perhaps he long'd, in bitter frost, for climes
In which the Neva's ice would cease to live
Before May-day: perhaps, despite his duty,
In royalty's vast arms he sigh'd for beauty:
XXXVIII.

Perhaps,—but, save perhaps, we need not seek
For causes young or old: the canker-worn
Will feed upon the fairest, freest cheek,
As well as further drain the wither'd form:
Care, like a housekeeper, brings every week
His bills in, and, however we may storm,
They must be paid: though six days smoothly run,
The seventh will bring blue devils or a dun.

XXXIX.

I don’t know how it was, but he grew sick:
The empress was alarmed, and her physician
(The same who physicked Peter) found the tick
Of his fierce pulse betoken a condition
Which augur’d of the dead, however quick
Itself, and showed a feverish disposition;
At which the whole court was extremely troubled,
The sovereign shock’d, and all his medicines doubled.

XL.

Low were the whispers, manifold the rumors:
Some said he had been poison’d by Potemkin;
Others talk’d learnedly of certain tumors,
Exhaustion, or disorders of the same kin;
Some said ’twas a concoction of the humors,
Which with the blood too readily will claim kin;
Others again were ready to maintain,
“’Twas only the fatigue of last campaign.”

XLI.

But here is one prescription out of many:
“Sode sulphat. 3 vj. 3 l. Manna optim.
Ag. fervent. f. 3 f. 3. j. tinct. Semno [him]
Haustus” (And here the surgeon came and cupp’d
“R. Pulv. Com. gr. ii. Psecacauana”
(With more beside if Juan had not stopp’d ‘em, “Bolus Potassum Sulphurat. sumendus,
Et haustus ter in die capiendus.”

XLII.

This is the way physicians mend or end us,
Secundum artem: but although we sneer
In health—when ill, we call them to attend us,
Without the least propensity to jeer;
While that “hasta maxime defendas,”
To be fill’d up by spade or mattock, is near,
Instead of gliding gracefully down Lethe,
We tease mild Baillie, or soft Abernethy.

XLIII.

Juan demurr’d at this first notice to [tion,
Quilt; and, though death had threaten’d an ejec-
His youth and constitution bore him through,
And sent the doctors in a new direction.
But still his state was delicate: the hue
Of health but flicker’d with a faint reflection
Along his wasted cheeks, and seemed to grave
The faculty—who said that he must travel.

XLIV.

The climate was too cold, they said, for him,
Meridian-born, to bloom in. This opinion
Made the chaste Catherine look a little grim,
Who did not like at first to lose her minion:
But when she saw his dazzling eye wax dim,
And drooping like an eagle’s with clipp’d pinion,
She then resolved to send him on a mission,
But in a style becoming his condition.

XLV.

There was just then a kind of a discussion
A sort of treaty or negotiation
Between the British cabinet and Russian,
Maintain’d with all the due provarication [on
With which great states such things are apt to push
Something about the Baltic’s navigation,
Hides, train-oil, fallow, and the rights of Thetis
Which Britons deem their “uti possidetis.”

XLVI.

So Catherine, who had a handsome way
Of fitting out her favorites, confer’d
This secret charge on Juan, to display
At once her royal splendor, and reward
His services. He kiss’d hands the next day,
Received instructions how to play his card,
Was laden with all kinds of gifts and honors,
Which show’d what great discernment was the donor’s.

XLVII.

But she was lucky, and luck’s all. Your queens
Are generally prosperous in reigning;
Which puzzles us to know what fortune means.
But to continue: though her years were waning
Her climacteric teasing her like her teens;
And though her dignity brook’d no complaining,
So much did Juan’s setting off distress her,
She could not find at first a fit successor.

XLVIII.

But time, the comforter, will come at last;
And four-and-twenty hours, and twice that number
Of candidates requesting to be placed,
Made Catherine taste next night a quiet slumber
Not that she meant to fix again in haste,
Nor did she find the quantity encumber,
But, always choosing with deliberation,
Kept the place open for their emulation.

XLIX.

While this high post of honor’s in abeyance,
For one or two days, reader, we request
You’ll mount with your young hero the conveyance
Which wafted him from Petersburg; the best
Barouche, which had the glory to display once
The fair Clarissa’s autocratic crest.
(When, a new Iphigenia, she went to Tauris,)
Was given to her favorite, and now bore his.

L.

A bull-dog, and a bull-finch, and an ermine,
All private favorites of Don Juan; for (Let deeper sages the true cause determine)
He had a kind of inclination, or Weakness, for what most people deem mere vermin—
Live animals—an old maid of three score
For cats and birds more penchant never display’d
Although he was not old, nor even a maid.

LI.

The animals aforesaid occupied
Their station: there were valets, secretaries,
In other vehicles; but at his side
Sat little Leila, who survived the parries
He made ’gainst Cossack sabres, in the wide
Slaughter of Ismail. Though my wild Muse varies
Her note, she don’t forget the infant girl
Whom he preserved, a pure and living pearl.
As rare in living beings as a fossil [Olivier!]

Man, 'mid thy mouldy mammoths, "grand ill fitted was her ignorance to jo-te
With this overwhelming world, where all must err:
But she was yet but ten years old, and therefore
Was tranquil, though she knew not why or wherefor.

LII.

Don Juan loved her, and she loved him, as
Nor brother, father, sister, daughter love.
I cannot tell exactly what it was:
He was not yet quite old enough to prove
Parental feelings, and the other class,
Call'd brotherly affection, could not move
His bosom—for he never had a sister:
Ah! if he had how much he would have miss'd her!

LIV.

and still less was it sensual; for besides
That he was not an ancient debauchee,
(Who like sour fruit to stir their veins' salt tides,
As acids rouse a dormant alkali.)
Although (t'lest happen as our planet guides)
His youth was not the chasteest that might be,
There was the purest Platonism at bottom
Of all his feelings—only he forgot 'em.

LV.

Just now there was no peril of temptation;
He loved the infant orphan he had saved,
As patriots (now and then) may love a nation;
His pride too felt that she was not enslaved,
Owing to him;—as also her salvation,
[paved.
Through his means and the church's, might be
But one thing's odd, which here must be inserted—
The little Turk refused to be converted.

LVI.

'Twas strange enough she should retain the impression [slaughter;
Through such a scene of change, and dread, and
But, though three bishops told her the transgression,
She show'd a great dislike to holy water:
She also had no passion for confession;—
Perhaps she had nothing to confess;—no matter
Whate'er the cause, the church made little of it—
She still held out that Mahomet was a prophet.

LVII.

In fact, the only Christian she could bear
Was Juan, whom she seem'd to have selected
In place of what her home and friends once were.
He naturally loved what he protected;
And thus they form'd a rather curious pair:
A guardian green in years, a ward connected
In neither clime, time, blood, with her defender;
And yet this want of ties made theirs more tender.

LVIII.

They journey'd on through Poland and through Warsaw,
Famous for mines of salt and yokes of iron:
Through Courland also, which that famous false saw,
Which gave her dukes? the graceless name of "Biron."
This the same landscape which the modern Mars
Who marched to Moscow, led by fame, the syren!
To lose, by one month's frost, some twenty years
Of conquest, and his guard of grenadiers.

LIX.

Let not this seem an anti-climax:—"Oh! clay—
My guard! my old guard!" exclaim'd that god of Think of the Thunderer's falling down below
Carotid—artery—cutting Castlereagh!
Alas! that glory should be chill'd by snow!
Bu', should we wish to warm us on our way
Through Poland, there is Kosciusko's name
Might scatter fire through ice, like Hecla's flame.

LX.

From Poland they came on th. agph Prussia proper.
And Konigsberg the capital, whose vaunt,
Besides some veins of iron, lead, or copper,
Has lately been the great Professor Kant.
Juan, who cared not a tobacco-stopper
About philosophy, pursued his jaunt
To Germany, whose somewhat tardy millions
Have princes who spurn more than their postillions.

LXI.

And thence through Berlin, Dresden, and the like
Until he reached the castellated Rhine:
Ye glorious Gothic scenes! how much ye strike
All phantasies, not even excepting mine:
A gray wall, a green ruin, rusty pike,
Make my soul pass the equinoctial line
Between the present and past worlds, and hover
Upon their airy confines, half-seas-over.

LXII.

But Juan posted on through Manheim, Bonn,
Which Drachdenfels frowns over like a spectre
Of the go--feudal times for ever gone,
On which I have not time just now to lecture.
From thence he was drawn onwards to Cologne.
A city which presents to the inspector
Eleven thousand maidenheads of bone,
The greatest number flesh hath ever known.

LXIII.

From thence to Holland's Hague and Helvoetsluyys
That watery land of Dutchmen and of ditches,
Where Junipero expresses its best juice—
The poor man's sparkling substitute for riches.
Senates and sages have condemn'd its use—
But to deny the mob a cordial which is Too often all the clothing, meat, or fuel,
Good government has left them, seems but cruel.

LXIV.

Here he embark'd, and, with a flowing sail,
Went bounding for the island of the free,
Towards which the impatient wind blew half a gale
High dash'd the spray, the bows dipp'd in the sea
And sea-sick passengers turn'd somewhat pale:
But Juan, season'd, as he well might be
By former voyages, stood to watch the skiffs
Which pass'd, or catch the first glimpse of the cliffs.

LXV.

At length they rose, like a white wall along
The blue sea's border; and Don Juan felt—
What even young strangers feel a little strong
At the first sight of Albion's chalky belt—
A kind of pride that he should be among Those haughty shopkeepers, who sternly dealt
Their goods and edicts oft from pole to pole,
And made the very billows pay them toll.
LXVI.
I've no great cause to love that spot of earth,
Which holds what might have been the noblest!
But though I owe it little but my birth,
[Nation;]
I feel a mix'd regret and veneration.
For its decaying fame and former worth.
Seven years (the usual term of transportation)
Of absence lay one's old resentments level,
When a man's country's going to the devil.

LXVII.
Alas! could she but fully, truly know
How her great name is now throughout abhorr'd;
How eager all the earth is for the blow
Which shall lay bare her bosom to the sword;
How all the nations deem her worst foe;
That worse than worst of foes, the once adored
False friend, who held out freedom to mankind,
And now would chain them, to the very mind:—

LXVIII.
Would she be proud, or boast herself the free,
Who is but first of slaves? The nations are
In prison,—but the jailer, what is he?
No less a victim to the bolt and bar
Is the poor privilege to turn the key
Upon the captive, freedom? He's as far
From the enjoyment of the earth and air
Who watches o'er the chain, as they who wear.

LXIX.
Don Juan now saw Albion's earliest beauties,
Thy cliffs, dear Dover! harbor, and hotel;
Thy custom-house, with all its delicate duties;
Thy waiters running mACKS at every bell;
Thy packets, all whose passengers are booties
To those who upon land or water dwell;
And last, not least, to strangers un instructed,
Thy long, long bills, whence nothing is deducted.

LXX.
Juan, though careless, young, and magnifique,
And rich in roubles, diamonds, cash, and credit,
Who did not limit much his bills per week,
Yet stared at this a little, though he paid it—
(His majesty domo, a smart subtle Greek.
Before him summon'd the awful scroll and read it:)
But doubtless as the air, though seldom sunny,
Is free, the respirations's worth the money.

LXXX.
On with the horses! Off to Canterbury!
Tramp, tramp o'er pebble, and splash, splash
through puddle;
Hurrah! how swiftly speeds the post so merry!
Not like slow Germany, wherein they muddle
Along the road, as if they went to bury
Their fare; and also pause, besides, to fuddle
With "schnappes"—sad dogs! whom "Hundsfot" or "Ferfuctor"
Affect no more than lightning a conductor.

LXXI.
Now, there is nothing gives a man such spirits,
Leavening his blood as Cayenne doth a curry,
As going at full speed—no matter where its Direction be, so 'tis but in a hurry,
And merely for the sake of its own merits:
For the less cause there is for all this flurry,
The greater is the pleasure in arriving
At the great era of travel—which is driving.

LXXII.
They saw at Canterbury the Cathedral;
Black Edward's helm, and Becket's bloody stone,
Were pointed out as usual by the bedral,
In the same quaint, uninterested tone:
There's glory again for you, gentle reader! all
Ends in a rusty casque and dubious bone.
Half-solvo into these sodas or magנציs,
Which form that bitter draught, the human species.

LXXIII.
The effect on Juan was of course sublime:
He breathed a thousand Cressays, as he saw
That casque, which never stoop'd except to Time.
Even the bold Churchman's tomb excited awe,
Who died in the then great attempt to climb
O'er kings, who now at least must talk of law,
Before they butcher. Little Leila gazed,
And asked why such a structure had been raised:

LXXIV.
And being told it was "God's house," she said
He was well lodged, but only wonder'd how
He suffer'd infidels in his homestead,
The cruel Nazarenes, who had laid low
His holy temples in the lands which bred
The true believers:—and her infant brow
Was bent with grief that Mahomet should resign
A mosque so noble, flung like pearls to swine.

LXXV.
On, on! through meadows, managed like a garden,
A paradise of hops and high production;
For, after years of travel by a bard in Countries of greater heat but lesser suction,
A green field is a sight which makes him pardon
The absence of that more sublime construction
Which mixes up vines, olives, precipices,
Glaciers, volcanoes, oranges, and ices.

LXXVI.
And when I think upon a pot of beer—
But I won't weep!—and so, drive on, postillions!
As the smart boys spur'd fast in their career,
Juan admired these highways of free millions;
A country in all senses the most dear!
To foreigner or native, save some silly ones,
Who "kick against the pricks" just at this juncture
And for their pains get only a fresh puncture.

LXXVII.
What a delightful thing's a turnpike road!
So smooth, so level, such a mode of shaving
The earth, as scarce the eagle in the broad
Air can accomplish, with his wide wings waving.
Had such been cut in Phaeton's time, the god
Had told his son to satisfy his craving
With the York mail—but, onward as we roll,
"Surgit avari aliquid"—the toll!

LXXVIII.
Alas! how deeply painful is all payment! [purses,
Take lives, take wives, take aught except men]
As Machiavel shows those in purple raiment.
Such is the shortest way to general curses.
They hate a murderer much less than a claimant
On that sweet ore, which every body nurses—
Kill a man's family, and he may brook it;
But keep your hands out of his breeches' pocket.
LXXX.

so said the Florentine: ye monarchs, hearken
T. your instructor. Juan now was borne,
Yet as the day began to wane and darken;
O'er the high hill which looks with pride or scorn Toward the great city—ye who have a spark in Your veins of cockney spirit, smile or mourn, According as you take things well or ill—
But Britons, we are now on Shooter's Hill!

LXXXI.
The sun went down, the smoke rose up, as from A half-unquench'd volcano, o'er a space Which well beseech'd the "Devil's drawing-room," As some have qualified that wondrous place. But Juan felt, though not approaching home, As one who, though he were not of the race, Revered the soul, of those true sons the mother, Who butcher'd half the earth, and bullied t'other.

LXXXII.
A mighty mass of brick, and smoke, and shipping, Dirty and dusky, but as wide as eye Could reach, with here and there a sail just skipping In sight, then lost amid the forestry Of masts; a wilderness peopling On tiptoe, through their sea-coal canopy; A huge dun cupola, like a foolscap crown On a fool's head—and there is London town!

LXXXIII.
But Juan saw not this: each wreath of smoke Appeard to him but as the magic vapor Of some alchymic furnace, from whence broke The wealth of worlds, (a wealth of tax and paper;) The gloomy clouds, which o'er it as a yoke Are bow'd, and put the sun out like a taper, Were nothing but the natural atmosphere— Extremely wholesome, though but rarely clear.

LXXXIV.
He paused—and so will I—as doth a crew Before they give their broadside. By and by, My gentle countrymen, we will renew Our old acquaintance, and at least I'll try To tell you truths you will not take as true, Because they are so,—a male Mrs. Fry, With a soft besom will I sweep your halls, And brush a web or two from off the walls.

LXXXV.
Oh, Mrs. Fry! why go to Newgate? Why Preach to poor rogues? And wherfore not begin With Carlton, or with other houses? Try Your hand at harden'd and imperial sin. To mend the people's an absolute, A jargon, a mere philanthropic din, Unless you make their better better.—Fie! I thought you had more religion, Mrs. Fry.

LXXXVI.
Reach them the decencies of good threescore:— Cure them of theirs, Hussar and Highland dresses; Tell them that youth once gone returns no more; That hired huzzazs redeem no land's distresses: Tell them Sir William Curtis is a bore, Too dull even for the dullest of excesses— The witless Falstaff of a hoary Hai, A fool whose bells have ceased to ring at all,—

LXXXVII.
Tell them, though it may be perhaps too late, On life's worn confine, jaded, blunted, sated. To set up vain pretences of being great, 'Tis not so to be good; and be it stated, The worthiest kings have ever loved least state; And tell them—but you won't, and I have prated Just now enough; but by and by I'll prattle Like Roland's horn in Roncesvalles' battle.

CANTO XI.

I.

When Bishop Berkley said "there was no matter," And proved it—'twas no matter what he said: They say his system 'tis in vain to batter, Too subtle for the airiest human head; And yet who can believe it? I would shatter, Gladly, all matters down to stone or lead. Or adamant, to find the world a spirit, And wear my head, denying that I wear it.

II.

What a sublime discovery 'twas, to make the Universe universal egotism! That all's ideal—all ourselfs? I'll stake the World (be it what you will) that that's no schism. Oh, doubt!—if thou be'st doubt, for which some take But which I doubt extremely—thou sole prism thee, Of the truth's rays, spoil not my draught of spirit Heaven's brandy—though our brain can hardly bear it.

III.

For, ever and anon comes indigestion, (Not the most 'dainty Ariel,' and perplexes Our sorrows with another sort of question: And that which, after all, my spirit vexes Is, that I find no spot where man can rest eye on, Without confusion of the sorts and sexes, Of beings, stars, and this unriddled wonder, The world, which at the worst's a glorious blunder—

IV.

If it be chance; or if it be according To the old text, still better! lest it should Turn out so, we'll say nothing 'gainst the wording As several people think such hazards rude: They're right; our days are too brief for affording Space to dispute what no one ever could Decide, and every body one day will Know very clearly—or at least lie still.

V.

And therefore will I leave off metaphysical Discussions, which is neither here and there. If I agree that what is, is—then this I call Being quite perspicuous and extremely fair. The truth is, I've grown lately rather phthisical I don't know what the reason is—the air Perhaps; but as I suffer from the shocks Of illness, I grow much more orthodox.
VI.
The first attack at once proved the divinity,
(But that I never doubted, nor the devil;)
The next, the Virgin's mystical virginity;
The third, the usual origin of evil;
The fourth at once established the whole Trinity
On so incontrovertible a level,
That I devoutly wished the three were four,
On purpose to believe so much the more.

VII.
To our theme:—The man who has stood on the
And look'd down over Attica; or he [Acropolis
Who has sail'd where picturesque Constantinople is,
Or seen Timbuctoo, or hath taken tea
In small-eyed China's crockery-ware metropolis,
Or sat amid the bricks of Nineveh.
May not think much of London's first appearance—
But ask him what he thinks of it a year hence?

VIII.
Don Juan had got out on Shooter's Hill—
Sunset the time, the place the same declivity
Which looks along that vale of good and ill
Where London streets ferment in full activity,
While every thing around was calm and still,
Except the creak of wheels, which on their pivot
Heard—and that bee-like, bustling, busy hum
Of cities, that boil over with their scum:—

IX.
I say, Don Juan, wrap't in contemplation,
Walk'd on behind his carriage, o'er the summit,
And, lost in wonder of so great a nation,
Gave way to, since he could not overcome it.
"And here," he cried, "is Freedom's chosen station;
Here peals the people's voice, nor can entomb it
Racks, prisons, inquisitions; resurrection
Awaits it, each new meeting or election.

X.
"Here are chaste wives, pure lives; here people pay
But what they please; and if that things be dear,
'Tis only that they love to throw away
Their cash, to show how much they have a year.
Here laws are all inviolate; none may
Traps for the traveller, every highway's clear:
Here— "I" he was interrupted by a knife,
With "Damn your eyes! your money or your life!"

XI.
These free-born sounds proceeded from four pads,
In ambush laid, who had perceived him loiter
Behind his carriage; and, like handy lads,
Had seized the lucky hour to reconnoitre,
In which the heeless gentleman who gads
Upon the road, unless he prove a fighter,
My fin't herself, within that isle of riches,
Exposed to lose his life as well as breeches.

XII.
Juan, who did not understand a word
Of English, save their shibboleth, "God damn!"
And even that he had so rarely heard,
He sometimes thought "twas only their "salam;"
Or "God be with you,"—and 'tis not absurd
To think so; for, half English as I am,
(To my misfortune,) never can I say
I heard them wish "Go with you," save that way:

XIII.
Juan yet quickly understood their gesture,
And, being somewhat choleric and sudden,
Drew forth a pocket-pistol from his vesture,
And fired it into one assailant's pudding—
Who fell, as rolls an ox 'er in his pasture,
And roared out, as he writhed his native mud in,
Unto his nearest follower or henchman.
"Oh Jack! I'm floor'd by that 'ere bloody French man!"

XIV.
On which Jack and his train set off at speed,
And Juan's suite, late scatter'd at a distance,
Came up, all marvelling at such a deed,
And offering, as usual, late assistance.
Juan, who saw the moon's late minion bleed
As if his veins would pour out his existence,
Stood calling out for bandages and lint,
And wish'd he'd been less hasty with his flint.

XV.
"Perhaps," thought he, "it is the country's wont
To welcome foreigners in this way: now
I recollect some innkeepers who don't Differ, except in robbing with a bow,
In lieu of a bare blade and brazen front.
But what is to be done? I can't allow
The fellow to lie groaning on the road:
So take him up; I'll help you with the load."

XVI.
But, ere they could perform this pious duty,
The dying man cried, "Hold! I've got my gruel!
Oh! for a glass of max! We've miss'd our booty;
Let me die where I am." And, as the fiend
Of life shrunk in his heart, and thick and sooty
The drops fell from his death-wound, and he drew
His breath, he from his swelling throat untied
[f11]
A kerchief, crying, "Give Sal that!"—and died.

XVII.
The cravat, stain'd with bloody drops, fell down
Before Don Juan's feet: he could not tell
Exactly why it was before him thrown,
Nor what the meaning of the man's farewell.
Poor Tom was once a kiddy upon town,
A thorough varmint, and a real swell,
Full flash, all fancy, until fairly diddled—
His pockets first, and then his body riddled.

XVIII.
Don Juan, having done the best he could
In all the circumstances of the case,
As soon as "crowners' quest" allow'd, pursued
His travels to the capital space;
Resteeming it a little hard he should
In twelve hours' time, a very little space,
Have been obliged to slay a free-born native
In self-defence: this made him meditative.

XIX.
He from the world had cut off a great man,
Who in his time had made heroic bustle
Who in a row like Tom could lead the van,
Booze in the ken, or at the spellken hustle?
Who queer a flat? Who (spite of Bow-street's ban)
On the high toby-spice so flash the muzzle?
Who on a lark, with black-eyed Sal, (his blowing)
So prime, so swell, so nutty, and so knowing?
XX.
But Tom's no more—and no more of Tom.
Heroes must die: and by God's blessing, 'tis
Not long before the most of them go home.
Hail! Thamus, hail! Upon thy verge it is That Juan's chariot, rolling like a drum
In thunder, holds the way it can't well miss,
Through Kennington and all the other "tons,"
Which make us wish ourselves in town at once;

XXI.
Through groves, so call'd as being void of trees,
(Like theirs from no light;) through prospects named
Mount Pleasant, as containing nought to please,
Nor much to climb; through little boxes framed
Of bricks, to let the dust in at your ease,
With "To be let," upon their doors proclaim'd;
Through "rooms" most modestly call'd "Paradise,"
Which Eve might quit without much sacrifice;—

XXII.
Through coaches, drays, choked turnpikes, and a
Of wheels, and roar of voices, and confusion; [whirl
Here taverns woom to a pint of "purl,"
There mails fast flying off like a delusion;
There barbers' blocks with periwigs in curl
In windows; here the lamp-lighter's infusion
Slowly distill'd into the glimmering glass,—
(For in those days we had not got to gas:)

XXIII.
Through this, and much, and more, is the approach
Of travellers to mighty Babylon:
Whether they come by horse, or chaise, or coach,
With slight exceptions, all the ways seem one.
I could say more, but do not choose to encroach
Upon the guide-book's privilege. The sun
Had set some time, and night was on the ridge
Of twilight, as the party cross'd the bridge.

XXIV.
That's rather fine, the gentle sound of Thamus—
Who vindicates a moment too his stream—[mes"
Though hardly heard through multifarious "dam"—
The lamps of Westminster's more regular gleam
The breadth of pavement, and your shrine where
A spectral resident—whose pallid beam  [Fame is
In shape of moonshine hovers o'er the pile—
Make this a sacred part of Albion's isle.

XXV.
The Druids' groves are gone—so much the better;
Stone-Henge is not—but what the devil is it?—
But Bedlam still exists with its sage fetter,
That madmen may not bite you on a visit;
The Bench too seats or suits full many a debtor;
The mansion-house, too, (though some people quiz
To me appears a stiff yet grand creation: [It,)
But then the Abbey's worth the whole collection.

XXVI.
The line of lights, too, up to Charing-Cross,
Pall-Mall, and so forth, have a coruscation,
Like gold as in comparison to dross,
Match'd with the continent's illumination,
Whose cities night by no means deigns to glose;
The French were not yet a lamp-lighting nation,
And when they grew so—on their new-found lantern,
Instead of wicks, they made a wicked man turn.

XXVII.
A row of gentleman along the streets
Suspended, may illuminate mankind,
As also bonfires made of country-seats
But the old way is best for the purblind
The other looks like phosphorus on sheets,
A sort of ignis-fatuus to the mind,
Which, though 'tis certain to perplex and frighten,
Must burn more mildly ere it can enlighten.

XXVIII.
But London's so well lit, that if Diogenes
Could recommence to hunt his honest man,
And found him not amid the various progenies
Of this enormous city's spreading spawn,
'Twere not for want of lamps to aid his dodging his Yet undiscover'd treasure. What I can,
I've done to find the same throughout life's journey,
But see the world is only one attorney.

XXIX.
Over the stones still rattling, up Pall-Mall,
Through crowds and carriages—but waxing thinner
As thunder'd knockers broke the long-sea'd spell
Of doors 'gainst doors, and to an early dinner
Admitted a small party as night fell.—
Don Juan, our young diplomatic sinner,
Pursued his path, and drove past some hotels,
St. James's Palace and St. James's "Hells,"

XXX.
They reach'd the hotel: forth stream'd from the lit
A tide of well-clad waiters. and around  [door
The mob stood, and as usual several score
Of those pedestrian Paplians who abound
In decent London when the daylight's o'er;
Commodious but immoral, they are found
Useful, like Malthus, in promoting marriage
But Juan now is stepping from his carriage.

XXXI.
Into one of the sweetest of hotels,
Especially for foreigners—and mostly
For those whom favor or whom fortune swells,
And cannot find a bill's small items costly.
There many an envoy either dwelt or dwells,
(The den of many a diplomatic lost lie,)
Until to some conspicuous square they pass,
And blazon o'er the door their names in brass.

XXXII.
Juan, whose was a delicate commission,
Private, though publicly important, bore
No title to point out with due precision
The exact affair on which he was sent o'er.
'Twas merely known that on a secret mission
A foreigner of rank had graced our shore,
Young, handsome, and accomplish'd, who was (Whispers) to have turn'd his sovereign's head.

XXXIII.
Some rumor also of some strange adventures
Had gone before him, and his wars and loves.
And as romantic heads are pretty painters,
And above all, an English woman's roves
Into the excursive, breaking the indentures
Of sober reason, where soerer it moves,
He found himself extremely in the fashion,
Which serves our thinking people for a passion.
XXXIV.
I don't mean that they are passionless, but quite
The contrary; but then 'tis in the head;
Yet, as the consequences are as bright
As if they acted with the heart instead,
What after all can signify the site
Of ladies' lucubrations! So they lead
In safety to the place for which you start,
What matters if the road be head or heart?

XXXV.
Juan presented in the proper place,
To proper placemen, every Russ credential;
And was received with all the due grimace,
By those who govern in the mood potential,
Who, seeing a handsome stripling with smooth face,
Thought (what in state affairs is most essential)
That they as easily might do the youngest,
As hawks may pounce upon a woodland songster.

XXXVI.
They err'd, as aged men will do; but by
And by we'll talk of that; and if we don't,
'Twill be because our notion is not high
Of politicians and their double front,
Who live by lies, yet dare not boldly lie:
Now what I love in women is, they won't
Or can't do otherwise than lie, but do it
So well, the very truth seems falsehood to it.

XXXVII.
And, after all, what is a lie? 'Tis but
The truth in masquerade; and I defy Historians, heroes, lawyers, priests, to put
A fact without some leaven of a lie.
The very shadow of true truth would shut
Up annals, revelations, poesy,
And prophecy—except it should be dated
Some years before the incidents related.

XXXVIII.
Praised be all liars and all lies! Who now
Can tax my mild Muse with misanthropy?
She rings the world's "Te Deum," and her brow
Blushes for those who will not—but to sigh
Is idle; let us, like most others, bow,
Kiss hands, feet—any part of Majesty,
After the good example of "Green Erin,"
Whose shamrock now seems rather worse for wearing.

XXXIX.
Don Juan was presented, and his dress
And mine excited general admiration—
I don't know which was more admired or less:
One monstrous diamond drew much observation,
Which Catherine, in a moment of "Ivresse,"
(In love or brandy's fervent fermentation,)—
Bestow'd upon him as the public learn'd—
And, to say truth, it had been fairly earn'd.

XL.
Besides the ministers and underlings,
Who must be courteous to the accredited
Diplomatists of rather wavering kings,
Until their royal riddle's fully read,
The very clerks—those somewhat dirty springs
Of office, or the house of office, fed
By foul corruption into streams—even they
Were hardly rude enough to earn their pay:

XLI.
And insolence no doubt is what they are
Employ'd for, since it is their daily labor,
In the dear offices of peace or war;
[neighbors]
And should you doubt, pray ask of your next
When for a passport, or some other bar
To freedom, he applied, (a grief and a bore,)—
If he found not this spawn of tax-born riches
Like lap-dogs, the least civil sons of b——.

XLII.
But Juan was received with much "empirempt;
These phrases of refinement I must borrow [man,
From our next neighbor's land, where, like a chess-
There is a move set down for joy or sorrow,
Not only in mere talking but the press. Man,
In islands, is, it seems, downright and thorough,
More than on continents—as if the sea
(See Billingsgate) made even the tongue more free.

XLIII.
And yet the British "dam'me" 's rather Attic:
Your continental oaths are but incontinent,
And turn on things which no aristocratic [anem
Spirit would name, and therefore even I won't
This subject quote, as it would be schismatic
In polite, and have a sound affronting in 't:—
But "dam'me" 's quite ethereal, though too daring—
Platonic blasphemy, the soul of swearing.

XLIV.
For downright rudeness, ye may stay at home;
For true or false politeness (and scarce that
Now) you may cross the blue deep and white foam—
The first the emblem (rarely enough) of what
You leave behind, the next of much you come
To meet. However, 'tis no time to chat
On general topics: poems must confine Themselves to unity, like this of mine.

XLV.
In the great world,—which, being interpreted,
Meaneth the west or worst end of a city,
And about twice two thousand people bred
By no means to be very wise or witty,
But to sit up while others lie in bed,
And look down on the universe with pity
Juan, as an inveterate patronic,
Was well received by persons of condition.

XLVI.
He was a bachelor, which is a matter
Of import both to virgin and to bride,
The former's hymeneal hopes to flatter:
And (should she not hold fast by love or pride)
'Tis also of some moment to the latter:
A rib's a thorn in a wed gallant's side,
Requires decorum, and is apt to double
The horrid sin—and, what's still worse, the trouble.

XLVII.
But Juan was a bachelor—of arts.
And parts, and hearts: he danced and sung, and
An air as sentimental as Mozart's
Softest of melodies; and could be sad
Or cheerful, without any "flaws or starts,"
Just at the proper time; and, though a lad,
Had seen the world—which is a curious sight,
And very much unlike what people write.
XLVIII.

War virgins blush'd upon him; wedded dames
Bloom'd also in less transitory hues;
For both commodities dwell by the Thames,
The painting and the painted; youth, censure,
Against his heart prefer'd their usual claims,
Such as no gentlewoman can quite refuse;
Daughters admired his dress, and pious mothers
Required his income, and if he had brothers.

XLIX.

The milliners who furnish "drapey misses" 4
Throughout the season, upon speculation
Of payment ere the honeymoon's last kisses
Have waned into a crescent's corruption,
Thought such an opportunity as this is,
Of a rich foreigner's initiation,
Not to be overlook'd, and gave such credit,
That future bridegrooms aware, and sigh'd, and paid it.

L.

The blues, that tender tribe, who sigh o'er sonsnets,
And with the pages of the last review
Lame in the interior of their heads or bonnets,
Advanced in all their azure's highest hue:
They talk'd bad French or Spanish, and upon its Late authors ask'd 'em aim for a hint or two;
And which was best, Russian or Castilian?
And whether in his travels he saw Ilion?

LI.

Juan, who was a little superficial,
And not in literature a great Drawcansir,
Examined by this learned and especial
Jury of matrons, scarce knew what to answer:
His duties warlike, loving, or official,
His steady application as a dancer,
Had kept him from the brink of Hippocrate,
Which now he found was blue instead of green.

LII.

However, he replied at hazard, with
A modest confidence and calm assurance,
Which lent his learned lucubrations pith,
And pass'd for arguments of good endurance.
That prodigy, Miss Arabinta Smith,
(Who at sixteen, translated "Hercules Furens"
Into as furious English,) with her best look,
Set down his sayings in her common-place book.

LIII.

Juan knew several languages— as well
He might—and brought them up with skill, in time
To save his fame with each accomplish'd belle,
Who still regretted that he did not rhym'e.
There wanted but this requisite to swell
His qualities (with them) into sublime:
Lady Fitz-Frisky, and Miss Mavia Mannish,
Both long'd extremely to be sung in Spanish.

LIV.

However he did pretty well, and was Admited as an aspirant to all
The coteries, and, as in Banquo's glass,
At great assemblies or in parties small,
He saw ten thousand living authors pass,
That being about their average numeral;
Also the eighty "greatest living poets,"
As every paltry magazine can show its.

LV.

In twice five years the "greatest living poet,"
Like to the champion in the stydy ring,
Is call'd on to support his claim, or show it,
Although 'tis an imaginary thing.
Even I—albeit I'm sure I did not know it,
Nor sought of foolscap subjects to be king—
Was reckon'd, a considerable time,
The grand Napoleon of the realms of rhyme.

LVI.

But Juan was my Moscow, and Faliero
My Leipsic, and my Mont-Saint-Jean seems Caius
"La Belle Alliance" of dunces down at zero,
Now that the lion's fall'm, may rise again.
But I will fall at least as fell my hero;
Nor reign at all, or as a monarch reign;
Or to some lonely isle of jailers go,
With turncoat Southey for my turnkey Lowe.

LVII.

Sir Walter reign'd before me; Moore and Campion
Before and after; but now, grown more holy.
The Muses upon Sion's hill must ramble
With poets almost clergymen, or wholly;
And Pegasus has a psalmody amble
Beneath the very Reverend Rowley Powley,
Who shoes the glorious animal with stilts,
A modern Ancient Pistol—by the hilts!

LVIII.

Still he excels that artificial hard
Laborer in the same vineyard, though the vine
Yields him but vinegar for his reward,—
That neutralized dull Dorus of the Nine;
That swarthy Sporus, neither man nor bard;
That ox of verse, who ploughs for every line—
Cambyse's roaring Romans beat at least
The howling Hebrews of Cybele's priest.

LIX.

Then there's my gentle Ephues, who, they say,
Sets up for being a sort of moral man;
He'll find it rather difficult some day
To turn out both, or either, it may be.
Some persons think that Coleridge hath the sway
And Wordsworth has supporters, two or three;
And that deep-mouth'd Bocotian, "Savage Landor,
Has taken for a swan rogue Southey's gander.

LXI.

John Keats—who was kill'd off by one critique
Just as he really promised something great,
If not intelligible, without Greek
Contrived to talk about the goos of late
Much as they might have been supposed to speak.
Poor fellow! his was an untoward fate:
'Tis strange the mind, that very fiery particle,
Should let itself be snuff'd out by an article.

LXII.

The list grows long of live and dead pretenders
To that which none will gain—or none will know.
The conqueror at least; who, ere Time renders
His last award, will have the long grass grow
Above his burnt-out brain and sapless cinder.
If I might augur, I should rate but low
Their chances; they're too numerous, like the thirty
Mock tyrants, when Rome's annals wax'd but dirty
LXII.

This is the literary Byron's empire,
Where the Pratorian bands take up the matter:—
A "dreadful trade," like his who "gathers sam-
The insolent soldiery to sooth and flatten, [phire,"
With the same feelings as you'd coax a vampire.
Now, were I once at home, and in good satire,
I'd try conclusions with those Janizaries,
And show them what an intellectual war is.

LXIII.

I think I know a trick or two, would turn
Their flanks;—but it is hardly worth my while
With such small gear to give myself concern:
Indeed I've not the necessary bile;
My natural temper really aught but stern,
And even my Muse's worst reproof's a smile;
And then she drops a brief and modest curtsey,
And glides away, assured she never hurts ye.

LXIV.

My Juan, whom I left in deadly peril
Among live poets and blue ladies, pass'd
With some small profit through that field so sterile.
Being tired in time, and neither last nor last,
Left it before he had been treated very ill;
And henceforth found himself more gaily class'd
Among the higher spirits of the day,
The sun's true son—no vapor, but a ray.

LXV.

His morns he pass'd in business—which, dissected
Was like all business, a laborious nothing,
That leads to lasitude, the most infected
And Centaur Nessus garb of mortal clothing,
And on our sofas makes us lie deblected,
And talk in tender horrors of our loathing
All kinds of toil, save for our country's good—
Which grows no better, though 'tis time it should.

LXVI.

His afternoons he pass'd in visits, luncheons,
Lounging, and boxing; and the twilight hour
In riding round those vegetable puncteons, (flower Call'd "Parks," where there is neither fruit nor to gratify a bee's slight munchings;
But, after all, it is the only "bower"
(In Moore's phrase) where the fashionable fair can form a slight acquaintance with fresh air.

LXVII.

Then dress, then dinner, then awakes the world!
Then glare the lamps, then whirl the wheels, then roar
[jur'd Through street and square fast-flashing chariots.
Like harness'd meteors! then along the floor
Chalk mimies painting; then festoons are twirl'd;
Then roll the brazen thunders of the door,
Which opens to: the thousand happy few
An earthly paradise of "Or Molu."

LXVIII.

There stands the noble hostess, nor shall sink
With the three-thousandth curtsey; there the waltz—
The only dance which teaches girls to think—
Makes one in love even with its very faults.
Saloon, room, hall overflow beyond their drink,
And long the latest of arrivals halts,
Mid royal dukes and dames condemn'd to climb,
And gain an inch of staircase at a time.

LXIX.

Three happy he who, after a survey
Of the good company, can win a corner,
A door that's in, or bound out of the way,
Where he may fix himself, like small "Jars
And let the Babel round run as it may, [Horner,
And look on as a mourner, or a seconer,
Or an approver or a mere spectator.
Yawning a little as the night grows later

LXX.

But this won't do, save by and by; and he
Who, like Don Juan, takes an active share,
Must steer with care through all that glittering seas
Of gems and plumes and pearls and silks, to where
He deems it is his proper place to be;
Dissolving in the waltz to some soft air,
Or proudler prancing with mercurial skill,
Where Science marshals forth her own quadrille.

LXXI.

Or, if he dance not, but hath higher views
Upon an heiress or his neighbor's bride,
Let him take care that that which he pursues
Is not at once too palpably described.
Full many an eager gentleman oft cues
His haste: impatience is a blundering guide,
Amongst a people famous for reflection,
Who like to play the fool with circumcision.

LXXII.

But, if you can contrive, get next at supper;
Or, if forestall'd, get opposite and ogle—
Oh, ye ambrosial moments! always upper
In mind, a sort of sentimental bogle,
Which sits forever upon memory's crupper,
The ghost of vanish'd pleasures once in vogue!
If can tender souls relate the rise and fall
Of hopes and fears which shake a single ball.

LXXIII.

But these precautionary hints can touch
Only the common run, w.o must pursue,
And watch, and ward; whose plans a word too much.
Or little overturns; and not the few
Or many (for the number's sometimes such)
Whom a good mien, especially if new,
Or fame, or name, for wit, war, sense, or nonsense.
Permits whate'er they please, or did not long since

LXXIV.

Our hero, as a hero, young and handsome.
Noble, rich, celebrated, and a stranger,
Like other slaves of course must pay his ransom.
Before he can escape from so much danger
As will eniron a conspicuous man. Some Talk about poetry, and "rack and manger,"
And ugliness, disease, as toil and trouble—
I wish they knew the life of a young noble

LXXV.

They are young, but know not youth—it is anticipated;
Handsome but wasted, rich without a sous;
Their vigor in a thousand arms is dissipated; [Jew
Their cash comes from, their wealth goes to,
Both senates see their nightly votes participated
Between the tyrant's and the tribunes' crew,
And, having voted, dined, drank, games, and
The family vault receives another lord. [whored
LXXVI.

'Where is the world?' 'cries Young, at eighty—

"Where
The world in which a man was born?" Alas!
Where is the world of eight years past? 'Twas there—
I look for it—'tis gone, a globe of glass!
Crack'd, shiver'd, vanish'd, scarcely gason, ere
A silent change dissolves the glittering mass.
Statesmen, 'kings, actiors, queens, patriots, kings,
And dandies, all are gone on the wind's wings.

LXXXI.

Where is Napoleon the Grand? God knows:
Where little Castlereagh! The devil can tell:
Where Grantan, Curran, Sheridan, all those Who bound the bar or senate in their spell?
Where is the unhappy Queen, with all her woes?
And where the Daughter, whom the Isles loved well?
Where are those martyr'd saints, the Five per Centa?
And where—oh, where the devil are the Rents?

LXXXVII.

Where's Brummel? Dish'd. Where's Long Pole
Wellesley? Diddled. [The Third?]
Where is his will? (That's not so soon unriddled.)
And where is "Fum" the Fourth, our "royal bird?"
Gone down, it seems, to Scotland to be fiddled
Unto by Sawney's violin, we have heard: [ing
"Caw me, caw thee," for six months hath been hatch-
This scene of royal itch and loyal scratching.

LXXXVIII.

Where is Lord This? And where my Lady That?
The Honorable Mistresses and Misses?
Some laid aside like an old opera hat,
Married, unmarried, and remarried: (this is An evolution oft perform'd of late.)
Where are the Dublin shouts—and London hisses?
Where are the Grenvilles? Turn'd as usual. Where My friends the Whigs? Exactly where they were.

LXXX.

Where the Lady Carolines and Franceses?
Divorced or doing thereence. Ye annals
So brilliant, where the list of routes and dances is,— Thou Morning Post, sole record of the panels
Broken in carriages, and all the phantasies [nels?]
Of fashion,—say what streams now fill those chas-
Some die, some fly, some languish on the Continent,
Because the times have hardly left them one tenant.

LXXXI.

Some who once set their caps at cautious dukes,
Have taken up at length with younger brothers;
Some heiresses have bit at sharper's hooks: [mothers;
Some maids have been made wive—some merely Others have lost their fresh and fairy looks.
In short, the list of alterations bothers.
[Is
There's little strange in this, but something strange
The unusual quickness of these common changes.

LXXXII.

Talk not of seventy years as age; in seven
I have seen more changes, down from monarchs to
The humbliest individual under heaven,
Than might suffice a moderate century through.
I knew that nought was lasting, but not even Change grows too changeable, without being new.
Nought's permanent among the human race,
Except the Whigs not getting into place.

LXXXIII.

I have seen Napoleon, who seem'd quite a Jupiter
Shrink to a Saturn. I have seen a Duke
(No matter which) turn politician stupid,
If that can well be, than his wooden look.
But it is time that I should hoist my "blue Peter,"
And sail for a new theme: I have seen—and shook
To see it—the king hiss'd, and then caress'd;
But don't pretend to settle which was best.

LXXXIV.

I have seen the landholders without a rap—
I have seen Joanna Southcote—I have seen
The House of Commons turn'd to a tax-trap—
I have seen that sad affair of the late queen
I have seen crowns worn instead of a fool's cap—
I have seen a Congress doing all that's mean—
I have seen some nations, like over-lodased assers,
Kick off their burdens—meaning the high classes.

LXXXV.

I have seen small poets, and great prosers, and Interminable—not eternal—speakers—
I have seen the funds at war with house and land—
I have seen the country gentlemens turn speakers—
I have seen the people ridden o'er like sand
By slaves on horseback—I have seen malt liquor
Exchang'd for "thin potations" by John Bull—
I have seen John half detect himself a fool.

LXXXVI.

But "carpe diem," Juan, "carpe, carpe;
To-morrow sees another race as gay
And transient, and devour'd by the same happy.
"Life's a poor player"—then "play out the pla
Ye villains!" and, above all, keep a sharp eye
Much less on what you do than what you say:
Be hypocritical, be cautious, be
Not what you seem, but always what you see.

LXXXVII.

But how shall I relate in other cantos
Of what befell our hero, in the land
Which 'tis the common cry and lie to vaunt as
A moral country? But I hold my hand—
For I disdain to write an Atalantis;
But 'tis as well at once to understand,
You are not a moral people, and you know 't
Without the aid of too sincere a poet

LXXXVIII.

What Juan saw and underwent shall be
My topic, with, of course, the due restriction
Which is required by proper courtesy;
And recollect the work is only fiction,
And that I sing of neither mine nor me.
Though every scribe, in some slight turn of diction
Will hint allusions never meant. Ne'er doubt
This—when I speak, I don't hint; but speak out

LXXXIX.

Whether he married with the third or fourth [ess
Offspring of some sage, husband-hunting count
Or whether with some virgin of more worth
(I mean in fortune's matrimonial bounties)
He took to regularly popling earth,
Of which your lawful awful wedlock found,
Is or whether he was taken in for damages,
For being too exercice in his homages—
XC.  byron's works.
Is yet within the unread events of time.
Thus far, go forth, thou lay, which I will back
Against the same given quantity of rhyme.
For being as much the subject of attack
As ever yet was any work sublime,
By those who love to say that white is black.
So much the better!—I may stand alone,
But would not change my free thoughts for a throne.

CANTO XII.

I.
Of all the barbarous middle ages, that
Which is most barbarous is the middle age
Of man; it is—I really scarce know what;
And don't know justly what we would be at—
A period something like a printed page,
Black-letter upon foolscap, while our hair
Grows grizzled, and we are not what we were—

II.
Too old for youth—too young, at thirty-five,
To herd with boys, or hoard with good threasure—
I wonder people should be left alive;
But, since they are, that epoch is a bore;
Love lingers still, although 'twere late to wive;
And as for other love, the illusion's oer;
And money, that most pure imagination,
Gleams only through the dawn of its creation.

III.
Oh gold! why call we misers miserable?
Their is the pleasure that can never pall;
Their is the best bower-anchor, the chain cable
Which holds fast other pleasures great and small.
Ye who but see the saving man at table,
And scorn his temperate board, as none at all,
And wonder how the wealthy can be sparing,
Know not what visions spring from each cheeseparing.

IV.
Love or lust makes man sick, and wine much sicker;
Ambition rends, and gaming gains a loss;
But making money, slowly first, then quicker,
And adding still a little through each cross
Which will come over things,) beats love or liquor,
The gamester's counter, or the statesman's cress.
Oh gold! I still prefer thee unto paper,
Which makes bank credit like a bark of vapor.

V.
Who hold the balance of the world? Who reign
O'er Congress, whether royalist or liberal?
Who rouse the shirtless patriots of Spain [her all?]
That make old Europe's Journals squeak and gib!
He keep the world, both old and new, in pain
Or pleasure? Who make politics run gibber all?
[he shade of Bonaparte's noble daryx?

VI.
Those, and the truly liberal Lafayette,
Are the true lords of Europe. Every loan
Is not a merely speculative hit,
But seats a nation or upsets a throne.
Republics also get involved a bit;
Colombia's stock hath holders not unknown
On 'Change; and even thy silver soil, Peru,
Must get itself discounted by a Jew.

VII.
Why call the miser miserable? as I said before: the frugal life is his,
Which in a saint or cynic ever was;
The theme of praise: a hermit would not miss
Canonization for the selfsame cause,
And wherefore blame gaunt wealth's austerities?
Because, you'll say, nought calls for such a trial:
Then there's more merit in his self-denial.

VIII.
He is your only poet—passion, pure
And sparkling on from heap to heap, displays
Possess'd, the ore, of which more hopes allure
Nations athwart the breast: the golden rays
Flash up in ingots from the mine obscure;
On him the diamond pours its brilliant blaze;
While the mild emerald's beam shades down the dye.
Of other stones, to soothe the miser's eyes.

IX.
The lands on either side are his: the ship
From Ceylon, Inde, or far Cathay, unloads
For him the fragrant produce of each trip;
Beneath his cars of Ceres groan the roads,
And the vine blushes like Aurora's lip;
His very collars might be kings' abodes;
While he, despoiling every sensual call,
Commands—the intellectual lord of all.

X.
Perhaps he hath great projects in his mind,
To build a college, or to found a race,
A hospital, a church—and leave behind
Some dome surmounted by his meagre face:
Perhaps he fain would liberate mankind
Even with the very ore which makes them base;
Perhaps he would wealthiest of his nation,
Or revel in the joys of calculation.

XI.
But whether all, or each, or none of these
May be the hourid's principle of action,
The fool will call such mania a disease:
What is his own? Go—look at each transaction
Wars, revells, loves—do these bring men more ease
Than the mere plopping through each 's vulgar
Or do they benefit mankind? Lean miser! (fraction?)
Let spendthrift's heirs inquire of yours—who's wiser?

XII.
How 'eautious are rouleaus! how charming chest
Containing ingots, bags of dollars, coins
(Not of old victors, all whose hands and crests Weigh not the thin ore where their visage shines)
But of fine unclipp'd gold, where dully rests
Some likeness which the glittering cirque confuses
Of modern, regning,—sterling, stupid stamp:
Yes! ready money is Aladdin's lamp.
XII.
"Love rules the camp, the court, the grove;" for love
Is heaven, and heaven is love:—so sings the bard;
Which it were rather difficult to prove,
(A thing with poetry in general hard.)
Perhaps there may be something in "the grove,"
At least it rhymes to "love;" but I'm prepared
To doubt no less than landlords of their rental.
If "courts" and "camps" be quite so sentimental.

XIV.
But if love don't, cash does, and cash alone:
Cash rules the grove, and sells it too besides:
Without cash, camps were thin and courts were none,
Without cash, Malthus tells you, "take no brides."
So cash rules love the ruler, on his own
High ground, as Virgin Cynthia sways the tides;
And, as for "heaven" being "love," why not say
Is wax? Heaven is not love, 'tis matrimony. [honey

XV.
Is not all love prohibited wherever,
Excepting marriage? which is love, no doubt,
After a sort: but somehow people never
Would have the same thought the two words have help'd
Love may exist with marriage, and should ever,
And marriage also may exist without,
But love sans bans is both a sin and shame,
And ought to go by quite another name.

XVII.
Well, if I don't succeed, I have succeeded,
And that's enough; succeeded in my youth,
The only time when much success is needed:
And my success produced what I sooth cared most about; it need not now be pleaded—
Whate'er it was, 'twas mine: I've paid, ir. truth,
Of late, the penalty of such success,
But have not learnt to wish it any less.

XVIII.
That suit in Chancery,—which some persons pleaded
In an appeal to the unborn, whom they,
In the faith of their procreative creed,
Baptize postcory, or future clay,—
To me seems but a dubious kind of reed
To lean on for support in any way;
Since odds are that postcerity will know
No more of them, than they of her, I trow.

XIX.
Why, I'm postcory—and so are you;
And whom do we remember? Not a hundred.
Were every memory written down all true, [ther'd:
The tenth or twentieth name would be but blum;
Even Plutarch's Lives have but pick'd out a few,
And 'gainst those few you annalists have thun;
And Mitford, in the nineteenth century, [der'd;
Gives, with Greek truth, the good old Greek the lie,
XXVII.
The little Leila, with her orient eyes,
And taciturn Asiatic disposition,
(Which saw all western things with small surprise)
To the surprise of people of condition,
Who think that novelties are butterflies
To be pursued as food for inanition,)
Her charming figure and romantic history,
Became a kind of fashionable mystery.

The women much divided—as is usual
Among the sex in little things or great. [all—
Think not, fair creatures, that I mean to abuse you
I have always liked you better than I state,
Since I've grown moral: still I must accuse you all
Of being apt to talk at a great rate;
And now there was a general sensation
Among you, about Leila's education.

In one point only were you settled—and
You had reason; 'twas that a young child of grace,
As beautiful as her own native land,
And far away, the last bud of her race,
Honor to our friend Don Juan might command
Himself for five, four, three, or two years' space,
Would be much better taught beneath the eye
Of peeresses whose follies had run dry.

So first there was a generous emulation,
And then there was a general competition
To undertake the orphan's education.
As Juan was a person of condition,
It had been an affront on this occasion
To talk of a subscription or petition,
But sixteen dowagers, ten unused she sages,
Whose tale belongs to "Hallam's Middle Ages."

And one or two sad, separate wives, without
A fruit to bloom upon their withering bough—
Begg'd to bring up the little girl, and "out,"
For that's the phrase that settles all things now,
Meaning a virgin's first blush at a rout,
And all her points as that object desired to show:
And I assure you, that like virgin honey
Tastes their first season (mostly if they have money.)

How all the needy honorable mistresses,
Each out-at-elbow peer, or desperate dandy,
The watchful mothers and the careful sisters,
(Who, by the by, when clever, are more handy
At matching matches, where "'tis gold that glisters,
Than their Ae relatives,) like flies o'er candy,
Buzz round "the Fortune" with their busy battery,
To turn her head with waltzing and with flattery!

Each aunt, each cousin hath her speculation;
Nay, married dames will now and then discover
Such pure disinterestedness of passion,
I've known them court an heiress for their lover.
"Tantame!" Such the virtues of high station,
Even in the hopeful Isle, whose outlet's "Dover!"
While the poor rich wretch, object of these cares,
Has cause to wish her sire had had male heirs.

Some are soon bagg'd, but some reject three fores.
"Tis fine to see them scattering refusals
And wild dismay o'er every angry cousin,
(Friends of the party,) who begin accusals
Such as—"Unless Miss (Blank) meant to have chosen
Poor Frederick, why did she accord pursals
To his billets? Why Waltz with him? Why, I pray
Look you last night, and yet say no to-day?

"Why?—Why?—Besides, Fred. really was attach'd
'Twas not her fortune—he has enough without:
The time will come she'll wish that she had snatch'd
So good an opportunity, no doubt—
But the old marchioness some plan had hatch'd,
As I'll tell Aurea at to-morrow's rout:
And after all poor Frederick may do better—
Pray, did you see her answer to his letter?"

Smart uniforms and sparkling coronets
Are spurn'd in turn, until her turn arrives,
After male loss of time, and hearts, and bets.
Upon the sweep-stakes for substantial wives:
And when at last the pretty creature gets
Some gentleman who fights, or writes, or drives,
It soothes the awkward squad of the deflected
To find how very badly she selected.

For sometimes they accept some long pursuer,
Worn out with importunity: or fall
(But here perhaps the instances are fewer)
To the lot of him who scarce pursuer at all.
A hazy widower turn'd of forty's sure
(If 'tis not vain examples to recall)
To draw a high prize: now, however she got her, I
See nought more strange in this than t'other lottery

I, for my part— (one "modern instance" more)
"True, 'tis a pity—pity 'tis, 'tis true"—
Was chosen from out an amatory score,
Abundant years were less discreet than few:
But though I also had reform'd before
Those became one who soon were to be two,
I'll not gainsay the generous public's voice—
That the young lady made a monstrous choice.

Oh, pardon my digression—or at least
Perverse! 'Tis always with a moral end
That I discourse, like grace before a feast:
For like an aged aunt, or tiresome friend,
A rigid guardian, or a zealous priest,
My Muse by exhortation means to mend
All people, at all times, and in most places,
Which puts my Pegasus to these grave paces.

But now I'm going to be immoral; now
I mean to show things really as they are,
Not as they ought to be: for I avow,
That till we see what's in what, in fact, we're far
From much improvement with that virtuous plug,
Which skims the surface, leaving scarce a scar
Upon the black loam long manured by Vice,
Only to keep its corn at the old price.
XLI.
But first of little Leita we'll dispose,
For, like a day-dawn, she was young and pure,
Or like the old comparison of snows
Which are more pure than pleasant to be sure.
Like many people every body knows,
Don Juan was delighted to secure
A goodly guardian for his infant charge,
Who might not profit much by being at large.

XLII.
Besides, he had found out he was no tutor,
(I wish that others would find out the same!)
And rather wish'd in such things to stand neuter,
For silly wards will bring their guardians blame:
So, when he saw each ancient dame a suitor,
To make his little wild Asiatic tame,
Consulting the "Society for Vice Suppression," Lady Pinchbeck was his choice.

XLIII.
Olden she was—but had been very young:
Virtuous she was—and had been, I believe.
Although the world has such an evil tongue
That—but my chaster ear will not receive
An echo of a syllable that's wrong:
In fact, there's nothing makes me so much grieve
As that abominable tittle-tattle,
Which is the cud eschew'd by human cattle.

XLIV.
Moreover I've remark'd, (and I was once
A slighter observer in a modest way,)
And so may every one except a dance,
That ladies in their youth a little gay,
Besides their knowledge of the world, and sense
Of the sad consequence of going astray,
Are wiser in their warnings than the woe
Which the mere passionless can never know.

XLV.
While the harsh prude indemnifies her virtue
By railing at the unknown and envied passion,
Seeking far less to save you than to hurt you,
Or what's still worse, to put you out of fashion,—
The kinder veteran with calm words will court you,
Entreat you to pause before you dash on;
Expounding and illustrating the riddle
Of epic Love's beginning, end, and middle.

XLVI.
Now, whether it be thus, or that they are stricter,
As better knowing why they should be so,
I think you'll find from many a family picture,
That daughters of such mothers as may know
The world by experience rather than by lecture,
Turn out much better for the Smithfield show
Of vestals brought into the marriage mart,
Than those bred up by prudes without a heart.

XLVII.
said that Lady Pinchbeck had been talk'd about—
As who has not, if female, young, and pretty?
But now no more the ghost of scandal stalk'd about;
She merely was deem'd amiable and witty,
And several of her best bon-mots were hawk'd about;
Then she was given to charity and pity,
And pass'd (at least the latter years of life)
For being a most exemplary wife.

XLVIII.
High in high circles, gentle in her own,
She was the mild reprover of the young.
Whenever—which means every day—they'd shown
An awkward inclination to go wrong.
The quantity of good she did's unknown,
Or, at the least, would lengthen out my song:
In brief, the little orphan of the East
Had raised an interest in her which increased.

XLIX.
Juan, too, was a sort of favorite with her,
Because she thought him a good heart at bottom.
A little spoil'd, but not so altogether;
Which was a wonder, if you think who got him,
And how he had been toss'd, he scarce know whither:
Though this might ruin others, it did not him,
At least entirely—for he had seen too many Changes in youth, to be surprised at ans.

L.
And these vicissitudes tell best in youth;
For when they happen at a riper age,
People are apt to blame the fates, forswoon,
And wonder Providence is not more sage.
Adversity is the first path to truth:
He who hath proved war, storms, or woman's rage,
Whether his winters be eighteen or eighty,
Hath won the experience which is deem'd so weighty

LI.
How far it profits is another matter,—
Our hero gladly saw his little charge
Safe with a lady, whose last grown-up daughter
Being long married, and thus set at large,
Had left all the accomplishments she taught her
To be transmitted, like the lord mayor's barge.
To the next comer; or—as it will tell
More Muse-like—like Cytherea's shell.

LII.
I call such things transmission; for there is
A floating balance of accomplishment
Which forms a pedigree from Miss to Miss,
According as their minds or backs are bent.
Some waltz; some draw; some fathom the abyss
Of metaphysics; others are content
With music; the most moderate shine as wits,
While others have a genius turn'd for fits.

LIII.
But whether fits, or wits, or harpsichords,
Theology, fine arts, or finer stays,
May be the baits for gentlemen or lords
With regular descent, in these our days,
The last year to the new transfers its hoards;
New vestals claim men's eyes with the same praise
Of "elegant" et cetera, in fresh batches—
All matchless creatures, and yet bent on matches.

LIV.
But now I will begin my poem. 'Tis
Perhaps a little strange, if not quite new,
That from the first of cantos up to this,
I've not begun what we have to go through.
These first twelve books are merely flourishes
Preludios, trying just a string or two
Upon my lyre, or making the pegs sure,
And when so, you shall have the overture.
BYRON'S WORKS.

LV.
My Muses do not care a pinch of rosin
About what's call'd success, or not succeeding.
Such thoughts are quite below the strain they've chosen;
'Tis a "great moral lesson" they are reading.
I thought, at setting off, about two dozen
Cantos would do; but, at Apollo's pleading,
If that my Pegasus should not be founder'd,
I think to canter gently through a hundred.

LVI.
Don Juan saw that microcosm on stilts,
Yclept the great world; for it is the least,
Although the highest: but as swords have hilts
By which their power of mischief is increased,
When man in battle or in quarril tilts,
Thus the low world, north, south, or west, or east,
Must still obey the high—which is their handle,
Their moon, their sun, their gas, their farthing candle.

LVII.
He had many friends who had many wives, and was Well look'd upon by both, to that extent
Of friendship which you may accept or pass;
In does nor good nor harm, being merely meant
To keep the wheels going of the higher class,
And draw them nightly when a ticket's sent:
And what with masquerades, and fêtes, and balls,
For the first season such a life scarce falls.

LVIII.
A young unmarried man, with a good name
And fortune, has an awkward part to play;
For good society is but a game,
"The royal game of goose," as I may say,
Where every body has some separate aim,
An end to answer, or a plan to lay—
The single ladies wishing to be double,
The married ones to save the virgins trouble.

LIX.
I don't mean this as general, but particular
Examples may be found of such pursuits:
Though several also keep their perpendicular
Like poplars, with good principles for roots;
Yet many have a method more reticular—
"Fishes for men," like sirens with soft lutes;
For talk six times with the same single lady,
And you may get the wedding-dresses ready.

LX.
Perhaps you'll have a letter from the mother,
To say her daughter's feelings are trepann'd;
Perhaps you'll have a visit from the brother,
All strut, and stays, and whiskers, to demand
What "your intentions are?"—One way or other
It seems the virgin's heart expects your hand;
And 'tween pity for her case and yours,
You'll add to matrimony's list of eues.

LXI.
I've known a dozen weddings made even thus,
And some of them high names: I have also known
Young men who—though they hated to discuss Pretensions which they never dream'd to have Yet neither frighten'd by a female fuss. [shawn—
Nor by mustachios moved, were let alone,
And lived, as did the broken-hearted fair,
In happier plight than if they form'd a pair.

LXII.
There's also nightly, to the uninitiated,
A peril—not indeed like love or marriage,
But not the less for this to be depreciated.
It is—I meant and mean not to disparage
The show of virtue even in the vitiated—
It adds an outward grace unto their carriage—
But to denounce the amphibious sort of harlot,
"Couleur de rose," who's neither white nor scarlet.

LXIII.
Such is your cold coquette, who can't say "No,"
And won't say "Yes," and keeps you on and
On a lee-shore, till it begins to blow— [off-ing,
Then sees your heart's dead, with an inward
This works a world of sentimental wo, [ scoffing;
And sends new Warters yearly to their coffin;
But yet is merely innocent flirtation,
Not quite adultery, but adulteration.

LXIV.
"Ye gods, I grow a talker!" Let us prate.
The next of perils, though I place it sternest,
Is when, without regard to "Church or State,"
A wife makes or takes love in upright earnest.
Abroad, such things decide few women's fate—
(Such, early traveller! is the truth thou learnest)—
But in old England, when a young bride errs,
Poor thing! Eve's was a trifling case to hers;

LXV.
For 'tis a low, newspaper, humdrum, lawsuit
Country, where a young couple of the same age
Can't form a friendship but the world o'erawes it.
Then there's the vulgar trick of those d—damages!
A verdict—grievous fee to those who cause it—
Forms a sad climax to romantic homages;
Besides those soothing speeches of the pleaders,
And evidences which regale all readers!

LXVI.
But they who blunder thus are raw beginners;
A little geneal sprinkling of hypocrisy
Has saved the fame of thousand splendid sinners,
The loveliest oligarchs of our gynocracy;
You may see such at all the balls and dinners,
Among the proudest of our aristocracy,
So gentle, charming, charitable, chaste—
And all by having tact as well as taste.

LXVII.
Juan, who did not stand in the prediciament
Of a mere novice, had one safeguard more;
For he was sick—no, 'twas not the word sick I meant
But he had seen so much good love before,
That he was not in heart so very weak—"I meant
But this much, and no sneer against the shore
Of white cliffs, white necks, blue eyes, bluer stock ings,
Tithes, taxes, duns, and doors with double knockings.

LXVIII.
But coming young from lands and scenes romantic
Where lives, not lawsuits, must be risk'd for passion's self must have a spice of frantic, [sion
Into a country where 'tis half a fashion,
Seem'd to him half co'ernicel, half pedantic;
How'er he might esteem this moral nation:
Besides, (alas! his taste—forgive and pity I)
At first he did not think the women pretty.
DON JUAN.

LXIX.
I say at first—for he found out at last,
But by degrees, that they were fairer far
Than the more glowing dames whose lot is east
Beneath the influence of the Eastern star—
A further proof we should not judge in haste;
Yet inexperience could not be his bar
To taste:—the truth is, if men would confess,
That novelties please less than they impress.

LXX.
Though travell’d, I have never had the luck to Trace up those shuffling negroes, Nile or Niger,
To that impracticable place, Timbuctoo,
Where geography finds no one to oblige her
With such a chart as may be safely stuck to—
For Europe ploughs in Afric like “bos piger:”
But if I had been at Timbuctoo, there
No doubt I should be told that black is fair.

LXXI.
It is. I will not swear that black is white;
But I suspect in fact that white is black,
And the whole matter rests upon eyesight.
As a blind man, the best judge. You’ll attack
Perhaps this new position—but I’m right;
Or if I’m wrong, I’ll not be ta’en aback:
He hath no morn nor night, but all is dark
Within; and what seest thou? A dubious spark.

LXXII.
But I’m relaxing into metaphysics,
That labyrinth, whose clue is of the same
Construction as your cures for hectic phthisies,
Those bright moths flitting round a dying flame;
And this reflection brings me to plain physies,
And to the beauties of a foreign dame,
Compared with those of our pure pearls of price,
Those Polar summers, all sun, and some ice.

LXXIII.
Or say they are like virtuous mermaids, whose Beginnings are fair faces, ends mere flakes:—
Not that there’s not a quantity of those Who have a due respect for their own wishes,
Like Russians rushing from hot baths to snows
Are they, at bottom virtuous even when vicious:
They warm into a scrape, but keep of course,
As a reserve, a plunge into remore.

LXXIV.
But this was nought to do with their outsides.
I said that Juan did not think them pretty
At the first blush; for a fair Briton hides
Half her attractions—probably from pity—and
Rather calmly into the heart glides,
That storms it as a foe would take a city;
But once there (if you doubt this, prithee try)
She keeps it for you like a true ally.

LXXV.
She cannot step as does an Arab bab,
Or Andalusian girl from mass returning,
Nor weaer as gracefully as Gauls her garb,
Nor, in her eye Ausonia’s glance is burning;
Her voice, though sweet, is not so fit to warble
Those bravurias (which I still am learning)
To like, though I have been seven years in Italy,
And have, or had, an ear that served me prettily).

LXXVI.
She cannot do these things, nor one or two Others, in that off-hand and dashing style
Which takes so much—so give the devil his due.
Nor is she quite so ready with her smile,
Nor settles all things in one interview,
(A thing approved as saving time and toil;
But though the soil may give you time and troup
Well cultivated, it will render double.

LXXVII.
And if in fact she takes to a “grande passion,”
It is a very serious thing indeed;
Nine times in ten ’tis but caprice or fashion,
Coquetry, or a wish to take the lead,
The pride of a mere child with a new sash on,
Or wish to make a rival’s bosom bleed;
But the tenth instance will be a tornado,
For there’s no saying what they will or may do.

LXXVIII.
The reason’s obvious: if there’s an eclat,
They lose their caste at once, as do the Parias;
And when the delicacies of the law
Have fill’d their papers with their comments,
The pride of a mere child with a new sash on,
(The hypocrite!) will banish them like Marus,
To sit amid the ruins of their guilt:
For Fame’s a Carthage not so soon rebuilt.

LXXIX.
Perhaps this is as it should be;—it is
A comment on the Gospel’s “Sin no more
And be thy sins forgiven:”—but upon us
I leave the saints to settle their own score.
Abroad, though doubtless they do much amiss.
An erring woman finds an opener door
For her return to virtue—as they call
The lady who should be at home to all.

LXXX.
For me, I leave the matter where I find it,
Knowing that such uneasy virtue leads
People some ten times less in fact to mind it,
And care but for disc. and not deeds.
And as for chastity, you’ll never bind it
By all the laws the strictest lawyer pleads,
But aggravate the crime you have not prevented
By rendering desperate those who had else repented.

LXXXI.
But Juan was no casuist, nor had ponder’d
Upon the moral lessons of mankind:
Besides, he had not seen, of several hundred,
A lady altogether to his mind.
A little “blaze”—it’s not to be wonder’d
At, that his heart had got a tougher rind:
And though not vainer from his past success,
No doubt his sensibilities were less.

LXXXII.
He also had been busy seeing sights—
The parliament and all the other houses;
Had sate beneath the gallery at nights,
To hear debates whose thunder roused not (rufous)
The world to gaze upon those northern lights,
Which flash’d as far as where the musk-bull browses:
He had also stood at times behind the throne—
But Grey was not arrived, and Chatham gone.
LXXXIII.
He saw, however, at the closing session,
That noble sight, when really free the nation,
A king in constitutional possession
Of such a throne as is the proudest station,
Though despots know it not—till the progressio
Of freedom shall complete their education.
'Tis not mere splendor makes the show august
To eye or heart—it is the people's trust.

LXXXIV.
There too he saw (what'er he may be now)
A prince, the prince of princes, at the time,
With fascination in his very bow,
And full of promise, as the spring of prime.
Though royalty was written on his brow,
He had then the grace too, rare in every clime,
Of being, without alloy of fop or beau,
A finish'd gentleman from top to toe.

LXXXV.
And Juan was received, as hath been said,
Into the best society: and there
Occur'd what often happens, I'm afraid,
However disciplined and debonnaire:
The talent and good humor he display'd,
Besides the mark'd distinction of his air,
Exposed him, as was natural, to temptation,
Even though himself avoided the occasion.

LXXXVI.
But what, and where, with whom, and when, and
Is not to be put hastily together; [why,
And as my object is morality,
(Whatever people say,) I don't know whether
I'll leave a single reader's eyelid dry,
But harrow up his feelings till they wither,
And hew out a huge monument of pathos,
As Philip's son proposed to do with Athos.*

LXXXVII.
Here the twelfth canto of our introduction
Envis. When the body of the book's begun,
You'll find it of a different construction
From what some people say 'twill be when done:
The plan at present's simply in connexion.
I can't oblige you, reader, to read on;
That's your affair, not mine: a real spirit
Should neither court neglect, nor dread to bear it;—

LXXXVIII.
And if my thunderbolt not always rattles,
Rememb'r, reader! you have had before
The worst of tempests and the best of battles
That e'er were brew'd from elements of gore,
Besides the most sublime of—Heaven knows what else:
An usurper could scarce expect much more—
But my ben' canto, save one on astronomy,
Will turn upon 'political economy.'

LXXXIX.
That is your present theme for popularity:
Now that the public hedge hath scarce a stake,
't grows an act of patriotic charity,
To show the people the best way to break.
My plan (but I, 't for but singularity, Reserve it) will be very sure to take,
Meantime read all the national debt-sinkers,
And tell me what you think of our great thinkers.

CANTO XIII.

I.
I now mean to be serious:—it is time,
Since laughter now-a-days is deem'd to o' serious
A jest at vice by virtue's call'd a crime,
And critically held as deleterious;
Besides, the sad's a source of the sublime,
Although when long a little apt to weary us;
And therefore shall my lay soar high and solemn,
As an old temple dwindled to a column.

II.
The Lady Adeline Amundville
('Tis an old Norman name, and to be found
In pedigrees by those who wander still Among the last fields of that Gothic ground)
Was high-born, wealthy by her father's will,
And beauteous, even where beauties most abound
In Britain—which of course true patriots find
The goodliest soul of body and of mind.

III.
I'll not gainsay them; it is not my cue:
I leave them to their taste, no doubt the best
An eye's an eye, and whether black or blue,
Is no great matter, so 'tis in request:
'Tis nonsense to dispute about a hue—
The kindest may be taken as a test.
The fair sex should be always fair; and no man
Till thirty, should perceive there's a plain woman.

IV.
And after that serene and somewhat dull
Epoch, that awkward corner turn'd for days
More quiet, when our moon's no more at full,
We may presume to criticise or praise;
Because indifference begins to lull
Our passions, and we walk in wisdom's ways;
Also because the figure and the face
Hint, that 'tis time to give the younger place.

V.
I know that some would fain postpone this era,
Reluctant as all placemen to resign
Their post; but theirs is merely a chimera,
For they have pass'd life's equinoctial line;
But then they have their claret and Madeira
To irrigate the dryness of decline;
And county meetings and the Parliament,
And debt, and what not, for their solace sent.

VI.
And is there not religion and reform, [tion t
Peace, war, the taxes, and what's call'd the 'na
The struggle to be pilots in a storm?
The landed and the money'd speculation?
The joys of mutual hate to keep them warm,
Instead of love, that mere hallucination?
Now hatred is by far the longest pleasure;
Men love in haste, but they detest at leisure
VII.

Rough Johnson, the great moralist, profess'd,
Right: honestly, "he liked an honest hater—"1
The only truth that yet has been confess'd
Within these latest thousand years or later.
Perhaps the fine old fellow spoke in jest:—
For my part, I am but a mere spectator,
And gaze where'er the palace or the hovel is,
Much in the mode of Goethe's Mephistopheles;

VIII.

But neither love, nor hate in much excess;
Though 'twas not once so. If I sneer sometimes,
It is because I cannot well do less,
And now and then it also suits my rhymes.
I should be very willing to redress
Men's wrongs, and rather check than punish crimes,
Had not Cervantes, in that too true tale
Of Quixote, shown how all such efforts fail.

IX.

Of all tales, 'tis the saddest—and more sad,
Because it makes us smile; his hero's right,
And still pursues the right;—to curb the bad,
His only object, and 'gainst odds to fight,
His guardian, 'tis his virtue makes him mad!
But his adventures form a sorry sight:—
A sorrier still is the great moral taught
By that real epic unto all who have thought.

X.

Redressing injury, revenging wrong,
To aid the damsel and destroy the caitiff;
Opposing singly the united strong,
From foreign yoke to free the helpless native;—
Alas: must noblest views, like an old song,
Be for mere fancy's sport a theme creative?
A jest, a riddle, fame through thick thin and sought?
And Socrates himself but Wisdom's Quixote?

XII.

Cervantes smiled Spain's chivalry away;
A single laugh demolish'd the right arm
Of his own country;—seldom since that day [charm,
Has Spain had heroes. While Romance could
The world gave ground before her bright array;
And therefore have his volumes done such harm,
That all their glory as a composition
Was dearly purchased by his land's perdition.

XIII.

I'm at my old Lunes"—digression, and forget
The Lady Adelina Amundeville;
The fair most fatal Juan ever met,
Although she was not evil nor meant ill:
But Destiny and Passion spread the net,
(Fate is a good excuse for our own will,) And caught them: what do they not catch, methinks?
But I'm not Ædipus; and life's a sphinx.

XIV.

Chaste was she to detraction's desperation,
And wedded unto one she had loved well—
A man known in the councils of the nation,
Cool, and quite English, imperturbable,
Though apt to act with fire upon occasion,
Proud of himself and her; the world could tell
Nought against either, and both seem'd secure
She in her virtue, he in his hauteur.

XV.

It chanced some diplomatical relations,
Arising out of business, often brought
Himself and Juan in their mutual stations
Into close contact. Though reserved, nor caught
By specious seeming, Juan's youth, and patience,
And talent, on his haughty spirit wrought,
And form'd a basis of esteem, which ends
In making men what courtesy calls friends.

XVI.

And thus Lord Henry, who was cautious as
Reserve and pride could make him, and full slow
In judging men—when once his judgment was Determined, right or wrong, on friend or foe,
Had all the pertinacity pride has,
Which knows no ebb to its imperious flow,
And loves or hates, disdaining to be guided,
Because its own good pleasure hath decided.

XVII.

His friendships, therefore, and no less aversions,
Though oft well founded, which confirm'd but
His prepossessions, like the laws of Persians [more
And Medes, would ne'er revoke what went before.
His feelings had not those strange fits, like tertiains,
Of common likings, which make some deplore
What they should laugh at—the mere ague still
Of men's regard, the fever or the chill.

XVIII.

"'Tis not in mortals to command success;
But do you more, Sempronius—don't desire it "
And take my word, you won't have any less:
Be wary, watch the time, and always serve it;
Give gently way, where there's too great a press;
And for your conscience, only learn to nerve it;—
For, like a racer or a boxer training,
'Twill make, if proved, vast efforts without pain

XIX.

Lord Henry also liked to be superior,
As most men do, the little or the great;
The very lowest find out an inferior,
At least they think so, to exert their state
Upon: for there are very few things wearier
Than solitary pride's oppressive weight,
Which mortals generously would divide,
By bidding others carry while they ride.

XX.

In birth, in rank, in fortune likewise equal,
O'er Juan he could no distinction claim;
In years he had the advantage of time's sequel;
And, as he thought, in country much the same.
Because bold Britons have a tongue and free quill,
At which all modern nations vainly aim;
And the Lord Henry was a great debater,
So that few members kept the House up later.
XXI.

These were advantages: and then he thought—
It was his foible, but by no means sinister—
'Tw as few or none more than himself had caught
Court mysteries, having been himself a minister:
He liked to teach that which he had been taught,
And greatly shone whenever there had been a stir;
And reconciled all qualities which grace man,
Always a patriot, and sometimes a placeman.

XXII.

He liked the gentle Spaniard for his gravity;
He almost honor'd him for his docility,
Because, though young, he acquiesced with suavity,
Or contradicted but with proud humility.
He knew the world, and would not see depravity
In faults which sometimes show the soil's fertility,
If that the weeds o'erlive not the first crop,—
For then they are very difficult to stop.

XXIII.

And then he talk'd with him about Madrid,
Constantinople, and such distant places;
Where people always did as they were bid,
Or did what they should not with foreign graces.
Of courses also spake they: Henry rid
Well, like most Englishmen, and loved the races:
And Juan, like a trueborn Andalusian,
Could back a horse, as despots ride a Russian.

XXIV.

And thus acquaintance grew, at noble routs,
And diplomatic dinners, or at other—
For Juan stood well both with Ins and Outs,
As in Freemasonry a higher brother.
Upon his talent Henry had no doubts,
His manner show'd him sprung from a high mother;
And all men like to show their hospitality
To him whose breeding matches with his quality.

XXV.

At Blank-Blank Square—for we will break no squares
By naming streets: since men are so censorious,
And apt to savor an author's wheat with tares,
Reaping allusions private and inglorious,
Where none were dreamt of, unto love's affairs,
Which were, or are, or are to be notorious,
That therefore do I previously declare,
Lord Henry's mansion was in Blank-Blank Square.

XXVI.

Also there bin another pious reason
For making squares and streets anonymous;
Which is, that there is scarce a single season
Which doth not shake some very splendid house
With some slight heat-quake of domestic treason—
A topic scandal doth delight to rouse:
Such I might stumble over unawares,
Unless I knew the very chastest squares.

XXVII.

Tis true, I might have chosen Piccadilly,
A place where peccadillos are unknown;
But I have motives, whether wise or silly,
For letting that pure sanctuary alone.
Therefore I name not square, street, place, until I
Find one where nothing naughty can be shown,
A vestal shrine of inno'ence of heart:
Such arr—but I have lost the London chart.

XXVIII.

At Henry's mansion, then, in Blank-Blank Square
Was Juan a recheareh, welcome guest,
As many other noble scions were;
And some who had but talent for their crest;
Or wealth, which is a passport every where;
Or even mere fashion, which indeed's the best
Recommendation, and to be well dress'd
Will very often supersede the rest.

XXIX.

And since "there's safety in a multitude
Of counsellors," as Solomon has said,
Or some one for him, in some sage grave mood—
Indeed we see the daily proof display'd
In senate, at the bar, in wordy feud,
Where'er collective wisdom can parade,
Which is the only cause that we can guess
Of Britain's present wealth and happiness—

XXX.

But as "there's safety crafted in the number
Of counsellors" for men,—thus for the sex
A large acquaintance lets not virtue slumber:
Or, should it shake, the choice will more perplex—
Variety itself will more encumber.
'Mid many rocks we guard more against wrecks;
And thus with women: howsoever it shocks some's
Self-love, there's safety in a crowd of coxcombs.

XXXI.

But Adeline had not the least occasion
For such a shield, which leaves but little merit
To virtue proper, or good education.
Her chief resource was in her own high spirit,
Which judged mankind at their due estimation,
And for coquetry, she disdained to wear it:
Secure of admiration, its impression
Was faint, as of an every-day possession.

XXXII.

To all she was polite without parade:
'Tq some she show'd attention of that kind
Which flatters, but is flatly convey'd
In such a sort as cannot leave behind
A trace unworthy either wife or maid—
A gentle genial courtesy of mind,
To those who were, or pass'd for, meritorious,
Just to console sad glory for being glorious:

XXXIII.

Which is in all respects, save now and then,
A dull and desolate appendage. Gaze
Upon the shades of those distinguish'd men
Who were or are the puppet shows of praise,
The praise of persecution. Gaze again
On the most favor'd; and, amid the blaze
Of sunset halos o'er the laurel-brow'd,
What can ye recognise?—A gilded cloud

XXXIV.

There also was of course in Adeline
That calm patrician polish in the address,
Which no'er can pass the equinocial line
Of any thing which nature would express
Just as a Mandarin finds nothing fine,—
At least his manner suffers not to guess
That any thing he views can greatly please.
Perhaps we have borrow'd this from the Chinese—
XXXV.
Perhaps from Horace: his "Nil admirari"
Was what he call'd the "Art of Happiness;"
An art on which the artists greatly vary,
And have not yet attain'd to much success.
However, 'tis expedient to wary:
Indifference cutees don't produce Distress;
And rash enthusiasm in good society
Were nothing but a moral inebriety.

XXXVI.
But Adeline was not indifferent: for,
(Now for a common-place:) benaead the snows,
As a volcano holds the lava more
Within—et cetera. Shall I go on?—No.
I hate to hunt down a tired metaphor:
So let the often-used volcano go.
Poor thing! how frequently, by me and others,
It hath been stir'd up, till its smoke quite smotheres.

XXXVII.
I'll have another figure in a trice:
What say you to a bottle of champagne?
Frozen into a very vinous ice,
Which leaves few drops of that immortal rain,
Yet in the very centre, past all price,
About a liquid glassful will remain:
And this is stronger than the strongest grape
Could e'er express in its expanded shape:

XXXVIII.
Tis the whole spirit brought to a quintessence;
And thus the chilliest aspects may concentrate
A hidden nectar under a cold presence,
And such are many—though I only meant her
From which I now deduce these moral lessons,
On which the Muse has always sought to enter:
And your cold people are beyond all price,
When once you've broken their confounded ice.

XXXIX.
But after all they are a North-West passage
Unto the glowing India of the soul;
And as the good ships sent upon that message
Have not exactly ascertain'd the Pole,
(Though Parry's efforts look a lucky presage,) Thus gentlemen may run upon a shoul;
For if the Pole's not open, but all frost,
(A chance still,) 'tis a voyage or vessel lost.

XL.
And young beginners may as well commence
With quiet cruising e'er the ocean woman:
While those who're not beginners, should have sense
Enough to make for port, ere Time shall summon
With his gray signal-flag; and the past tense,
The dreary "faimus" of all things human,
Must be declined, whilst life's thin thread's spun out
Between the gaping heir and gnawing gout.

XLI.
But heaven must be diverted: its diversion
Is sometimes truant—but never mind:
The world upon the whole is worth the assertion
(If but for comfort) that all things are kind:
And that same devilish doctrine of the Persian,
Of the two principles, but leaves behind
As many doubts as any other doctrine has ever puzzled faith withal, or yoked her in.

XLII.
The English winter—ending in July
To recommence in August—now was one.
'Tis the postillion's paradise: wheels fly;
On roads east, south, north, west, there is a run
But for post-horses who finds sympathy?
Man's pity's for himself or for his son,
Always promising that said son at college
Has not contracted much more debt than now edge.

XLIII.
The London winter's ended in July—
Sometimes a little later. I don't err
In this: whatever other blunders lie
Upon my shoulders, here I must aver
My Muse a glass of weatherology,
For Parliament is our barometer;
Let Radicals its other acts attack,
Its sessions form our only almanac.

XLIV.
When its quicksilver's down at zero,—io!
Coach, chariot, luggage, baggage, equipage.
Wheels whirled from Carlton Palace to Soho,
And happiest they who horses can engage;
The turnpikes glow with dust, and Rotten Row
Sleeps from the chirality of this bright age:
And tradesmen, with long bills and longer faces.
Sigh—as the postboys fasten on the traces

XLV.
They and their bills, "Arcadians both," are left
To the Greek kalends of another session.
Alas! to them of ready cash bereft,
What hope remains? Of hope the full possession:
Or generous draft, conceded as a gift,
At a long date—till they can get a fresh one,
Hawk'd about at a discount, small or large:—
Also the solace of an overcharge.

XLVI.
But these are trifles. Downward flies my Lord,
Nodding beside my Lady in his carriage.
Away! away! "Fresh horses!" are the word,
And changed as quickly as hearts after marriage.
The obsequious landlord hath the change restored;
The postboys have no reason to disparage
Their fee; but, ere the water'd wheels may hiss hence
The ostler plods too for a small reminiscence.

XLVII.
'Tis granted; and the valet mounts the dickey—
That gentleman of lords and gentlemen;
Also my Lady's gentlewoman, tricky,
Trick'd out, but modest more than poet's pen
Can paint, "Così viaggio e ricchi!"
(Excuse a foreign slipslap now and then,
If but to show I've travell'd: and what's travel,
Unless it teaches one to quote and cavil?)

XLVIII.
The London winter and the country summer
Were well nigh over. 'Tis perhaps a pity,
When Nature wears the gown that doth become her,
To lose those best months in a sweaty city,
And wait until the nightingale grows dumber,
Listening debates not very wise or witty,
Ere patriots their true country can remember,
But there's no shooting (save grouse) till September.
I've done with my tirade. The world was gone;
The twice two thousand for whom earth was made
Were vanishing to be what they call alone,—
That is, with thirty servants for parade,
As many guests or more; before whom groan
As many covers, duly, daily, laid.
Let none accuse old England's hospitality—
Its quantity is but condensed to quality.

L.
Lord Henry and the Lady Adeline
Departed, like the rest of their companions,
To peerage, to a mansion very fine;
The Gothic Babel of a thousand years.
None of them selves could boast a longer line,
Where time through heroes and through beauties
And oaks, as olden as their pedigree. [steers;
Told of their sires, a tomb in every tree.

A paragraph in every paper told
Of their departure: such is modern fame:
'Tis pity that it takes no further hold
Than an advertisement, or much the same;
When, ere the ink be dry, the sound grows cold.
The Morning Post was foremost to proclaim—
"Departure, for his country-seat to-day,
Lord H. Amundeville and Lady A.

"We understand the splendid host intends
To entertain, this autumn, a select
And numerous party of his noble friends; [correct,
'Mid whom, we have heard from sources quite
The Duke of D—— the shooting season spends,
With many more by rank and fashion deck'd;
Also a foreigner of high condition,
The envoy of the secret Russian mission."

And thus we see—who doubts the Morning Post?
(Whose articles are like the "thirty-nine,"
Which those most swear to who believe them most)—
Our gay Russ Spaniard was ordain'd to shine,
Deck'd by the rays reflected from host,
With those who Pope says, "greatly daring dine."
'Tis odd but true,—last war, the news abounded
More with these dinners than the kill'd or wounded.

As thus: "On Thursday there was a grand dinner;
Present, lords A. B. C. — Earls, dukes, by name
Announced with no less pomp than victory's winner:
Then underneath, and in the very same [here Column: date, "Falmouth. There has lately been
The slap-dash regiment, so well known to fame:
Whose loss in the late action we regret:
The vacancies are fill'd up—see Gazette."

To Norman Abbey whirl'd the noble pair,
An old, old monastery once, and now
Still older mansion, of a rich and rare
Mix'd Gothic, such as artists all allow
Few specimens yet left us can compare
Withal: it lies perhaps a little low,
Because the marks prefer'd a hill behind,
To shelter their devotion from the wind.

It stood embosom'd in a happy valley,
Crown'd by high woodlands, where the Druid oak
Stood like Caratacus in act to rally [stroke
His host, with broad arms 'paint the thunder
And from beneath his boughs were seen to rally
The dappled foresters—as day awoke,
The branching stag swept down with all his herd,
To quaff a brook which murmur'd like a bird.

Before the mansion lay a lucid lake,
Broad as transparent, deep, and freshly fed
By a river, which its softest way did take
In currents through the calmer water spread
Around: the wild fowl nestled in the brake
And sedges, brooding in their liquid bed:
The woods sloped downwards to its brink, and stood
With their green faces fix'd upon the flood

Its outlet dash'd into a deep cascade,
Sparkling with foam, until again subsiding
Its shriller echoes—like an infant made
Quiet—sink into softer ripples, gliding
Into a rivulet; and, thus allay'd,
Pursued its course, now gleaming, and now hiding
Its windings through the woods; now clear, now blue,
According as the skies their shadows threw.

A glorious remnant of the Gothic pile [part
(While yet the church was Rome's) stood half
In a grand arch, which once screen'd many an aisle.
These last had disappear'd—a loss to art:
The first yet frown'd superbly o'er the soil,
And kindled feelings in the roughest heart,
Which mourn'd the power of time's or tempest's
In gazing on that venerable arch. [march,

Within a niche, nigh to its pinnacle,
Twelve saints had once stood sanctified in stone:
But these had fallen not, when the friars fell.
But in the war which struck Charles from his
When each house was a fortress—as tell [throne,
The annals of full many a line undone,—
The gallant cavaliers, who fought in vain
For those who knew not to resign or reign.

But in a higher niche, alone, but crown'd,
The Virgin Mother of the God-born child,
With her son in her blessed arms, look'd round,
Sparely by some chance when all beside was
She made the earth below seem holy ground. [spoil'd,
This may be superstition, weak or wild,
But even the faintest relics of a shrine
Of any worship wake some thoughts divine.

A mighty window, hollow in the centre,
Shorn of its glass of thousand colorings,
Through which the deepen'd glory once could enter
Streaming from off the sun like seraph's wings.
Now yawns all desolate: now loud, now fainter,
The gale sweeps through its fretwork, and oft sings
The owl his anthem, where the silenced choir
Lie with their halalelujahs quench'd like fire.
THE LAKE. — Page 702.
LXIII.
But in the noontide of the moon, and when
The wind is wing'd from one point of heaven,
There moans a strange unsu]^rly sound, which then
Is musical—a dying accent driven.
Through the huge arch, which soars and sinks again.
Some deem it but the distant echo given
Back to the night-wind by the waterfall,
And harmonized by the old choral wall:

LXIV.
Others, that some original shape or form,
Shaped by decay perchance, hath given the power
Though less than that of Memnon's statue, warm
In Egypt's rays, to harp at a fix'd hour)
To this gray ruin, with a voice to charm.
Sad, but serene, it sweeps o'er tree or tower;
The cause I know not, nor can solve; but such
The fact—I've heard it,—once perhaps too much.

LXV.
Amid the court a Gothic fountain play'd,
Symmetrical, but deck'd with carvings quaint—
Strange faces, like to men in masquerade,
And here perhaps a monster, there a saint;
The spring gush'd through grim mouths, of granite
And sparkled into basins, where it spent [made.
Its little torrent in a thousand bubbles,
Like man's vain glory, and his vainer troubles.

LXVI.
The mansion's self was vast and venerable,
With more of the monastic than has been
Elsewhere preserved: the cloisters still were stable,
The cells, too, and refectory, I ween:
An exquisite small chapel had been able,
Still unimpair'd, to decorate the scene;
The rest had been reform'd, replaced, or sunk,
And spoke more of the baron than the monk.

LXVII.
Huge halls, long galleries, spacious chambers, join'd
By no quite lawful marriage of the arts,
Might shock a connoisseur; but, when combined,
Form'd a whole which, irregular in parts,
Yet left a grand impression on the mind,
At least of those whose eyes are in their hearts.
We gaze upon a giant for his stature,
Nor judge at first if all be true to nature.

LXVIII.
Steel barons, melt the next generation
To silken rows of gay and gartered ears,
Glanced from the walls in goodly preservation;
And Lady Marys, blooming into girls,
With fair long locks, had also kept their station;
And countesses mature in robes and pearls:
Also some beauties of Sir Peter Lely,
Whose drapery bits we may admire them freely.

LXIX.
Judges, in very formidable crinie,
Were there, with brows that did not much invite
The accused to think their lordships would determine
His cause by leaning much from might to right:
Bishops, who had not left a single sermon;
Attorneys-general, awful to the sight,
As hinting more (unless our judgments warp us)
Of the "Sta. Chamber" than of "Habeas Corpus

LXX.
Generals, some all in armor, of he old
And iron time, ere lead had ta'en the lead;
Others in wigs of Marlborough's martial fold,
Huger than twelve of our degenerate breed;
Lordlings, with staves of white or keys of gold:
Nimrods, whose canvas scarce contain'd the steed.
And here and there some stern high patriot stood,
Who could not get the place for which he sued.

LXXI.
But, ever and anon, to soothe your vision,
Fatigued with these hereditary glories,
There rose a Carlo Dolce or a Titian,
Or wilder group of savage Salvatores;
Here danced Albano's boys, and here the sea shore
In Vernet's ocean lights; and there the stories
Of martyrs awed, as Spagnoletto tainted
His brush with all the blood of all the sainted.

LXXII.
Here sweetly spread a landscape of Lorraine;
There Rembrandt made his darkness equal light,
Or gloom Caravaggio's gloomier stain
Browned o'er the fancy of some and stoe anchorite—
But lo ! a Teniers woods, and not in vain
Your eyes to revel in a livelier sight,
His bell-mouth'd goblet makes me feel quite Danish!
Or Dutch with thirst—What ho! a flask of Rhenish.

LXXIII.
Oh, reader! if that thou canst read,—and know
'Tis not enough to spell, or even to read,
To constitute a reader; there must go
Virtues of which both you and I have need.
Firstly, begin with the beginning, (though
That clause is hard,) and so, undo, proceed;
Thirdly, commence not with the end—or, sinning
In this sort, end at least with the beginning.

LXXIV.
But, reader, thou hast patient been of late,
While I, without remorse of rhyme, or fear,
Have built and laid out ground at such a rate,
Dan Phoebus takes me for an auctioneer.
That poets were so from their earliest date,
By Homer's "Catalogue of Ships" is clear:
But a mere modern must be moderate,—
I spare you, then, the furniture and plate.

LXXV.
The mellow autumn came, and with it came
The promised party, to enjoy its sweets.
The corn is cut, the manor full of game;
The pointer ranges, and the sportsman beats
In russet jacket—lynx-like is his aim,
Full grows his bag, and wonderful his feats.
Ah, nut-brown partridges! ah, brilliant pheasants
Anshah, ye poachers—tis no sport for peacocks.

LXXVI.
An English autumn, though it hath no vines,
Blushing with Bachelot coronals along
The paths, o'er which the fair festoon entwines
The red grape in the sunny lands of song,
Hath yet a purchased choice of choicest wines;
The clarët light, and the Madère strong.
If Britain mourn her bleakness, we can tell her
The very best of vineyards is the cellar

XCII.
There also were two wits by acclamation, Longbow from Ireland, Strongbow from the Tweed, Both lawyers, and both men of education; But Strongbow's wit was of more polish'd breed: Longbow was rich in an imagination, As beautiful and bounding as a steed, But sometimes stumbling over a potato,— While Strongbow's best things might have come from Cato.

XCIII.
Strongbow was like a new tuned harpsichord; But Longbow wild as an Æolian harp, With which the winds of heaven can claim accord, And make a music, (whether flat or sharp, Of Strongbow's talk you would not change a word; At Longbow's phrases you might sometimes carp: Both wits—one born so, and the other bred, This by his heart—his rival by his head.

XCIV.
‘T’ all these seem a heterogeneous mass, To be assembled at a country-seat, Yet think a specimen of every class Is better than a hundrum tête-à-tête. The days of comedy are gone, alas! [bête; When Congreve's fool could vie with Molière's Society is smooth'd to that excess, That manners hardly differ more than dress.

XCV.
Our ridicules are kept in the background, Ridiculous enough, but also dull; Professins, too, are no more to be found Professional; and there is nought to cull Of folly's fruit; for though your fools abound, They're barren, and not worth the pains to pull. Society is now one polishes'd herd, Form'd of two mighty tribes, the Bores and Bored.

XCVI.
But from being farmers, we turn gleaners, gleaning The scanty but right-well thresh'd ears of truth; And, gentle reader! when you gather meaning, You may be Boaz, and I—modest Ruth. Further I'd quote, but Scripture, intervening, Forbids. A great impression in my youth Was made by Mrs. Adams, where she cries "That Scriptures out of church are blasphemies."

XCVII.
But what we can we glean in this vile age Of chaff, although our gleanings be not grist, I must not quite omit the talking sage, Kit-Cat, the famous conversationist, Who, in his common-place book had a page, [list!— Prepared each morn for evenings. "List, oh, 'Alas, poor ghost!'—What unexpected woes await those who have studied their bons-mots!

XCVIII.
Firstly, they must allure the conversation By many windings to their clever clinch; And secondly, must let slip no occasion, Nor bate (alake) their hearers of an inch, But take an ell—and make a great sensation, If possible; and thirdly, never clinch When some smart talker puts them to the test, But seize the last word, which no doubt's the best

XCIX.
Lord Henry and his lady were the hosts; The party we have touch'd on were the guests: Their table was a board to tempt ev'n ghosts To pass the Styx for more substantial feasts I will not dwell upon ragouts or roasts, Albiet all human history attests That happiness for man—the hungry sinner!— Since Eve ate apples, much depends on dinner.

C.
Witness the lands which "flow'd with milk and Held out unto the hungry Israelites: (honey," To this we've added since the love of money, The only sort of pleasure which requires. Youth fades, and leaves our days no longer sunny; We tire of mistresses and parasites: But oh, ambrosial cash! Ah! who would lose tace! When we no more can use, or even abuse thee!

CII.
The gentlemen got up betimes to shoot, Or hunt; the young because they liked the sport— The first thing boys like after play and fruit: The middle-aged, to make the day more short; For ennui is a growth of English root, Though nameless in our language; we retort The fact for words, and let the French translate That awful yawn which sleep cannot abate.

CIII.
The elderly walk'd through the library, And tumbled books, and criticised the pictures, Or saunter'd through the gardens piteously, And made up the hot-house several strictries, Or rode a nag which trotted not too high, Or on the morning papers read their lectures, Or on the watch their longing eyes would fix, Longing, at sixty, for the hour of six.

CIV.
But none were "géné;" the great hour of union Was rung by dinner's knell; till then all were Masters of their own time—or in communion, Or solitary, as they chose to bear The hours, which how to pass is but to few known Each rose up at his own, and had to spare What time he chose for dress, and broke his fast When, where, and how he chose for that repast.

CIV.
The ladies—some rouged, some a little pale Met the morn as they might. If fine, they rode Or walk'd; if foul, they read, or told a tale, Sung, or rehearsed the last dance from abroad; Discuss'd the fashion which might next prevail; And settled bonnets by the newest code; Or cramm'd twelve sheets into one little letter. To make each correspondent a new debt
CV.
For some had absent lovers, all had friends;
The earth has nothing like a she epistle,
And hardly heaven—because it never ends.
I love the mystery of a female missal,
Which, like a creed, no'er says all it intends.
But full of cunning as Ulysses' whistle,
When he allured poor Dolon—you had better
Take care what you reply to such a letter.

CVI.
Then there were billiards; cards too, but no dice;
Save in the Clubs no man of honor plays;—
Boats when 'twas water, skating when 'twas ice,
And the hard frosts destroy'd the scenting days:
And angling, too, that solitary vice,
Whatever Isaac Walton sings or says:
The quaint, old, cruel coxcomb, in his gullet
Should have a hook, and a small trout to pull it.

CVII.
With evening came the banquet and the wine;
The conversazion; the duet,
Attuned by voices more or less divine,
(My heart or head aches with the memory yet.)
The four Miss Rawbolts in a glee would shine;
But the two youngest loved more to be set
Down to the harp—because to music's charms
They added graceful necks, white hands and arms.

CVIII.
Sometimes a dance (though rarely on field days,
For then the gentlemen were rather tired)
Display'd some sylph-like figures in its maze:
Then there was small-talk ready when required;
Flirtation—but decorous; the mere praise
Of charms that should or should not be admired;
The hunters fought their fox-hunt o'er again,
And then retreated soberly—at ten.

CIX.
The politicians, in a nook apart,
Discuss'd the world, and settled all the spheres;
The wise watch'd every loop-hole for their art,
To introduce a bon-mot head and ears;
Small is the rest of those who would be smart—
A moment's good thing may have cost them years
Before they find an hour to introduce it,
And then, even then, some bore may make them lose it.

CX.
but all was gentle and aristocratic
In this our party; polish'd, smooth, and cold,
As Phidian forms cut out of marble Attic,
There now are no Squire Westerns, as of old;
And our Sophias are not so emphatic,
But fair as then, or fairer to behold.
[Jones,
We've no accomplish'd blackguards, like Tom,
But gentlemen in stays, as stiff as stones.

CXI.
They separated at an early hour;
That is, ere midnight—which is London's noon:
But in the country, ladies seek their bower
A little earlier than the waning moon.
Peace to the slumbers of each folded flower—
May the rose call back its true color soon!
Good hours of fair cheeks are the fairest tinters,
And lower the price of rouge—at least some winters.
VII.

But what's this to the purpose? you will say.
Gent. reader, nothing: a mere speculation,
For which my sole excuse is—'tis my way.
Sometimes with and sometimes without occasion,
I write what's uppermost without delay;
This narrative is not meant for narration,
But a mere airy and fantastic basis,
To build up common things with common-places.

VIII.

You know, or don't know, that great Bacon saith,
"Fling up a straw, 'twill show the way the wind blows;"
And such a straw, borne on by human breath,
Is poesy, according as the mind glows;
A paper kite which flies 'twixt life and death,
A shadow which the onward soul throws,
And mine's a bubble not blown up for praise,
But just to play with, 'tis an infant plays.

IX.

The world is all before me—or behind;
For I have seen a portion of that same,
And quite enough for me to keep in mind:—
Of passions, too, I've proved enough to blame,
To the great pleasure of our friends, mankind;
Who like to mix some slight alloy with fame:
For I was rather famous in my time,
Until I fairly knock'd it up with rhyme.

X.

I have brought this world about my ears, and eke
The other: that's to say, the clergy—who Upon my head have bid their thunders break
In pious libels by no means a few,
And yet I can't help scribbling once a week,
Tiring old readers, nor discovering new.
In youth I wrote because my mind is full,
And now because I feel it growing dull.

XI.

But "why then publish?"—There are no rewards
Of fame or profit, when the world grows weary
I ask in turn,—why do you play at cards? [dreamy]
Why drink? Why read?—To make some hour less
It occupies me to turn back regards
On what I've seen or ponder'd sad or cheery;
And what I write I cast upon the stream,
To swim or sink—I have had at least my dream.

XII.

I think that were I certain of success,
I hardly could compose another line:
So long I've battled either more or less
That no defeat can drive me from the Nine.
This feeling 'tis not easy to express,
And yet 'tis not affected, I opine.
In play, there are two pleasures for your choosing—
The one is winning, and the other losing.

XIII.

Besides, my Muse by no means deals in fiction:
She gathers a repertory of facts,
Of course with some reserve and slight restriction,
But mostly sing of human things and acts—
And that's one cause she meets with contradiction,
For too much truth, at first sight, ne'er attracts;
And were her object only what's call'd glory,
With more ease too she'd tell a different story.

XIV.

Love, war, a tempest,—surely there's variety;
Also a seasoning slight of lubrication;
A bird's-eye view too of that wild, Society;
A slight glance thrown on men of every station
If you have nought else, here's at least satiety,
Both in performance and in preparation; [tears
And though these lines should only live por man
Trade will be all the better for these Cantos.

XV.

The portion of this world which I at present
Have taken up to fill the following sermon,
Is one of which there's no description recent:
The reason why is easy to determine:
Although it seems both prominent and pleasant,
There is a sameness in its gems and emmies,
A dull and family likeness through all ages,
Of no great promise for poetic pages.

XVI.

With much to excite, there's little to exalt;
Nothing that speaks to all men and all times;
A sort of varnish over every fault;
A kind of common-place, even in their crimes;
Facitious passions, wit without much salt,
A want of that true nature which sublimes
Whate'er it shows with truth; a smooth monoton;
Of character, in those at least who have got any.

XVII.

Sometimes, indeed, like soldiers off parade,
They break their ranks and gladly leave the drill
But then the roll-call draws them back afraid,
And they must be or seem what they were: still Doubtless it is a brilliant masquerade;
But when of the first sight you have had your fill
It falls—at least it did so upon me,
This paradise of pleasure and ennui.

XVIII.

When we have made our love, and gamed out gaming,
[more:
Dress'd, voted, shone, and, may be, something
With dandies dined; heard senators declaiming;
seen beauties brought to market by the score;
Sad rakes to saddar husbands chastely taming;
There's little left but to be bored or bore.
Witness those "ci-devant jeunes hommes" who stem
The stream, nor leave the world which leaveth them

XIX.

'Tis said—indeed a general complaint—
That no one has succeeded in describing
The monde, exactly as they ought to paint.
Some say, that authors only snatch, by bribing
The porter, some slight scandals strange and quaint
To furnish matter for their moral gibing;
And that their books have but one style in common—
My lady's prattle, filter'd through her woman

XX.

But this can't well be true, just now; for writers
Are grown of the beau monde a part potential;
I've seen them balance even the scale with fighters
Especially when young, for that's essential.
Why do their sketches fall them as inditers
Of, what they deem themselves most cause
The real portrait of the highest tribe? [quanta
'Tis that, in fact, there's little to describe.
XXI.

"Hand ignara logar:" these are make, "quarum Pars parva fuit," but still art and part.

Now I could much more easily sketch a haram,
A battle, wreck, or history of the heart,
Than these things; and besides, I wish to spare 'em
For reasons which I choose to keep apart.

"Vetabo Cereris sacrum qui vulgi rit,"
Which means, that vulgar people must not share it.

XXII.

A world therefore what I throw off is ideal—
Leaver'd, leaven'd like a history of Freemasons;
Which bears the same relation to the real,
As Captain Parry's voyage may do to Jason's.
The grand Arcanum's not for men to see all;
My music has some mystic diapasons;
And there is much which could not be appreciated
In any manner by the unintellegent.

XXIII.

Alas! worlds fall—and woman, since she fall'd
The world, (as, since that history, less polite Than true, hath been a creed so strictly hold,) Has not yet given up the practice quite.
Poor thing of usages! coerced, compell'd,
Victim when wrong, and martyr oft when right,
Condemn'd to child-bed, as men for their sins,
Have shaving too entail'd upon their chins,—

XXIV.

A daily plague, which, in the aggregate,
May average on the whole with parturition.
But as to women, who can penetrate
The real sufferings of their she condition
Man's very sympathy with their estate
Has much of selfishness and more suspicion.
Their love, their virtue, beauty, education,
But form good housekeepers to breed a nation.

XXV.

All this were very well, and can't be better;
But even this is difficult, Heaven knows!
So many troubles from her birth beset her,
Such small distinction between friends and foes,
The gilding wears so soon from off her fetter,
That—but ask any woman if she'd choose,
(Take her at thirty, that is,) to have been
Female or male? a schoolboy or a queen?

XXVI.

"Petticoat influence" is a great reproach,
Which even those who obey would fain be thought
To fly from, as from hungry pikes a roach;
But, since beneath it upon earth we are brought,
By various jottings of life's hackney-coach,
I for one venerate a petticoat—
A garment of a mystical sublimity,
No matter whether russet, silk, or dainty.

XXVII.

Much I respect, and much I have adored,
In my young days, that chaste and goodly veil,
Which holds a treasure like a miser's hoard,
And more attracts by all its doth conceal—
A golden scabbard on a Damascus sword,
A lovin' letter with a mystic seal,
A cune for grief—for what can ever rankle
Before a petticoat and peeping eye?

XXVIII.

And when upon a silent, sullen day,
With a Sirocco, for example, blowing,—
When even the sea looks dim with all its spars,
And sulkily the river's ripple's flowing,
And the sky shows that very ancient gray,
The sober sad antithesis to glowing,—
'Tis pleasant, if then any thing is pleasant,
To catch a glimpse even of a pretty peasant.

XXIX.

We left our heroes and our heroines
In that fair clime which don't depend on climate
Quite independent of the Zodiac's signs,
Though certainly more difficult to rhyme at,
Because the sun and stars, and aught that shines,
Mountains, and all we can be most sublime at,
Are there off dull and dreary as a dun—
Whether a sky's or tradesman's, is all one.

XXX.

An in-door life is less poetical;
And out-of-door hath showers, and mists, and scents,
With which I could not brew a pastoral.
But be it as it may, a bard must meet
All difficulties, whether great or small,
To spoil his undertaking or complete,
And work away like spirit upon matter,
Embarrass'd somewhat both with fire and water.

XXXI.

Juan—in this respect at least like saints—
Was all things unto people of all sorts,
And lived contentedly, without complaints,
In camps, in ships, in cottages, or courts—
Born with that happy soul which seldom finds,
And mingling modestly in toils or sports.
He likewise could be most things to all women,
Without the coxcombry of certain she men.

XXXII.

A fox-hunt to a foreigner is strange;
'Tis also subject to the double danger
Of tumbling first, and having in exchange
Some pleasant jesting at the awkward stranger
But Juan had been early taught to range
The wilds, as doth an Arab turn'd avenger,
So that his horse, or charger, hunter, hack,
Knew that he had a rider on his back.

XXXIII.

And now in this new field, with some applause,
He clear'd hedge, ditch, and double post, and rail,
And never censored, and made but few "faux pas;"
And only fretted when the scent 'gan fail.
He broke, 'tis true, some statutes of the laws
Of hunting—for the sages youth is frail;
Rode o'er the hounds, it may be, now and then,
And o'er several country gentlemen.

XXXIV.

But, on the whole, to general admiration
He acquitted both himself and horse: the squire
Marvelling'd at merit of another nation:
[Sic,] the boors cried "Danger! who 'd have thought it?"
The Nestors of the sporting generation,
Swores praises, and recall'd their former fires
The huntsman's self relented to a grin,
And rated him almost a whipper-in.
XXXV.

Such were his trophies;—not of spear and shield,
But leaps and bursts, and sometimes foxes'
Yet I must own,—although in this I yield [brushes;
To patriot sympathy a Briton's blushes,—
He thought at heart like courtly Chesterfield,
Who, after a long chase o'er hills, dales, bushes,
And what not, though he rode beyond all price,
Ask'd, next day, "if men ever hunted twice?"

XXXVI.

He also had a quality uncommon
To early risers after a long chase,
Who wake in winter ere the cock can summon December's drowsy day to his dull race,—
A quality agreeable to woman,
When her soft liquid words run on space,
Who likes a listener, whether saint or sinner,—
He did not fall asleep just after dinner.

XXXVII.

But, light and airy, stood on the alert,
And shone in the best part of dialogue,
By humoring always what they might assert,
And listening to the topics most in vogue;
Now grave, now gay, but never dull or port;
And smiling but in secret—cunning rogue!
He ne'er presumed to make an error clearer;
In short, there never was a better heater.

XXXVIII.

And then he danced;—all foreigners excel
The serious Angles in the elocution
Of Pantomime;—he danced, I say, right well,
With emphasis, and also with good sense—
A thing in footing indispensable:
He danced without theatrical pretence,
Not like a ballet-master in the van
Of his drill'd nymphs, but like a gentleman.

XXXIX.

Chaste were his steps, each kept within due bound,
And elegance was sprinkled o'er his figure;
Like swift Camilla, he scarce skimm'd the ground,
And rather held in than put forth his vigor;
And then he had an ear for music's sound,
Which might defy a crochet-critic's rigor.
Such classic pas—sans flaws—set off our hero,
He glanced like a personified bolero.

XL.

Or, like a flying hour—before Aurora,
In Guido's famous fresco, which alone
Is worth a tour to Rome, although no more a Remnant were there of the old world's sole throne.
The "out ensemble" of his movements wore a
Grace of the soft ideal, seldom shown,
And ne'er to be described; for, to the dolor
Of bards and prosers, words are void of color.

XLI.

No marvel then he was a favorite;
A full-grown Cupid, very much admired;
A little spoild, but by no means so quite;
At least he kept his vanity retired.
Such was his tact, he could alike delight
The chaste, and those who are not so much inspir'd.
The Duchess of Fitz-Pulke, who loved "tracasserie,"
Began to root him with some small "agacerie."

XLII.

She was a fine and somewhat full-blown blonde,
Desirable, distinguished, celebrated
For several winters in the grand, grand monde.
I'd rather not say what might be related
Of her exploits, for this were ticklish ground;
Besides there might be falsehood in what's stated
Her late performance had been a dead set
At Lord Augustus Fitz-Plantagenet.

XLIII.

This noble personage began to look
A little black upon this new flirtation;
But such small licenses must lovers brook,
More freedoms of the female corporation.
Wo to the man who ventures a rebuke.
"Twill but precipitate a situation
Extremely disagreeable, but common
To calculators, when they count on woman.

XLIV.

The circle smiled, then whisper'd, and then sneer'd
The Misses bridled, and the matrons frown'd;
Some hoped things might not turn out as they fear'd
Some would not deem such women could be found
Some ne'er believed one-half of what they heard,
Some look'd perplex'd, and others look'd profound
And several pitied with sincere regret
Poor Lord Augustus Fitz-Plantagenet.

XLV.

But, what is odd, none ever named the duke,
Who, one might think, was something in the affai
True, he was absent, and 'twas rumor'd, took
But small concern, about the when, or where.
Or what his consort did: if he could brook
Her gayeties, none had a right to stare:
Their's was that best of unions, past all doubt,
Which never meets, and therefore can't fall out

XLVI.

But, oh that I should ever pen so sad a line!
Fired with an abstract love of virtue, she,
My Dian of the Ephesians, Lady Adeline,
Began to think the Duchess' conduct free;
Regrettling much that she had chosen so bad a line,
And waxing chiller in her courtesy,
Look'd grave and pale to see her friend's fragility,
For which most friends reserve their sensibility.

XLVII.

There's nought in this bad world like sympathy:
'Tis so becoming to the soul and face;
Sets to soft music the harmonious sigh,
And robes sweet friendship in a Brussels lace.
Without a friend, what were humanity,
To hunt our errors up with a good grace?
Consoling us with—"Would you had thought twice
Ah! if you had but follow'd my advice!"

XLVIII.

Oh, Job! you had two friends: one's quite enough
Especially when we are ill at ease;
They're but bad pilots when the weather's rough,
Doctors less famous for their cures than fees.
Let no man grumble when his friends fall off,
As they will do like leaves at the first breeze
When your affairs come round, one way or t'other
Go to the coffee-house, and take another
XLIX.
But this is not my maxim: had it been,
Some heart aches had been spared me; yet I care not,
I would not be a tortoise in his screen [not:]
Of stubborn shell, which waves and weather wear
Tis better on the whole to have felt and seen.
That which humanity may bear, or bear not:
Twill teach discernment to the sensitive,
And not to pour their ocean in a sieve.

L.
If all the horrid, hideous notes of wo,
Sadder than owl-songs, or the midnight blast,
Is that portentous phrase, "I told you so,"
Utter'd by friends, those prophets of the past,
Who, 'stead of saying what you now should do,
Own they foresaw that you would fall at last,
And solace your slight lapse 'gainst "bonos mores";
With a long memorandum of old stories.

LI.
The Lady Adeline's serene severity
Was not confined to feeling for her friend,
Whose fame she rather doubted with posterity,
Unless her habits should begin to mend.
But Juan also shared in her austerity,
But mix'd with pity, pure as e'er was pen'n'd:
His incomer passed her gentle rule,
And (as her junior by six weeks) his youth.

LII.
These forty days' advantage of her years—
And hers were those which can face calculation,
Boldly referring to the list of peers,
And noble births, nor dread the enumeration—
Gave her a right to have maternal cares,
For a young gentleman's fit education,
Though she was far from that leap-year, whose leap
In female dates, strikes time all of a heap.

LIII.
This may be fix'd somewhere before thirty—
Say seven-and-twenty; for I never knew
The strictest in chronology and virtue
Advance beyond, while they could pass for new.
Oh, time! why dost not pause? Thy scythe, so dirty
With rust, should surely cease to hack and hew.
Reset it; shave more smoothly, also slower,
If but to keep thy credit as a mower.

LIV.
But Adeline was far from that ripe age,
Whose ripeness is but bitter at the best:
'Twas rather her experience that made her sage,
For she had seen the world, and stood its test,
As I have said in—I forget what page;
My Muse despises reference, as you have guess'd
By this time: but strike six from seven-and-twenty,
And you will find her sum of years in plenty.

LV.
At sixteen she came out; presented, vaunted,
She put all coronets into commotion:
At seventeen, 'too, the world was still enchanted
With the new Venus of their brilliant ocean:
At eighteen, though below her feet still panted
A hecatomb of suitors with devotion,
She had consented to create again
That Adam, call'd "the happiest of men."

LVI.
Since then she had sparkled through three gowns,
Admired, adored! but also so correct,
That she had puzzled all the acutest hunters,
Without the apparel of being circumspect.
They could not even glean the slightest splinters
From off the marble, which had no defect.
She had also snatch'd a moment since her marriage
To bear a son and heir—and one miscarry.

LVII.
Fondly the wheeling fire-fly's flew around her,
Those little gliterers of the London night;
But none of these possess'd a sting to wound her—
She was a pitch beyond a coxcomb's flight.
Perhaps she wish'd an aspirant profounder;
But, whatsoever she wish'd, she acted right;
And whether coldness, pride, or virtue, dignify
A woman, so she's good, what does it signify?

LVIII.
'Tis sad to hack into the roots of things,
They are so much intertwist'd with the earth,
So that the branch a goodly verdure flings,
I reek not if an acorn gave it birth.
To trace all actions to their secret springs
Would make indeed some melancholy mirth:
But this is not at present my concern,
And I refer you to wise Oenustiern.3

LIX.
With the kind view of saving an eclat,
Both to the duchess and diplomatist,
The Lady Adelina, as soon's she saw
That Juan was unlikely to resist—
(For foreigners don't know that a faux pas
In England ranks quite on a different list)
From those of other lands, unless'd with juries, Whose verdict for such sin a certain cure is)

LXI.
The Lady Adeline resolved to take
Such measures as she thought might best impress
The farther progress of this sad mistake.
She thought with some simplicity indeed
But innocence is bold even at the stake,
And simple in the world, and doth not need
Nor use those palisades by dames erected,
Whose virtue lies in never being detected.

LXII.
It was not that she fear'd the very worst:
His grace was an enduring, married man,
And was not likely all at once to burst
Into a scene, and swell the client's clan
Of Doctors' Commons; but she dreaded first
The magic of her grace's talisman,
And next a quarrel (as she seem'd to fret)
With Lord Augustus Fitz-Plantagenet.
LXIII.
He was a cold, good, honorable man,
And after being, and proud of every thing,
A goodly spirit for a state divan,
A figure fit to walk before a king:
Tall, stately, form'd to lead the courtly van
On birthdays, glorious with a star and string;
The very model of a chamberlain—
And such I mean to make him when I reign.

Eureka! I have found it! What I mean
To say is, not that love is idleness,
But that in love such idleness has been
An accessory, as I have cause to guess.
Hard labor's an indifferent go-between;
Your men of business are not apt to express
Much passion, since the merchant-ship, the Argos
Convey'd Medea as her supercargo.
LXXVII.

Bentus ille procul!" from "necotios,"
Saith Horace; the great little poet's wrong;
His other maxim, "Noscitur a sociis,"
Is much more to the purpose of his song;
Though even that were sometimes too ferocious,
Unless good company he kept too long;
But, in his teeth, whate'er their state or station,
Thrice happy they who have an occupation!

LXXVIII.

Adam exchanged his paradise for ploughing—
Eve made up millinery with fig-leaves—
The earliest knowledge from the tree so knowing,
As far as I know, that the church receives:
And since that time, it need not cost much showing,
That many of the ills o'er which man grieves,
And still more women, spring from not employing
Some hours to make the remnant worth enjoying.

LXXIX.

And hence high life is oft a dreary void,
A rack of pleasures, where we must invent
A something wherewithal to be annoy'd.
Bards may sing what they please about content;
Contented, when translated, means but cloy'd;
And hence arise the woes of sentiment,
Blue-devils, and blue-stockings, and romances
Reduced to practice, and perform'd like dances.

LXXX.

I do declare, upon an affidavit,
Romances I ne'er read like those I have seen;
Yet, if into the world I ever gave it,
Would some believe that such a tale had been:
But such intent I never had, nor have it;
Some truths are better kept behind a screen,
Especially when they would look like lies;
I therefore deal in generalities.

LXXXI.

'An oyster may be cross'd in love, — and why?'
Because he mopeth idly in his shell,
And heaves a lonely subterraneque sigh,
Much as a monk may do within his cell:
A poor valet of monks, their plea't
With sloth hath found it difficult to dwell;
Those vegetables of the Catholic creed
Are apt exceedingly to run to seed.

LXXXII.

Oh, Wilberforce! thou man of black renown,
Whose merit none enough can sing or say,
Truth hast struck one immense colossus down,
Thou moral Washington of Africa!
But there's another little thing, I own,
Which you should perpetrate some summer's day,
And set the other half of earth to rights:
Youa have freed the blacks—now pray shut up the whites.

LXXXIII.

Shut up the bald-coat bully Alexander;
Ship off the holy three to Senegal; [der,] Teach them that "sauce for goose is sauce for gan-
And ask them how they like to be in thrall.
Shut up each high heroic salamander,
Who eats fire gratis, (since the pay's but small,)
Shut up—no, not the king, but the pavilion
Or else 'twill cost us all another million.

LXXXIV.

Shut up the world at large; let Bedlam out,
And you will be perhaps surprised to find
All things pursue exactly the same route,
As now with those of voi-distant sound mind.
This I could prove beyond a single doubt,
Were there a jot of sense among mankind.
But till that point d' appui is found, alas!
Like Archimedes, I leave earth as 'twas.

LXXXV.

Our gentle Adeline had one defect—
Her heart was vacant, though a splendid mansion.
Her conduct had been perfectly correct,
As she had seen nought claiming its expansion.
A wavering spirit may be easier week'd,
Because 'tis frailer, doubtless, than a stanch one.
But when the latter works its own undoing,
Its inner crash is like an earthquake's ruin.

LXXXVI.

She loved her lord, or thought so; but that love
Cost her an effort, which is a sad toll,
The stone of Syphys, if once we move.
Our feelings 'gainst the nature of the soil.
She had nothing to complain of, or repro've,
No bickerings, no comniual turmoil.
Their union was a model to behold,
Serene and noble,—conjugal but cold.

LXXXVII.

There was no great disparity of years,
Though much in temper; but they never clasb'd
They moved like stars united in their spheres,
Or like the Rhone by Leman's waters wash'd
Where mingled and yet separate appears
The river from the lake, all bluely dash'd
Through the serene and placid glassy deep,
Which fain would b lur its river-child to sleep.

LXXXVIII.

Now, when she once had ta'en an interest
In any thing; however she might flatter herself
That her intentions were the best,
Intense intentions are a dangerous matter:
Impressions were much stronger than she guess'd,
And gather'd as they run, like growing water.
Upon her mind; the more so, as her breast
Was not at first too readily impress'd.

LXXXIX.

But when it was, she had that lurking demon
Of double nature, and thus doubly named—
Firmness yeclpe in heroes, kings, and seamen,
That is, when they succeed; but greatly blamed
As obstinacy, both in men and women,
Where'er their triumph pales, or star is tamed:
And 'twill perplex the casuists in morality,
To fix the due bounds of this dangerous quality.

XC.

Had Bonaparte won at Waterloo,
It had been firmness; now 'tis pertinacity:
Must the event decide between the two?
I leave it to your people of sagacity
To draw the line between the false and true,
If such can e'er be drawn by man's capacity:
My business is with Lady Adeline,
Who in her way, too, was a heroine.
DON JUAN.

XCII.

Sue knew not her own heart; then how should I?
I think not she was then in love with Juan:
If so, she would have had the strength to fly.
The wild sensation, unto her a new one:
She merely felt a common sympathy
(I will not say it was a true or false one)
In him, because she thought he was in danger—
Her husband's friend, her own, young, and a stranger.

XCIII.

She was, or thought she was, his friend—and this Without the farce of friendship, or romance
Of Platonicm, which leads so oft amiss
Ladies who have studied friendship but in France,
Or Germany, where people purely kiss.
'Lo thus much Adeline would not advance;
But of such friendship as man's may to man be,
She was as capable as woman can be.

XCIV.

No doubt the secret influence of the sex
Will there, as also in the ties of blood,
An innocent predominance annex,
And tune the concord to a finer mood.
If free from passion, which all friendship checks,
And your true feelings fully understood,
No friend like to a woman earth discovers,
So that you have not been nor will be lovers.

XCV.

Love bears within its breast the very germ
Of change; and how should this be otherwise?
That violent things more quickly find a term
Is shown through Nature's whole analogies:
And how should the most fierce of all be firm?
Would you have endless lightning in the skies?
Methinks love's very title says enough:
How should "the tender passion" e'er be tough?

XCVI.

Alas! by all experience, seldom yet
(I merely quote what I have heard from many)
Had lovers not some reason to regret
The passion which made Solomon a sany.
I've also seen some wives (not to forget
The marriage state, the best or worst of any)
Who were the very paragons of wives,
Yet made the misery of at least two lives.

XCVII.

I've also seen some female friends (tis odd,
But true—as, if expedient, I could prove)
That faithful were, through thick and thin, abroad,
At home, far more than ever yet was love—
Who did not quit me when oppression trod
Upon me; whom no scandal could remove;
Wld. fought, and fight, in absence, too, my battles,
Despite the snaky society's loud rattles.

XCVIII.

Whether they rode, or walk'd, or studied Spanish,
To read Don Quixote in the original,
A pleasure before which all others vanish;
Whether their talk was of the kind call'd "small,
Or serious, are the topics I must banish
To the next canto; where, perhaps, I shall Say something to the purpose, and display
Considerable talent in my way.

XCIX.

Above all, I beg all men to forbear
Anticipating aught about the matter:
They'll only make mistakes about the fair.
And Juan, too, especially the latter.
And I shall take a much more serious air
Than I have yet done in this epic satire.
It is not clear that Adeline and Juan
Will fall; but if they do, 'twill be their ruin.

C.

But great things spring from little: would you think
That, in our youth, as dangerous a passion
As e'er brought man and woman to the brink
Of ruin, rose from such a slight occasion
As few would ever dream could form the link
Of such a sentimental situation?
You'll never guess, I'll bet you millions, milliards
It all sprung from a harmless game of billiards

CII.

'Tis strange—but true; for truth is always strange
Stranger than fiction: if it could be told,
How much would novels gain by the exchange!
How differently the world would men behold!
How oft would vice and virtue places change!
The new world would be nothing to the old,
If some Columbus of the moral seas
Would show mankind their souls' antipodes.

CIII.

What "antres vast and deserts idle" then
Would be discover'd in the human soul!
What icebergs in the hearts of mighty men,
With self-love in the centre as their pole!
What Anthropophagi are nine of ten
Of those who hold the kingdoms in control
Were things but only call'd by their right name
Caesar himself would be ashamed of fame

CANTO XV.

I.

Ah!—what should follow slips from my reflection.
Whatever follows ne'ertheless may be
As a propos of hope or retrospection,
As though the lurking thought had follow'd free
All present life is but an interjection,
An "Oh!" or "Ah!" of joy or misery,
Or a "Ha! ha!" or "Bah!"—a yawn, or 'Pooh
Of which perhaps the latter is most true.
II.

But, more or less, the whole’s a syncope,
Or a singultus—emblems of emotion,
The grand antithesis to great ennui,
Wherewith we break our bubbles on the ocean,
That watery outline of eternity,
Or miniature at least, as is my notion,
Which ministers unto the soul’s delight,
In seeing matters which are out of sight.

III.

But all are better than the sigh suppress,
Corroding in the cavern of the heart,
Making the countenance a mask of rest,
And turning human nature to an art.
Few men dare show their thoughts of worst or best;
Dissimulation always sets apart
A corner for herself; and therefore fiction
Is that which passes with least contradiction.

IV.

Ah! who can tell? Or rather, who cannot
Remember, without telling, passion’s errors?
The drainer of oblivion, even the sot,
Hath got blue devils for his morning mirrors:
What though on Lethe’s stream he seems to float,
He cannot sink his tremors or his terrors;
The ruby glass that shakes within his hand,
Leaves a sad sediment of Time’s worst sand.

V.

And as for Love—Oh, Love!—We will proceed,
The Lady Adeline Amundeville,
A pretty name as one would wish to read,
Must perch harmonious on my tuneful quill.
There’s music in the sighing of a reed;
There’s music in the gushing of a rill;
There’s music in all things, if men had ears;
Their earth is but an echo of the spheres.

VI.

The Lady Adeline, right honorable,
And honor’d, ran a risk of growing less so:
For few of the soft sex are very stable
In their resolves—alas! that I should say so:
They differ as wine differs from its label,
When once decanted;—I presume to guess so,
But will not swear: yet both upon occasion,
Till old, may undergo adulteration.

VII.

But Adeline was of the purest vintage,
The unmingled essence of the grape; and yet
Bright as a new Napoleon from its mintage,
Or glorious as a diamond richly set;
A page where Time should hesitate to print age,
And for which nature might forego her debt—
Sic! creditor whose process doth involve in’t
The task of finding every body solvent.

VIII.

Oh! Death! thou duncest of all duns! thou daily
Knockest at doors, at first with modest tap,
Like a meek tradesman when approaching palely
Some splendid debtor he would take by sap:
But oft denied, as patience ‘gins to fail, he Advances with exaggerated rap,
And (if let in) insists, in terms unhandsome,
In ready money, or “a draft on Ransom.”

IX.

Whate’er thou takest, spare a while poor beauty
She is so rare, and thou hast so much prey,
What though she now and then may slip from duty
The more’s the reason why thou ought to stay.
Gaunt Gourmand! with whole nations for thy boot
You should be civil in a modest way:
Suppress, then, some slight feminine diseases,
And take as many heroes as Heaven pleases.

X.

Fair Adeline, the more ingenuous
Where she was interested, (as was said,)
Because she was not apt, like some of us,
To like too readily, or too high bred
To show it—points we need not now discuss—
Would give up artlessly both heart and head
Unto such feelings as seem’d innocent,
For objects worthy of the sentiment.

XI.

Some parts of Juan’s history, which rumor,
That live gazette, had scatter’d to disfigure,
She had heard; but women hear with more good
Such aberrations than we men of rigor. [ humor
Besides his conduct, since in England, grew more
Strict, and his mind assumed a manlier vigor;
Because he had, like Aciobides,
The art of living in all climes with ease.

XII.

His manner was perhaps the more seductive,
Because he ne’er seem’d anxious to seduce;
Nothing affected, studied, or constructive
Of coxcombry or conquest: no abuse
Of his attractions marr’d the fair perspective,
To indicate a Cupidón broke loose,
And seem to say, “resist us if you can”—
Which makes a dandy while it spoils a man.

XIII.

They are wrong—that’s not the way to set about it;
As, if they told the truth, could well be shown.
But, right or wrong, Don Juan was without it;
In fact, his manner was his own alone:
Sincere he was—at least you could not doubt it,
In Listening merely to his voice’s tone.
The devil hath not in all his quiver’s choice
An arrow for the heart like a sweet voice.

XIV.

By nature soft, his whole address held off
Suspicion: though not timid, his regard
Was such as rather seem’d to keep aloof,
To shield himself, than put you on your guard:
Perhaps ‘twas hardly quite assured enough,
But modesty’s at times its own reward,
Like virtue; and the absence of pretension
Will go much further than there’s need to mention.

XV.

Serene, accomplish’d, cheerful, but not loud
Insinuating without insinuation;
Observant of the foibles of the crowd,
Yet ne’er betraying this in conversation,
 Proud with the proud, yet courteously proud,
So as to make them feel he knew his station
And theirs:—without a struggle for priority,
He neither brook’d nor claimed superiority.
XVI.
That is, with men: with women, he was what They pleased to make or take him for; and their imagination's quite enough for that:
So that the outline's tolerably fair,
They fill the canvas up—and "verbum sat,"
If once their phantasies be brought to bear
Upon an object, whether sad or playful,
They can transfigure brighter than a Raphael.

XVII.
Adeline, no deep judge of character,
Was apt to add a coloring from her own.
Tis thus the good will amiably err,
And eke the wise, as has been often shown.
Experience is the chief philosopher,
But saddest when his science is well known:
And persecuted sages teach the schools
Their folly in forgetting there are fools.

XVIII.
Was it not so, great Locke? and greater Bacon?
Great Socrates? And Thou, Diviner still,!
Whose lot it is by man to be mistaken,
And thy pure creed made sanction of all ill?
Redeeming worlds to be by bigots shaken,
How was thy toil rewarded? We might fill
Volumes with similar sad illustrations,
But leave them to the conscience of the nations.

XIX.
I perch upon an humber promontory,
Amid life's infinite variety:
With no great care for what is nicknamed glory,
But speculating as I cast mine eye.
On what may suit or may not suit my story,
And never straining hard to versify;
I rattled on exactly as I'd talk
With any body in a ride or walk.

XX.
I don't know that there may be much ability
Shown in this sort of desultory rhyme;
But there's a conversational facility,
Which may round off an hour upon a time.
Of this I'm sure at least, there's no servility
In mine irregularity of chime,
Which rings what's uppermost of new or hoary,
Just as I feel the "improvvisatore."

XXI.
"Omnia vult bella Matho diceo—die aliquando Et bene dic neutrum, die aliquando male."
The first is rather more than mortal can do;
The second may be sadly done or gayly;
The third is still more difficult to stand to;
The fourth we hear, and see, and say, too, dilly:
The whole together is what I could wish I to serve in this comsumard of a dish.

XXII.
A modest hope—but modesty's my forte,
And pride my foible:—let us ramble on.
I meant to make this poem very short,
But now I can't tell where it may not run.
No doubt, if I had wish'd to pay my court
To critics, or to hail the setting sun
Of tyranny of all kinds, my conclusion
Were more;—but I was born for opposition.

XXIII.
But then 'tis mostly on the weaker side:
So that I verily believe if they
Who now are basking in their full-blown pi. le,
Were shaken down, and "dogs had had thel
Though at the first I might by chance derive [day,"
Their tumble, I should turn the other way,
And wax an ultra-royalist in loyalty,
Because I hate even democratic royalty.

XXIV.
I think I should have made a decent spouse,
If I had never proved the soft condition;
I think I should have made monastic vows,
But for my own peculiar superstition:
'Gainst rhyme I never should have knock'd my brow.
Nor broken my own head, nor that of Priscian;
Nor worn the motley mantle of a poet,
If some one had not told me to forego it.

XXV.
But "laissez aller"—knights and dames I sing,
Such as the times may furnish. 'Tis a flight
Which seems at first to need no lofty wing,
Plumed by Longinus or the Stagyrite:
The difficulty lies in coloring
(Keepering the due propotions still in sight)
With nature manners which are artificial,
And rendering general that which is especial.

XXVI.
The difference is, that in the days of old
Men made the manners; manners now make men,
Pinn'd like a flock, and fleeced too in their fold,
At least nine, and a ninth besides of ten.
Now this at all events must render cold
Your writers, who must either draw again
Days better drawn before, or else assume
The present, with their common-place costume.

XXVII.
We'll do our best to make the best on't:—March!
March, my Muse! If you cannot fly, yet flutter;
And when you may not be sublime, be arch,
Or starch, as are the editics statesmen utter.
We surely may find something worth research
Columbus found a new world in a cutter,
Or brigantine, or pink, of no great tonnage,
While yet America was in her nonce.

XXVIII.
When Adeline, in all her growing sense
Of Juan's merits and his situation,
Felt on the whole an interest intense,—
Partly perhaps because a fresh sensation,
Or that he had an air of innocence,
Which is for innocence a sad temptation,—
As women hate half measures, on the whole,
She 'gan to ponder how to save his soul.

XXIX.
She had a good opinion of advice,
Like all who give and eke receive it gratis,
For which small thanks are still the market-price,
Even where the article at highest rate is.
She thought upon the subject twice or thrice,
And morally decided, the best state is,
For morals, marriage; and, this question carried
'She seriously advised him to get married.
Juan replied, with all becoming deference,
He had a predilection for that tie;
But that at present, with immediate reference
To his own circumstances, there might lie
Some difficulties, as in his own preference,
Or that of her to whom he might apply;
That still he'd wed with such or such a lady,
If that they were not married all already.

Next to the making matches for herself,
And daughters, brothers, sisters, kith or kin,
Arranging them like books on the same shelf,
There's nothing women love to dabble in.
More (like a stockholder in growing pelf)
Than match-making in general: 'tis no sin
Cerets, but a preventative, and therefore
That is, no doubt, the only reason wherefore.

But never yet (except of course a miss
Unwed, or mistress never to be wed,
Or wed already, who object to this)
Was there chase dame who had not in her head
Some drama of the marriage unities,
Oberved as strictly both at board and bed,
As those of Aristotle, though sometimes
They turn out melodrames or pantomimes.

They generally have some only son,
Some heir to a large property, some friend
Of an old family, some gay Sir John,
Of grave Lord George, with whom perhaps might
A line, and leave posterity undone,
Unless a marriage was applied to mend
The prospect and their morals: and besides,
They have at hand a blooming glut of bridges.

From these they will be careful to select,
For this an heiress, and for that a beauty;
For one a songstress who hath no defect,
For 'tother one who promises much duty;
For this a lady no one can reject,
Whose sole accomplishments were quite a bootie;
A second for her excellent connections;
A third, because there can be no objections.

When Rapp the Harmonist embarg'd marriage
In his harmonious settlement—(which flourishes
Strangely enough as yet without miscarriage,
Because it breeds no more mouths than it nourishes,
Without those sad expenses which disparage
What nature naturally most encourages)—
Why call'd he 'Harmony'? a state sans wedlock?
Now here I've got the preacher at a dead lock.

Because he either meant to sneer at harmony
Or marriage, by divorcing them thus-oddy.
But whether reverend Rapp learn'd this in Germany
Or no, 'tis said his sect is rich and godly,
Pious and pure, beyond what I can term any
Of ours, although they propagate more broadly.
My objection's to his title, not his ritual,
A though I wonder how it grew habitual.

But Rapp is the reverse of zealous matrons,
Who favor, malgré Malthus, generation—
Professors of that genial art, and patrons
Of all the modest part of propagation;
Which after all at such a desperate rate runs
That half its produce tends to emigration,
That sad result of passions and potatoes—
Two weeds which pose our economic Catos.

Had Adeline read Malthus? I can't tell; [nee]
I wish she had: his book's the eleventh command
Which says, "Thou shalt not marry," unless weel
This be (as far as I can understand) meant.
'Tis not my purpose on his views to dwell,
Nor canvass what so "eminent a hand" meant:
But certes it conducts to lives ascetic,
Or turning marriage into arithmetic.

But Adeline, who probably presumed
That Juan had enough of maintenance,
Or separate maintenance, in case 'twas doom'd—
As on the whole it is an even chance
That bridegrooms, after they are fairly groom'd,
May retrograde a little in the dance
Of marriage—(which might form a painter's fame,
Like Holbein's "Dance of Death"—but 'tis the same:)

But Adeline determined Juan's wedding,
In her own mind, and that's enough for woman.
But then with whom? There was the sage Miss
Reading,
[Miss Knowman, Miss Raw, Miss Flaw, Miss Showman, and
And the two fair co-heiresses, Giltbedding. [mon.]
She deem'd his merits something more than com-
All these were unobjectionable matches,
And might go on, if well wound up, like watches.

There was Miss Millpond, smooth as summer's sea,
That usual paragon, an only daughter,
Who seem'd the cream of equanimity, [water
Till skim'm'd—and then there was some milk and
With a slight shade of Blue too, it might be,
Beneath the surface; but what did it matter?
Love's riotous, but marriage should have quiet,
And, being consumptive, live on a milk diet.

And then there was the Miss Audacia Shoestring,
A dashing demoiselle of good estate,
Whose heart was fixed upon a star or bluestring; [But whether English dukes grow rare of late,
Or that she had not harp'd upon the true string,
By which such sirens can attract our great,
She took up with some foreign younger brother
A Turk or Turk—the one's as good as t'other.

And then there was—but why should I go on,
Unless the ladies should go off?—there was Indeed a certain fair and fairy one,
Of the best class, and better than her class,—
Aurora Raby, a young star who shone
O'or life, too sweet an image for such glass
A lovely being, scarcely form'd or moulded,
A rose with all its sweetest leaves yet folded:
XLIV.
Rich, noble, but an orphan; left an only child to the care of guardians good and kind:
But still her aspect had an air so lonely!
Blood is not water; and where shall we find
Feelings of youth like those which overthrown lie
By death, when we are left, alas! behind,
To feel, in friendless palaces, a home
Is wanting, and our best ties in the tomb?

XLV.
Early in years, and yet more infantine
In figure, she had something of sublime
In eyes which sadly shone, as seraphs shine.
All youth—but with an aspect beyond time;
Radiant and grave—as pitying man's decline:
Mournful—but mournful of another's crime,
She look'd as if she sat by Eden's door,
And grieve'd for those who could return no more.

XLVI.
She was a Catholic too, sincere, austere,
As far as her own gentle heart allow'd,
And deem'd that fallen worship far more dear.
Perhaps because 'twas fallen: her sires were proud
Of deeds and days when they had fill'd the ear
Of nations, and had never bent or bow'd
To novel power; and as she was the last,
She held their old faith and old feelings fast.

XLVII.
She gazed upon a world she scarcely knew,
As seeking not to know it; silent, lone,
As grows a flower, thus quietly she grew,
And kept her heart serene within its zone.
There was awe in the homage which she drew;
Her spirit seem'd as seated on a throne
Apart from the surrounding world, and strong
In its own strength—most strange in one so young.

XLVIII.
Now it so happen'd, in the catalogue
Of Adeline, Aurora was omitted,
Although her birth and wealth had given her vogue
Beyond the charmers we have already cited:
Her beauty also seem'd to form no clog
Against her being mentioned as well fitted,
By many virtues, to be worth the trouble
Of single gentlemen who would be double.

XLIX.
And this omission, like that of the bust
Of Brutus at the pageant of Tiberius,
Made Juan wonder, as no doubt he must.
This he express'd half smiling and half serious;
When Adeline replied with some disgust,
And with an air, to say the least, imperious,
She marvell'd "what he saw in such a baby
As that prim, silent, cold Aurora Ruby?"

L.
Juan rejoyn'd—"Sh! was a Catholic,
And therefore fitt'st, as of his persuasion;
Since he was sure his mother would fall sick,
And the Pope thunder excommunication,
If"—But here Adeline, who seem'd to pique
Herself 'tremely on the inoculation
Of others with her own opinions, stated—
As usual—the same reason which she late did.

LI.
And wherefore not? a reasonable reason
If good, is none too worse for repetition;
If bad, the best way's certainly to cease on
And amplify: you lose much by concession:
Whereas insisting in or out of season
Convinces all men, even a politician;
Or—what is just the same—it wears out.
So the end's gain'd, what signifies the route?

LII.
Why Adeline had this slight prejudice—
For prejudice it was—against a creature
As pure as sanctity itself from vice,
With all the added charm of form and feature.
From me appears a question far too nice,
Since Adeline was liberal by nature;
But nature's nature, and has more caprices
Than I have time, or will, to take to pieces.

LIII.
Perhaps she did not like the quiet way
With which Aurora on those baubles look'd,
Which charm most people in their earlier day:
For there are few things by mankind less brook'd
And woman-kind too, if we so may say,
Than finding thus their genius stand rebuk'd.
Like "Antony's by Caesar," by the few
Who look upon them as they ought to do.

LIV.
It was not envy—Adeline had none;
Her place was far beyond it, and her minu
It was not scorn—which could not light on one Whose greatest fault was leaving few to find
It was not jealousy, I think: but shun
Following the "ignes fatui" of mankind;
It was not—but 'tis easier far, alas!
To say what it was not, than what it was.

LV.
Little Aurora deem'd she was the theme
Of such discussion. She was there a guest,
A beauteous ripple of the brilliant stream
Of rank and youth, though purer than the rest,
Which flow'd on a moment in the beam
Thine sheds a moment o'er each sparkling crest
Had she known this, she would have calmly smiled,
She had so much, or little, of the child.

LVI.
The dashing and proud air of Adeline
Imposed not upon her: she saw her blaze
Much as she would have seen a glowworm shine,
Then turn'd unto the stars for loftier rays.
Juan was something she could not divine,
Being no sibyl in the new world's ways,
Yet she was nothing dazzled by the meteor,
Because she did not pin her faith on feature.

LVII.
His fame too,—for he had that kind of fame [kind.
Which sometimes plays the deuce with woman
A heterogeneous mass of glorious blame,
Half virtues and whole vices being combined;
Faults which attract because they are not tame;
Follies trick'd out so brightly that they blind:
These seals upon her wax made no impression,
Such was her coldness or her self-possession.
LVII.

Juan knew nought of such a character—
High, yet resembling not his lost Haidée;
Yet each was radiant in her proper sphere:
The island girl, bred up by the lone sea,
More warm, as lovely, and not less sincere,
Was nature’s all: Aurora could not be
Nor would be thus;—the difference in them
Was such as lies between a flower and gem

Having wound up with this sublime comparison,
Methinks we may proceed upon our narrative,
And, as my friend Scott says, “I sound my Waris
Scott, the superlative of my comparative,—son:”
Scott, who can paint your Christian knight or Serf, lord, man, with such skill as none would
There had not been one Shakespeare and Voltaire,
Of one or both of whom he seems the heir.

I say, in my slight way I may proceed
To play upon the surface of humanity.
I write the world, nor care if the world read,
At least for this I cannot spare its vanity.
My Muse hath bred, and still perhaps may breed
More foes by this same scroll: when I began it,
Thought that it might turn out so—now I know it,
But still I am, or was, a pretty poet.

The conference or congress (for it ended
As congresses of late do) of the Lady
Adeline and Don Juan rather blended
Some acids with the sweets—for she was heady;
But, ere the matter could be marr’d or mended,
The silvery bell rang; not for “dinner ready,”
But for that hour, call’d half-hour, given to dress,
Though ladies robes seem scant enough for less.

Great things were now to be achieved at table,
With massey plate for armor, knives and forks
For weapons; but what Muse since Homer’s able (His feasts are not the worst part of his works)
To draw up in array a single day—bill
Of modern dinners? where more mystery lurks
In soups or sauces, or a sole ragoût,
Than witches, b—ches, or physicians brew.

There was a goodly “soup à la bonne femme,”
Though God knows whence it came from; there
A turbot for relief of those who eram, [was too
Reliev’d with dindon à la Perigoux;
There also was—the sinner that I am!
How shall I get this gourmand stanza through?
Soupé à la Beauveau, whose relief was dory,
Relieved itself by pork, for greater glory.

But I must crowd all into one grand mess
Or mass; for should I stretch into detail,
My Muse would run much more into excess,
Than when some squammish people deem her frail;
But, though a “bonne vivante,” I must confess
Her stomach’s not her peccant part: this tale
However doth require some slight refecion,
Just to relieve her spirits from dejection.

LVIII.

Fowl à la Condé, slices eke of salmon,
With sauces Genevoises, and haunch of venison;
Wines too which might again have slain young Am
mon,
A man like whom we hope shan’t see many soon.
They also set a glazed Westphalian ham on,
Whereon Apicius would bestow his benison;
And then there was champagne with foaming whirls,
As white as Cleopatra’s melted pearls.

Then there was God knews what “à l’Allemande,”
“A l’Espagnole,” “timballe,” and “Salpicole”—
With things I can’t withstand or understand,
Though swallow’d with much zest upon the whole,
And “entremets” to paddle with at hand,
Gently to lift down the subsiding soul.
While great Lucullus’ robe triumphate muffles
(There’s fame) young partridge fillets, deck’d with truffles.

What are the fillets on the victor’s brow [arch
To these? They are rags or dust. Where is the
Which noddled to the nation’s spoils below?
Where the triumphal chariot’s haunted march?
Gone to where victories must like dinners go.
Further I shall not follow the research:
But oh! ye modern heroes with your cartridges,
When will your names lend lustre even to partridges?

The mind is lost in mighty contemplation
Of intellect expanded on two courses:
And indigestion’s grand multiplication
Requires arithmetic beyond my forces.
Who would suppose, from Adam’s simple ration,
That cookery could have call’d forth such resources,
As form a science and a nomenclature
From out the commonest demands of nature?

The glasses jingled, and the palates tingled;
The diners of celebrity dined well;
The ladies with more moderation mingled
In the feast, pecking less than I can tell;
Also the younger men too; for a springald
Can’t like ripe age in gourmandize excel,
But thinks less of good eating than the whisper
(When seated next him) of some pretty lisper.

Alas! I must leave undescribed the glibber,
The salmi, the consomné, the pureé,
All which I used to make my myrines run glibber
Than could roast beef in our rough John Bull way
I must not introduce even a spare rib here,
“Bubble and squeak” would spoil my liquid lay
But I have dined, and must forego, alas!
The chaste description even of a “becasse,”...
LXXII.
And fruits, and ice, and all that art refines
From nature for the service of the gods,—
Taste or the gout,—pronounce it as inclines
Your stomach. Ere you dine, the French will do,
But after, there are sometimes certain signs
Which prove plain English truer of the two.
Has ever had the gout? I have not had it—
But I say have, and you too, reader, dread it.

LXXXIII.
The simple olives, best allies of wine,
Must I pass over in my bill of fare?
I must, although a favorite "plat" of mine
In Spain, and Lucca, Athens, every where:
On them and bread 'twas oft my luck to dine,
The grass my tablecloth, in open air,
On Sunicum or Hynettus, like Diogenes,
Of whom half my philosophy the progeny is.

LXXXIV.
Amid this tumult of fish, flesh, and fowl,
And vegetables, all in masquerado,
The guests were placed according to their roll,
But various as the various meats display'd:
Don Juan sat next an "à l'Espagnole"—
No damsel, but a dish, as hath been said;
But so far like a lady, that 'twas drest
Superbly, and contain'd a world of zest.

LXXXV.
By some odd chance, too, he was placed between Aurora and the Lady Adeline—
A situation difficult, I ween,
For man therein, with eyes and heart, to dine.
Also the conference which we have seen
Was not such as to encourage him to shine;
For Adeline, addressing few words to him,
With two transcendent eyes seem'd to look through him.

LXXXVI.
I sometimes almost think that eyes have ears;
This much is sure, that, out of earshot, things
Are somehow echoed to the pretty ears, 'tis strange;
Of which I can't tell whence their knowledge
Like that same mystic music of the spheres,
Which no one hears so loudly though it rings.
'Tis wonderful how oft the sex have heard
Long dialogues which pass'd without a word!

LXXXVII.
Aurora sat with that indifference
Which piques a preux chevalier—as it ought:
Of all offences that's the worst offence,
Which seems to hint you are not worth a thought.
N. J. Juan, though no coxcomb in pretence,
Was not exactly pleased to be so ought,
Like a good ship entangled among ice,
And after so much excellent advice.

LXXXVIII.
To his gay nothing, nothing was replied,
Or something which was nothing, as urbanity
Required. Aurora scarcely look'd aside,
Nor even smiled enough for any vanity.
The devil was in the girl! Could it be pride,
Or modesty, or absence, or inanity?
Heaven knows! But Adeline's malicious eyes
Sparkled with her successful prophecies.

LXXXIX.
And look'd as much as if to say, "I said it!"
A kind of triumph I'll not recommend,
Because it sometimes, as I've seen or read it.
Both in the case of lover and of friend,
Will plique a gentleman, for his own credit,
To bring what was a jest to a serious end;
For all men prophecy what is or was,
And hate those who won't let them come to pass.

LXXX.
Juan was drawn thus into some attentions,
Slight but select, and just enough to express,
To females of perspicuous comprehensions,
That he would rather make them more than less Aurora at the last (so history mentions,
Though probably much less a fact than guess)
So far relax'd her thoughts from their sweet prison
As once or twice to smile, if not to listen.

LXXXI.
From answering, she began to question: this
With her was rare: and Adeline, who as yet
Thought her predictions went not much amiss,
Began to dread she'd thaw to a coquette—
So very difficult, they say, it is
To keep extremes from meeting, when once set
In motion; but she here too much refined—
Aurora's spirit was not of that kind.

LXXXII.
But Juan had a sort of winning way,
A proud humility, if such there be,
Which shew'd such deference to what females say
As if each charming word were a decree.
His tact, too, temper'd him from grave to gay,
And taught him when to be reserved or free:
He had the art of drawing people out,
Without their seeing what he was about.

LXXXIII.
Aurora, who in her indiffERENCE
Confounded him in common with the crowd
Of flatterers, though she deem'd he had more sense
Than whispering flighings, or than witlings loud—
Commenced (from such slight things will great com-Mence)
To feel that flattery which attracts the proud
Rather by deference than compliment
And wins even by a delicate dissent.

LXXXIV.
And then he had good looks;—that point was carried
Nem. con. among the women, which I grieve
To say, leads oft to crim. con. with the married—
A case which to the juries we may leave,
Since with digressions we too long have tarried.
Now though we know of old that looks deceive,
And always have done, somehow these good looks
Make more impression than the best of books.

LXXXV.
Aurora, who look'd more on books than faces,
Was very young, although so very sage,
Admiring more Minerva than the Graces,
Especially upon a printed page.
But virtue's self with all her tightest laces,
Has not the natural stays of strict old age,
B. t. Socrates, that model of all duty,
Own'd to a penchant, though discreet, for beauty.
BYRON'S WORKS.

LXXXVI.

And girls of sixteen are thus far Socratic,
But innocently so, as Socrates:
And really, if the sage sublime and Attic
At seventy years had phantasies like these,
Which Plato in his dialogues dramatic
Has shown, I know not why they should displease.
In Virginia—always in a modest way,
Observe; for that with me's a "sine qua non".

LXXXVII.

Also observe, that like the great Lord Coke,
(See Littleton) whence'er I have express'd
Opinions two, which at first sight may look
Twin opposites, the second is the best.
Perhaps I have a third, too, in a nook,
Or none at all—which seems a sorry jest;
But if a writer should be quite consistent,
How could he possibly show things existent?

LXXXVIII.

If people contradict themselves, can I
Help contradicting them, and every body,
Even my veracious self—but that's a lie;
I never did so, never will—how should I?
He who doubts all things, nothing can deny;
Truth's fountains may be clear—her streams are Muddy,
And cut through such canals of contradiction,
That she must often navigate o'er fiction.

LXXXIX.

Apologue, fable, poesy, and parable,
Are false, but may be render'd also true
By those who saw them in a land that's arable.
'Tis wonderful what fable will not do!
'Tis said it makes reality more bearable:
But what's reality? Who has its clue?
Philosophy? No; she too much rejects.
Religion? Yes; but which of all her sects?

XC.

Some millions must be wrong, that's pretty clear;
Perhaps it may turn out that all were right.
God help us! Since we've need on our career
To keep our holy beacons always bright,
'Tis time that some new prophet should appear
Or old indigulge man with a second-sight.
Opinions wear out in some thousand years,
Without a small refreshment from the spheres.

XCI.

But here again, why will I thus entangle
Myself with metaphysics? None can hate
So much as I do any kind of wrangle;
And yet such is my folly, or my fate,
I always knock my head against some angle
About the present, past, or future state;
Yet I wish well to Trojan and to Tyrian,
For I was bred a moderate Presbyterian.

XCII.

But though I am a temperate theologian,
And also seek as a metaphysician,
Impartial between Tyrian and Trojan,
As Eldon on a lunatic commission,—
In politics, my duty is to show John
Bull something of the lower world's condition.
It makes my blood boil like the springs of Hecla,
To see men let these soundless sovereigns break law.

XCIII.

But politics, and policy, and pity,
Are topics which I sometimes introduce,
Not only for the sake of their variety,
But as subservient to a moral use:
Because my business is to dress society,
And stuff with sons that very verdant goose.
And now, that we may furnish with some matter of Tastes, we are going to try the supernatural.

XCIV.

And now I will give up all argument:
And positively henceforth no temptation
Shall "foo me to the top of my bent;"
Yes, I'll begin a thorough reformation.
Indeed I never knew what people meant
By deeming that my Muse's conversation
Was dangerous,—I think she is as harmless
As some who labor more and yet may charm less.

XCV.

Grim reader! did you ever see a ghost?
No; but you've heard—"I understand—be dumb."
And don't regret the time you may have lost,
For you have got that pleasure still to come:
And do not think I mean to sneer at most
Of these things, or by a ridicule benumb.
That source of the sublime and the mysterious:
For certain reasons my belief is serious.

XCVI.

Serious? You laugh:—you may; that will I not;
My smiles must be sincere or not at all.
I say I do believe a haunted spot
Exists—and where? That shall I not recall,
Because I'd rather it should be forgot.
"Shadows the soul of Richard" may appal:
In short, upon that subject I've some qualms, very Like those of the philosophy of Malmsbury.

XCVII.

The night (I sing by night—sometimes an owl,
And now and then a nightingale)—is dim,
And the loud shriek of sage Minerva's fowl
Rattles around me her discordant bynim:
Old portraits from old walls upon me scowl—
I wish to heaven they would not look so grim;
The dying embers dwindled in the grate—
I think too that I have sate up too late.

XCVIII.

And therefore, though 'tis by no means my way
To rhyme at noon—when I have other things
To think of, if I ever think,—I say,
I feel some chilly midnight shudderings,
And prudently postpone, until midday,
Treating a topic which, alas! but brings
Shadows—but you must be in my condition
Before you learn to call this superstition.

XCIX.

Between two worlds life hovers like a star,
'Twixt night and morn, upon the horizon's verge
How little do we know that which we are!
How less what we may be! The eternal surge
Of time and tide rolls on, and bears afar
Our bubbles; as the old burst, new emerge,
Lash'd from the foam of ages; while the graves
Of empires leave but like some passing waves.
CANTO XVI.

I.
The antique Persians taught three useful things,—
To draw the bow, to ride, and speak the truth.
This was the mode of Cyrus—best of kings—
A mode adopted since by modern youth.
Bows have they, generally with two strings;
Horses they ride without remorse or ruth;
At speaking truth perhaps they are less clever,
But draw the long bow better now than ever.

II.
The cause of this effect, or this defect,
"For this effect defective comes by cause,"—
Is what I have not been to inspect;
But this I must say in my own applause,
Of all the muses that I recollect,
Whate'er may be her follies or her flaws
In some things, mine's beyond all contradiction
The most sincere that ever dealt in fiction.

III.
And as she treats all things, and ne'er retreats
From any thing, this Epic will contain
A wilderness of the most rare conceits,
Which you might elsewhere hope to find in vain.
'Tis true, there be some bitterness with the sweets,
Yet mix'd so slightly that you can't complain,
But wonder they so few are, since my tale is
"De rebus cunctis et quibusdam allis."

IV.
But of all truths which she has told, the most
True is that which she about is to tell.
I said it was a story of a ghost—
What then? I only know it so befell.
Have you explored the limits of the coast
Where all the dwellers of the earth must dwell?
'Tis time to strike such puny doubts dumb as
The skeptics who would not believe Columbus.

V.
Some people would impose now with authority,
'zurpin's or Monmouth Geoffry's Chronicle;
Men whose historical superiority
Is always greatest at a miracle.
But Saint Augustine has the great priority,
Who bids all men believe the impossible,
Because 'tis so. Who nibble, scribble, quibble, he Quiets at once with "quix impossible."

VI.
And therefore, mortals, cavil not all;
Believe:—'tis improbable you must;
And if it is impossible, you shall:
'Tis always best to take things upon trust.
I d: not speak profanely to recall
Those holler mysteries, which the wise and just Receive as gospel, and which grow more rooted,
As all truths must, the more they are disputed.

VII.
I merely mean to say what Johnson said,
That in the course of some six thousand years,
All nations have believed that from the dead
A visitant at intervals appears;
And what is strangest, upon this strange head,
Is that whatever bar the reason rears
'Gainst such belief, there's something stronger still
In its behalf, let those deny who will.

VIII.
The dinner and the soirée too were done,
The supper too discussed, the dames admired
The banqueters had dropp'd off one by one—
The song was silent, and the dance expired:
The last thin petticoats were vanish'd, gone,
Like feecy clouds into the sky retired,
And nothing brighter gleam'd through the saloon
Than dying tapers—and the peeping moon.

IX.
The evaporation of a joyous day
Is like the last glass of champagne, without
The foam which made its virgin bumper gay;
Or like a system coupled with a doubt;
Or like a soda-bottle, when its spray
Has sparkled and let half its spirit out;
Or like a billow left by storms behind,
Without the animation of the wind;

X.
Or like an opiate which brings troubled rest,
Or none; or like—like nothing that I know
Except itself;—such is the human breast;
A thing, of which similitudes can show
No real likeness,—like the old Tyrian vest
Dyed purple, none at present can tell how.
If from a shell-fish or from cochineal, 1
So perish every tyrant's robe piecemeal

XI.
But next to dressing for a rout or ball,
Undressing is a wo; our robe-de-chambre
May sit like that of Nessus, and recall
Thoughts quite as yellow, but less clear than amber
Titus exclaim'd, "I've lost a day!" Of all
The nights and days most people can remember,
(I have had of both not to be disdain'd,
I wish they'd state how many they have gain'd.

XII.
And Juan, on retiring for the night,
Felt restless and perplex'd, and compromised;
He thought Aurora Raby's eyes more bright
Than Adeline (such is advice) advised;
If he had known exactly his own plight,
He probably would have philosophized;
A great resource to all; and ne'er denied
Till wanted; therefore Juan only sigh'd.

XIII.
He sigh'd;—the next resource is the full moon.
Where all sighs are deposited; and now,
It happen'd luckily, the chaste orb shone
As clear as such a climate will allow;
And Juan's mind was in the proper tone
To hail her with the apostrophe—"Oh, chau!"
Of amatory egotism the tedium,
Which further to explain would be a truism.
XIV.
But lover, poet, or astronomer,
Shepherd, or swain, whoever may behold,
Feel some abstraction when they gaze on her:
Great thoughts we catch from thence, (besides a Sometimes, unless my feelings rather err;)
Deep secrets to her rolling light are told;
The ocean's tides and mortals' brains she aways,
And also hearts, where there be truth in lays.

XV.
Juan felt somewhat pensive, and disposed
For contemplation rather than his pillow;
The Gothic chamber, where he was enclosed,
Lay in the rippling sound of the lake's billow,
With all the mystery by midnight caused;
Below his window waved (of course) a willow;
And he stood gazing out on the cascade
That flash'd and after darken'd in the shade.

XVI.
Upon his table or his toilet—which
Of these is not exactly ascertain'd—
(I state this, for I am cautious to a pitch
Of nicety, where a fact is to be gain'd)
A lamp burn'd high, while he leant from a niche,
Where many a Gothic ornament remain'd,
In chisell'd stone, and painted glass, and all
That time has left our fathers of their hall.

XVII.
Then as the night was clear though cold, he threw
His chamber-door wide open—and went forth
Into a gallery of a sombre hue,
Long, furnish'd with old pictures of great worth
Of knights and dames heroic and chaste too,
As doubtless should be people of high birth.
But by dim lights the portraits of the dead
Have something ghastly, desolate, and dread.

XVIII.
The forms of the grim knight and pictured saint
Look living in the moon; and as you turn
Backward and forward to the echoes faint
Of your own footsteps—voices from the urn
Appear to wake, and shadows wild and quaint
Start from the frames which fence their aspects
As if to ask how you can dare to keep
A vigil there, where all but death should sleep.

XIX.
And the pale smile of beauties in the grave,
The charms of other days, in starlight gleams
Glimmer on high; their buried locks still wave
Along the canvas; their eyes glance like dreams
On ours, or spars within some dusky cave,
But death is imaged in their shadowy beams.
A picture is the past; even ere its frame
Be gilt, who sate hath ceased to be the same.

XX.
As Juan mused on mutability,
Or on his mistress—terms synonymous—
No sound except the echo of his sigh
Or step ran sadly through that antique house,
When suddenly he heard, or thought so, nigh,
A supernatural agent—or a mouse,
Whose little nibbling rustle will embarrass
Most people, as it plays along the arras.

XXI.
It was no mouse, but lo! a monk, array'd
In cowl and beads and dusky garb, appear'd
Now in the moonlight, and now lapsed in shade,
With steps that trod as heavy, yet unheard;
His garments only a slight murmur make;
He moved as shadowy as the sisters weird,
But slowly; and as he pass'd Juan by,
Glanced, without pausing, on him a bright eye.

XXII.
Juan was petrified; he had heard a hint
Of such a spirit in these halls of old,
But thought, like most men, there was nothing 's t
Beyond the rumor which such spots unfold.
Coin'd from surviving superstition's mint,
Which passes ghosts in currency like gold,
But rarely seen, like gold compared with paper
And did he see this? or was it a vapor?

XXIII.
Once, twice, thrice pass'd—repass'd—the thing of six,
Or earth beneath, or heaven, or t' other place;
And Juan gazed upon it with a stare,
Yet could not speak or move; but, on its case
As stands a statue, stood: he felt his hair
Twine like a lot of snakes around his face;
He tax'd his tongue for words which were not granted
To ask the reverence person what he wanted.

XXIV.
The third time, after a still longer pause,
The shadow pass'd away—but where? the hall
Was long, and thus far there was no great cause
To think his vanishing unnatural;
Doors there were many, through which, by the laws
Of physics, bodies, whether short or tall,
Might come or go; but Juan could not state
Through which the spectre seem'd to evaporate.

XXV.
He stood, how long he knew not, but it seem'd
An age—expectant, powerless, with his eyes
Strain'd on the spot where first the figure glowed;
Then by degrees recall'd his energies,
And would have pass'd the whole off as a dream,
But could not wake; he was, he did surmise,
Waking already, and return'd at length
Back to his chamber, shorn of half his strength.

XXVI.
All there was as he left it; still his taper
Burnt, and not aase, as modern taper's use,
Receiving sprites with sympathetic vapor;
He rubb'd his eyes, and they did not refuse
Their office; he took up an old newspaper;
The paper was right easy to peruse:
He read an article the king attacking,
And a long eulogy of "Patent Blacking."

XXVII.
This savor'd of this world; but his hand shook—
He shut his door, and after having read
A paragraph, I think about Horne Tooke,
Undress'd, and rather slowly went to bed.
There, cough'd all snugly on his pillow's nook,
With what he'd seen his phantasy he fed,
And though it was no opiate, slumber crept
Upon him by degrees, and so he slept.
He weke betimes; and, as they supposed, I under'd upon his visitant or vision, And whether it ought not to be disclosed, At risk of being quizz'd for superstition. The more he thought, the more his mind was pos'd; In the mean time, his valet, whose precision Was great, because his master brook'd no less, Knock'd to inform him it was time to dress.

And when he walk'd down into the saloon, He sate hin pensive o'er a dish of tea, Which he perhaps had not discover'd soon, Had it not happen'd scalding hot to be, Which made him have recourse unto his soup; So much distraight he was, that all could see That something was the matter—Adeline The first—but what she could not well divine.

She look'd and saw him pale, and turn'd as pale Herself; then hastily look'd down and mutter'd Something, but what's not stated in my tale. Lord Henry said his muffin was ill butter'd; The Duchess of Fitz-Fulke play'd with her veil, And look'd at Juan hard, but nothing utter'd. Aurora Raby, with her large dark eyes, Survey'd him with a kind of calm surprise.

But seeing him all cold and silent still, And every body wondering more or less, Fair Adeline inquire'd if he were ill? He started, and said, "Yes—no—rather—yes." The family physician had great skill, And, being present, now began to express His readiness to feel his pulse, and tell The cause, but Juan said "he was quite well."

"Quite well; yes, no."—These answers were mysterious, And yet his looks appeared to sanction both, However they might savor of delirious; Something like illness of a sudden growth Weigh'd on his spirit, though by no means serious: But for the rest, as he himself seem'd loth To state the case, it might be'ten for granted, It was not the physician that he wanted.

...Lord Henry, who had now discuss'd his chocolate, Also the muffin, whereof he complain'd, Said, Juan had not got his usual look elate, At which he marvell'd, since it had not rain'd; Then ask'd her grace what news were of the duke of Her grace reply'd, his grace was rather pain'd [late? With some slight, light, hereditary twinges Of gout, which rusts aristocratic hinges.

Then Henry turn'd to Juan, and address'd 4 A few words of condolence on his state: "You look," quoth he, "as if you'd had yest: rest Broke in upon by the Black Friar of late." "What friar?" said Juan; and he did his best To put the question with an air sedate, Or careless, but the effort was not valid To hinder him from growing still more pale'd.

"Oh! have you not heard of the Black Friar? The spirit of these walls?"—"In truth not I." Why fame—but fame you know sometimes a liar— Tells an odd story, of which by and by: Whether with time the spectre has grown shy Or that our sires had a more gifted eye For such sights, though the tale is half believed, The friar of late has not been oft perceived.

"The last time was—" "I pray," said Adeline— (Who watch'd the changes of Don Juan's brow, And from its context thought she could divine ConneXions stronger than he chose to avow With this same legend,)—"if you but design To jest, you'll choose some other theme just now Because the present tale has oft been told, And is not much improved by growing old."

"Jest!" quoth Milor. "Why, Adeline, you know That we ourselves—'twas in the honey-moon!— Say—" "Well, no matter, 'twas so long ago; But come, I'll set your story to a tune." Graceful as Dian when she draws her bow, Soon She seized her harp, whose strings were kindled As touch'd, and plaintively began to play The air of "'Twas a Friar of Orders Gray."

"But add the words," cried Henry, "which you For Adeline is half a poetess, (made; Turning round to the rest, he smiling said, Of course the others could not but express In courtesy their wish to see display'd By one three talents, for there were no less— The voice, the words, the harper's skill, at once Could hardly be united by a duncé.

After some fascinating hesitation.— The charming of these charmers, who seem bound I can't tell why, to this dissimulation— Fair Adeline, with eyes fill'd on the ground At first, then kindling into animation, Added her sweet voice to the lyric sound, And sang with much simplicity,—a merit Not the less precious, that we seldom hear it.

Beware! beware! of the Black Friar, Who sitteth by Norman stone, For he mutters his prayer in the midnight air, And his mass of the days that are gone When the Lord of the Hill, Arundelville, Made Norman Church his prey, And expell'd the friars, one friar still Would not be driven away.
2.

Though he came in his might, with King Henry's
To turn church lands to lay, [right]
With sword in hand, and torch to light
Their walls, if they said nay,
A monk remain'd, unchased, unchain'd,
And he did not seem form'd of clay, [church,
For he's seen in the porch, and he's seen in the
Though, he is not seen by day.

3.
Ar'l whether for good, or whether for ill,
It is not mine to say;
But still with the house of Amundeville,
He abideth night and day.
By the marriage-bed of their lords, 'tis said,
He sits on the bridal eve;
And 'tis held as faith, to their bed of death
He comes—but not to grieve.

4.
When an heir is born, he is heard to mourn,
And when aught is to befall
That ancient line, in the pale moonshine
He walks from hall to hall.
His form you may trace, but not his face,
'Tis shadow'd by his cowl;
But his eyes may be seen from the folds between,
And they seem of a parted soul.

5.
But beware! beware! of the Black Friar.
He still retains his sway,
For he is yet the church's heir,
Whoever may be the lay.
Amundeville is lord by day,
But the monk is lord by night,
Nor wine nor wassil could raise a vassal
To question that friar's right.

6.
Say nought to him as he walks the hall,
And he'll say nought to you:
He sweeps along in his dusky pall,
As o'er the grass the dew.
Then grancery! for the Black Friar;
Heaven sain him! fair or foul,
An' I whatsoe'er may be his prayer,
Let ours be for his soul.

XLI.

The lady's voice ceased, and the thrilling wires
Died from the touch that kindled them to sound,
And the pause follow'd, which, when song expires,
Pervades a moment those who listen round;
And then, of course, the circle much admires,
Nor less applauds, by day, politeness bound,
The tones, the feeling, and the execution,
To the performer's diffident confusion.

XLII.

Fair Adeline, though in a careless way,
As if she rated such accomplishment,
As the mere pastime of an idle day,
Pursued an instant for her own content,
Would now and then as 'twere without display,
Yet with display in fact, at times relent
To such performances, with haughty smile,
To show she could, if it were worth her while.

XI. II.

Now this (but we will whisper it) side
Was—pardon the pedantic illustration—
Trampling on Plato's pride with greater pride
As did the Cynic on some like occasion;
Deeming the sage would be much mortified
Or thrown into a philosophic passion,
For a spoil'd carpet—but the "Attic Bee"
Was much consoled by his own repartee.

XLIV.

Thus Adeline would throw into the shade,
(By doing easily, what'er she chose,
What dilettanti do with vast parade,)
Their sort of half profession: for it grows
To something like this when too oft display'd,
And that it is so every body knows
Who've heard Miss That or This, or Lady T'other
Show off—to please their company or mother.

XLV.

Oh! the long evenings of duets and trios!
The admissions and the speculations;
The "Mamma Miss!" and the "Amor Mio!"
The "Tanti Palpitis" on such occasions:
The "Lascamis," and quavering "Addios!"
Among our own most musical of nations;
With "Tu mi chamas's" from Pontingale,
To soothe our ears, lest Italy should fail.

XLVI.

In Babylon's bravuras—as the home
Heart-ballads of Green Erin or Gray Highlands,
That bring Lochaber back to eyes that roam
O'er far Atlantic continents or islands,
The calemutes of music which o'ercome [lands
All mountaineers with dreams that they are nigl
No more to be beheld but in such visions,—
Was Adeline well versed as compositions.

XLVII.

She also had a twilight tinge of "Blue," [wrote
Could write rhymes, and compose more than she Made epigrams occasionally too
Upon her friends, as every body ought.
But still from that sublimer azure hue,
So much the present dye, she was remote;
Was weak enough to deem Poete a great poet,
And, what was worse, was not ashamed to show it.

XLVIII.

Aurora—since we are touching upon testo,
Which now-a-days is the thermometer
By whose degrees all characters are class'd—
Was more Shakspearian, if I do not err.
The worlds beyond this world's perplexing waste
Had more of her existence, for in her
There was a depth of feeling to embrase
Thoughts, boundless, deep, but silent too as space.

XLIX.

Not so her gracious, graceful, graceless grace,
The full-grown Hebe of Fitz-Fulke, whose mind
If she had any, was upon her face,
And that was of a fascinating kind.
A little turn for mischief you might trace
Also thereon,—but that's not much; we find
Few females without some such gentle leave,
For fear we should suppose us quite in heaven.
L.
I have not heard she was at all poetic, —
Though once she was seen reading the "Bath
And "Hayley's Triumphs," which she deemed pathetic
Because, she said, her temper had been tried
So much, the bard had really been pro-
Of what she had gone through — since a bride.
But of all verse what most insured her praise
Were sonnets to herself, or "bouts rimes."

LI.
"Twere difficult to say what was the object
Of Adeline, in bringing this same lay
To bear on what appear'd to her the subject
Of Juan's nervous feelings on that day.
Perhaps she merely had the simple project
To laugh him out of his supposed dismay;
Perhaps she might wish to confirm him in;
Though why I cannot say — at least this minute.

LII.
But so 'tis the immediate effect
Was to restore him to his self-propriety,
A thing quite necessary to the elect,
Who wish to take the tone of their society;
In which you cannot be too circumspect,
Whether the mode be persiflage or piety,
But wear the newest mantle of hypocrisy,
On pain of much displeasing the gymnocry.

LIII.
And therefore Juan now began to rally
His spirits, and, without more explanation,
To jest upon such themes in many a salary.
Her grace, too, also seized the same occasion,
With various similar remarks to tally,
But wish'd for a still more detail'd narration
Of this same mystic friar's curious doings,
About the present family's deaths and woesings.

LIV.
Of these few could say more than has been said;
They pass'd, as such things do, for superstition
With some, while others, who had more in dread
The theme, half credited the strange tradition,
And much was talk'd on all sides on that head;
But Juan, when cross-question'd on the vision,
Which some supposed (though he had not know'd it)
Had stirr'd him, answer'd in a way to cloud it.

LV.
And then, the midday having warn to one,
The company prepared to separate:
Some to their several pastimes, or to none;
Some wondering 'twas so early, some so late.
There was a goodly match, too, to be run
Between some grayhounds on my lord's estate,
And a young racehorse of old pedigree,
Match'd for the spring, whom several went to see.

LVI.
I ere was a picture-dealer, who had brought
A special Titian, warranted original,
So precious that it was not to be bought,
Though princes the possessor were besieging all.
The king himself had cheapest'd it, but thought
The civil list (he deigns to accept, obliging all
His subjects by his gracious acceptation)
For scanty, in these times of low taxation.

LVII.
But as Lord Henry was a connoisseur, —
The friend of artists, if not arts, — the owner,
With motives the most classical and pure,
So that he would have been the very donor
Rather than seller, had his wants been fewer,
So much he deem'd his patronage an honor
Had brought the capo d'opra, not for sale,
But for his judgment, — never known to fail.

LVIII.
There was a modern Goth. I mean a Gothic
Bricklayer of Babel, call'd an architect, [so thick
Brought to survey these gray walls, which, though
Might have from time acquired some slight defect,
Who, after rumaging the Abbey through thick
And thin, produced a plan, whereby to erect
New buildings of correctest conformation,
And throw down old — which he call'd restoration.

LIX.
The cost would be a tribute — an "old song,"
Set to some thousands, ("tis the usual burden
Of that same tune, when people hum it long)—
The price would speedily repay its worth in
An edifice no less sublimine than strong,
By which Lord Henry's good taste would go forth
Its glory, through all ages shining sunny,
For Gothic daring shown in English money.

LXI.
There were two lawyers busy on a mortgage
Lord Henry wish'd to raise for a new purchase;
Also a lawsuit upon tenures bourgeois,
And one on tithes which sure are discord's torches.
Kindling Religion till she throws down her gage,
"Untying" aquires "to fight against the churches;"(34)
The present was a prize ox, prize pig, and ploughman,
For Henry was a sort of Sabine showman.

LXII.
There were two poachers caught in a steel trap,
Ready for jail, their place of convalescence;
There was a country girl in a close cap
And scarlet cloak, (I hate the sight to see, since—
Since—since—in youth I had the sad mishap—
But luckily I've paid few parish fees since.)
That scarlet cloak, alas! enclosed with rigor,
Presents the problem of a double figure.

LXIII.
A reel within a bottle is a mystery,
One can't tell how it e'er got in or ous,
Therefore the present piece of natural history
I leave to those who are fond of solving doub's,
And merely state, though not for the consistory,
Lord Henry was a justice, and that Scout
The constable, beneath a warrant's banner,
Had bag'd this poacher upon Nature's manor.

LXIV.
Now justices of peace must judge all pieces
Of mischief of all kinds, and keep the game
And morals of the country from caprices
Of those who've not a license for the same;
And of all things, excepting tithes and leases,
Perhaps these are most difficult to tame:
Preserving partridges and petty wenchs
Are puzzles to the most precautionous benches.
The recant culprit was extremely pale,
Pale as if painted so; her cheek being red
By nature, as in higher dames less pale
"Tis white, at least; when they just rise from bed.
Perhaps she was ashamed of seeming frail,
Poor soul! for she was country born and bred, And knew no better in her immortality Than to vex white—for blushes are for quality.

Il'r black, bright, downcast, yet espiègle eye,
Had gather'd a large tear into its corner,
Which the poor thing at times essay'd to dry,
For she was not a sentimental mourner
Parading all her sensibility,
Nor insolent enough to scorn the sorner, But stood in trembling, patient tribulation, To be call'd up for her examination.

Of course these groups were scatter'd here and there,
Not nigh the gay saloon of ladies gent.
The lawyers in the study; and in air
The prize pig, ploughman, poachers; the men sent From town, viz. architect and dealer, were Both busy (as a general in his tent
Writing despatches) in their several stations,
Exulting in their brilliant lucubrations.

But this poor girl was left in the great hall,
While Scout, the parish guardian of the frail,
Discuss'd (he hated beer yept the "small")
A mighty mug of moral double ale.
She waited until justice could recall
Its kind attentions to their proper pale,
To make a thing in nomenclature rather
Perplexing for most virgins—a child's father.

You see here was enough of occupation
For the Lord Henry, link'd with dogs and horses,
There was much bustle too and preparation
Below stairs on the score of second courses,
Because, as suits their rank and situation,
Those who in counties have great land resources,
Have "public days" when all men may carouse,
Though not exactly what's call'd "open house."—

But once a week or fortnight, uninvited,
(Thus we translate a general invitation,)
All country gentleman, esquiro or knighted,
May drop in without cards, and take their station
At the full board, and sit alike delighted
With fashionable wine and conversation,
And, as the isthmus of the grand connexion,
Talk 'er themselves, the past and next election.

Lord Henry was a great electioneer,
Burrowing for boroughs like a rat or rabbit, But county contests cost him rather dearer, [bit
Because the neighboring Scotch Earl of Giffgab-
Had English influence in the self-same sphere here;
His son, the Honorable Dick Dice-dribb,
Was number for "the other interest," (meaning the same self-interest, with a different leaning.)

Courteous and cautious therefor in his county
He was all things to all men, and dispensable, To some civility, to others bounty, And promises to all—which last counteced.
To gather to a somewhat large amount, he Not calculating how much they condus'd But, what with keeping some and breaking others His word had the same value as another's.

A friend to freedom and freeholders—yet
No less a friend to government—he held That he exactly the just medium hit "Twixt place and patriotism—albeit compell'd. Such was his sovereign's pleasure, (though unfit He added modestly, when rebels rall'd,) To hold some sires he wish'd abolish'd, But that with them all law would be demolish'd.

He was "free to confess," (whence comes this phrase?
Is't English? No—his only parliamentary) That innovation's spirit now-a-days Had made more progress than for the last century, He would not tread a factious path to praise, Though for the public weal disposed to venture. As for his place, he could but say this of it, [high, That the fatigue was greater than the profit Heaven and his friends knew that a private life Had ever been his sole and whole ambition; But could he quit his king in times of strife? (ion! Which threaten'd the whole country with peril When damagegus would with a butcher's knife Cut through and through (oh, damnable incision The Gordian or the Gordian knot, whose strings Have tied together Commons, Lords, and Kings.

Sooner "come place into the civil list,
If, and champion him to the utmost"—he would keep Till duly disappointed or dismiss'd:
Provided he cared not for, let other reap it; But should the day come when place ceased to exist, The country would have far more cause to weep it; For how could it go on? Explain who can! He gloried in the name of Englishman.

He was as independent—ay, much more— Than those who were not paid for independent, As common soldiers, or a common—shore Have in their several arts or parts ascendance O'er the irregulars in lust or gore Who do not give professional attendance Thus on the mob all statesmen are as eager To prove their pride as footmen to a beggar.

All this (save the last stanza) Henry said, And thought. I say no more—I've said too much 2 For all of us have either heard or read Off—or upon the hustings—some slight such Hints from the independent heart or head Of the official candidate. I'll touch No more on this—the dinner-bell hath rung, And grace is said; the grace I should have sung
LXXXVIII.
But I'm too late, and therefore must make play,
'Twas a great banquet, such as Albion old
Was wont to boast—as if a glutton's tray
Were something very glorious to behold.
But 'twas a public feast and public day,—
Quite full, right dull, guests hot, and dishes cold,
Great plenty much formality, small cheer,
And every body out of their own sphere.

LXXXIX.
The squires familiarly formal, and
My lords and ladies proudly condescending;
The very servants puzzling how to hand
Their plates—without it might be too much bend—
From their high places by the sideboard's stand—
Yet, like their masters, fearful of offending;
For any deviation from the graces
Might cost both men and masters too—their places.

LXXX.
There were some hunters bold, and coursers keen,
Whose hounds ne'er err'd, nor greyhounds delign'd
Some deadly shots too, Septembrizers, seen [to lunch;
Earliest to rise, and last to quit the search
Of the poor partridge through his stubble screen.
There were some natty members of the church,
Takers of tythes, and makers of good matches,
And several who sung fewer psalms than catches.

LXXXI.
There were some country wags, too,—and, alas!
Some exiles from the town, who had been driven
To gaze, instead of pavement, upon grass,
And rise at nine, in lieu of long eleven.
And lo! upon that day it came to pass,
I sate next that o'erwhelming son, of heaven,
The very powerful parson, Peter Pith,
The loudest wit I ever was deafen'd with.

LXXXII.
I knew him in his livelier London days,
A brilliant dinner-out, though but a curate;
And not a joke he cut but earn'd its praise,
Until preferment, coming at a sure rate,
Oh, Providence! how wondrous are thy ways!
Who would suppose thy gifts sometimes obdurate!
Gave him, to lay the devil who looks o'er Lincoln,
A fat set prizage, and nought to think on.

LXXXIII.
His jokes were sermons, and his sermons jokes;
But both were thrown away among the fens;
For with hath no great friend in asquishy folks.
No longer ready ears and short-hand pens
Imbibed the gay bon-mot, or happy hoax:
The poor priest was reduced to common sense,
Or to coarse efforts very loud and long;
I, hammer a horse laugh from the thick throng.

LXXXIV.
There is a difference, says the song, "between
A beggar and a queen," or seas (of late)
The latter worse used of the two we're seen—
But we'll say nothing of affairs of state)—
A difference "twixt a bishop and a dean;"—
A difference between crockery-ware and plate,
As between English beef and Spartan broth—
And yet great heroes have been bred by both.

LXXXV.
But of all nature's discrepancies, none
Upon the whole is greater than the difference
Beheld between the country and the town,
Of which the latter merits every preference
From those who've few resources of their own,
And only think, or act, or feel with reference
To some small plan of interest or ambition—
Both which are limited to no condition.

LXXXVI.
But "en avant!" The light loves languish o'er Long banquets and too many guests, although
A slight repast makes people love much more,
Bacchus and Ceres being, as we know,
With vivifying Venus, who doth owe
To these the invention of champagne and truffles
Temperance delights her, but long fasting ruffles

LXXXVII.
Dully pass'd o'er the dinner of the day;
And Juan took his place he knew not where,
Confused, in the confusion, and distraught;
And sitting as if nail'd upon his chain:
Though knives and forks clang'd round as in a fray
He seem'd unconcern'd, the act of all passings there,
Till some one, with a groan, express'd a wish (Unheeded twice) to have a fin of fish.

LXXXVIII.
On which, at the third asking of the bans,
He started; and, perceiving smiles around
Broadening to grins, he colored more than once,
And hastily—as nothing can confound
A wise man more than laughter from a dunce—
Inflicted on the dish a deadly wound,
And with such hurry that, ere he could curb it,
He'd paid his neighbor's prayer with half a turbet

LXXXIX.
This was no bad mistake, as it occur'd,
The suppliant being an amateur;
But others, who were left with scarce a third,
Were angry—as they well might, to be sure.
They wonder'd how a young man so absurd
Lord Henry at his table should endure;
And this, and his not knowing how much oats
Had fallen last market, cost his host three votes.

XC.
They little knew, or might have sympathized,
That he the night before had seen a ghost;
A prologue, which but slightly harmonized
With the substantial company engross'd
By matter, and so much materialized.
That one scarce knew at what to marvel most
Of two things—how (the question rather is it)
Such bodies could have souls, or souls such bodies

XCI.
But what confused him more than smile or stare
From all the 'squires and 'squiresness around
Who wonder'd at the abstraction of his air.
Especially as he had been renown'd
For some vivacity among the fair,
Even in the country circle's narrow bound—
(For little things upon my lord's estate
Were good small-talk for others still less great)—
XCII.

Was, that he caught Aurora's eye on his,
And something like a smile upon her cheek.
Now this he really rather took amiss;
In those who rarely smile, their smile bespeaks
A strong external motive; and in this
Sing of Aurora's there was sought to pique,
Or hope, or love, with any of the wiles
Which some pretend to trace in ladies' smiles.

XCIII.

'Twas a mere quiet smile of contemplation,
Indicative of some surprise and pity;
And Juan grew carnation with vexation,
When was not very wise and still less witty,
Since he had gain'd at least her observation,
A most important outwork of the city—
As Juan should have known, had not his senses
By last night's ghost been driven from their defences.

XCIV.

But, what was bad, she did not blush in turn,
Nor seem embarrass'd—quite the contrary:
Her aspect was, as usual, still—not stern—
And she withdrew, but cast not down her eye,
Yet grew a little pale—with what? concern?
I know not; but her colorer was high—
Though sometimes faintly flush'd—and always clear
As deep seas in a sunny atmosphere.

XCV.

But Adeline was occupied by fame
This day; and watching, witching, condescending
To the consumers of fish, fowl, and game,
And dignity with courtesy so blending,
As all must blend whose part it is to aim (especially as the sixth year is ending)
At their lord's, son's, and similar connexions'
Safe conduct through the rocks of reflections.

XCVI.

Though this was most expedient on the whole,
And usual—Juan, when he cast a glance
On Adeline, while playing her grand role,
Which she went through as though it were a dance,
Betraying only now and then her soul
By a look scarce perceptible askance,
Of weariness or scorn,) began to feel
Some doubt how much of Adeline was real;

XCVII.

So well she acted all and every part
By turns—with that vivacious versatility,
Which many people take for want of heart:
They err—'tis merely what is call'd mobility,
A thing of temperament, and not of art,
Though seeming so, from its supposed facility:
And false—at though true; for surely they're sincerest
Who're strongly act'd on by what is nearest.

XCVIII.

This makes your actors, artists, and romancers,
Heroes sometimes, though seldom—sages never.
But speakers, bardis, diplomatists, and dancers,
Little that's great, but much of what is clever;
Most orators, but very few financiers,
Though all Exchequer Chancellors endeavor,
Of late years, to dispense with Cocker's rigors,
And grow quite figurative with their figures.

XCIX.

The poets of arithmetic are they,
Who, though they prove not two and two to be
Five, as they would do in a modest way,
Have plainly made it out that four are three,
Judging by what they take and what they pay.
The sinking Fund's unfathomable sea,
That most unliquidating liquid, leaves
The debt unsunk, yet sinks it all receives.

C.

While Adeline dispensed her airs and graces,
The fair Fitz-Fu-lke seem'd very much at ease;
Though too well-bred to quiz men to their faces,
Her laughing blue eyes with a glance could seize
The ridiculous of people in all places—
That honey of your fashionable bees—
And store it up for mischievous enjoyment;
And this at present was her kind employment.

CII.

However, the day closed, as days must close;
The evening also wane—sud coffee came,
Each carriage was announced, and ladies rose,
And curtseying off, as curtsies country dame,
Retired: with most unfashionable bows,
Their dicele esquires also did the same,
Delighted with the dinner and their host,
But with the lady Adeline the most.

CIII.

Some praised her beauty; others her great grace,
The warmth of her politeness, whose sincerity
Was obvious in each feature of her face,
Whose traits were radiant with the rays of verity
Yes: she was truly worthy her high place!
No one could envy her desired prosperity:
And then her dress—what beautiful simplicity
Draped her form with curious felicity!

CIV.

True, she said little—'twas the rest that broke
Forth into universal epigram:
But then 'twas to the purpose what she spoke
Like Addison's 'faint praise' so wont to man
Her own but served to set off every joke,
As music chimes in with a melodrame.
How sweet the task to shield an absent friend!
I ask but this of mine, to—not defend.

CV.

There were but two exceptions to this keen
Skirmish of wits o'er the departed; one,
Aurora, with her pure and placid mien;
And Juan too, in general behind none
In gay remark on what he'd heard or seen,
Sate silent now, his usual spirits gone;
In vain he heard the others rail or rally,
He would not join them in a single sally
CVII.

The guest at least had done him this much good, It making him as silent as a ghost, If in the circumstances which ensued He gain’d esteem where it was worth the most. And certainly Aurora had renew’d In him some feelings which he had lately lost Or harden’d; feelings which, perhaps ideal, Are so divine, that I must deem them real:—

CVIII.

The love of higher things and better days; The unbounded hope, and heavenly ignorance Of what is call’d the world, and the world’s ways; The moments when we gather from a glance More joy than from all future pride or praise, Which kindle manhood, but can ne’er entrance The heart in an existence of its own, Of which another’s bosom is the zone.

CIX.

Who would not sigh As ai rav Kupeiros That hath a memory, or that had a heart? Also her star must wave like that of Dian, Ray fades on ray, as years on years depart. Anacreon only had the soul to tie on Unwithering myrtle round the unblunted dart Of Eros; but, though thou hast play’d usmany tricks, Still we respect thee, “Alma Venus Genetrix!”

CX.

And full of sentiments, sublime as billows Heaving between this world and worlds beyond, Don Juan, when the midnight hour of pillows Arrived, retired to his; but to despond Rather than rest. Instead of poppies, willows Waved o’er his couch; he meditated, fond Of those sweet bitter thoughts which banish sleep, And make the wording sneer, the youngling weep.

CXI.

The night was as before: he was undrest, Saving his night-gown, which is an undress: Completely “sans culotte,” and without vest; In short, he hardly could be clothed with less: But apprehensive of his spectral guest, He sate with feelings awkward to express, (By those who have not had such visitations,) Expectant of the ghost’s fresh operations.

CXII.

And not in vain listen’d;—Hush! what’s that? I see—I see—Ah, no!—’tis not—yet ’tis— Ye powers! it is the—The—the—Poo! the cat! The devil may take that stealthy pace of his! So like a spiritual pit-a-pat, Or tiptoe of an amatory Miss, Gliding the first time to a rendezvous, And dreading the chaste echoes of her shawl.

CXIII.

Again—what is’t? The wind? No, no,—this time It is the sable friar as before With awful footsteps regular as rhyme, Or (as rhymes may be in these days) much more. Again through shadows of the night sublime, When deep sleep fell on men, and the world wore The starry darkness round her like a girdle Spangled with gems—the monk made his blood curdle.

CXIV.

A noise like to wet fingers drawn on glass, Which sets the teeth on edge; and a slight clatter Like showers which on the midnight gusts will pass Sounding like very supernatural water,— Came over Juan’s ear, which throb’d, alas! For immaterialism’s a serious matter: So that even those whose faith is the most great In souls immortal, shun them tête-à-tête.

CXV.

Were his eyes open?—Yes! and his mouth too. Surprise has this effect—to make one dumb, Yet leave the gate which eloquence slips through As wide as if a long speech were to come. Nigh and more nigh the awful echoes drew, Tremendous to a mortal tympanum: His eyes were open, and (as was before Stated) his mouth. What open’d next?—the door.

CXVI.

It open’d with a most infernal creak, Like that of hell. “Lasciate gli ergast, Vio che entrate!” The hinge seem’d to speak, Dreadful as Dante’s rima, or this stanza; Or—but all words upon such themes are weak: A single shade’s sufficient to entrance a Hero—for what is substance to a spirit? Or is ’t matter trembles to come near it?

CXVII.

The door flew wide, not swiftly—but, as say The sea-gulls, with a steady, sober flight— And then swung back; nor close—but stood awry Half letting in long shadows on the light Which still in Juan’s candlesticks burn’d high. For he had two, both tolerably bright,— And in the door-way, darkening darkness, stood The sable friar in his solemn hood.

CXVIII.

Don Juan shook, as erst he had been shaken The night before; but, being sick of shaking, He first inclined to think he had been mistaken, And then to be ashamed of such mistaking: His own internal ghost began to awaken Within him, and to quell his corporeal quaking— Hinting, that soul and body on the whole Were odds against a disembodied soul.

CXIX.

And then his dread grew wrath, and his wrath fiercer And he arose—advanced—the shade retreated: But Juan, eager now the truth to pierce, Follow’d; his veins no longer cold, but heated. Resolved to thrust the mystery cart and tierce, At whatsoever risk of being defeated: The ghost stopp’d, menaced, then retired, until He reach’d the ancient wall, then stood stone still.
CXX.

But still the shade remain'd: the blue eyes glared,
And rather variably for stony death;
Yet one thing rather good the grave had spared,
The ghost had a remarkably sweet breath:
A straggling curl show'd he had been fair-hair'd;
A red lip, with two rows of pearls beneath,
Gleam'd forth, as through the casement's ivy shroud
The soon peep'd, just escaped from a gray cloud.

CXXI.

And Juan, puzzled, but still curious, thrust
His other arm forth—Wonder upon wonder.
It press'd upon a hard but glowing bust,
Which beat as if there was a warm heart under.
He found, as people on most trials must,
That he had made at first a silly blunder,
And that in his confusion he had caught
Only the wall, instead of what he sought.

CXXIII.

The ghost, if ghost it were, seem'd a sweet soul
As ever lurk'd beneath a holy hood:
A dimpled chin, a neck of ivory, stole
Forth into something much like flesh and blood
Back fell the sable frock and dreamy cowl,
And they reveal'd—ah! that c'or they should!
In full, voluptuous, but not o'ergrown bulk,
The phantom of her frolic Grace—Fitz Fulke.
4. Her parents, if allow'd at large to run.
   Stanza lixii.

This is no exaggeration; there were four women whom I remember to have seen, who possessed their hair in this profusion; of these, three were English, the other was a Levantine. Their hair was of that length and quantity that, when let down, it almost entirely shaded the person, so as nearly to render dress a superfluity. Of these, only one had dark hair: the Oriental's had, perhaps, the lightest color of the four.

5. Oh Hesperus! thou bringest all good things.
   Stanza civ.

"Ere gitj" on the verge of dawn,
A navigare s'annociò il giorno
Lo di chi non avea a' doldi merit abbin;
E che lo soave penegli di mona.

Pungo, se odi Spilla di Misia
Che poi' il giorno piange che s'acqua.

DANTE'S Purgatorio, Canto viii.

This last line is the first of Gray's Elegy, taken by him without acknowledgment.

7. Some hands unseen strew'd flowers upon his tomb.
   Stanza cix.

See Suetonius for this fact.

CANTO IV.

1. Whom the gods love die young; was said of yore.
   Stanza xii.

See Herodianus.

2. A vein had burst.
   Stanza lix.

This is no very uncommon effect of the violence of conflicting and different passions. The Doge Francis Foscari, on his deposition, in 1457, hearing the bell of St. Mark announce the election of his successor, "mourned sublimely d'une horriblage cause par une veine qui s'élata dans sa poitrine," (see Sirmond in and Daru, vols. I. and II.) at the age of eighty years, when "who would have thought the old man had so much blood in him." Before I was sixteen years of age, I was witness to a melancholy instance of the same effect of mixed passions upon a young person; who, however, did not die in consequence, at that time, but fell a victim some years afterwards to a seizure of the same kind, arising from causes intimately connected with agitation of mind.

3. But sold by the impresario at no high rate.
   Stanza lxx.

This is a fact. A few years ago, a man engaged a company for some foreign theatre; embarked them at an Italian port, and, carrying them to Algiers, sold them all. One of the women, returned from her captivity, I heard sing, by a strange coincidence, in Rossini's opera of "L'Italiana in Algeri," at Venice, in the beginning of 1817.

4. From all the Pope makes yearly, 'twould perplex,
   To find three perfect pipes of the third sea.
   Stanza lxxxvi.

It is strange that it should be the pope and the sultan who are the chief encouragers of this branch of trade—women being prohibited as singers at St. Peter's, and not deemed trusty-thy as guardians of the harem.

5. While weeds and ordure rankle round the base.

The pillar which records the battle of Ravenna, is about two miles from the city, on the opposite side of the river to the road towards Purl. Gustau de Foix, who gained the battle, was killed in it; there fell on both sides twenty thousand men. The present state of the pillar and its site is described in the text.

CANTO V.

1. The ocean stream.
   Stanza iii.

This expression of Homer has been much criticised. It hardly answers to our Atlantic ideas of the ocean, but is, sufficiently applicable to the Hellespont, and the Bosphorus, with the Aegean intersected with islands.

   Stanza v.

"The Giant's Grave" is a height on the Asiatic shore of the Bosphorus, much frequented by holiday parties; like Harrow and Highgate.

3. And running out as fast as I was able.
   Stanza xxxii.

The assassination alluded to took place on the eighth of December, 1829, in the streets of Ravenna, not a hundred pieces from the residence of the writer. The circumstances were as described.

4. Kill'd by five bullets from an old gun-barrel.
   Stanza xxxiv.

There was found close by him an old gun-barrel, sawn half off: it had just been discharged, and was still warm.

5. Prepared for supper with a glass of rum.
   Stanza lxxii.

In Turkey, nothing is more common, than for the Mussulmans to take several glasses of strong spirits by way of appetizer. I have seen them take as many as six of raki before dinner, and swear that they dined the better for it; I tried the experiment, but was like the Scotchman, who having heard that the birds called kittiwakes were admirable wheats, ate six of them, and complained that "he was no hungrier than when he began.

6. Splendid but silent, save in one, where drooping,
   A marble fountain echoes.
   Stanza iv.

A common furniture.—I recollect being received by Ali Pacha, in a room containing a marble basin and fountain, &c., &c., &c.

7. The gate so splendid was in all its features.
   Stanza lxxxvii.

Features of a gate—a ministerial metaphor; "the feature upon which this question hinges."—See the "Pudge Family," or hear Castleroagh.

8.

Though on more thorough-bred or fairer fingers.
Stanza cvi.

There is perhaps nothing more distinctive of birth than the hand: it is almost the only sign of blood which aristocracy can generate.

9.

Save Solymus, the glory of their line.
Stanza cxlvii.

It may not be unworthy of remark, that Bacon, in his essay on "Empire," hints that Solymus was the last of his line; on what authority, I know not. These are his words: "The destruction of Mustapha was so fatal to Solymus's line, as the succession of the Turks from Solymus, until this day, is suspected to be untrue, and of strange blood; for that Solymus the Second was thought to be suppositions. But Bacon, in his historical authorities, is often inaccurate. I could give half a dozen instances from his apocrypha only.

Being in the humor of criticism, I shall proceed, after having ventured upon the slips of Bacon, to touch on one or two as trifling in the edition of the British Poets, by the justly celebrated Campbell.—But I do this in good will, and trust it will be so taken.—If any thing could add to my opinion of the talents and true feeling of that gentleman, it would be his classical, honest, and triumphant defence of Pope, against the vulgar cant of the day, and its existing Grub street.

The inadvertencies to which I allude, are,—

Firstly, in speaking of Anstey, whom he accuses of having taken "his leading characters from Smollett." Anstey's Bath Guide was published in 1766. Smollett's Humphry Clinker (the only work of Smollett's from which Tabitha, &c., &c., could have been taken) was written during Smollett's last residence at Leghorn, in 1770.—"Argal," if there has been any borrowing, Anstey must be the creditor, and not the debtor. I refer Mr. Campbell to his own data in his lives of Smollett and Anstey.

Secondly, Mr. Campbell says, in the life of Cowper, (note to page 328, vol. 7) that "he knows not to whom Cowper alludes in these lines:"

"Nor he who, for the base of thousands born, Bolts God a church, and taught his name to worm."

The Calvianist meant Voltaire, and the church of Ferney, with its inscription, "Deo erexit Voltaire."

Thirdly, in the life of Burns, Mr. C. quotes Shakspeare thus,—

"To girl refined gold, to paint the rose,
Or add fresh perfume to the violet."

This version by no means improves the original, which is as follows:

"To girl refined gold, to paint the rose,
Or add fresh perfume to the violet."

King John.

A great poet, quoting another, should be correct: he should also be accurate when he accuses a Par nasian brother of that dangerous charge "borrowing:" a poet had better borrow any thing (excepting money) than the thoughts of another—they are always sure to be reclaimed; but it is very hard having been the lender, to be denounced as the debtor, as is the case of Anstey versus Smollett.

As there is "honor among thieves," let these be some among poets, and give each his due,—none can afford to give it more than Mr. Campbell himself, who, with a high reputation for originality, and a fame which cannot be shaken, is the only poet of the times (except Rogers) who can be reproached (and in him it is indeed a reproach) with having written too little.
CANTO IX.

Humility would rise and thunder "Nay!"

Query, Nay?—Printer’s Devil.

2.

‘And send the sentinel before your gate.
A slice or two from your luxurious meals.

Stanza vi.

“I at this time got a poxt, being for fatique, with four others.—We were sent to break biscuit, and make a mess for Lord Wellington’s hounds. I was very hungry, and thought it a good job at the time, as we got our own fill while we broke the biscuit,—a thing I had not got for some days. When thus engaged, the Prodigal Son was never once out of my mind; and I sighed, as I fed the dogs, over my humble situation and my ruined hopes.”—Journal of a Soldier of the 1st Regt. during the war in Spain.

3.

Because he could no more digest his dinner.

Stanza xxxii.

He was killed in a conspiracy, after his temper had been exasperated, by his extreme costivitv, to a degree of insanity.

4.

And had just buried the fair-faced Lanskoil.

Stanza xxvii.

He was the “grande passion” of the grande Catherine.—See her Lives, under the head of “Lanskoil.”

5.

Bid Ireland’s Londonderry’s Marquess show
His parts of speech.

This was written long before the suicide of that person.

6.

Your “fortune” was in a fair way “to swell A man,” as Giles says.

Stanza lxiii.

“His fortune swells him, it is rank, he’s married.”

—Sir Giles Overreach; Massinger.—See “A New Way to Pay Old Debts”

CANTO X.

1.

Woulcl scarcely join again the “reformadores.”

Stanza xxxii.

“Reformers,” or rather “Reformed.” The Baron Bradwardine, in Waverly, is authority for this.

2.

The endless root beastes a sint far deeper
Than can be hid by altering his shirt.

Stanza xv.

Query, suit—Printer’s Devil.

CANTO XI.

1.

Who on a lark, with black-eyed Sat (his bowing)
So prime, so swell, so nutty, and so knowing?

Stanza xix.

The advance of science and of language has rendered it unnecessary to translate the above good and true English, spoken in its original purity by the select nobility and their patrons. The following is a stanza of a song which was very popular, at least in my early days—
On the high taw-spice flash the muskets,
In spite of each yellows old aunt;
If you at the yellows can't mount,
You'll be held back in making a Croot.

"Then your blowing will wax gloo-burgly,
When she hears of your scaly mistake,
She'll surely turn unlucky for the first,
That her Jack may be useful weight.

But if there be any gem'man so ignorant as to require a traduction, I refer him to my old friend and corporal pastor and master, John Jackson, Esq., Professor of Pucelium; who I trust still retains the strength and symmetry of his model of a form, with his good humor, and athletic as well as mental accomplishments.

St. James's Palace and St. James's " Hella."
Stanza xxix.

"Hella," gaming-houses. What their number may now be in this life, I know not. Before I was of age, I knew them pretty accurately, both "gold" and "silver." I was once nearly called out by an acquaintance, because when he asked me where I thought his soul would be found hereafter, I answered, "In Silver Hell."

3.

___and therefore even I won't ament
This subject quote.
Stanza xlix.

"Ancent," was a Scotch phrase, meaning "concerning,"—" with regard to." It has been made English by the Scotch Novels; and, as the Frenchman said—" If it be not, ought to be English."

4. The milliners who furnish "drapery misses."
Stanza xlix.

"Drapery misses."—This term is probably any thing new but a "mystery."
It was, however, almost so to me when I first returned from the East in 1811-1812. It means a pretty, a high-born, a fashionable young female, well instructed by her friends, and furnished by her milliner with a wardrobe upon credit, to be repaid, when married, by the husband.
The riddle was first read to me by a young and pretty heiress, on my praising the "drapery" of an "untouched" but "pretty virginities" (like Mrs.
Anne Page) of the then day, which has now been some years yesterday—she assured me that the thing was common in London; and as her own thousands, and blooming looks, and rich simplicity of array, put any suspicion in her own case out of the question, I confess I gave some credit to the allegation. If necessary, authorities might be cited, in which case I could quote both "drapery" and the wearers. Let us hope, however, that it is now obsolete.

5.

'Tis strange the mind, that very fiery particle,
Should let itself be emm'd out by an article.
Stanza lx.

"Divinae particularan ante."

CANTO XII.

1. Giv'es. with Greek truth, the good old Greek the lie.
Stanza xix.

See Mtford's 'Greece. "Gracia Vexax." His great pleasure consists in praising tyrants, abusing Phutarch, spelling oddly, and writing quaintly; and, what a strange after all, his is the best modern history of Greece in any language, and he is perhaps the best of all modern historians whatsoever. Having named his sins, it is but fair to state his virtues
—learning, labor, research, wrath, and partiality
I call the latter virtues in a writer, because they make him write in earnest.

2. A hazy widower turn'd of forty's sure,
Stanza xxxvii

This line may puzzle the commentators more than the present generation.

3. Like Russians rushing from hot baths to snows.
Stanza lxxiii.

The Russians, as is well known, run out from their hot baths to plunge into the Neva: a pleasant practical antithesis, which it seems does them no harm.

4. The world to gaze upon those northern lights.
Stanza lxxii.

For a description and print of this inhabitant of the polar region and native country of the aurora borealis, see Pain's 'Voyage in Search of the North West Passage."

5. As Philip's son proposed to do with Athos.
Stanza lxxxvi.

A sculptor projected to hew Mount Athos into a statue of Alexander, with a city in one hand, and, believing, a river in his pocket, with various other similar devices. But Alexander's gone, and Athos remains, I trust, ere long, to look over a nation of freemen.

CANTO XIII.

1. Right honestly, " he liked an honest hater."
Stanza vii.

"Sir, I like a good hater."—See the Life of Dr
Johnson, &c.

2. Also there bin another pious reason.
Stanza xxvi.

"With every thing that pretty bin,
My lady sweet arise."—Shakespeare.

3. They and their bills " Arcadian both," are left.
Stanza xiv.

"Arcades ambo."

4. Or wilder groups of savage Salvatore's.
Stanza lxii.

Salvator Roes.

5. His bell-mouth'd goblet makes me feel quite Danish.
Stanza lxxii.

If I err not, "Your Dane" is one of Iago's catalogue of nations "exquisite in their drinking."

6. Even Nimrod's self might leave the plains of Dura.
Stanza lxxxviii.

In Assyria.

7. "That Scriptures out of church are blasphemies," Stanza xvi.

"Mrs. Adams answered Mr. Adams, that it was blasphemous to talk of Scripture out of church.
This dogma was broached to her husband—the best Christian in any book. See Joseph Andrews, in the latter chapters.
Canto XIV.

1. And never craned, and made but few "faux pan." Stanza cxxiii.

Cramming.—"To crame" is, or was, an expression used to denote a gentleman's stretching out his neck over a hedge, "to look before he leaped:" a pause in his "vaulting ambition," which in the field both occasion some delay and exertion in those who may be immediately behind the eques- trian skeptic. "Sir, if you don't choose to take the leap, let me" was a phrase which generally sent the aspirant on again; and to good purpose: for the ugh "the horse and rider" might fall, they made a gap, through which, and over him and his steed the field might follow.

2. Go to the coffee-house, and take another. Stanza clviii.

In Swift's or Horace Walpole's Letters, I think it is mentioned that somebody regretting the loss of a friend, was answered by a universal Py-lades: "When I lose one, I go to the Saint James's Coffee-house, and take another." I recollect having heard an anecdote of the same ki.d. Sir W. D. was a great gamester. Coming in one day to the club of which he was a member, he was observed to look melancholy. "What is the matter, Sir William?" cried Hare, of facetious memory. "Ah!" replied Sir W. "I have just lost poor Lady D." "Lost! What! at—Quince or Hazard?" was the consolatory rejoinder of the querist.

3. And I refer you to wise Oxenstirem. Stanza liv.

The famous Chancellor Oxenstirem said to his son, on the latter expressing his surprise upon the great effects arising from petty causes in the pre- sumed nursery of politics: "You see by this, my son, with how little wisdom the kingdoms of the world are governed."

Canto XV.

1. And Thou, diviner still, Whose lot it is by man to be mistaken. Stanza xviii.

As it is necessary in these times to avoid am-biguity, I say, that I mean, by "Diviner still," Guizot. If ever God was Man—or Man God—he was both. I never straitened his creed, but the use—or abuse—made of it. Mr. Canning one day quoted Christianity to a sect of Negro Slavery, and Mr. Wilberforce had little to say in reply. And was Christ cruified, that black men might be scourged? If so, he had better been born a Mus- tauto, to give both colors an equal chance of free- dom, or at least salvation.

2. When Rapp the Harmonist embargued marriage In his harmonious settlement. Stanza xxxv.

This extraordinary and flourishing German colony in America does not entirely exclude matrimony, as the "Shakers" do; but lays such restrictions upon it as prevent more than a certain quantum of births within a certain number of years; which births (as Mr. Hulme observes) generally arrive "in a little flock like those of a farmer's lambs, all within the same month, perhaps." These Harmonists (so called from the name of their settlement) are represented as a remarkably flour* hing, pious, and quiet people. See the various works on America.

3. Nor compass what "so eminent a land" meant. stanza xxxviii.

Jacob Tonson, according to Mr. I. Ope, was accu- tom'd to call his writers "able pens"—"persons of honor" and especially "eminent hands." Vide correspondence, &c., &c.

A dish "à la Lucullus." This hero, who con- quered the East, has left his more extended celeb-rity to the transplantation of cherries (which he first brought into Europe) and the nomenclature of some very good dishes;—and I am not sure that (barring indigestion) he has not done more service to mankind by his cookery than by his conquests. A cherry-tree may weigh against a bloody laurel, because he has contributed to earn celebrity from both.

5. But even sans "configuration," it no less true is, There's pretty picking in those "petits pois." Stanza lvii.

"Petits pois! d'amour garnis de confitures," a classical and well-known dish for part of the flank of a second course.

6. For that with me's a "sine qua non." Stanza lxxvii.

Subauditur "Non," omitted for the sake of euphony

7. In short, upon that subject I've some qualms very Like those of the Philosopher of Malmsbury. Stanza lxxvi.

Hobbes; who doubting of his own soul, paid that compliment to the souls of other people as to de-cline their visits, of which he had some apprehension.

   Against the churches."—Moseuth.

3. They err—"its merely what is call'd mobility.
   Stanz_a xvii.
   In French "mobility."  I am not sure that mobility is English; but it is expressive of a quality which rather belongs to other climates, though it is sometimes seen to great extent in our own. It may be defined as an excessive susceptibility of immediate impressions—at the same time without losing the past—and is, though sometimes apparently useful to the possessor, a most painful and unhappy attribute.

LETTER I.

TO MISS PIGOT OF SOUTHWELL.

"Hargate Manor, August 29, 1806.

"I received the arms, my dear Miss Pigot, and am very much obliged to you for the trouble you have taken. It is impossible I should have any fault to find with the draught or the carving: it gives me great pleasure for a double reason,—in the first place, they will ornament my books; in the next, they convince me that you have not forgotten me. I am, however, sorry you do so much: you have already been gone an age. I perhaps may have taken my departure for London before you came back; but, however, I will hope not. Do not overlook my watch-ribbon and purse, as I wish to carry them with me. Your note was given me by Harry, at the play, whither I attended Miss Lyon and Dr. S. ; and now I have sat down to answer it before I go to bed. If I am at Southwell when you return, and I sincerely hope you will soon, for I very much regret your absence,—I shall be happy to hear you sing my favorite, 'The Maid of Loth.' My mother, together with myself, desires to be affectionately remembered to Mrs. Pigot, and believe me, my dear Miss Pigot, I remain your affectionate friend.

"BYRON.

"P.S. If you think proper to send me any answer to this, I shall be extremely happy to receive it. Adieu.

"P.S. 2d. As you say you are a novice in the art of knitting, I hope it don't give you too much trouble. Go on slowly, but surely. Once more, Adieu."

LETTER II.

TO MR. PIGOT.

"8 Pencilly, August 9, 1810.

"My Dear Pigot,

"Many thanks for your amusing narrative of the last proceedings of my amiable Alecto,* who now begins to feel the effects of her folly. I have just received a penitential epistle, to which, apprehensive of pursuit, I have despatched a moderate answer, with a kind of promise to return in a fortnight;—this, however, (entirosos) I never mean to fulfill. Her soft worblings have delighted her auditors, her higher notes being particularly musical, and on a calm moonlight evening would be heard to great advantage. Had I been present as a spectator, nothing would have pleased me more; but to have come forward as one of the 'dramatic persons,'—St. Dominie defend me from such a scene! Seriously, your mother has laid me under great obligations, and you, with the rest of your family, merit my warmest thanks for your kind condescension at my escape from 'Mrs. Byron.'

"Oh! for the pen of Ariosto to rehearse, in epie, the wounding of that momentous eve,—or rather, let me invoke the shade of Dante to inspire me, for none but the author of the 'Inferno' could properly preside over such an attempt. But, perhaps, where the pen might fail, the pencil would succeed. What a group!—Mrs. B. the principal figure; you cramming your ears with cotton, as the only antidote to total deafness; Mrs. — in vain endeavoring to mitigate the wrath of the lioness robed of her whelp; and last, though not least, Elizabeth and Wousky,—wonderful to relate!—both deprived of their parts of speech, and bringing up the rear in mute astonishment. How did S. B. receive the intelligence? How many paws did he utter on so fateful an event? In your next inform me on this point, and what excuse you made to A. You are probably this time tired of deciphering this hieroglyphical letter;—like Tony Lumpkin, you will pronounce mine to be a d—d up and down hand. All Southwell, without doubt, is involved in amazement. Apprope, how does my blue-eyed nun, the fair * * * is she 'robot in noble garb of now'?

"Here I remain at least a week or ten days; previous to my departure you shall receive my address, but what it will be I have not determined. My lodgings must be kept secret from Mrs. B.; you may present my compliments to her, and say any attempt to pursue me will fail, as I have taken measures to retreat immediately to Portsmouth, on the first intimation of her removal from Southwell. You may add, I have now proceeded to a friend's house in the country, there to remain a fortnight. I have now bloted (I must not say written) a complete double letter, and in return shall expect a monstrous budget. Without doubt, the dames of Southwell repurate the pernicious example I have shown, and tremble lest their baches should disobey their mandates, and quit in dudgeon their mammas on any grievance. Adieu. When you begin, your next, drop the 'lordship,' and put 'Byron' in its place. Believe me yours, &c.

LETTER III.

TO MISS PIGOT.

"London, August 10, 1806.

"My Dear Pigot,

"As I have already troubled your brother with more than he will find pleasure in deciphering, you..."
are the next to whom I shall assign the difficult employment of perusing this second epistle. You will perceive from my first, that no idea of Mrs. B.'s arrival had disturbed me at the time it was written; yet so the present, since the appearance of a note from the illustrious cause of my sudden desertment has driven the 'natural ruby from my cheeks,' and completely blanched my wo-begone countenance. This gunpowder intimation of her arrival, (confound her activity!) breathes less of terror and dismay than you will probably imagine from the volcanic temperament of her ladyship, and concludes with the comfortable assurance of all present motion being prevented by the fatigue of her journey, for which my blessings are due to the rough roads and restive quadrupeds of his majesty's highways. As I have not the smallest inclination to be chased round the country, I shall e'en make a virtue of necessity, and, since, like Macbeth, 'They've tied me to the stake, I cannot fly,' I shall imitate that valorous tyrant, and 'bear-like fight the course,' all escape being precluded. I can now engage with less disadvantage, having drawn the enemy from her en- trancements, though, like the lyre to whose image I have compared myself, with an excellent chance of being knocked on the head. However, 'lay on, Macduff, and - be he who first cries, hold, enough.'

"I shall remain in town for, at least, a week, and expect to hear from you before its expiration. I presume the printer has brought you the offspring of my poetic mania. Remember, in the first line, to read loud the winds whistle,"* instead of 'round,' which that blockhead Ridge has inserted by mistake, and makes nonsense of the whole stanza. Adieu!—Now to encounter my Hydra. Yours ever."

LETTER IV.

TO MR. PIGOT.

London, Sunday, midnight, August 10, 1806.

"Dear Pigot,

This post-haste packet will, doubtless, amaze you, but having an idle hour this evening, I wrote the enclosed stanzas, which I request you to deliver to Ridge, to be printed separate from my other com-positions, as you will perceive them to be improper for the personal ladies; of course, none of the females of your family must see them. I offer a thousand apologies for the trouble I have given you in this and other instances. Yours truly,"

LETTER V.

TO MR. PIGOT.

Penzance, August 16, 1806.

"I cannot exactly say with Caesar, 'Venit, vidi, vici;' however, the most important part of his laconic account of success applies to my present situation; for, though Mrs byron took the trouble of 'coming' and 'seeing,' yet your humble servant proved the victor. After an obstinate engagement of some hours, in which we suffered considerable damage, from the quickness of the enemy's fire, they were compelled to retreat in confusion, leaving behind the artillery, field equipoise, and some prisoners; their defeat is, de cry of the present campaign. To speak more intelligibly, Mrs. B. returns immediately, but I proceed, with all my laurels, to Worthing, on the Sussex coast, to which place you will address, (to be left at the post-office) your next epistle."

---

LETTER VI.

TO MR. PIGOT.

"London, August 13, 1806.

"I am just on the point of settling off for Worthing, and write merely to request you will send that idle assouder Charles, [his groom,] with my horses immediately; tell him I am excessively provoked he has not made his appearance before, or written to inform me of the cause of his doing so, and accordingly as I supplied him with money for his journey. On no pretext is he to postpone his march one day longer, and if, in obedience to the entreaties of Mrs. B. (who I presume is again spreading desolation through her little mania,;) he thinks proper to disregard my positive orders, I shall not, in future, consider him as my servant. He must bring the surgeon's bill with him, which I will discharge immediately on receiving it. Nor can I conceive the reason of his not acquainting Frank, [his valet,] with the state of my unfortunate quadrupeds. Dear Pigot, forgive this petulant effusion, and attribute it to the idle conduct of that precious rascal, who, instead of obeying my injunctions, is wasting the streets of that political Pandemonium, Nottingham. Present my remembrances to your family and the Leacrofts, and believe me, &c.

"P.S. I delegate to you the unpleasant task of despatching him on his journey-Mrs. B.'s orders to the contrary are not to be attended to; he is to proceed first to London, and then to Worthing, without delay. Every thing I have left must be sent to London. My Poetic you will pack up for the same place, and not even reserve a copy for yourself and sister, as I am about to give them an entire new form: when they are complete, you shall have the first proofs. Mrs. B. on no account is to see or touch them. Adieu."

LETTER VII.

TO MR. PIGOT.

"Little Hampden, August 26, 1806.

"I this morning received your epistle, which I was obliged to send for to Worthing, whence I have removed to this place, or the same coast, about eight miles distant from the former. You will probably not be displeased with this letter, when it informs you that I am 39,000 richer than I was at our parting. Having just received intelligence from my lawyer that a cause has been gained at Lancaster assizes, which will be worth that sum by the time you receive this, I have no doubt but I shall be acquainted with this acquisition, though not apprized of its exact value, of which she had better be ignorant; for her behavior on any sudden piece of favorable intelligence is, if possible, more ridiculous than her detestable conduct on the most trifling circumstance of an unpleasant nature. You may give my compliments to her, and say that her detaining my servant's things shall only lengthen my absence; for unless they are immediately despatched to 16 Piccadilly, together with those which have been so long delayed belonging to myself, she shall never again behold my radiant countenance illuminating her gloomy mansion. If they are sent, I may probably appear in less than two years from the date of my present epistle.

"Mettical compliment is an ample reward for my pains; you are one of the few votaries of Apollo who unite the sciences over which that deity presides. I wish you to send my poems to my lodgings in London immediately, as I have several alterations and some additions to make; every copy must be sent, as I am about to amend them, and you shall soon behold them in all their glory. I hope you have kept them from that Ipsos tree, that antidote to the arts, Mrs. B. Entire nous,—you may expect to see me soon. Adieu. Yours ever.

LETTER VIII.

TO MISS PIquot.

"Mr. Dear Bridget,

"I have only just dismounted from my Pegmas, which has prevented me from descending to plain prose in an epistle of greater length to your fair self. You resorted in a former letter, that my poems were not more extensive; I now for your satisfaction announce that I have nearly doubled them, partly by the discovery of some I conceived to be lost, and partly by some new productions. We shall meet on Wednesday next; till then, believe me yours affectionately,

"Byron."

LETTER IX.

TO THE EARL OF CLARE.

"Southwell, Nova, February 6th, 1807.

"My Dearest Clare,

"Were I to make all the apologies necessary to stone for my late negligence, you would justly say you had received a petition instead of a letter, as it would be filled with prayers for forgiveness; but instead of this, I will acknowledge my sins at once, and I trust to your friendship and generosity rather than to my own excuses. Though my health is not perfectly reestablished, I am out of all danger, and have recovered everything but my spirits, which are subject to depression. You will be astonished to hear I have lately written to Delaware, for the purpose of explaining (as far as possible, without involving some old friends of mine in the business) the cause of my behavior to him during my last residence at Harrow, (nearly two years ago,) which you will recollect was rather 'en casuador.' Since that period I have discovered he was treated with injustice, both by those who misrepresented his conduct, and by me in consequence of their suggestions. I have therefore made all the repairation in my power, by apologizing for my mistake, though with very faint hopes of success; indeed I never expected any answer, but desired one for form's sake; that has not yet arrived, and most probably never will. However, I have ceased my own conscience by the atonement, which is humiliating enough to one of my disposition, yet I cannot have slept satisfied with the reflection of having, even unintentionally, injured any individual. I have done all that could be done to repair the injury, and there the affair must end. Whether we renew our intimacy or not is of very trivial consequence.

"My time has lately been much occupied with very different pursuits. I have been transporting a servant, who cheated me, rather a disgraceful event; performing in private theatricals and publishing a volume of poems, (at the request of my friends, for their perusal;) making love and taking physic. The last two amusements have not had the best effect in the world; for my attentions have been divided among so many fair damsels, and the drugs I swallow are of such variety in their compositions, that between Venus and Ascanius I am harassed to death. However, I have still leisure to devote some hours to the recollections of past, regretted friendships, and in the interval to take the advantage of the moment, to assure you how much I am, and ever will be, my dearest Clare,

"Your truly attached and sincere,

"Byron."

LETTER X.

TO MR. PIquot.

"Southwell, Jan. 3d, 1807.

"I ought to begin with sundry apologies, for my own negligence, but the variety of my avocations in prose and verse must plead my excuse. With this epistle you will receive a volume of all my Juvenilia published since your departure; it is of considerably greater size than the collection which I beg you will destroy, as the present is much more complete. That unlucky poem to my poor Mary† has been the cause of some animadversion from ladies in years. I have not printed it in this collection, in consequence of my being pronounced a most profane sinner, in short, 'a young Moore,' by your friend. I believe in general they have been favorably received, and surely the age of your author will preclude severe criticism. The adventures of my life from sixteen to nineteen, and the dissipation into which I have been thrown in London, have given a voluptuous tinct to my ideas, and the occasions which called forth my muse could hardly admit any other coloring. This volume is vastly correct and miraculously chaste. Apropos, talking of love, "

BYRON'S WORKS.

LETTER XI.

TO MR. WILLIAM BANKIS.

"Dear Bankis,

"Your critique is valuable for many reasons: in the first place, it is the only one in which flattery has borne a slight part; and the next, I am led by insipid compliments. I have a better opinion of your judgment and ability than your feelings. Accept my most sincere thanks for your kind decision, not less welcome, because totally unexpected. In regard to a more exact estimate, I need not remind you how few of the best poems, in our language, will stand the test of minute or verbal criticism; it can therefore hardly be expected that the effusions of a boy, (and most of these pieces have been produced at an early period,) can derive much merit either from the subject or composition. Many of them were written under great depression of spirits, and during severe indisposition; hence the greater turn of the ideas. We coincide in opinion that the 'poésies érotiques' are the most exceptionable; they were however, grateful to the deities on whose altars they were offered—more I seek not.

"The portrait of Don Juan was drawn at Harrow, after a long sitting; this accounts for the resemblance, or rather the caricature. He is your friend, he never was mine—for both our sakes I shall be silent on this head. The collegiate rhymes are not personal; one of the notes may appear so, but could not be omitted. I have little doubt they will be deservedly abused; a just punishment for my unillustrious treatment of so excellent an Alms Master. I sent you a copy, lest we should be placed in the situation of Gil Bias and the Archbishop of Grenaude: though running some hazard from the experiment, I wished your verdict to be unbiased. Had my 'Liberation' been presented previous to your letter, it would have appeared a species of bribe to purchase compliment. I feel no hesitation in saying, I was more anxious to hear your critique, however severe, than the praises of the million. On the same day I was honored with a visit from Mackenzie, the celebrated author of the 'Man of Feeling.' Whether his approbation or yours elated me most, I cannot decide.

"You will receive my Juvenilia, at least all yet published. I have a large volume in manuscript, which may in part appear hereafter; at present I have neither time nor inclination to prepare it for the press. In the spring I shall return to Trinity, to dismantle my rooms, and bid you a final adieu. The 'Can' will not be much increased by my tears on the occasion. Your father's remarks, however, cautious or bitter to a palate vitiated with the sweets of adulation, will be of service. Johnson, has shown us that no poetry is perfect; but to correct mine would be an Herculean labor. In fact I never looked beyond the moment of composition, and published merely at the request of my friends. Notwithstanding so much has been said concerning the 'Genius irritabile vatrum,' we shall never quarrel on the subject. Poetic fame is by no means the 'name' of my wishes. Adieu.

"Yours ever,

"Byron."

LETTER XII.

TO MR. WILLIAM BANKIS.—(Fragment.)

"For my own part, I have suffered severely in the decease of my two greatest friends, the only beings I ever loved, (females excepted.) I am therefore a solitary animal, miserable enough, and so perfectly a citizen of the world, that whether I pass my days in Great Britain or Kamschatka is to me a matter of perfect indifference. I cannot conceive greater respect for your alteration than by immediately adopting it—this shall be done in the next edition. I am sorry your remarks are not more frequent, as I am certain they would be equally beneficial. Since my last I have received two critical opinions from Edinburgh, both too flattering for me to detail. One is from Lord Woodhouselee, at the head of the Scotch literati, and a most profuse writer, (his last work is a life of Lord Kaimes;) the other from Mackenzie, who sent his decision a second time, more at length. I am not personally acquainted with either of these gentlemen, nor ever requested their sentiments on the subject: their praise is voluntary, and transmitted through the medium of a friend, at whose house they read the productions.

"Contrary to my former intention, I am now preparing a volume for the public at large; my amatory pieces will be exchanged, and others substituted in their place. The whole will be considerably enlarged, and appear the latter end of May. This is a hazardous experiment; but want of better employment, the encouragement I have met with, and my own vanity, induce me to stand the test, though not without sundry palpitations. The book will circulate fast enough in this country, from mere curiosity, what I prize—

LETTER XIII.

TO MR. FALKNER.

"Sir,

"The volume of little pieces which accompanies this, would have been presented before, had I not been apprehensive that Miss Falkner's indisposition might render such tributes unwelcome. There are some errors of the printer which I have not had time to correct in the collection; you have it thus, with all its imperfections on its head, a heavy weight, when joined with the faults of its author. Such Juvenilia as they can claim no great degree of approbation, I may venture to hope, will also escape the severity of unmarked, though perhaps undeserved, criticism.

"They were written on many and various occasions, and are now published merely for the perusal of a friendly circle. Believe me, sir, if they afford the slightest amusement to yourself and the rest of my social readers, I shall have gathered all the boys I ever wish to adorn the head of

LETTER XV
TO MISS PILOT.

"Dear Queen Biss,

"Surely ought to be immortal—but though a thorough-bred bull-dog, he is the finest puppy I ever saw, and will answer much better: in his great and manifold kindness he has already bitten my fingers, and disturbed the gravity of old Boatswain, who is grievously discomfited. I wish to be informed what his costs, his expenses, &c., &c., that I may indemnify Mr. G——. My thanks are all I can give for the trouble he has taken, make a long speech and conclude it with 1 2 3 &c. I am out of practice, so do yourselves at Legate, —ambrose would not do in a matter concerning the Pope, which I presume this must, as the whole turns upon a Bull.

"Yours,

"BYRON."

"P. S. I write in bed."

LETTER XVI.
TO MISS PILOT.

"Cambridge, June 30, 1807.

"Better late than never, Pal,' is a saying of which you know the origin, and as it is applicable on the present occasion, you will excuse its conspicuous place in the front of my epistle. I am almost superannuated here. My old friends, (with the exception of a very few,) all departed, and I am preparing to follow them, but remain till Monday to be present at three Oratorios, two Concerts, a Fair, and a Ball. I find I am not only thinner, but taller; I could not reach by an inch since my last visit. I was obliged to tell everybody my surname, nobody having the least recollection of my visage or person. Even the hero of my Cornelius (who is now sitting vis-à-vis, reading a volume of my Poetics,) passed me in Trinity walks without recognising me in the least, and was thunderstruck at the alteration which had taken place in my countenance, &c., &c. Some say I look better, others worse, but all agree I am thinner—more I do not require. I have lost two pounds in my weight since I left our cursed, detestable and abhorred abode of scandal, where, excepting yourself and John Becher, I care not if the whole race were consigned to the Pit of Acheron, which I would visit in person rather than contaminate my palace with the polluted dust of Southwell. Seriously, unless obliged by the emptiness of my purse to revisit Mrs. B., you will see me no more.

"On Monday I depart for London. I quit Cambridge with little regret, because our set are vanished, and my musical protege before mentioned has left the choir, and is stationed in a mercantile house of considerable eminence in the metropolis. You may have heard me observe he is exactly, to an hour, two years younger than myself. I found him grow, considerably, and, as you will suppose, very glad to see his former Patron. He is nearly my height, very thin, very fair complexion, dark eyes, and light locks. My estimation of his mind you already know—I hope I shall never have occasion to change it. Every body here conceives me to be an uncultured University at present very gay, from the fêtes of divers kinds. I suppose out last night, but eat (or ate) nothing, sipped a bottle of claret, went to bed at two and rose at eight. I have commenced early rising, and find it agrees with me. The Masters and the Fellows all very polite, but look a little askance—I don’t much admire lamps—truth always disagreeable.

"Write, and tell me how the inhabitants of your managery go on, and if my publication goes off well: do the quadrapeds growl? Apropos, my bull dog is deceased—Flesh both of our and man is grass.' Address your answer to Cambridge. If I am gone, it will be forwarded. Sad news just arrived—Russians beat—a bad set, eat nothing but oil, consequently must melt before a hard fire. I get awkward in my academic habits and distaste for practice. Got up in a window to hear the oratorio at St. Mary's, popped down in the middle of the Messiah, tore a woeful rent in the back of my best black silk gown, and damaged my eyes and clothes pair of breeches. Mem.—never tumble from a church window during service. Adieu, dear, do not remember me to any body—to forgét and be forgotten by the people of Southwell is all I aspire to."

LETTER XVII.
TO MISS PILOT.

"Since my last letter I have determined to reside another year at Granta, as my rooms, &c., are finished in great style, several old friends come up again, and many new acquaintances made; consequently, my inclination leads me forward, and I shall return to London in October, if still alive. My life here has been one continued state of relaxation—out at different places every day, engaged to more dinners, &c., &c., than my stay will permit me to fulfil. At this moment I write with a bottle of claret in my hand, and tears in my eyes: for I have just parted from my 'Cornelian,' who spent the evening with me. As it was our last interview, I postponed my engagement to devote the hours of the Sabbath to friendship;—Edleston and I have separated for the metropolis. And, in all, a chaos of hope and sorrow. To-morrow I set out for London: you will address your answer to Gordon's Hotel, Abingdon street, where I sojourn during my visit to the metropolis.

"I rejoice to hear you are interested in my protege: he has been my almost constant associate since October, 1805, when I entered Trinity College. His voice first attracted my attention, his countenance fixed it, and his manners attached me to him for ever. He departs for a mercantile house in town in October, and we shall probably not meet till the expiration of my minority, when I shall leave to his decision either entering as a partner through my interest, or residing with me altogether. Of course he would in his present frame of mind prefer the latter, but he may alter his opinion previous to that period;—however, be assured, he certainly love him more than any human being, and neither time nor distance have had the least effect on my (in general) changeable disposition. In short, we shall put Lady E. Butler and Miss Pownalby to the blinches, blue stockings and corded shoes, and you may countenance, and want nothing but a catastrophic like Nissus and Euryalus, to give Jonathan and

TO MISS PILOT.

"Gordon's Hotel, July 13, 1807.

"You write most excellent epistles—a fig for other correspondents with their nonsensical apologies for 'knowing nought about it'; you send me a delightful budget. I am here in a perpetual vortex of dissipation. (Very pleasant for all that,) and, strange to tell, I get the morning now below eighteen stone considerably. Stay in town a month, perhaps six weeks, trip into Essex; and then, as a favor, iritate Southwell for three days with the light of my countenance; but nothing shall ever make me reside there again! "What the devil would Ridge have? Is not fifty in a fortnight, before the advertisements, sufficient sale? I hear many of the London booksellers have them, and Crosby has sent copies to the principal watering-places. Are they liked or not in Nottishow? I wish Boatwain had vexatious Demon! How is Bran? By the immortal gods, Bran ought to be a Count of the Holy Roman Empire.

However, I decrease instead of enlarging which is extraordinary, as violent exercise in London is impracticable; but I attribute the phenomenon to our evening squeezes at public and private parties. His opinions I neither know nor care about: if he is the least insolent, I shall enroll him with Butler and the other worthies. He is in Yorkshire, poor man! and very busy. He said he had not time to read the contents, but thought it necessary to acknowledge the receipt of the volume immediately. Perhaps the earl 'bears no brother near the throne,'—if so, I will make his scepter totter in his hands. Adieu!"

LETTER XIX.

TO MISS PILOT.

"August 2, 1807.

"London begins to disgorge its contents—town is empty—consequently I can scribble at leisure, as occupations are less numerous. In a fortnight I shall start to fulfil a country engagement; but expect two epistles from you previous to that period. Ridge does not proceed rapidly in Notts—very possible. In town things wear a more promising aspect, and a man whose works are praised by reviewers and admired by duchesses, and bookseller in the metropolis, does not dedicate much consideration to rustic readers, I have now a review before me, entitled 'Literary Recreations,' where my bardship is applauded far beyond my deserts. I know nothing of the critic, but think him a very discerning gentleman, and myself a devilish clever fellow. His critique pleases me particularly because it is of great length, and a crosstributum of censure is administered, just to give an agreeable relish to the praise. You know I hate insipid, unqualified, common-place compliment. If you would wish to see it, order the thirteenth number of the Literary Recreations for the last month. I assure you I have not the most distant idea of the writer of the article—it is printed in a periodical publication—and though I have written a paper, (a review of Wordsworth,) which Though the present work may not equal his former efforts, many of its poems possess native elegance," &c. &c. &c.

He said he had not time to read the contents, but thought it necessary to acknowledge the receipt of the volume immediately. Perhaps the earl 'bears no brother near the throne,'—if so, I will make his scepter totter in his hands. Adieu!"

Let us now consider the following points:

1. The text contains several errors and inconsistencies. For example, the word "Southwell" is repeated multiple times, and the last sentence of the first letter contains a typographical error: "I will make his scepter totter in his hands. Adieu!"

2. The text is a collection of letters written by an individual named Byron. These letters discuss various topics, including literary works, personal experiences, and social events.

3. The letters are written in a style that is characteristic of the early 19th century, with references to literature, art, and social activities of the time.

4. The text contains several references to authors and literary works, such as "Wordsworth," "Byron's Works," and "Lyrical Ballads."
appears in the same work, I am ignorant of every other person concerned in it—even the editor, whose name I have not heard. My cousin, Lord Alexander Gordon, who resided in the same hotel, told me his mother, her Grace of Gordon, requested he would introduce me to poetical Lordship to her Highness, and that a volume, prepared in it exceedingly in common with the rest of the fashionable world, and wished to claim her relationship with the author. I was unluckily engaged on an excursion for some days afterward, and as the door was not opened when I called, my dearest wish to see her, I have postponed my introduction till the winter, when you shall favor the lady, whose taste I shall not dispute, with my most sublime and effusing con-

"Crosby, my London publisher, has disposed of his second importation, and has sent to Ridge for a third—at least so he says. In every bookseller's window I see my own name and say nothing, but enjoy my fame in secret. My last reviewer kindly requests me to alter my determination of writing no reviews for the press; and my coadjutor begs I will gratify the public with some new work at no very distant period. Who would not be a bard?—that is to say, if all critics would be so polite. However, the others will pay me off, I doubt not, for this gentle encouragement. If so, have at 'em! By-the-by, I have written at my intervals of leisure, after two in the morning, three hundred and eighty lines in blank verse, of Bosworth Field. I have luckily got Hutton's account, shall extend the Poem to eight or ten books, and shall have finished it in a year. Whether it will be published or not must depend on circumstances. So much for Egyptian! My laurels have turned my brain too much and my manuscripts than a thousand dolls would have done. Believe me, I have not forgotten your good-nature in this circle of sin, and one day I trust I shall be able to evince my gratitude. Adieu, yours, &c.

"P. S. Remember me to Dr. P."

"Last week I swam in the Thames from Lambeth through the City of London, and Blackfriars, a dista ce, including the different turns and tacks made on the way, of three miles. You see I am in excellent training in case of a squall at sea. I mean to collect all the first traditions, poems, &c., and translate, or expand the subject to fill a volume, which may appear next spring under the denomination of 'The Highland Larp,' or some title equally picturesque. Of Bosworth Field, one book is finished, another just begun. It will be a work of three or four years, and must probably never conclude. What would you say to some stanzas on Mount Hecla? they would be written at least with fire. How is the immortal Drain; and the Phoenix of the name? Do not the Irish, like the Scotch, have lately purchased a thorough-bred bull-dog, worthy to be the condottier of the aforesaid celestials—his name is Smut!—bear it, ye breezes, on your baldy wings."

"Write to me before I set off, I conjure you by the fifth rib of your grandfather. Ridge goes on well with the books—I thought that worthy had not done much in the country. In town they have been very successful; Carpenter (Moore's publisher) told me a few days ago they sold all theirs immediately, and had several inquiries made since, which, from the books being gone, they could not supply. The Duke of York, the Marchioness of Headfort, the Duchess of Gordon, &c., were among the purchasers, and Crosby says the circulation will be still more extensive in the winter; the summer season being very bad for a sale, as most people are absent from London. However, they have gone extremely well altogether. I shall pass very near you on my journey through Newark, but cannot approach. Don't tell this to Mrs. B., who supposes I dwell a different road. If you have time, I desire it to be left at Ridge's shop, where I shall call, or the post-office, Newark, about six or eight in the evening. If your brother would ride over, I should be devilish glad to see him—he can return the same night, or sup with us and go home the next morning—the Kingston Arms is my inn. Adieu. Yours ever,"

TO MISS PILOT.

"My Dear,

"Fatigued with sitting up till four in the morning for the last two days at hazard, I take up my pen to inquire how your highness and the rest of my female acquaintance at the seat of archiepiscopal grandeur go on. I know I deserve a scolding for my negligence in not writing more frequently; but racing up and down the country for these last three months, how was it possible to fulfil the duties of a correspondent? Fixed at last for six weeks, I write, as thin as ever, (not having gained an ounce since my reduction,) and rather in better humor—but; after all, Southwell was a desirable residence. Thank St. Domincia, I have done with it: I have been twice within eight miles of it, but could not prevail on myself to suffocate in its heavy atmosphere. This place is wretched enough—a village and village road, but harbor and Burgundy, hunting mathematics and Newmarket, riot and racing. Yet it is a paradise compared with, the eternal dulness of Southwell. This is the business of doing nothing but make love, enemies, and verses.

"Next January (but this is entre nous only, and pray let it be so, or my maternal persecutor will be throwing her tomahawk at any of my curious pre-

TO MISS PILOT.

"On Sunday next I set off for the Highlands. A friend of mine accompanies me in my carriage to Edinburgh. There we shall leave it, and proceed in a tandem, (a species of open carriage,) through the western passes to Inverary, where we shall purchase sheep, to enable us to view places inaccessible to vehicle conveyances. On the coast we shall hire a vessel and visit the most interesting parts of the Hebrides, and, if we have time and favorable weather, mean to sail as far as Iceland, only three hundred miles from the northern extremity of Caladonia, to peel at Hecla. Also last information you will keep secret, is my nice mamma would imagine I was on a voyage of Discovery, and raise the accustomed maternal war-whoop.

the Tartar, the finest frigate in the navy. I have seen most scenes, and wish to look at a naval life. We are going probably to the Mediterranean, or to the West Indies, or to the d—; and if there is a possibility of taking me to the latter Bettereworth will do it; for he has received four-and-twenty wounds in different places, and at this moment possesses a letter from the late Lord Nelson, stating Bettereworth as the only officer in the navy who has more wounds than himself.

"I have got a new friend, the finest in the world, a tame bear. When I brought him here, they asked me what I meant to do with him, and my reply was, he should sit for a fellowship." Shecord will explain the meaning of the sentence, if it is ambiguous. This answer delighted them not. We have several parties here, and this evening a large assortment of jockeys, gamblers, box-ers, authors, parsons, and poets, sup with me,—a precious mixture, but they go on well together: and for me, I am a spice of every thing except a jockey; by-the-by, I was dismounted again the other day.

"Thank your brother in my name for his treatise. I have written 214 pages of a novel,—one poem of 390 lines, to be published (without my name) in a few weeks, with notes,—560 lines of Bosworth Field, and 250 lines of another poem in rhyme, besides half a dozen smaller pieces. The poem to be published is a Satire. Apricosis, I have been praised to the skies in the Critical Review, and abused greatly in another publication. So much the better, they tell me, for the sale of the book; it keeps up controversy, and prevents it being forgotten. Besides, the first men of all ages have had their share, nor do the humblest escape,—so I bear it like a philosopher. It is odd two opposite criticisms come out on the same day, and out of five pages of abuse my censor only quotes two lines from different poems, in support of his opinion. Now the proper way to cut up, is to quote long passages, and make them appear absurd, because simple allegation is no proof. On the other hand, there are seven pages of praise, and more than my modesty will allow said on the subject. Adieu.

"P. S. Write, write, write!!!"

LETTER XXII.

TO MR. DALLAS.
"Dorcas's Hotel, Albemare street, Jan. 29, 1806.

"Sir,

"Your letter was not received till this morning, I presume from being addressed to me in Notts, where I have not resided since last June, and as the date is the 6th, you will excuse the delay of my answer.

"If the little volume you mention has given pleasure to the author of Percival and Aubrey, I am sufficiently repaid by his praise. Though our periodical critics have been uncommonly lenient, I confess a tribute from a man of acknowledged genius is still more flattering. But I am afraid I should forfeit all claim to candor, if I did not decline such praise as I do not deserve; and this is, I am sorry to say, the case in the present instance.

"My compositions speak for themselves, and must stand or fall by their own worth or demerit: thus far I feel highly gratified by your favorable opinion, but my last inference from virtue are unlocked so few, that though I should be happy to merit, I cannot accept your applause in that respect. One passage in your letter struck me forcibly: you mention the two Lords Lyttleton in a manner they respectively deserve, and will be surprised to hear the person who is now addressing you has been frequently compared to the latter. I know I am injurious to myself in your estimate of me, but the circumstance was so remarkable from your observation, that I cannot help relating the fact. The events of my short life have been of so singular a nature, that although I have occasionally been in honor, and I trust even will, prevent me from disgracing my name by a mean or cowardly action, I have been already held up as the votary of licentiousness, and the disciple of infidelity. How far justice may have dictated this accusation I cannot pretend to say, but like the gentleman to whom my religious friends, in the warmth of their charity, have already devoted me, I am made worse than I really am. However, to quit myself, (the worst theme I could pitch upon,) and return to my Poems, I cannot sufficiently express my thanks, and I hope I shall some day have an opportunity of rendering them in person. A second edition is now in the press, with some additions and considerable omissions; you will allow me to present you with a copy. The Critical, Monthly, and Anti-Jacobin Reviews have been very indulgent; but the Eclectic has pronounced a furious attack against the book but the author, where you will find all I have mentioned asserted by a reverend divine who wrote the critique.

"Your name and connexion with our family have been long known to me, and I hope your person will be not less so; you will find me an excellent compound of a 'Brainless' and a 'Stanhope.' I am afraid you will hardly be able to read this, for my hand is rigorous at this time, and my character, but you will find me, as legibly as possible.

"Your obliged and obedient servant,

"BYRON."
headache without clearing the part affected:—of philosophy, astronomy, and metaphysics, more than I can comprehend, and of common sense so little that I can scarce have a day cognizant at each of our "Alme Matres" for the first discovery although I rather fear that of the Longitude will precede it.

"I once thought myself a philosopher, and talked nonsense with great decorum. I dined pint, and preached up equivinity. For some time this did very well, for no one was in pain for me but my friends, and none lost their patience but my hearers. At last, a fall from my horse convinced me bodily suffering was an evil; and the worst of an argument overest my maxims and my temper at the same moment, so I quitted Zeno for Aristippus, and conceive that pleasure constitutes the 79. 10. 11. 12. in morality, I prefer Confucius to the Ten Commandments, and Socrates to St. Paul, though the latter two agree in their opinion of marriage. In religion, I favor the Catholic emancipation, but do not acknowledge the Pope; and I have refused to take the Sacrament, because I do not think eating bread or drinking wine from the hand of an earthly vicar will make me an inheritor of heaven. I hold virtue in general, or the virtues severally, to be only in the disposition, each a feeling, not a principle. I believe truth the prime attribute of the Deity; and death an eternal sleep, at least of the body. You have here a brief compendium of the sentiments of the wicked George Lord Byron; and, till I give a new suit, you will perceive I am badly clothed. I remain, "Your very truly, "Byron.""

LETTER XXIV.

TO MR. HENRY DIBRY.*

"Dorant's Hotel, Jan. 13, 1808.

'My Dear Sir,

"Though the stupidity of my servants, or the porter of the house, in not showing you up stairs, (where I should have joined you directly,) prevented me the pleasure of seeing you yesterday, I hoped to meet you at some public place in the evening. I have written letters, however, on other occasions, when they generally do; when I have any favor to request of them. I think you would have been surprised at my figure, for, since our last meeting, I am reduced four stone in weight. I then weighed fourteen stone seven pounds, and now only ten stone and a half. I have disposed of my superfluities by means of hard exercise and abstinence. • • •

"Should your Harrow engagements allow you to visit town between this and February, I shall be most happy to see you in Albermarle street. If I am not so fortunate, I shall endeavor to join you for an afternoon at Harrow, though, I fear, your cellars will by no means contribute to my cure. As for my worthy preceptor, Dr. B., our encounters would by no means prevent the mutual entertainments he and I were wont to lavish on each other. We have only spoken once since my departure from Harrow in 1806, and then he politely told Tatemall it was not a proper associate for his pupils. This was long before my strictures were in verse: but, in plain prose, had I been some years older, I should have written what I thought being said on my account, that when schoolboy thing was written—or rather dictated—expecting to rise no more, my physician having taken his sixtieth fee, and I his prescription, I could not quit this earth without leaving a moment of my constant attachment to Butler in gratitude for his manifold good offices.

"Son of Dibry Dibry, Late: Dibry's former Master at Harrow School.
In your favor, from that turbulent and ratiocinative disposition of mine, which impelled me into every species of mischief—all these circumstances combined to destroy an intimacy, which Affectation urged me to continue, and Memory compels me to regret. But there is not a circumstance attending the period, hardly a sentence we exchanged, which is not impressed on my mind at this moment. I need not say more,—this assurance alone must convince you, had I considered them as trivial, they would have been less indelible. How well I recollect the perusal of your 'first flights!' There is another circumstance you do not know—the first lines I ever attempted at Harrow were addressed to you. You were to have seen them, but Sinclair had the copy in his possession when we went home;—and, on our return, we were strangers. They were destroyed, and certainly no great loss; but you will perceive from this circumstance my opinions at an age when we cannot be hypocrites.

"I have dwelt longer on this than I intended, and I shall now conclude with what I ought to have begun. We were once friends,—nay, we have all been too near for our separation was the effect of chance, not of disposition. I do not know how far our destinations in life may throw us together, but if opportunity and inclination allow you to waste a thought on such a harelipped being as myself, I will find me at least in Pro, and not so bigoted to my faults as to involve others in the consequences. Will you sometimes write to me? I do not ask it often, and, if we meet, let us be what we should be and what we were."

LETTER XXVII.

TO MR. BECHER.

"* * * * * Now for Apollo. I am happy that you still retain your predilection, and that the public allow me some share of praise. I am of so much importance that a most violent attack is preparing for me in the next number of the Edinburgh Review. This had from the authority of a friend who has seen the proof and manuscript of the critique. You know the system of the Edinburgh gentlemen is universal attack. They praise none; and nothing but public nor the author expect praise from them. It is, however, something to be noticed, as they profess to pass judgment only on works requiring the public attention. You will see this, when it comes out; it is, I understand, of the most uncivil description; but I am aware of it, and hope you will not be hurt by its severity.

"Tell Mrs. Byron not to be out of humor with them, and to prepare her mind for the greatest novelty on their part. It will do no injury whatever, and I trust her mind will not be ruffled. They defeat their object by indiscriminate abuse, and they never praise, except the partizans of Lord Holland and Co. It is nothing to be abused when Southey, Moore, Lauderdale, Strangford, and Payne Knight share the same fate.

"I am sorry that 'Childish Recollections' must be suppressed during this edition. I have altered, at your suggestion, the obnoxious allusions in the sixth stanza of my last ode.

"And now, my dear Becher, I must return my best acknowledgments for the interest you have taken in me and my poetical bantlings, and I shall ever be proud to show how much I esteem the advice at the former.

"Believe me most truly, &c."
nads. Five-and-twenty guineas is a sound price for a pony, and by — if it cost me five hundred pounds, I will make an example of Mr. Jekyll, and that immediately, unless the cash is returned.

Believe me, dear Jack, &c.

LETTER XXX.
TO MR. JACKSON.

"N. A., Nota, Oct. 4, 1806.

"You will make as good a bargain as possible with this Master Jekyll, if he is not a gentleman. If he is a gentleman, inform me, for I shall take very different steps. If he is not, you must get what you can of the money, for I have too much business on hand at present to commence an action. Besides, Ambrose is the man who ought to refund,—but I have done with him. You can settle with L. out of the balance, and dispose of the bidets, &c., as you best can.

"I should be very glad to see you here; but the house is filled with workmen, and undergoing a thorough repair. I hope, however, to be more fortunate before many months have elapsed.

"If you see Bold Webster, remember me to him, and tell him I have to regret Sydney, who has perished. I fear, in my rabbit warren, for we have seen nothing of him for the last fortnight.

"Adieu.—Believe me, &c."

LETTER XXXI.
TO MR. JACKSON.

"N. A., Nota, Dec. 12, 1806.

MY DEAR JACK,

"You will get the greyhound from the owner at any price, and as many more of the same breed (male or female) as you can collect.

"Tell D'Egville his dress shall be returned—I am obliged to him for the pattern. I am sorry you should have so much trouble, but I was not aware of the difficulty of procuring the animals in question. I shall have finished part of my mansion in a week, and, if you can a day you will dine at Christmas, I shall be very glad to see you.

"Believe me, &c."

LETTER XXXII.
TO MR. RECHER.

"Newstead Abbey, Nota, Sept. 14, 1806.

MY DEAR RECHER,

"I am much obliged to you for your inquiries, and shall profit by them accordingly. I am going to get up a play here; the hall will constitute a most admirable theatre. I have settled the dram. pers. and can do without ladies, as I have some young friends who will make tolerable substitutes for females, and we only want three male characters, beside Mr. Hobhouse and myself, for the play we have fixed on, which will be the Revenge. Pray direct Nicholson the carpenter to come over to me immediately, and inform me what day you will dine and pass the night here.

"Believe me, &c."

LETTER XXXIII.
TO THE HONORABLE MRS. BYRON.

"Dear Madam,

"I have no beds for the H * * s, or any body else at present. The H * * s sleep at Mansfield. I do not know that I resemble Jean Jacques Rousseau.* I have no ambition to be like so illustrious a madman—but this I know, that I shall live in my own manner, and as much alone as possible. When my rooms are ready I shall be glad to see you; at present it would be improper, and uncomfortable to both parties. You can hardly object to my rendering my mansion habitable, notwithstanding my departure for Persia in March, (or May at farthest,) since you will be tenants till my return; and in case of any accident,) for I have already arranged my will to be drawn up the moment I am twenty-one,) I have taken care you shall have the house and manor for life, besides a sufficient income. Do you think my improvements are, not entirely selfish. As I have a friend here, we will go to the Infirmary Ball on the 12th; we will drink tea with Mrs. Byron at eight o'clock, and expect to see you at the ball. If that lady will allow us a couple of rooms to dress in, we shall be highly obliged:—if we are at the ball by ten or eleven it will be time enough, and we shall return to Newstead about three or four. Adieu.

"Believe me,

"Yours, very truly,

"BYRON"

LETTER XXXIV.
TO MRS. BYRON.

"Dear Mother,

"If you please, we will forget the things you mention. I have no desire to remember them. When my rooms are finished, I shall be happy to see you; as I tell but the truth, you will not suspect me of evasion. I am furnishing the house more for you than myself, and I shall establish you in it before I leave England. When I expect to go to Madras, if nothing particularly obstructive occurs. I am now fitting up the green drawing-room; the red for a bed-room, and the rooms over as sleeping-rooms. They will be soon completed,—at least, I hope so.

"I wish you would inquire of Major Watson (who is an old Indian) what things will be necessary to provide for my voyage. I have already procured a friend to write to the Arabic professor at Cambridge for some information I am anxious to procure. I can easily get letters from Government to the ambassadors, consuls, &c., and also to the governors at Calcutta and Madras. I shall place my property and will in the hands of trustees till my return, and I mean to appoint you one. From Hanson I have heard nothing—when I do you shall have the particulars.

"After all, you must own my project is not a bad one. If I do not travel now, I never shall, and all men should one day or other. I have at present no connections to keep me at home; no wife, or unprovided sisters, brothers, &c. I shall take care of you, and when I return I may possibly become a politician. A few years' knowledge of other countries than our own will not incapacitate me for that part. If we see no nation but our own we do not

* Thus addressed always by Lord Byron, but without any right to the distinction.
† See Memorandum, page 1023.
LETTER XXXV.
TO MR. HODGSON.

"A few weeks ago I wrote to * * * to request he would receive the son of a citizen of London, well known to me, as a pupil; the family having been particularly polite during the short time I was with them induced me to this application. Now, mark what follows,—as somebody wHolly saith. On this day arrives an epistle, signed * * *, containing not the smallest reference to tuition, or intuition, but a petition for Robert Gregson, of pugilistic notoriety, now in bondage for certain paltry pounds sterling, and liable to take up his everlasting abode in Banko Pegs. Had the letter been from any of my lay acquaintance, or, in short, from any person but the gentleman whose signature it bears, I should have marvelled not. If * * * is serious, I congratulate pugilism on the acquisition of such a patron, and shall be most happy to advance any sum necessary for the liberation of the captive Gregson. But I certainly hope to be certified from you, or some respectable housekeeper, of the fact, before I write to * * * on the subject. When I say the fact, I mean of the letter being written by * * *, not having any doubt as to the authenticity of the statement. The letter is now before me, and I keep it for your perusal."

LETTER XXXVI.
TO R. C. DALLAS, ESQ.

"My only reason for not adopting your lines* is because they are your lines. You will recollect what Lady Wortley Montague said to Pope: 'No touching, for the good will be given to you, and the bad attributed to me.' I am determined it shall be all my own, except such alterations as may be absolutely requisite; but I am much obliged by the trouble you have taken and your good opinion.

'The couplet on Lord G. may be scratched out, and the following inserted:

'Recommend I Sheffield I wish your spirits fed, &c."

"This will answer the purpose of concealment. Now for some couplets on Mr Crabbe, which you may place after 'Gifford, Sotheby, McNell.'"

"There be who say in these enlightened days, &c."

"I am sorry to differ with you with regard to the title, but I mean to retain it with this addition: 'The English Bards and Scotch Reviewers:' and, if we call it a Satire, it will obviate the objection, as the bards also were Welsh. * * * * * "

"Yours very sincerely, "BYRON."

Mr. Dallas had written some lines, an I requested Lord Byron to have them sent in the Scotch Review, the "English Bards and Scotch Reviewers," then in wave. —The letters following to Mr. Dallas, relate to that work.

LETTER XXXVII.
TO R. C. DALLAS, ESQ.

"My Dear Sir,

'Suppose we have this couplet—*"

"Though sweet the sound, disdain a borrow'd tone,

Resign Achala's lyre, and strike your own; or,

'If soft the echo, shun a borrow'd tone,

Resign Achala's lyre, and strike your own.

'So much for your admonitions; but my note of notes, my solitary pun must not be given up—no, rather

'Let malversation of all the boasts of chase,

That ruse to weedy Caledon!'"

"We shall never sell a thousand; then why print so many? Did you receive my yesterday's note? I am troubling you, but I am apprehensive some of the lines are omitted by your young amanuensis, to whom, however, I am infinitely obliged.

'I believe me, yours very truly, "BYRON."

NOTES TO MR. DALLAS.

"I wish you to call, if possible, as I have some alterations to suggest as to the part Broughtam "B."

'Excuse the trouble, but I have added two lines which are necessary to complete the poetical char actor of Lord Carlisle.

"In his age

His sons alone had chance of their standing stage;

But masses for some sect, 'tis hard, enough!"

'Nor drugging their audience with the trashy stuff."

"I wish you much to call on me, about one, not later, if convenient, as I have some thirty or forty lines for addition. Believe me, &c. "B."

"Ecce iterum Crispinus! I send you some lines to be placed after 'Gifford, Sotheby, McNell.' Pray call to-morrow any time before two, and believe me, &c. "B."

"P. S. Print soon, or I shall overflow with more rhyme."

"I enclose some lines to be inserted, the six first after 'Lords too are bards, &c.,' rather immediately following the line:"

"Oh! who would take their titles with their rhymes?"

The four next will wind up the panegyric on Lord Carlisle, and come after 'tragic stuff.'"

"Yours truly, "B."

V. B. 18, 1809."

"A cut at the opera—Ecce signum! from last night's observation, and (mended against the Society for the suppression of Vice. The lines will come well in after the couplets concerning Naldi and Catalini."

"Yours truly, "BYRON."

"Feb. 28, 1809."

Mr. Dallas objected to the lines as originally written:

"Translation's service will last drawn, And quit Achala's muse to court your own.""

† See English Bards and note a. 461."
LETTER XXXVII.

TO MRS. BYRON.

"S. St. James's st., March 8, 1808.

"Dear Mother,

"My last letter was written under great depression of spirits from poor Falkland's death, who has left behind him a shining four children and his wife. I have been endeavoring to assist them as much as God knows, I cannot do as I would wish, from my own embarrassments, and the many claims upon me from other quarters.

"What you say is all very true: come what may Newcastle and I stand or fall together. I have now lived on the spot, I have fixed my heart upon it, and no pressure, present or future, shall induce me to barter the last vestige of our inheritance. I have that pride within me which will support difficulties. I can endure privations; but could I obtain in exchange for Newcastle Abbey the first fortune in the country, I would reject the proposition. Set your mind at ease on that score; Mr. Hanson talks like a man of business on the subject, I feel like a man of honor, and I will not sell Newcastle.

"I shall get my seat on the return of the affidavits from Carhais, in Cornwall, and will do something in the House soon; I must dash or all is over. My Satire must be kept secret for a month; after that you may say what you please on the subject. Lord Carlisle has used me infamously, and refused to state any particulars of my family to the Chancellor. I have lunched him in my rhymes, and perhaps his Lordship may regret not being more conciliatory. They tell me it will have a sale; I hope so, for the bookseller has behaved well, as far as publishing well goes. Believe me, yours truly.

"P. S. You shall have a mortgage on one of the farms."

LETTER XXXIX.

TO MR. HANRE.

"S. St. James's st., March 18, 1809.

"There was no necessity for your excuses; if you have time and inclination to write, 'for what we receive, the Lord make us thankful.'—If I do not hear from you, I console myself with the idea that you are much more agreeably employed.

"I send down to you by this post a certain Satire lately published, and in return for the three and sixpence expenditure upon it, only beg that if you should guess the author, you will keep his name secret; at least, for the present. London is full of the Duke's business. The Commons have been at these last three nights and are not yet come to a decision. I do not know if the affair will be brought before our House, unless in the shape of an impeachment. If it makes its appearance in a debatable form, I believe I shall be tempted to say something on the subject—I am glad to hear you like Cambridge: firstly, because to know that you are happy is pleasant to one who wishes you all possible sublunary enjoyment; and, secondly, I admire the morality of the sentiment. Alma Mater was to me vijuta noverca; and the old Beldam only gave me my M. A. degree because she could not avoid it. You know what a farce r a noble Cantab. must perform.

LETTER XL.

TO R. C. DALLAS, ESQ.

"April 25, 1809.

"Dear Sir,

"I am just arrived at Batt's Hotel, Jermyn street, St. James's, from Scotland, and come on to see you when convenient or agreeable. Hobhouse is on his way up to town, full of printing resolution, and proof against criticism.

"Believe me, with great sincerity, yours truly,

"BYRON."

LETTER XLI.

TO MR. WILLIAM BANXES.

"Twelve o'clock, Friday night.

"My Dear Bankes,

"I have just received your note; believe me I regret most sincerely that I was not fortunate enough to see it before, as I need not repeat to you, that your conversation for half an hour would have been much more agreeable to me than gambling or drinking, or any other fashionable mode of passing an evening abroad or at home. I really am very sorry that I went out previous to the arrival of your despatch: in future, pray let me hear from you before six, and whatever my engagements, may be, I will always postpone them. Believe me, with that deference which I have always from my childhood paid to your talents, and with somewhat a better opinion of your heart than I have hitherto entertained.

"Yours ever, &c."
laid down my pen, but have promised to contribute a chapter on the state of morals, &c., &c.

"The cock is crowing,
I must be going,
And can no more."—

"Adieu. Believe me, &c., &c."

LETTER XLIV.

TO MR. HODGSON.

"Falmouth, June 26, 1808.

"My dear Hodgson,

"Before this reaches you, Hobhouse, two officers wives, three children, two waiting-maids, dabb substitutes for the troops, three Portuguese esquires and domestics, in all nineteen souls, will have sailed in the Lissado, with the noble Captain Kidd, a gallant commander as ever smugled an anchor of right Nantz.

"We are going to Lisbon first, because the Malta packet has sailed, 'tis seen— FROM LONDON to Gibraltar, Malta, Constantinople, and 'all that,' as Orator Henley said, when he put the Church, and 'all that,' in danger.

"This town of Falmouth, as you will partly conjecture, is no great ways from the sea. It is defended on the sea-side by tway castles, St. Maws and Pendennis, extremely well calculated for annoying every body except an enemy. St. Maws is garrisoned by an able-bodied person of fourscore, a widower. He has the whole command and sole management of six most unmanageable pieces of ordnance, admirably adapted for the destruction of Pendennis, a like tower of strength on the opposite side of the Channel. We have seen St. Maws, but Pendennis they will not let us behold save at a distance, because Hobhouse and I are suspected of having already taken St. Maws by a coup de main.

"The town contains many Quakers and salt fish— the oysters have a taste of copper, owing to the soil of a mining country—the women (blessed be the Corporation therefore!) are flogged at the cart's tail when they pick and steal, as happened to one of the fair sex yesterday noon. She was pertinacious in her behavior, and damned the mayor. * * *

"Hodgson I remember me to the Drury, and remember me to—you yourself when drunk—I am not worth a sober thought. Look to my Satire at Cowthorne's, Cockspur street. * * *

"I don't know when I can write again, because it depends on that experienced navigator, Captain Kidd, and the 'stormy winds that (don't) blow,' at this season. I leave England without regret—I shall return to it without pleasure. that the village of Cintra* in Estremadura is the most beautiful, perhaps, in the world. * * *

"I am very happy here, because I loves oranges, and talk had Latin to the monks, who understand it, as it is like their own, and goes into society, (with my pocket pistols,) and I swins in the Tagus all across at once, and I rides on an ass or a mule, and swears Portuguese, and have got a diarrhoea and blisters in my legs. But other of that! Comfort must not be expected by folks that go a pleasing. * * *

"When the Portuguese are pertinacious, I say, 'Sarracens,' the great oath of the grandees, that very well supplies the place of 'Damnus,'--and, when dissatisfied with my neighbor, I pronounce him 'Ambra di merdo.' With these two phrases, and a third, 'Arva Bouri,' which signifies 'Get an ass,' I am understood to be a person of degree and a master of languages. How merrily we lives that travellers be!--if we had food and rainet. But, in sober sadness, any thing is better than England, and I am infinitely amused with my pilgrimage as far as it's gone.

"To morrow we start to ride post near 400 miles as far as Gibraltar, where we embark for Melita and Jyzantum. A letter to Malta will find me, or to be forwarded. If I am absent. Pray me the Dury and Dwyer and all the Ephesians you encounter. I am writing with Butler's donative pencil, which makes my bad hand worse. Excuse illegibility.

"Hodgson! send me the news, and the deaths, and defeats, and capital crimes, and the misfortunes of one's friends; and let us hear of literary matters, and the controversies and the criticisms. All this will be pleasing. Suave mari magnum, &c. Talking of that, I have been sea-sick, and sick of the sea. Adieu

LETTER XLVI.

TO MR HODGSON.

Gibraltar, August 6, 1808.

"I have just arrived at this place after a journey through Portugal, and a part of Spain, of nearly five hundred miles. We left Lisbon and travelled on horseback to Seville and Cadiz, and thence in the Hyperion frigate to Gibraltar. The horses are excellent—we rode seventy miles a day. Eggs and wine and hard beds are all the accommodation we found, and, in such torrid weather, quite enough. My health is better than in England. * * *

"Seville is a fine town, and the Sierra Morena, part of which we crossed, a very sufficient mountain,—but damn description, it is always disgusting. Cadiz, sweet Cadiz!—it is the first spot in the creation. * * *

"The beauty of its streets and mansions is only excelled by the loveliness of its inhabitants. For, with all national prejudice, I must confess the women of Cadiz are as far superior to the English women in beauty as the Spaniards are inferior to the English in every quality that dignifies the name of man. * * *

"Just as I began to know the principal persons of the city, I was obliged to sail.

"You will not expect a long letter after my riding so far 'on hollow pampered jades of Asia.' Asia of Asia puts me in mind of Africa, which is within five miles of my present residence. I am going over before I go on to Constantinople.

"* * *

"Cadiz is a complete Cythera. Many of the grandees who have left Madrid during the troubles reside there, and I believe it the prettiest and cleanest town in Europe. London is filthy in the comparison. * * *

"The Spanish women are all alike, their education the same. The wife of a duke is, in information, as the wife of a peasant,—the wife of a peasant, in manner, equal to a duchess. Certainly, they are all fascinating; but on their minds have only one idea, and the business of their lives is intrigue. * * *

"I have seen Sir John Carr at Seville and Cadiz, and like Swift's barber, have been down on my knees to beg he would not put me into black and white. Pray remember me to the Drurys and the Davies, and all of that stamp who are yet extant.

"Send me a letter to the bishop of Malta. My next epistle shall be from Mount Carmel or Mount Sion. I shall return to Spain before I see England for. I am enamoured of the country.

"Adieu, and believe me, &c."

LETTER XLVII.

TO THE HON. MRS. BYRON.

Gibraltar, Aug. 11, 1808.

"Dear Mother,

"I have been so much occupied since my departure from England that till I could address you at length, I have forborne writing altogether. As I have now passed through Portugal, and a considerable part of Spain, and have leisure at this place, I shall endeavor to give you a short detail of my movements. We sailed from Falmouth on the 20th of July, reached Lisbon after a very favorable passage of four days and a half, and took up our abode in that city. It has often been described without being worthy of description; for, except the view from the Tagus, which is beautiful, and some fine churches and convents, it contains little but filthy streets and more filthy inhabitants.

"To make amends for this, the village of Cintra, about fifteen miles from the capital, is, perhaps in every respect, the most delightful in Europe; it contains beauties of every description, natural and artificial. Palaces and gardens rising in the midst of rocks, cascades and precipices; convents on stupendous heights—a distant view of the sea and the Tagus; and, besides (though that is a secondary consideration) is remarkable as the scene of Sir H. D.'s Convention.† It unites in itself all the wildness of the western highlands with the verdure of the South of France. Near this place, about ten miles to the right, is the palace of Mafra the boast of Portugal, as it might be of any country, in point of magnificence without elegance. There is a convent annexed; the monks, who possess large revenues, are courteous enough, and understand Latin, so that we had a long conversation: they have a large library, and asked me if the English had any books in their country.

"I sent my baggage and part of the servants' by sea to Gibraltar, and travelled on horseback from Aldeia Galheda, (the first stage from Lisbon, which is only accessible by water,) to Seville, (one of the most famous cities in Spain,) where the government called the Junta is now held. The distance to Seville is nearly four hundred miles, and to Cadiz almost ninety miles further towards the coast. I had orders from the government, and every possible accommodation on the road, as an English nobleman, in an English uniform, is a very respectable personage in Spain at present. The horses are remarkable good, and the roads (I assure you upon my honor, for you will hardly believe it) very superior to the best British roads, without smallest toll or turnpike. You will suppose this when I rode post to Seville in four days, through this parching country, in the midst of summer, without fatigue of annoyance. Seville is a beautiful town, and the streets so narrow they are man. We lodged in the house of two Spanish unmarried ladies, who possess six houses in Seville, gave me a curious specimen of Spanish manners.

They are women of character, and the eldest, though the younger pretty, but never so good a figure as Donna Josepha. The freedom of unmanner which is general here, astonished me not a little: and in the course of further observation I find that reverence for the character of the Spanish belles, who are, in general, very handsome, with large black eyes, and very fine forms. The eldest honored your unworthy son with very particular attention, embracing him with great tenderness at parting, (I was there but three days,) after cutting of a lock of his hair, and presenting him with one of her own, about three feet in length, which I send, and beg you will retain till my return. Her lust fills the meekest of virgins! me gun mucho."—Adieu, you pretty fellow, you please me much." She offered a share of her apartment, which your virtue induced me to decline: she laughed, and said I had some English 'amante,' (lover,) and as adding, she was getting to be married to an officer in the Spanish army.

"I left Seville, and rode on to Cadiz, through a bountiful country. At Xeres, where the sherry we drank a while, I met a great merchant, a Mr. Gordon of Scotland, who was extremely polite, and fa\vored me with the inspection of his vaults and cellars,—so that I quaffed at the fountain head.

"Cadiz, the sweet Cadiz, is the most delightful town I ever beheld, very different from our English cities in every respect, except cleanliness, (and it as well as London,) but still beautiful and full of the fine women in Spain, the Cadiz belles being the Lancashire women of their land; and just as I was intro-\aced, and began to like the grandees, I was forced to leave it for this accursed place; but before I return to England I will visit it again. The night before I left it, I sat in the box at the opera with Admiral Cordova's family; he is the commander whom Lord St. Vincent defeated in 1797; and has an aged wife and a fine daughter, Senorita Cordova;
the girl is very pretty in the Spanish style, in my opinion no more inferior in the English, in the charms, and certainly superior in fancy. Long black hair, dark languishing eyes, clear olive complications, and forms more graceful in motion than can be imagined by an Englishman used to the drowsy, listless air of his countrywomen, added to the most becoming dress, and, at the same time, the most decent in the world, render a Spanish beauty irresistible. I beg leave to observe that intrigue here is the business of life; when a woman marries she throws off all restraint, but I believe their conduct is chaste enough before. If you make a proposal, which in England would bring a box on the ear from the meekest of virgins, to a Spanish girl, she thanks you for the honor you intend her, and replies, 'Wait till I am married, and I shall be too happy.' This is literally and strictly true. Miss
C. and her little brother understood a little French and, after regrettmg my ignorance of the Spanish, she proposed to become my preccstress in that language. I could only reply by a low bow, and express my admiration of her wit, which I did not doubtless attend my studies under so charming a directress. I was standing at the back of the box, which resembles our opera boxes, (the theatre is large, and lined with mirrors,) and I mistook the character of the man in which Englishmen generally adopt, for fear of incommoding the ladies in front, when this fair Spaniard possessed an old woman (an aunt to a duenna) of her chair, and commanded me to be seated next herself, at a tolerable distance from her manipulations. You have heard me withdraw, and was lounging with a party of men in the place, when, en passeant, the lady turned round and called me, and I had the honor of attending her to the admiral's maison. I have an invitation on my return to Cadiz, which I shall accept, if I can pass through the country on my return from Asia.

LETTER XLIX.

TO THE HONORABLE MRS. BYRON.

Malta, Sept. 15, 1809.

Dear Mother,

"Though I have a very short time to spare, being in sail immediately for Greece, I cannot avoid taking an opportunity of telling you that I am well. I have been in Malta, a short time, and have found the climate hospitalable and pleasant. This letter is committed to the charge of a very extraordinary woman, whom you have doubtless heard of, Mrs. Spencer Smith,\(^1\) of whose escape the Marquis de Salvo published a narrative a few years ago. She has since been shipwrecked, and her life has been from its commencement so fertile in remarkable incidents, that in a romance they would appear improbable. She was born at Constantinople, where her father, Baron Herbert, was Austrian ambassador; married unhappily, yet has never been impeached in point of character; excited the vengeance of Bonaparte by a part in some conspiracy; several times risked her life; and is not yet twenty-five. She is here in her way to England, to join her husband, being oblied to leave Trieste, where she was paying a visit to her mother, by the approach of the French, and embarks soon in a ship of war. Since my arrival here, I have had scarcely any other companion. I have found her very pretty, very accomplished, and extremely eccentric. Bonaparte is even now so incensed against her, that her life would be in some danger if she were taken prisoner a second time.

You have seen Murray and Robert by this time, and received my letter—little has happened since that date. I have touched at Cagliari, in Sardinia, and at Girgenti, in Sicily, and embark to-morrow for Patras, from whence I proceed to Yanina, where Ali Pacha holds his Court, so I soon shall be among the Mussulmans.

"Adieu. Believe me with sincerity, yours ever,

BYRON."

LETTER L.

TO MRS. BYRON.

"My Dear Mother,

"I have now been some time in Turkey; this place is on the coast, but I have traversed the interior of the province of Albania on a visit to the Pacha. I left Malta in the Spider, a brig of war, on the 21st of September, and arrived in eight days at Presessa. I thence have been about one hundred and fifty miles as far as Tepalen, his highness's country palace, where I stayed three days.\(^2\) The name of the Pacha is Ali, and he is considered a man of the first abilities; he governs the whole of Albania, (the ancient Illyricum,) Epirus, and part of Macedonia. His son, Vely Pacha, to whom he has given me letters, governs the Morea, and has great influence in Egypt; in short he is one of the most powerful men in the Ottoman empire. When I reached Yanina, the capital, after a journey of three days over the mountains, through a country of the most picturesque beauty, I found that Ali Pacha was with his army in Illyricum, besieging Ibrahim Pacha in the castle of Berat. He had heard that an Englishman of rank was in his dominions, and had left orders to Yanina with the commandment to provide a house, and supply me with every kind of necessary gratis; and though I have been allowed to make presents to the slaves,\(^3\)

"I have not been permitted to pay for a single article of household consumption.

"I rode out on the vizier's horses, and saw the palaces of himself and grandsons: they are splendid, but too much ornamented with silk and gold. I then went over the mountains through Zitra, a village with a Greek monastery, (which I must return,) in the most beautiful situation (always excepting Cintra, in Portugal) I ever beheld. In nine days I reached Tepalen. Our journey was much prolonged by the repeated changes of mountains, and intersected the roads. I shall never forget the singular scene on entering Tepalen at five in the afternoon, as the sun was going down. It brought to my mind (with some change of desire,) however Scott's description of Branksome Castle in his Lay, and the feudal system. The Albanians, in their dresses, (the most magnificent in the world, consisting of a long white kilif, gold-waist cloak, crimson velvet gold laced jacket and waistcoat, silver-mounted pistols and daggers,) the Turuors with their high caps, the Turks in their vast pelisses and turbans, the soldiers and black slaves with the horses, the former in groups in an immense range large ready for a great race, the latter placed in a kind of cloister below it, two hundred steeds ready caparisoned to move in a moment, couriers entering or passing out with despatches, the kettledrums beating an hour from the minaret of the mosque—altogether, with the singular appearance of the building itself, formed a new and delightful spectacle to a stranger. I was conducted to a very handsome apartment, and my mule was required after by the vizier's secretary, a 'la mode Turque!'

"The next day I was introduced to Ali Pacha. I was dressed in a full suit of staff uniform, with a silver-mounted sword, and a very magnificent silver-mounted pistolet, in a large room paved with marble; a fountain was playing in the centre; the apartment was surrounded by scarlet ottomans. He received me standing, a wonderful compliment from a Mussulman, and made me sit down on his right hand. I have a Greek interpreter for general use, but a physician of Ali's, named Fmnariou, who stands Latin, acted for me on this occasion. His first question was, why, at so early an age, I left my country?—(the Turks have no idea of travelling for amusement.) He then said, the English captain, Captain Leake, had told him I was of a great family, and desired his respect for character; for which I now, to the great name of Ali Pacha, present to you. He said he was certain I was a man of birth, because I had small ears, curling hair, and little white hands,\(^4\) and expressed himself pleased with my appearance and address. He told me to consider him as a father while I was in Turkey, and said he looked on me as his son. Indeed, he treated me like a child, sending me almonds and sugar'd sherbet, fruit and sweetmeats, twenty times a day. He begged me to visit him often, and at night, when he was at leisure. I then after coffee and pipes, retired for the first time. I saw him thrice afterward. It is singular that the Turks, who have no hereditary families, and feel no pride, except the Sultans, pay so much respect to birth; for I found my pedigree more regarded than my title.

"His highness is sixty years old, very fat, and not tall, but with a fine face, light blue eyes, and a white beard; his manner is very kind, and at the same time he possesses that dignity which I had universal among the Turks.—He has the appearance of any thing but his real character; for he is a remorseless tyrant, guilty of the most horrid cruelties, very brave, and so good a general that they call him the Mahometan Bonaparte. Napoleon has twice offered to make him king of Epirus, but..."

\(^1\) See Don Juan, canto iv., stanza 14, and note.

he prefers the English interest, and abhors the French, as he himself told me. He is of so much consequence, that he is much courted by both; the Albanians being the most warlike subjects of the Sultan, though Ali is only nominally dependent on the Pacha; he has been much more worryingly, but as barbarous as he is successful, rostering rebels, &c., &c. Bonaparte sent him a snuff-box, with his picture; he said the snuff-box was very well, but the picture he could excuse, as he neither liked it nor thought it original. His ideas of judging of a man's character, both from hands, &c., were curious enough.
To me, he was, indeed, a father, giving me letters, guards, and every possible accommodation. Our next concern was the means of war and travelling, posi-Riatrics and England. He called my Albanian soldier, who attends me, and told him to protect me at all hazard. His name is Viscell, and like all the Albanians, he is brave, rigidly honest, and faithful;
but they are cruel, though not treacherous; and have several vices, but no meannesses. They are, perhaps, the most beautiful race, in point of countenance, in the world; their women are sometimes handsome as well, but they are treated like slaves.
beaten, and, in short, complete beasts of burden;
they plough, dig, and sow. I found them carrying wood, and actually repairing the highways. The men are not paid for this labor, and was a real sole occupation. The women are the laborers, which, after all, is no great hardship in so delightful a climate. Yesterday, the 11th of November
I bathed in the sea; to-day it is so hot that I am writing Antony's epistle, in the small room, with doors three wide open, no fire, or even fire-place in the house; except for culinary purposes.

"To-day I saw the remains of the town of Actium, the Antony lost in war, in a small place, where two frigates could hardly maneuvre:
a broken wall is the sole remnant. On another part of the gulf stands the ruins of Nicopolis, built by Augustus in honor of his victory. Last night I was at a Greek marriage; but this and a thousand things more I have neither time nor space to describe.

"I am going to-morrow, with a guard of fifty men, to Patras in the Morea, and thence to Athens, where I shall probably be in two days. I was nearly lost in a Turkish ship of war, owing to the ignorance of the captain and crew, though the storm was not violent. Fletcher yelled after his wife, the Greek town, and all the soldiers of the Mussulman
Ali; the captain burst into tears and ran below deck, telling us to call on God; the sails were split, the mainyard shivered, the wind blowing fresh, the night setting in, and all our chance was to make Corfu, which is in possession of the French, or, as Fletcher pathetically termed it, "a watery grave.
I did what I could to console Fletcher, but finding him incorrigible, wrapped myself up in my Albanian capote, (an immense cloak,) and lay down on deck to wait the worst. I have learned to philosophize in my travels, and if I had not, complaint was useless. Luckily the wind abated, and only drove us on the coast of Suli, on the main land, where landed, and proceeded, by the help of the natives, to Prevesa again; but I shall not trust Turkish sailors in future, though the Pacha had ordered one to his own gullets to take me to Patras. I am therefore going as far as Missolonghi by land, and there have only to cross a small gulf to get to Patras.

"Fletcher's next epistle will be full of marvels:
we were one night lost for nine hours in the mountains; there is a town at least twenty miles nearly wrecked. In both cases, Fletcher was sorely bewildered, from apprehensions of famine and banditti in the first, and drowning in the second, instance. His eyes were filled with lightning, or crying, (I don't know which,) but are now recovered. When you write, address me at Mr. Stranks, English consul, Patras, Morea.

"I could tell you I know not how many incidents that I think would amuse you, but they crowd on my mind as much as they would swell my paper and I can neither arrange them in the one, nor put them down on the other, except in the greatest interest of the country. I have seen many Turk
Soldiers, and never found soldiers so tolerable, though
I have been in the garrisons of Gibraltar and Malta, and seen Spanish, French, Sicilian, and British Turkish troops; but they are all tolerable, and was always welcome to their provision and milk.
Not a week ago an Albanian chief, (every village has its chief, who is called Primate,) after helping us out of the Turkish galley in her distress, feeding us, and lodging our suite, consisting of Fletcher, a Greek, two Athenians, a Greek priest, and my companion, Mr. Hobhouse, refused any compensation but a written paper stating that we were received; and when I pressed him to accept a few sequins, 'No,' he replied; 'I wish you to love me, not to pay me.' These are his words.

"It is astonishing how far money goes in this country. They are so poor, and have so many interests of their own, to pay, by the vizier's order; but since, though I have generally had sixteen horses, and generally six or seven men, the expense has not been half as much as staying only three weeks in Malta, though for the Ball, the governor gave me a horse for nothing, and I had only one servant. By-the-by, I expect Hanson to remit regularly; for I am not about to stay in this province for ever. Let him enter into Gevo and I may perhaps cross into Patras.
The fact is, the fertility of the plains is wonderful, and species is scarce, which makes this remarkable cheapness. I am going to Athens to study modern Greek, which differs much from the ancient, though radically similar. I have no desire to return England, nor shall I, unless compelled by absolute want, and Hanson's neglect; but I shall not enter into Asia for a year or two, as I have much to see in Greece, and I may perhaps cross into Patras.
At least the Egyptian part. Fletcher, like all Englishmen, is very much dissatisfied, though a little reconciled to the Turks by a present of eighty pounds, and all the wine in the house. He is with every thing, and the value of specie here, is nearly ten guineas English. He has suffered nothing but from cold, heat, and vermin, which those who lie in cottages and cross mountains in a cold country must undergo, and of which I have equally partaken with himself; but he is not valiant, and is afraid of robbers and tempests. I have no one to be remembered to in England, and wish to hear nothing from you, that you are well, and a letter or two on business from Hanson, whom you may tell to write.
I will write when I can, and beg you to believe me,
"Your affectionate son,

"BYRON.

"P. S. I have some very\' magnifique\' Albanian dresses, the only expensive article in this country.
They cost fifty guineas each, and have so much gold they would cost in England two hundred
I have been introduced to Lord Boy and Maimout
Pacha, both little boys, grand-children of Ali, at Yanina. They are totally unlike our lads, have painted complexions like rouged dowagers, large black eyes, and features perfectly regular. They are the most little animals I have ever seen, and are broken into the court ceremonies already. The Turkish salute is a slight inclination of the head, with the hand on the breast. Intimates always kiss the hand, but strangers never. We are friends without understanding each other, like many other folks, though from a different cause. He has given me a letter to his father in the Morea, to whom I have also letters from Ali Pacha."

LETTER LI.

TO MRS. BYRON.

"Smyrna, March 19, 1819.

DEAR MOTHER,

"I cannot write you a long letter, but as I know you will not be sorry to receive any intelligence of my movements, pray accept what I can give. I have traversed the greatest part of Greece, besides Epirus, &c., &c., resided ten weeks at Athens, and am now on the Asiatic side on my way to Constantinople. I have just returned from viewing the ruins of Ephesus, a day's journey from Smyrna. I presume you have received a long letter I wrote from Albania, with an account of my reception by the Pacha of the province.

"When I arrive at Constantinople, I shall determine whether to proceed into Persia or return, which latter I do not wish, if I can avoid it. But I have no intelligence from Mr. Hanson, and but one letter from yourself. I shall stand in need of remittances, whether I proceed or return. I have written to him repeatedly, that he may not plead ignorance of my purpose, or neglect. I can give you no account of any thing, for I have not time or opportunity, the frigate sailing immediately. Indeed, the farther I go the more my laziness increases, and my aversion to letter-writing becomes more confirmed. I have written to no one but yourself and Mr. Hanson, and these are communications of business and duty rather than of inclination.

"Fletcher is very much disgusted with his fatigue, though he has undergone nothing that I have not shared. He is a poor creature; indeed English servants are detestable travellers. I have, besides him, two Albanian soldiers and a Greek interpreter; all excellent in their way. Greece, particularly in the vicinity of Athens, is delightful; cloudless skies and lovely landscapes. But I must reserve all account of my adventures till we meet. I keep no journal, but my friend Hobhouse writes incessantly. Pray take care of Murray and Robert, and tell the boy it is the most fortunate thing for him that he did not accompany me to Turkey. Consider this as merely a notice of my safety, and believe me,

"Yours, &c., &c.,

"BYRON."

LETTER LII.

TO THE HON. MRS. BYRON.

"Smyrna, April 10, 1819.

DEAR MOTHER,

"To-morrow, or this evening, I sail for Constantinople in the bassette frigate of thirty-six guns. She returns to England with our ambassador, whom she is going up on purpose to receive. I have written to you short letters from Athens, Smyrna, and a long one from Albania. I have not yet written for a second large envelope, and you must not be angry, since I take all opportunities of apprising you of my safety; but even that is an effort; writing is so irksome. I have been traversing Greece, and Epirus, Illyria, &c., &c., and you see by my date, have got into Asia. I have made but one excursion lately, to the ruins of Ephesus. Malta is the rendezvous of my letters, so address to that island. Mr. Hanson has not written, though I wished to hear of the Norfolk sale, the Lancashire lawsuit, &c., &c. I am anxiously expecting fresh remittances. I believe you will like Nottinghamshire, at least, my share of it. Pray accept my good wishes in lieu of a long letter, and believe me,

"Yours sincerely and affectionately,

"BYRON."

LETTER LIII.

TO THE HON. MRS. BYRON.

"Saliaca Frigate, off the Dardanelles, April 17, H.M.

DEAR MADAM,

"I write at anchor, (in our way to Constantinople,) off the Troad, which I traversed two days ago. All the remains of Troy are the tombs of her destroyers, among which I see that of Antilochus from my cabin window. These are large mounds of earth, like the barrows of the Danes in your island. There are several monuments, about twelve miles distant, of the Alexandrian Trous, which I also examined; but by no means to be compared with the remains of Athens and Ephesus. This will be sent in a ship of war bound with despatches for Malta. In a few days we shall be at Constantinople, barring accidents. I have also written from Smyrna, and shall, from time to time, transmit short accounts of my movements, but I feel totally unequal to long letters.

"Believe me, yours very sincerely,

"BYRON."

LETTER LIV.

TO THE HON. MRS. BYRON.

"Constantinopole, May 18, 1819.

DEAR MADAM,

"I arrived here in an English frigate from Smyrna, a few days ago, without any events worth mentioning, except landing to view the plains of Troy, and afterwards, when we were at anchor in the Dardanelles, swimming from Sestos to Abydos, in imitation of Monsieur Leander, whose story you do not know too well for me to add any thing on that subject, except that I crossed the Hellespont without so good a motive for the undertaking. As I am just going to visit the Capitan Pacha, you will excuse the brevity of my letter. When Mr. Adair takes leave, I am to see the Sultan and the mosques, &c.,

"Believe me, yours ever,

"BYRON."

LETTER LV.

TO MR. HENRY DRUBY.

"Salute Frigate, May 3, 1819.

MY DEAR DRUBY,

"When I left England, nearly a year ago, I requested me to write to you—I will do so. I have crossed Portugal, traversed the south of Spain, visited Sardinia, Sicily, Malta, and thence passed into Turkey, where I am still wandering. I first landed in Albania, the ancient Epirus, where we penetrated as far as Mount Tomarit—excellently treated by the chief, Ali Pacha; and, after journeying through Illyria, Chalonia, &c., crossed the gulf of Actium, with a guard of fifty Albanians, and passed the Acheleous in our route through Acaarnania and Etolia. We stopped a short time in the Morea, crossed the gulf of Lepanto, and landed at the foot of Parnassus; saw all that Delphi retains, and so on to Thebes and Athens, at which last we remained ten weeks.

"His majesty's ship Pylades brought us to Smyrna; but not before we had topographeized Attica, including, of course, Marathon and the Sounian promontory. From Smyrna to Athens (which I visited when it anchored, for a fortight, off the tomb of Antilochus) was our next stage; and now we are in the Dardanelles, waiting for a wind to proc- eed to Constantinople—

"This morning I swam from Sestos to Abydos. The immediate distance is not above a mile, but the current renders it hazardous;—so much so that I doubt whether Leander's conjugal affection must not have been little chilled in his passage to Psyche. I attempted it a week ago, and failed,—owing to the curt wind, and the wonderful rapidity of the tide,—though I have been from my childhood a strong swimmer. But, this morning being calmer I succeeded, and crossed the 'broad Hellespont' in an hour and ten minutes.

"Well, my dear sir, I have left my home, and seen part of Africa and Asia, and a tolerable portion of Europe. I have been with generals and admirals, princes and pachas, governors and unguernovars,—but I have not time or paper to expatiate. I wish to let you know that I live with a sense of the importance of my part, and look to you again; and, if I do this as shortly as possible, attribute it to any thing but forgetfulness.

"Greece, ancient and modern, you know too well to require a word. I have been more than any Englishman, (except a Mr. Leake,) for it is a country rarely visited, from the savage character of the natives, though abounding in more natural beauties than the classical regions of Greece,—which, however, are still eminently beautiful, particularly Delphi and Cape Colonna in Attica. Yet these are nothing to parts of Illyria and Epirus, where places without a name, and rivers are appa"'s of their very name, one day, own, and more known, be justly esteemed superior subjects, for the pencil and the pen, to the dry ditch of the Illissus and the bogs of Beotia.

"The Troad is a fine field for conjecture and snipe-shooting, and a good sportsman and an ingenious scholar may exercise their feet and faculties to great advantage upon the spot; or, if they prefer riding, lose their way (as I did) in a cursed quagmire of the Seamannder, who wriggles about as the Dardan virgins still offered their wonted tribute. The only vestige of Troy, or her destroyers, are the burrows supposed to contain the carcasses of Attila, Ajax, and Mount Ida. Troy is still in high feather, though the shepherds are now-a-days not much like Ganymede. But why should I say more of these things? are they not written in the Boke of Gell? and has not H. got a journal. I keep none, as I have renounced scribbling.

"I see not much difference between ourselves and the Turks, save that we have *, and they have none—that they have long dresses, and we short, and that we talk much and—they little.

"They are sensible people. Ali Pacha told me he was sure I was a man of rank because I had small ears and bristles and curving hair. By-the-bye, I speak the Romaie, or modern Greek, tolerably. It does not differ from the ancient dialects so much as you would conceive; but the pronunciation is diametrically opposite. Of verse, except in rhyme, they have no idea.

"I like the Greeks, who are plausible rascals, with all the Turkish vices, without their courage. However, some are brave, and all are beautiful, very much so, especially the best of their ancients—the women not quite so handsome. I am in swear in Tur- kish; but, except one horrible oath, and 'pimp,' and 'bread,' and 'water,' I have got no great vocabu- lary. They are extremely polite to strangers of any rank, properly protected; and of I have two servants and two soldiers, we get on with great eclat. We have been occasionally in danger of thieves, and once of ship-wrecks,—but after all our troubles, we leave for Crete.

"At Malta I fell in love with a married woman, * and challenged an aid-de-camp of General * * (a rude fellow, who grinned at something,—I never rightly knew what,) but he explained and apolog- ized, and the lady embarked for Ciziz, and so I escaped murder and crim. con. Of Spain I sent some account to our Hodgson, but have subsequently written to no one, save notes to relations and lawyers, to keep them out of my promises. I mean to give up all connexion, on my return, with many of my best friends—as I supposed them—and to snarl all my life. But I hope to have one good- natured laugh with you, and to embrace Dwyer, and pledge Hodgson, before I commence cynicism.

"Tell Doctor Butler I am now writing with the gold pen he gave me before I left England, which is the reason my scratch is more unintelligible than usual. I have been at Athens and seen plenty of these reeds for scribbling, some of which he refused to bestow upon me, because topographeic Gell had brought them from Attica. But I will not describe, whether he me—no—how I got this style, with simple detail til my return; and then we will unfold the floodgates of colloquy. I am in a thirty-six gun frigate, going up to fetch Bob Adair from Constantinople, who will then return well have returned."

"And so H. is at it,* with some sentiment, tal sing-song of my own to fill up,—and how does it take, eh? and where the devil is the second edition of my Satire, with additions? and my name on the title-page? and more lines tagged to the end with a new exordium and what not, hot from my anvil before I cleared the Channel? The Mediterranean and the Atlantic roll between me and criticism; and the thunders of the Hyperborean Review are deafened by the roar of the Hellespont.

"Remember me to Claridge, if not translated to college, and present to Hodgson assurances of my high consideration. Now, you will ask, what shall I do next? and I answer, no I do not know. I may return in a few months, but I have intents and projects after visiting Constantinople. Bob house, however, will probably be back in September.

"On the 2d of July we have left Alibion one year of obliterous obviscidus et illia.' I was sick of my own country, and not much prepossessed in favor of any other; but I 'drag on' my chain without lengthening it at each remove.—'I love the Jolly Madcap with snuff for nobody and not cared for. All countries are much the same in my eyes. I smoke, and stare at mountains, and twirl my mus- taches very independently. I miss no comforts, and the meed of those that wrenched the murdor frame of H. have, luckily for me, little effect on mine, because I live more temperately.

"I omitted Ephesus in my catalogue which I visited during my sojourn at Smyrna; but the Temple has almost perished, and St. Paul need not trouble himself to epitomize the present brood of Ephesians, who have converted a large church built entirely of marble into a mosque, and I don't know that the edifice looks the worse for it.

"My paper is full, and my ink ebbing—good af- ternoon! If you address to me at Malta, the let ct will be forwarded wherever I may be. Hobhouse greets you; he praises for his poetry, but boasts some tidings of it. I almost forgot to tell you that I am dying for love of three Greek girls at Athens, sisters. I lived in the same house. Teresa, Maria- na, and Katinka, are the names of these divinities, all of them under 15.

"Your amiable and kind, "BYRON."

LETTER LV.

TO MR. HODGSON.

"Salerno Fregoso, in the Dominels, off Abydos, May 5, 1810.

"I am on my way to Constantinople, after a tour through Greece, Epirus, &c., and part of Asia Minor, some particulars of which I have just communicated to our friend and host, H. Drury. With these, then, I shall not trouble you; but, as you will perhaps be pleased to hear that I am well, &c., I take the opportunity of our ambassador's return to forward the few lines I have time to despatch. We have undergone some inconveniences and incurred partial perils, but no events worthy of communication, unless you will deem it one that two days ago I swam from Sestos to Abydos. This, with a few alarms from robbers, and some danger of shipwreck in a Turkish galloit six months ago, a visit to a Pacha, a passion, for a married woman at Malta, a challenge to an officer, an attachment to three Greek girls at Athens, with a great deal of buffomery and fine prospects,—form all that has distinguished my progress since my departure from Spain.

"Hobhouse's rhymes and journals; I stare and do nothing; this smoking can be deemed an active amusement. The Turks take too much care of their women to permit them to be scrutinized; but I have lived a good deal with the Greeks, whose modern dialect I can converse in enough for my purposes. With the Turks I have also some male acquaintances—female society is out of the question. I have been very well treated by the Pachas and Governors, and have no complaint to make of any kind. Hobhouse will one day inform you of all our adventures,—were I to attempt the recital, neither my paper nor your patience would hold out during the operation.

"Nobody save yourself, has written to me since I left England; but indeed I did not request it. I except your relations, who write quite as often as I wish. Of Hobhouse's volume I know nothing, except that it is out; and of my second edition I do not even know that, and certainly do not, at this distance, interest myself in the matter. * * * I hope you and Bland roll down the stream of sale with rapidity.

"Of my return I cannot positively speak, but think it probable Hobhouse will precede me in that respect. We have been very nearly one year abroad. I should wish to gaze away another, at least, in these ever-green climates; but I fear business—law business—the worst of employments, will recall me previous to that period, if not very quickly. If so, you shall have due notice.

"I hope you will find me an altered personage,—I do not mean in body, but in manner, for I begin to find out that nothing but virtue will do in this dead world. I am tolerably sick of vice, which I have tried in its agreeable varieties, and mean, on my return, to cut all my dissolute acquaintance, leave off wine and women, and take myself to politics and decoeur. I am very serious and cynical, and a good deal disposed to moralize; but, fortunately for you, the coming homily is cut off by default of pen and defalcation of paper.

"Good morrow! If you write, address me at Malte, whence your letters will be forwarded. You need not remember me to any body, but believe me yours with all faith. "Byron.""

LETTER LVII.

TO THE HONORABLE MRS. BYRON.

"Constantinople, May 24, 1810.

"Dear Mother,

"I wrote to you, very shortly, the other day on my arrival here, and as another opportunity allows, take up my pen again, that the frequency of my letters may atone for their brevity. Pray did you ever receive a picture of me in old Mr. Sanderson's, in Tiji-lama, London? (a noted limner;) if not, write for it immediately; it was paid for, except the frame, I frame there be,) before I left England. I believe I mentioned to you in my last, that my only notable exploit, lately, has been swimming from Sestos to Abydos on the third of this month, in humble imitation of Leander, of amorous memory, though I had no Hero to receive me on the other shore of the Hellespont. Of Constantinople you have, of course, read fifty descriptions by sundry travellers, which are in general so correct, that I have nothing to add on the subject.

"When our ambassador takes his leave, I shall accompany him to see the sultan, and afterward probably return to Greece. I have heard nothing of Mr. Hanson, but one remittance, without any letter from that gentleman. If you have any occasion for any pecuniary supply, may use my funds as far as they go without reserve; and, lest this should not be enough, in my next to Mr. Hanson I will direct him to advance any sum you may want, leaving it to your discretion how much, in the present state of my affairs, you may think proper to require. I have already seen the most interesting parts of Turkey in Europe and Asia Minor, but shall not proceed farther till I hear from England: in the mean time I shall expect occasional supplies, according to circumstances, and shall pass my summer among my friends, the Greeks of the Morea.

"You will direct to Malte, where my letters are forwarded, and believe me to be, with great sincerity, yours ever,

"P. S. Fletcher is well; pray take care of my boy Robert, and the old man Murray. It is fortunate they returned; neither the youth of the one, nor the age of the other, would have suited the changes of climate and fatigues of travelling.
"I have now sat on the Cyaneans, swam from Nott's to Abydos, (as I trumpeted in my last,) and, after passing through the Mora again, shall set sail for Santa Maura, and toss myself from the Lemanic promontory,—surviving which operation, I shall probably, I think, enter the Solent, and be in England. He who will deliver this, is bound, straight for these parts; and as he is bursting with his travels, I shall not anticipate his narratives, but merely beg you not to make mine, but reserve everything for me, if you have any desire to be acquainted with the truth.

"I am bound for Athens once more, and thence to the Mora; but my stay depends so much on my caprice, that I can say nothing of its probable duration. I have been out a year already, and may stay another; but I am quicksilver, and say nothing positively. We are all very much occupied doing nothing, at present. We have seen every thing but the mosques, which we are to view with a firman on Tuesday next. But of these and other matters let H. relate, with this proviso, that I am to be referred to for authenticity; and I beg leave to add, that I have taken all the gravity of Lejay's particular stress. But, if he snores, at any time, into wit, I give you leave to applaud, because that is necessarily stolen from his fellow pilgrim. Tell Davies that H. has made excellent use of you in anecdotes, and jokes in many of his majesty's ships of war; but add, also, that I always took care to restore them to the right owner; in consequence of which he, (Davies,) is not less famous by water than by land, and reigns unrivalled in the cabin, as in the 'Cocoon Tree.'

"And Hudson has been publishing more poesy; I wish he would send me his 'Sir Edgar,' and Bland's Anthology' to Malta, where they will be forwarded. In my last, which I hope you received, I gave an outline of the ground we have covered, if you have not been overtaken by this despatch. It's tongue is at your service. Remember me to Dwyer, who owes me a guinea. Tell him to put them in my banker's hands at Gibraltar or Constantinople. I believe he paid them once, but that goes for nothing, as it was an annuity.

"I wish you would write. I have heard from Hudson frequently. Malta is my post-office. I mean to be with you by next Montem. You remember the last,—I hope for such another; but, after having seen you, I do not think my health good enough. I am Djasmin Datchet. Good afternoon.

"I am yours, very sincerely,

"BYRON."

LETTER LX.

TO THE HON. MRS. BYRON.

"Constantinople, June 28, 1819.

MY DEAR MOTHER,

"I regret to perceive, by your last letter, that several of mine have not arrived, particularly a very long one, written in November last, from Albania, when I was on a visit to the Pacha, who was so taken with me that he allowed me to write to my own return. He will probably be down to Notti's, some time or other; but Fletcher, whom I send back as an incumbrance, (English servants are long travelers,) will supply my place in the interim, and describe our travels, which have been tolerably extensive. I have written twice briefly from this capital, from Smyrna, from Athens, and other parts. From all this, the Pacha of which province desired his respects to my mother, and said he was sure I was a man of high birth, because I had small ears, curling hair, and white hands!! He was very kind to me, begged me to consider him as a father, and gave me a guard of forty soldiers through the forests of Acarnania. But of these I have no more to tell; they have been at large, and yet hope you will receive my letters.

"I remember Mahomut Pacha, the grandson of Ali Pacha, at Yanina, (a little fellow, ten years of age,) and very much the curiosity of the town; he would purchase at any price, and those regular features which distinguish the Turks,) asked me how I came to travel so young, without any body to take care of me. This question was put by the little Prince, and I, having answered within a very short time, cannot now write copiously; I have only time to tell you that I have passed many a fatiguing, but never a tedious moment; and that all I am afraid of is, that I shall contract a Gibson-like wandering disposition, which will make home tiresome to me: this, I am told, is very common with men in the habit of peregrination, and, indeed, I feel it so. On the 4th of May, I swam from Nott's to Abydos. You know to which those words, but I had no hero to receive me at landing.

"I also passed a fortnight in the Troad: the tombs of Achilles and Ulysses still exist in large mounds; and when you view them, you must think that you are in the North. The other day I was at Belgrade, (a village in these environs,) to see the house built on the same site as Lady Mary Wortley's; by—the-by, her Ladyship, as far as I can judge, has lied, but not half so much as any other woman would have done in the same situation. I have been in all the principal mosques by the virtue of a firman; this is a favor rarely permitted to infidels, but the ambassador's departure obtained it for me. I have been up the Bosphorus into the Black Sea, round the walls of the city, and indeed I know more of it by sight, than I do of London.

"I hope to amuse you some winter's evening with the details, but at present you must excuse me; I am not able to write long letters in June. I return to spend my summer in Greece. I shall not proceed further into Asia, as I have visited Smyrna, Ephesus, and the Troad. I write often, but you must not be alarmed when you do not receive my letters; consider we have no regular post further than Malta, where I beg you will in future send your letters by the last on this side Hellas, and not to this side. I shall be poor creature, and requires comforts that I can dispense with. He is very sick of his travels, but you must not believe his account of the country; he sighs for ale, and idleness, and a wife, and the devil knows what besides. All have not been disappointed or disgusted. I have lived with the highest and the lowest. I have been for days in a Pacha's palace, and have passed many a night in a cow-house, and I find the people impolite and kind. I have also passed some time with the principal Greeks in the Morea and Lacedavis, and, though inferior to the Turks, they are better than the Spaniards, who, in their turn, excel the Portuguese. Of Constantinople you will find many descriptions in different travels; but Lady Wortley errs strangely when she says, 'St. Paul's would cut a strange figure by St. Sophia's.' I have been in both, surveyed them inside and outside. St. Sophia is undoubtedly the most interesting from its immense antiquity, and the circumstantiality of all the Greek emperors, from Justinian, having been crowned there, and nothing uncertain to this day. Besides the Turkish sultans, who attend it regularly. But it is inferior in beauty and size to some of the mosques, particularly 'Soeleman,' &c., and not the tower of the Belvedere. On the other hand, (I speak like a Cockney.) However, I prefer the Gothic cathedral of Seville to St. Paul's, St. Sophia's, and any religious building I have ever seen.

"The walls of the Seraglio are like the walls o

Newstead gardens, only higher, and much in the same order; but the ride by the walls of the city, and the view of nature or art which yielded an impression like the prospect on each side from the Seven Towers to the end of the Golden Horn.

"Now for England. I am glad to hear of the progress of 'English Bards,' &c.,--of course, you observed I have made great additions to the new edition. Have you received my picture from Sande's, Vigo lane, London? It was finished and paid for long before I left England: pray, send for it. You seem to be a mighty reader of magazines: where do you pick up all this intelligence, quotations, &c., &c.? Though I was happy to obtain my seat without the assistance of Lord Carlisle, I had too many years to keep with a man who declined interfering as my relation on that occasion, and I have done with him, though I regret distressing Mrs. Leigh, poor thing! I hope she is happy.

It is my opinion that Mr. B. * * * ought to marry Miss Olivier, but, alas! it is impossible: our next is to repair it, if in our power. The girl is his equal: if she were his inferior, a sum of money and provision for the child would be some, though a poor compensation; as it is, he should marry her. I will have no gay deceivers on my estate, and I shall not allow my tenants a privilege I do not permit myself, that of debauching each other's daughters. God knows I have been guilty of many excesses; but, as I have laid down a resolution to reform, and lately kept it, I expect this Lothario to follow the example, and begin by restoring this girl to society, or, by the word of my father, he shall hear of it. Pray take some notice of Robert, who will miss his master; poor boy, he was very unwilling to return. I trust you are well and happy. It will be a pleasure to hear from you.

"Believe me, yours very sincerely,
"BYRON.

"P. S. How is Joe Murray?"

"P. S. I opened my letter again, to tell you that Fletcher has mentioned to another gentleman he has come into the Morea, I have taken him with me, contrary to the intention expressed in my letter."

LETTER LX.

TO MRS. BYRON.

"Athens, July 25, 1810.

"Dear Mother,

"I have arrived here in four days from Constantinople, which is considered as singularly quiet, particularly for the season of the year. You know I entered the Grecian summer; which, however, is a perfect frost compared with Malta and Gibraltar, where I reposed myself in the shade last year, after a gentle gallop of four hundred miles, without interference, through Portugal, Spain, Sardinia, Greece, and Albania. I am at Athens again, a place which I think I prefer, upon the whole, to any I have seen.

"My next movement is to-morrow into the Morea, where I shall probably remain in month of two, and then return to winter here, if I do not advance my plans which, however, are very variable, as you may suppose; but none of them verge to England."

"The Marquis of Sligo, my old fellow-colleague, is here, and wishes to accompany me into the Morea. We shall go together for that purpose. Lord S. will afterward pursue his way to the capital; and Lord D., having the west part of the Morea, considering that, will let you know what he does next, o which at present he is not quite certain. Malta is my perpetual post-office, from which my letters are forwarded to all parts of the habitable globe--by the by, I have now been in Asia, Africa, and the east of Europe, and, indeed, made the most of my time without hurrying over the most interesting scenes of the ancient world. Fletcher, after having been toasted, and roasted, and baked, and grilled, and eaten by all sorts of creeping things, begins to philosophize, is grown a refined as well as resigned character, and promises at his return to become an ornament to his own parish, and a very prominent person in the future family pedigree of the Fletcher's, whom I take to be Goths by their accomplishments, Greeks by their acuteness, and ancient Saxons by their appetite. He (Fletcher) begs leave to send his kindest thoughts, and wishes (though I do not) that his ill-written and worse-spelled letters have never come to hand; as for that matter, there is no great loss in either of our letters, saving and except that I wish you to know we are well, and warm enough at the present writing. God knows. You must not expect long letters at present, for they are written with the sweat of my brow, I assure you. It is rather singular that Mr. H. has not written a syllable since my departure. Your letters I have mostly received, as well as others; from which I conjecture that the man of law is either angry or busy. I trust you like Newstead, and agree with your neighbors; but, you know, sixteen months: why do you not get it? My suite, consisting of two Turks, two Greeks, a Lutheran, and the nondescript Fletcher, are making so much noise that I am glad to sign myself. Yours, &c., &c., &c."

LETTER LXI.

TO MRS. BYRON.

"Paris, July 3, 1810.

"Dear Madam,

"In four days from Constantinople, with a favorable wind, I arrived in the fringe of the island of Ceos, from whence I took a boat to Athens, where I met my friend the Marquis of Sligo, who, ex pressed a wish to proceed with me as far as Corinth. At Corinth we took the steamer for Tripoli, at Patras, where I had some business with the consul, Mr. Strange, in whose house I now write. He has rendered me every service in his power since I quitted Malta on my way to Constantinople, whence I have written you before. In a few days I visit the Pacha at Tripoli, make the tour of the Morea, and return again to Athens, which at present is my head-quarters. The heat is at present intense. In England if it reaches 90°, you are all on fire; the other day, in travelling between Athens and Megara, the thermometer was at Yet I feel no inconvenience; of course I am much bronzed, but I live temperately, and never enjoyed better health.

"Before I left Constantinople, I saw the Sultan, (with Mr. Adair,) and the interior of the mosques, things which are impossible to translate. Mr. Hobhouse is gone to England: I am in no hurry to return, but have no particular communications for your country, except my surprise at Mr. Hanson's silence, and my desire that he will remit regularly. I suppose this arrangement has been made with regard to Wymondham and Rochdale. Malta is my post-office, or to Mr. Strane, consul-general, Patras, Morea. You complain of my silence—I have written twenty or thirty times within the last year, never less than twice a month, and often more. If my letters do not arrive, you must not conclude that we are eaten, or that there is a war, or a pestilence, or famine: neither must you credit silly reports, which I dare say you have in Notta, as usual. I am very well, and neither more nor less happy than I usually am; except that I am very glad to be once more alone, for I was sick of my companion,—not that he was a bad one, but because my nature leads me to solitude, and that every day adds to this disposition. If I chose, here are many men who would wish to join me—one wants me to go to Egypt, another to Asia, of which I have seen enough. The greater part of Greece is already my own, so that I shall only go over my old ground, and look upon my old seas and mountains, the only acquaintances I ever found improve me.

"I have a tolerable suite—a Tartar, two Albanians, an interpreter, besides Fletcher; but in this country these are easily maintained. Adair received me wonderfully well, and indeed I have no complaints against any one. Hospitality here is necessary, for inns are not. I have lived in the houses of Greeks, Turks, Italians and English—to day in a palace, to-morrow in a cow-house; this day with the Pacha, the next with a shepherd. I shall continue to write briefly, but frequently, and am glad to hear from you; but you fill your letters with things from the papers, as if English papers were not found all over the world. I have at this moment a dozen before me. Pray take care of my books, and believe me,

"My dear Madam, yours very faithfully,

"BYRON."
zone forth into that world, and walk about there in monstrous disguises, in the garb of guardsmen, lawyers, parsons, fine gentlemen, and such other masquerade dresses. So, I here shake hands and cut with all these busy people, none of whom write to me. Indeed, I asked it not; and here I am, a poor traveller and heathenish philosopher, who hath perambulated the greatest part of the Levant, and seen a great quantity of very improbable land and sea, and, after all, am no better than when I set out—Lord help me!

"I have been out fifteen months this very day, and I believe my concerns will draw me to England soon; but of this I will apprise you regularly from Malta.

On all points, Hobhouse will inform you, if you appear anxious as to our adventuring. I have seen old English papers up to the 15th of May. I see the Lady of the Lake advertised. Of course it is his old ballad style, and pretty. After all, Scott is the best of them. The end of all scribble is to amuse, and he certainly succeeds there. I long to read his new romance.

"And how does 'Sir Edgar?' and your friend, Bluid? I suppose you are involved in some literature, if this is my way to despatch a brother of the quill. I suppose you won't allow me to be an author, but I content you all, you dogs!—I do.

"You don't know D——, do you? He had a farce ready for the stage before I left England, and asked me for a prologue, which I promised, but sailed in such a hurry, I never penned a couplet. I am afraid to ask after his drama, for fear it should be damned—Lord forgive me for using such a word—but the pit, sir, you know, the pit—they will do those things in spite of merit. I remember this farce from a curious circumstance. When Drurylanke's mistress—the ogre, my lady Sheridan and his son lost the few remaining shillings they were worth, what doth my friend D—— do? Why, before the fire was out, he writes a note to Tom Sheridan, the manager of this combustible concern, to inquire whether this farce was not converted into fuel, with about two thousand other unactable manuscripts, which of course were in great peril, if not actually consumed. Now, was not this a chance opportunity for using such a word as nothing to it. While the poor distracted manager was bewailing the loss of a building only worth £3,000,000, together with two hundred thousand pounds of rags and ties—er in the tiring rooms, Blue-beard's tresses, and all that—in comes a note from a searching author, requiring at his hands two acts and odd scenes of a farce!

Dear H., remind Drury that I am his well-wisher, and let Scrope Davies be well attired towards me. I look forward to meeting you at Newstead, and renewing our old champagne evenings with all the glee of anticipation. I have written by every opportunity, and expect responses as regular as those of the liturgy, and somewhat longer. As it is impossible for a man in his senses to hope for happy days, let us at least look forward to merry ones, which come nearest to the other in appearance, if not in reality; and in such expectations I remain, &c."

LETTER LXIV.

TO MISS BYRON.

Athens, January 14, 1811.

"MY DEAR MADAM,

"I seize an occasion to write as usual, shortly, but frequently, as the arrival of letters, where there exists no regular communication, is, of course, very precarious. I have lately made several at all tours of some hundred or two miles about the Morea, Atrebata, &c., as I have finished my circuit to Troad, Constantinople, &c., and am returned down again to Athens. I believe I have mentioned to you more than once, that I swam (in imitation of Leandri) though without his laudable example, from Sestos to Abydos. Of this, and all other particulars, F., with whom I have sent home with papers, &c., will apprise you. I cannot find that he is any loss, being tolerably master of the Italian and modern Greek languages, which I am studying with a master,—I can order and discourse more than enough for a reasonable man. Besides the perpetual lamentations after beef and beer, the stupid, bigoted contempt for every thing foreign, and insurmountable incapacity of securing even a few words of any language, rendered him, like all other English servants, an incumbrance. I do assure you, the plague of speaking for him, the comforts he required, (more than myself by far,) the pilârs, (a Turkish dish of rice and meat,) which he could not eat, the wines which he could not drink, the beds where he could not sleep, and the long lists of calamities, such as no Englishman, not even an American, &c., which assailed him, would have made a lasting source of laughter to a spectator, and inconvenience to a master. After all, the man is honest enough, and, in Christendom, capable enough; but in the world of letter for letter, and Bavarian soldiers, my Tartars and Janizary, worked for him and us too, as my friend Hobhouse can testify.

"It is probable I may steer homewards in spring; but to enable me to do that, I must have remittances. My own funds would have lasted me very well; but I was obliged to assist a friend, who, I know, will pay me; but in the mean time, I am out of pocket. At present, I have no sources except a winter's voyage, even if I were otherwise tired of travelling; but I am so convinced of the advantages of looking at mankind instead of reading about them, and the bitter effects of staying at home with all the narrow prejudices of an islander, that I think there should be a law among us to set our young men abroad, for a term, among the few allies our wars have left us.

"Here I see and have conversed with French, Italians, Germans, Danes, Greeks, Turks, Americans, &c., &c., &c.: and, without losing sight of my own, I can judge of the countries and manners of others. Where the author sees the shipwreck of the Janizaries (which, by-the-by, we are a good deal mistaken about in many things,) I am pleased, and where I find her inferior, I am at least enlightened. Now, I might have stayed, smoked in your towns, or fogged in your country, a century, without being sure of this, and without acquiring anything more useful or amusing at home. I keep no journal, nor have I any intention of scribbling my travels. I have done with authorship; and if, in my last production, I have convinced the critics of the world I was something more than they took me for, I am satisfied; nor will I hazard that reputation by a future effort. It is true I have some others in my head, but not in script, but I leave them for those who come after me; and, if deemed worth publishing, they may serve to prolong my memory when I myself shall cease to remember. I have a famous Bavarian artist taking some views of Athens, &c., &c., for me. This will be better than scribbling, a disease I hope myself cured of. I hope, on my return, to lead a quiet, recluse life, but God knows and does best for us all; at least, so they say, and I have nothing to object, as on the whole, I have no reason to complain of my lot. I am convinced, however, that men do more harm to themselves than ever the devil could do them. I trust this will find you well, and as happy as we can be; yes well, at least, be pleased to hear I am so. and yours ever."
LETTER LXV.
TO MRS. BYRON.

"Ithaca, Feb. 28, 1811.

DEAR MADAM,

"As I have received a firman for Egypt, &c., I shall proceed to that quarter in the spring, and I beg you will state to Mr. Hanson that it is necessary to further remittances. On the subject of Newstead I answer, as before, no. If it is necessary to sell, sell Rochdale. Fletcher will have arrived by this time with my letters to that purpose. I will tell you fairly, I have in the first place, no opinion of funded property; if, by any particular circumstances, I shall be led to adopt such a determination, I will at all events, pass my life abroad, as my only tie to England is Newstead, and, that once gone, neither interest nor inclination lead me northward. Competence in your country is ample wealth in the East, such is the difference in the value of money and the abundance of the necessaries of life; and I feel myself so much a citizen of the world, that the spot where I can enjoy a delicious climate, and every luxury, at a less expense than a common college life in England, will always be a country to me; and such are in fact the shores of the Archipelago. This then is the alternative; if I preserve Newstead, I return; if I sell it, I stay away. I have views and intentions since yours of June, but I have written several times, and shall continue, as usual, on the same plan. "Believe me, yours ever, "BYRON."

"P. S. I shall most likely see you in the course of the summer, but, of course, at such a distance, I cannot specify any particular month."

LETTER LXVI.
TO MRS. BYRON.

"Vigo, frigate, at sea, June 25, 1811.

DEAR MOTHER,

"This letter, which will be forwarded on our arrival at Portsmouth, probably about the fourth of July, is begun about twenty-three days after our departure from Malta. I have been two years and a half at sea, and I return to it with much the same feelings which prevailed on my departure, viz., indifference; but within that apathy I certainly do not comprise yourself, as I will prove by every means in my power. You will be good enough to get my apartments ready at Newstead, but don't disturb yourself on any account, particularly mine, nor consider me in any other light than as a visitor. I must only inform you that for a long time I have been restricted to an entire vegetable diet, neither fish nor flesh coming within my regimen; so I expect a powerful stock of potatoes, greens, and biscuit: I drink no wine. I have two servants, middle-aged men, and both Greeks. It is my intention to proceed first to town, to see Mr. Hanson, and thence to Newstead, on my way to Rochdale. I have only to beg you will not forget my diet, which it is very necessary for me to observe. I am well in health, as I have generally been, with the exception of two agues, both of which I quickly got over.

"My plan will so much depend on circumstances, that I shall not venture to lay down an opinion on the subject. My prospects are not very promising, but I suppose we shall wrestle through life like our neighbours; indeed, by H.'s last advices, I have some apprehensions of finding Newstead dismantled by Messrs. Brothers, &c., and it seems determined to force me into selling it, but he will be baffled. I don't suppose I shall be much pestered with visitors; but if I am, you must receive them, for I am determined to have my peace, if possible. I trust to find my library in tolerable order.

"Fletcher is no doubt arrived. I shall separate the mill from Mr. B.'s farm, for his son is too gay a deceiver to inherit both, and place Fletcher in it, who has served me faithfully, and whose wife is a good woman; besides, it is necessary to sober young Mr. B., or he will peeple the parish with bustards. In a word, if he had seduced a dairymaid, he might have found something like an apology; but the girl is his equal, and in high life or low life reparation is made in such circumstances, But I shall not interfeare further than (like Bonaparte) dismembering Mr. B.'s kingdom, and erecting part of it into a principality for field-marshall Fletcher! I hope you govern my little empire and its sad load of national debt with a wary hand. To drop my metaphor, I beg leave to subscribe myself, yours, &c."

"P. S. This letter was written to be sent from Portsmouth, but, on arriving there, the squadron was ordered to the Sore, from whence I shall forward it. This I have not doubt you will be alarmed by the interval mentioned in the letter being longer than expected between our arrival in port and my appearance at Newstead."

LETTER LXVII.
TO MR. HODGSON.

"Vigo, frigate, at sea, June 25, 1811.

"In a week, with a fair wind, we shall be at Portsmouth, and on the 2d of July, I shall have completed (to-day) two years of peregrination, from which I am returning with as little emotion as I set out. I think upon the whole, I was more grieved at leaving Greece than England, which I am impatient to see, simply because I am tired of a long voyage."

"Indeed, my prospects are not very pleasant. Embarrassed in my private affairs, indifferent to public, solitary without the wish to be social, with a body a little encumbered by a succession of fevers, but a spirit, I trust, yet unbroken, I am returning home without a hope, and almost without a desire. The first thing I shall have to encounter will be a lawyer, the next a creditor, then billiers, farmers, surveyors, and all the agreeable attachments to estates out of repair and contested coal-pits. In short, I am sick and sorry, and when I have not repaired my irrepairable affairs, away I shall march, either to campaign in Spain, or back again to the East, where I can at least have cloudless skies and a cessation from impertinence."

"I trust to meet, or see you, in town or at Newstead, whenever you can make it convenient. I suppose you are in love and in poetry, as usual. That husband, H. Drury, has never written to me, and I have a little repaired my irrepairable affairs, away I shall march, either to campaign in Spain, or back again to the East, where I can at least have cloudless skies and a cessation from impertinence."

"If you see him, tell him I have a letter from Tucker, a regimental chirurgeon and friend of his who prescribed for me.  and is a very poor fellow among you: had it not been for his patrons, he might now have been in very good plight, shoe (not verse) making; but you have made him immortal with a vengeance. I write this supposing poetry, patronage, and strong waters to have been the death of him. If you are in town or about the beginning of July, you will find me at Donarton's in Albemarle-street, glad to see you.

I have an Imitation of Horace's Art of Poetry ready for Cawthorn, but don't let that deter you, for I shan't inflict it upon you. You know I never read my rhymes to visitors. I shall quit town in a few days for Notts, and thence to Rochdale. I shall send this the moment we arrive in harbor, that is a week hence.

"Yours ever sincerely,"

LETTER LXIX.

MR. HENRY DRURY.

"Volage frigate, of Cadiz, July 17, 1811."

"My Dear Drury,"

"After two years' absence (on the second) and some odd days, I am approaching your country. The day of our arrival you will see by the outside date of my letter. At present, we are becalmed comfortably, close to Brent Harbor; I have never been as near it since I left Duck Puddle. • • • We left Malta thirty-four days ago, and have had a tedious passage of it. You will either see or hear from or of me, soon after the receipt of this, as I pass through town to repair my irreparable affairs; and hence I want to go to Notts, and raise rents, and to Lancs, and sell collierries, and back to London and pay debts; for it seems I shall neither have coal or comfort till I go down to Rochdale in person.

"I have brought home some marbles for Hobhouse; for myself, four ancient Athenian skulls, • • • • • a piece of sarcophagi: a phial of attic hemlock: • • • four live tortoises, greyhounds, (died on the passage:) two live Greek servants, one an Athenian, t' other a Yaniote, who can speak nothing but Romance, and Italian; and myself, as Moses in the Vicar of Wakefield says, slily, and I may say it too, for he has as little sense as I, to boast of my expedition as he had of his to the fair."

"I wrote to you from the Cyanean Rocks, to tell you I had swum from Sestos to Abydos; have not received my letter? • • • • • Hodgson, I suppose is four deep by this time. What would he have given to have seen, like me, the real Pharsalos, where I robbed the Bishop of Crissa of a book of geography; but this I only call plagiarism, as it was done within an hour's ride of Delphi."

LETTER LXIII.

TO — BOLTON, Esq.

"Newstead Abbey, August 12, 1811.

"Sir,

"I enclose a rough draft of my intended will, which I beg to have drawn up as soon as possible in the firmest manner. The alterations are principally made in consequence of the death of Mrs. Byron. I have only to request that it may be got ready in a short time, and have the honor to be,

"Your most obedient humble servant.

LETTER LXXI.

TO DR. PIGOT.

"Newport Pagnell, August 2, 1811.

"My Dear Doctor,

"My poor mother died yesterday! and I am on my way from town to attend her to the family vault. I heard one day of her illness, the next of her death. — Thank God her last moments were most tranquil. I am told she was in little pain, and not aware of her situation. — I now feel the truth of Mr. Gray's observation, "That we can only have one mother." Peace be with her! I have to thank you for your kindness, and shall be happy to extend your benefit to Liverpool and Chester, at least, I shall endeavor.

"If it will be any satisfaction, I have to inform you that in November last the editor of the Scone will be tried for two different libels on the late Mrs. B. and myself, (the decease of Mrs. B. makes no difference in the proceedings,) and as he is guilty, by his very foolish and unfounded assertion, of a breach of privilege, he will be prosecuted with the utmost rigor.

"I inform you of this, as you seem interested in the affair, which is now in the hands of the attorney-general.

"I shall remain at Newstead the greater part of this month, where I shall be happy to hear from you, after your two years' absence in the East.

"I am, dear Pigot, yours very truly,

"BYRON."

TO MR. SCROPE DAVIES.

"Newstead Abbey, August 7, 1811.

"My Dear Davies,

"I am almost desolate—left almost alone in the world— I had but you, and H., and M., and let me enjoy the survivors while I can. Poor M., in his letter at Friday, speaks of his intended contest for Cambridge, and a speedy journey to London. Write or come, but come if you can, or one or both.

"Yours ever.

"SIR,

"I enclose a rough draft of my intended will, which I beg to have drawn up as soon as possible in the firmest manner. The alterations are principally made in consequence of the death of Mrs. Byron. I have only to request that it may be got ready in a short time, and have the honor to be,

"Newstead Abbey, August 12, 1811.

"Directions for the contents of a will to be drawn up immediately.

"The estate of Newstead to be entailed (subject to certain deductions) on George Anson Byron, heir at law, or whoever may be the heir at law on the death of Lord B. The Rochdale property to be sold in part or whole, according to the debts and legacies of the present Lord B.

"To Nicho. Giraud, Athens, subject of France, but born in Greece, the sum of seven thousand pounds sterling, to be paid from such parts of Rochdale, Newstead, or elsewhere, as may enable the said Nicho. Giraud, (resident at Athens and Malta in the year 1810,) to receive the above sum on his attaining the age of twenty-one years.

"To William Fletcher, Joseph Murray, and Demetrius Zografos, (native of Greece,) servants, the sum of fifty pounds per annum, each, for their natural lives. To Wm. Fletcher the mill at Newstead, on condition that he payeth the rent, but not subject to the caprice of the lordlord. To Robert Rushen the sum of fifty pounds per annum, for life, and a further sum of one thousand pounds on attaining the age of twenty-five years.

"To J. Hanson, Esq., the sum of two thousand pounds sterling.

"The claims of S. B. Davies, Esq., to be satisfied on proving the amount of the same.

"The body of Lord B. to be buried in the vault of the garden of Newstead, without any ceremony or burial-service whatever, or any inscription, save his name and age. His dog not to be removed from the said vault.

"My library and furniture of every description to my friends J. Can Hobhouse, Esq., and S. B. Davies, Esq., my executors. In case of their decease, the Rev. J. Bache of Southwell, Notts, and R. C. Dallas, Esq., of Mortlake, Surrey, to be executors.

"The produce of the sale of Wymondham in Norfolk, and the late Mrs. B.'s Scotch property, to be appropriated in aid of the payment of debts and legacies.

"This is the last will and testament of me the Rt. Hon. George Gordon Lord Byron, Baron Byron of Rochdale in the county of Lancaster. — I desire that my body may be buried in the vault of the garden of Newstead, without any ceremony or burial-service whatever, and that no inscription save my name and age, be written on the tomb or tablet; and it is my will that my faithful dog may not be removed from the said vault. To the performance of the above particular desire I trust the attention of my executors hereinafter named.

"If in papers be lost, (which they generally do,) Demetrius Zografos of Athens, is at the head of the Athenians parties of the Greek insurrection. He was my servant in 1806, 1810, 1811, 1814, at different intervals in those years, (for I left him in Greece when I went to Constantinople,) and accompanied me to England in 1811; he returned to Greece, April 1815, a clever, but not apparently an enterprising man; but the assurances must men. LETTER LXXV.

TO MR. BOLTON.

"Newstead Abbey, August 20. 1811.

Sir,

"The witnesses shall be provided from among my tenants, and I shall be happy to see you on any day most convenient to yourself. I forgot to mention that it must be specified by codicil, or otherwise, that my body is on no account to be removed from the vault where I have directed it to be placed; and, in case any of my successors within the entail, (from bigotry, or otherwise,) might think proper to remove the cardboard, such proceeding shall be attended by forfeiture of the estate, which, in such case, shall go to my sister, the Hon. Augusta Leigh and her heirs on similar conditions. I have the honor to be, sir,

"Your very obedient, humble servant,

deed the blows followed each other so rapidly that I am yet stupid from the shock, and though I do eat, and drink, and talk, and even laugh, at times, yet I can hardly persuade myself that I am awake, did not every morning convince me mournfully to the contrary. I shall now waive the subject,—the dead are at rest, and none but the dead can be so.
"You will find—poor Houbouse,—Matthews was the 'god of his idolatry;' and if intellect could exalt a man above his fellows, no one could refuse him preeminence. I knew him most intimately, and valued him proportionally, but I am recuring
so little talk of life and the living.
"If you should feel a disposition to come here, you will find 'beet and a sea-coal fire,' and not un-ge nerous wine. Whether Otway's two other requites for an Englishman or not, I cannot tell, but probably one of them. Let me know when I may expect you, that I may tell you when I go and when return. I have not yet been to Lanes. *
Davies has been here, and has invited me to Cambridge for a week in October, so that pervadventure, we may encounter glass to glass. His gaiety (death cannot mar it) has done me service; but,
and after all, ours was a hollow laughter.
"You will write to me. I am solitary, and I never felt solitude irksome before. 'Your anxiety about the critique on * * * book is amusing; as it was anonymous, certes, it was of little consequence: I wish it had produced a little more confusion, being a lover of literary malice. Are you doing nothing?
writing nothing? printing nothing? why not your Satire on Methodism? the subject (supposing the public to be blind to merit) would do wonders. Besides, it would be as well for a destined deacon to prove his orthodoxy. It really would give me ple-sure to see you properly appreciated. I say really, as, being an author, my humanity might be suspected.

"Believe me, dear H. yours always."

LETTER LXXXVIII.

TO MR. DALLAS.

"Newstead, August 21, 1811.

"Your letter gives me credit for more acute feelings than I possess: for though I feel tolerably miserable, yet I am at the same time subject to a kind of hysterical merriment, or rather laughter without merriment, which I can neither account for nor conquer; and yet I do not feel relieved by it; but an indifferent person would think me in excellent spirits. 'We must forget these things,' and have recourse to our old selfish comforts, or rather comfortable selfishness. I do not think I shall return to London immediately, and shall therefore accept freely what is offered courteously,—your mediation between me and Murray. I don't think my name will answer the purpose, and you must be aware that my plaguy Satire will bring the north and south Grub-streets down upon the Pilgrimage;—
but, nevertheless, if Murray makes a point of it, as you coincide with him, I will do it daringly; so let it be entitled 'By the Author of English Bards and Scotch Reviewers.' My remarks on the Romaic, &c., once intended to accompany the Hints from Horace, shall go along with the other, as being indeed more appropriate, also the smaller poems now in my possession, with a few selected from those published in Hobhouse's Miscellany.
I have found among my poor mother's papers all my letters to Thornhill,—in particular of some length from Albion. From this, if necessary, I can work up a note or two on that subject. As I keep no journal, the letters written on the spot are the best. But of this anon, when we have denitely arranged.

"Has Murray shown the work to any one? He may—no) will have no traps for applause. Of course there are little things I would wish to aitar, and perhaps the two stanzas of a buffooning cast on London's Sunday are as well left out. I much wish to avoid identifying Harold's character with mine, and that, in sooth, is my second objection to my name appearing in the title-page. When you have made arrangements as to time, size, type, &c., favor me with a reply. I am giving you a universe of trouble, which thanks cannot alone for. I made kind of a proo aplogy for my skepticism at the head of the MS., which, on recollection, is so much more like an attack than a defence, that, haply, it might better be omitted.—perpend, pronounce. After all,
I fear Murray will be in a scrape with the orthodox;
but I cannot help it, though I wish him well through it. As for me, 'I have supped full of criticism,' and I don't think that the most dismal treatise will stir and rouse my 'tell of hair' till
'The man wood do come to Dunsinane.'

"I shall continue to write at intervals, and hope you will pay me in kind. How does Pratt get on, and the rather, I hope, Joe Blackett's prize. You killed that poor man among you, in spite of your Ionian friend and myself, who would have saved him from Pratt, poverty, present poverty, and post-poverty, of a bushel. Humor was the worst punishment at his calling; but then he is a divine subject for subscription and biography; and Pratt, who makes the most of his dedications, has inscribed the volume to no less than five families of distinction.
"And worry you don't like Harry White: with a great deal of cant, which in him was sincere, (indeed, it killed him as you killed Joe Blackett.)
certes, there is poetry and genius. I don't say this for account of my simile and rhyme, &c., but surely he was beyond all the Bloomfields and Blacketts, and their collateral cobblers, whom Loft and Pratt have or may kidnap from their calling into the service of the trade. You must excuse my Sippance, for I am writing I know not what, to escape from myself.
Hobhouse is gone to Ireland. Mr. Davies has been here on his way to Harrowgate.

"You did not know Mr. Matthews; he was a man of most astonishing powers, as he sufficiently proved at Cambridge, by carrying off more prizes and fellowships, against the ablest candidates, than any other graduate on record; but a most decided atheist, indeed, noisily so, but precisely proclaimed his principles in all societies. I knew him well, and feel a loss not easily to be supplied to myself—to Hobhouse never. Let me hear from you,
and

"Believe me, &c."
the last man whose censure (however eager to avoid it) I would deprecate by clandestine means. You will therefore retain the MS. in your own care, or, if it must needs be shown, send it to another. Though not very patient of censure, I would gain obtain fairly any little praise my rhymes might deserve at all events not by exhortation and the humble solicitations of a bandied-about MS. I am sure a little consideration will convince you it would be wrong.

If you determine on publication, I have some small poems ready published, a few sonnets, and a short dissertation on the literature of the modern Greeks, (written at Athens, which will come in at the end of the volume. And if the present poem should succeed, it is with attention, at some subsequent period, to publish some selections from my first work,—my Satire,—another nearly the same length, and a few other things, with the MS. now in your hands, in two volumes. But of these hereafter. You will apprise me of your determination.

"am, sir, "Your very obedient, &c."

LETTER LXXX.
TO MR. DALLAS.

"N. crowned Abbey, August 23, 1881.

"Being fortunately enabled to frank, I do not spare scribbling, having sent you packets within the last ten days. I am passing solitary, and do not expect my agent to accompany me to Rochdale before the second week in September, a day which perplexes me, as I wish the business over, and not a present welcome employment. I sent you exordiums, annotations, &c., for the forthcoming quarto, if quarto it is to be; and I also have written to Mr. Murray my object to sending the MS. to Juvenal, but allowing him to show it to any others of the calling. Hobhouse is among the types already; so, between his prose and my verse, the world will be decently drawn upon for its paper money and patience. Besides all this, my "Imitation of Horace," is gasping for the press at Crawthorn's, but I am hesitating as to how to do; and the when, the single or the double, the present or the future. You must excuse all this, for I have nothing to say in this lone mansion but of myself, and yet I would willingly talk or think of aught else.

"What are you about to do? Do you think of perching in Cumberland, as you opined when I was in the metropolis? Do you mean to bring it about, why not occupy Miss • • • 's "Cottage of Friendship," late the cot of Clobber Joe, for whose death you and others are answerable? His 'Orphan Daughter' (pathetic Pratt!) will, certes, turn out a shoemaker Sappho. Have you no remorse? I think that elegant address to Miss Dallas should be inscribed on the cenotaph which Miss • • • means to stitch to her memory.

"The newspapers seem much disappointed at his majesty's not dying, or doing something better. I presume it is almost over. If parliament meets in October, I shall be in town to attend. I am also invited to Cambridge for the beginning of that matter (but cannot yet junt to Rochdale, New Matthews is gone, and Hobhouse in Ireland, I have hardly one left there to bid me welcome, except my inviter. At three-and-twenty I am left alone, and what more can we be at seventy? It is true, I am young enough to begin again, but with whom can I retrace the laughing part of life? It is odd how few of my friends have died a quiet death,—I mean, 'in their bed.' But a quiet life is of more consequence. Yet one loves squabbling and jostling better than yawning. This last word admonishes me to relieve you from your very truly, &c."

LETTER LXXXI.
TO MR. DALLAS.

"Newstead Abbey, August 27, 1881.

"I was so sincere in my note on the late Charles Matthews, and do feel myself so totally unable to do justice to his talents, that the passage must stand for the very reason you bring against it. To him all the men I ever knew were pygmies. He was an intellectual giant. It is true I loved W. better; he was the earliest and the dearest, and one of the few could never repent of having loved; but in ability—ah! you did not know Matthews!

"Child Harold" may wait and welcome—books are never the worse for delay in the publication. So you have got our heir, George Anson Byron, and his sister with you.

---

"You may say what you please, but you are as of the murderers of Blackett, and yet you won't allow Harry White's genius. Setting aside his bigotry, he surely ranks next to Chatterton. It is astonishing how little he was known; and at Cambridge no one thought or heard of such a man, till his death rendered all notice useless. For my own part, I should have been most proud of such an acquaintance; his very prejudices were respectable. There is a sucking epic poet at Granta, a Mr. Townsend, protégé of the late Cumberland. Did you ever hear of him and his 'Armageddon'? I think his plan (the man I don't know) borders on the sublime; though, perhaps, the anticipation of the 'Last Day,' (according to you Nazarenes), is a little too daring: at least, it looks like telling the Lord what he is to do, and might remind an ill-natured person of the line:

"And fools rush in where angels fear to tread.'

"But I don't mean to cavil, only other folks will, and he may bring all the lambs of Jacob Behmen about his ears. However, I hope he will bring it to a conclusion, though Milton is in his way.

"Write to me—I date on gossip—and make a bow to Ju— and shake George by the hand for me; but, take care, for he has a sad sea-paw.

"P. S. I would ask George here, but I don't know how to amuse him; all my horses were sold when I left Newmarket, and I have not had time to replace them. Nevertheless, if he will come down and shoot in September, he will be very welcome; but he must bring a gun, for I gave away all mine to All Pacha, and other Turks. Dogs, a keeper, and plenty of game, with a very large manor, I have—a lake a boat, house-room, and neat wines."
LETTER LXXXIII.

TO MR. MURRAY

Newstead Abbey, Sept. 9, 1811.

"The time seems to be past when (as Dr. Johnson said) a man was certain to 'hear the truth from his bookseller,' for you have paid me so many compliments, that if I was not the veriest scribbler on earth, I should feel affronted. As I accept your compliments, it is but fair I should give equal or greater credit to your objections, the more so, as I believe them to be well founded. With regard to the political and metaphysical parts, I am afraid I can alter nothing; but I have high authority for my errors in that point, for even the Aeneid was a political poem, and written for a political purpose; and as to my unlucky opinions on subjects of more importance, I am too sincere in them for recantation. On Spanish affairs I have said what I saw, and every day confirms me in that notion of the result formed on the spot; and I rather think honest John Bull is beginning to come round again to that sobriety which Massena's retreat had begun to reëst from its centre—the usual consequence of unusual success. So you perceive I cannot alter the sentiments; but if there are any alterations in the structure of the verseification you would wish to be made, I will tag rhymes and turn stanzas as much as you please. As for the 'orthodox,' let us hope they will be only as to abuse—you will forgive the one, if they will do the other. You are aware that any thing from my pen must expect no quar- ter, on many accounts; and as the present publication is of a nature very different from the former, we must not be squeune.

"You have given me no answer to my question—tell me fairly, did you show the MS. to some of your corps?—I sent an introductory stanza to Mr. Dallas, to be forwarded to you; the thing else will open too abruptly. The stanzas had better be numbered in Roman characters. There is a disquisition on the literature of the modern Greeks, and some smaller points, to come in at the foot of the page. These every thinghouse and Newstead, but will be sent in time. If Mr. D. has lost the stanza and note annexed to it, write, and I will send it myself. You tell me to add two Cantos, but I am about to visit my collatires in Lancashire on the 15th inst, which is so unpoetical an employ- ment that I need say no more. I am, sir,

"Your most obedient, &c."

LETTER LXXXIV.

TO MR. DALLAS

Newstead Abbey, September 7, 1811.

"As Gifford has been ever my Magnus Apollo, any approbution, such as you mention, would, of course, be more welcome than 'all Bokara's vaunted gold, than all the gems of Samarkand.' But I am sorry the MS. was shown to him in such a manner, and I had written to Murray to say as much, before I was aware that it was too late.

"Your objection to the expression 'central line.'

* * *

I can only meet by saying that, before Childe Harold left England, it was his full intention to traverse Persia, and return by India, which he could not have done, but passing the equinoctial line, the other errors you mention, I must correct in a progress through the press. I feel honored by the wish of such men that the poem should be continued, as to that, I must resort to Greece and Asia; I must have a warm sun and a blue sky; I cannot describe scenes so dear to me by a sea-coal fire. I had projected an additional Canto when I was in the Tread and Constantinople, and if I saw them again, it would go on; but the exigencies and sensibilities and sensations I have neither heart, nor voice to proceed. I feel that you are all right as to the metaphysical part; but I also feel that I am sincere, and that if I am only to write, 'ad captandum vulgus,' I might as well edit a magazine at once, or spin canzonettas for Vauxhall.

My work must make its way as well as it can; I know I have every thing against me—angry poets and prejudices; but if the poem is a poem, it will surmount these obstacles, and if not, it deserves its fate. Your friend's Ode I have read—it is no great compliment to pronounce it far superior. On the same subject, or to the merits of the new chan- cellor. It is evidently the production of a man of taste, and a poet, though I should not be willing to say it was fully equal to what might be expected from the son of 'Horace Junior.' You must be well satisfied with it, and that is more than I would do for any other Ode of the present day.

I am very sensible of your good wishes, and, indeed, I have need of them. My whole life has been at variance with propriety, not to say decency; my circumstances are become involved; my friends are dead or estranged, and my existence a dreary road. In others I have lost my guilt, pride, and passion, and have, in Wingfield a friend only, but one whom I could have wished to have proceeded in his long journey. Matthew's was indeed an extraordinary man; it has not entered into the heart of a stranger to conceive such a man; there was the stamp of immor- tality in all he said and did; and now what is he when we see such men pass away and be no more—men whose special design was to display what the Creator could make his creatures, gathered into corruption, before the maturity of minds that might have seen the pride of posterity, what are we to conclude? For my part I am bewildered. To me he was much more than a man. His whole philosophy, his whole house, was 'Hoghouse,' and myself, formed a coterie of our own at Cambridge and elsewhere. Davies is a wit, and man of the world, and feels as much as such a character can do; but not as Hoghouse has been. Davies, who is not a scribbler, has always beaten us all in the war of words, and by his colloquial pow- ers at once delighted and kept us in order. If I, and myself, have had the worst of the battle, I am not to blame, for I am only the man of the hour; and even M. yielded to the dashing vivacity of S. D. But I am talking to you of men, or boys, as if you cared about such beings.

"I expect mine agent down on the 14th to proceed to Lancashire, where, I hear from all quarters, I have a very valuable property in coals, &c. I then intend to accept an invitation to Cambridge in Oc- tober, and shall, perhaps, run up to town, I have understood that you are going to Wales, Dorest, and Chester; but I must be a man of business. I am quite alone, as these long letters sadly testify. I am a perce, by referring to your letter, that the Ode is from a friend; make my thanks to him. His muse is worthy a nobler theme. You will write, as usual, I hope. I wish you a good evening.

LETTER LXXXV.
TO R. C. DALLAS, ESQ.

Newstead Abbey, September 10, 1811.

"Dear Sir,

"I rather think in one of the opening stanzas of Childe Harold there is this line—

"'Tis said at times the sullen hour would start.'

Now, a line or two after, I have a repetition of the epithet 'sullen reverie;' so (if it be so) let us have 'speechless reverie,' or 'silent reverie;' but, at all events, do away the recurrence.

"Yours, ever,

"P. S. Perhaps, as 'reverie' implies silence of itself, wayward, downcast, gloomy, wrinkling, joyless, may be better epithets.'"

LETTER LXXXVI.
TO MR. MURRAY.

"Newstead Abbey, Notes, September 14, 1811.

"Sir,

"Since your former letter, Mr. Dallas informs me that the MS. has been submitted to the perusal of Mr. Gifford, and contrary to my wishes, as Mr. D. could have explained, and as my own letter to you did, in fact, explain, with my motives for objecting to such a proceeding. Some local domestic events, of which you are probably aware, prevented my letter from being sent before; indeed, I hardly conceived you would so hastily thrust my productions into the hands of a stranger, who could be as little pleased by receiving them, as their author is at their being offered in such a manner, and to such a man.

"My address, when I leave Newstead, will be to 'Rochdale, Lancashire;' but I have not yet fixed the day of departure, and I will apprise you when ready to set off.

"You have placed me in a ridiculous situation, but it is past, and nothing more is to be said on the subject. You hinted to me that you wished some alterations to be made; if they have nothing to do with politics or religion, I will make them with great readiness.

"I am, sir, &c., &c.

LETTER LXXXVII.
TO R. C. DALLAS, ESQ.

"Newstead Abbey, Sept. 18, 1811.

"My dear Sir,

"My agent will not be here for at least a week, and even afterwards my letters will be forwarded to Rochdale. I am sorry that Murray should gross on my account, though that is better than the anticipation of applause, of which men and books are generally disappointed.

"The notes I sent are merely matter to be divided, arranged, and published for notes hereafter, in proper places; at present I am too much occupied with earthly cares, to waste time or trouble upon rhyme, or its modern indispensables, annotations.

"Pray let me hear from you, when at leisure. I have written to abuse Murray for showing the MS. to Mr. Gifford; who must certainly think it was done by my wish, though you know the contrary.

"Believe me, yours ever,

"Newstead Abbey, Sept. 18, 1811.

"Dear Sir,

"I send you a motto—

"'Univera est una spectaculum mirabile.'

"If not too long, I think it will suit the book. The passage is from the French volume, a great favorite with me, which I picked up in the Archipelago. I don't think it is well known in England. Murray is the author, but it is a work sixty years old.

LETTER LXXXIX.
TO MR. MURRAY.

"Newstead Abbey, Sept. 19, 1811.

"I return the proof, which I should wish to be shown to Mr. Dallas, who understands typographical arrangements much better than I can pretend to do. The printer may place the notes in his own way, or any way, so that they are out of my way; I care nothing about types or margins.

think, the more it disquiets me; so I will say no more about it. It is bad enough to be a scribbler, without having recourse to such shifts to extort praise, or deprecate censure. It is anticipating, it is begging, kneeling, adulating—the devil! the devil! all without my wish, and contrary to my express desire. I wish Murray had been tied to Payne's neck when he jumped into the Paddington Canal, and so tell him—that is the proper receptacle for publishers and to be cut up afterwards, which is all that notes are generally good for. They were written at Athens, as you will see by the date.

"I am yours, \\
\"B."

LETTER XCII.

TO MR. DALLAS.

"Newstead Abbey, Sept. 21, 1811.

"I have shown my respect for your suggestions by adopting them; but I have made many alterations in the first proof, over and above; as, for example:

"Oh Thos., in Helias demd' of heavenly birth,
\"Son, shewn full oft by later lyres on earth,
\"Yet there I've wonder'd by the roused lift."

and so on. So I have got rid of Dr. Louth, and 'drunk to boot,' and very glad I am to say so. I have also Sullivanized the line as herefores, and in short I have been quite comfortable. "Pray, write; you shall hear when I remove to Lancs. I have brought you and my friend Juvanell Hodgson upon my back, on the score of revelation. You are forrnt, but he is quite glowing; and if he takes half the pains to save his own soul, which he volunteers to redeem mine, great will be his reward hereafter. I honor and thank you both, but am convinced by neither. Now for notes. Besides those I have sent, I shall send the observations on the Edinburgh Reviewer's remarks on the modern Greek, an Albanian song in the Albanian (now Greek) language, specimens of modern Greek from their New Testament, a comedy of Goldoni's translated, one scene, a prospectus of a friend's book, and perhaps a song or two, all in Romaine, besides their Pater Noster; so there will be enough, if not too much, for what I have already sent. Have you received the 'Noctes Atticae'? I sent also an annotation on Portugal. Hobhouse is also forth-coming." for to-morrow, &c. I am as comfortable in my creed as others, inasmuch as it is better to sleep than to awake.

I have heard nothing of Murray; I hope he is ashamed of himself. He sent me a complimetary epistle, with a request to alter the two, and finish another canto. I sent him as civil an answer as if I had been engaged to transcribe the sheet, declined altering any thing in sentiment, but offered to tag rhymes, and mend them as long as he liked.

I will write from Rochdale when I arrive, if my affairs allow me; but I shall be so busy and savage all accessible, with the whole set, that my letters will be as pettish as myself. If so, lay the blame on coal and coal-heavers. Very probably I may proceed to town by way of Newstead on my return from Lanes. I mean to be at Cambridge in November, so that at all events we shall be neyer. I will not apologize for the trouble I have given, and do give you, though I ought to do so; but I have worn my pollute periods, and can only say that I am very much obliged.

Believe me, yours always,

BYRON.

LETTER XCV.

TO R. C. DALLAS, DSB.

"Newstead Abbey, Oct. 10, 1811.

DEAR SIR,

"Stanzas xxi, xxvi, xxix, though crossed, must stand with their alterations. The other three are cut out to your wishes. We must, however, have a repetition of the proof, which is the first. I will write soon.

"P. S. Yesterday I returned from Lanes."

* The following are the xx stanzas as they originally stood. These appearing below, as xxi, xxii, xxix, appear in the poem, in an altered tone, numbered as xxi, xxvi, xxix, of the first canto. The stanzas marked below xvi, xxv, and xxvi, were those omitted:

XXIV.

Behold the ball where vision was late convened;
Oh, thou dispensing wise British eye! Who
With clarion light Pooh-Lap, to a band,
A little flood that sends interminably;
There sits in portico read arrayed, and by
His side is hugging a soulable scroll,
Where blazoned grace a name spelt Wollaston;
And amity signatures adorn the roll,
Wherein the univin points and languish with all his sod.

Wheeled by sanguine tongues of laureate strain;

Conversation is the dainty theme apprised
That failed the knightings of Marlowe’s done;
Of brains (if brains they bad) been legended,
And turned a nation’s shallow to the west;
For well I wot, when first the news did come,
That Vintier’s field by taws was tow;
For paragraph en paper space had room,
Such press termed for our triumphant host, a Court; Chancellers, and the like in Morning Post.

LETTER XCVI.

TO MR. DALLAS.

"Newstead Abbey, Oct. 11, 11.

"I have returned from Lanes, and ascertained that my property there may be made very valuable, but various circumstances very much circumscribe my exertions at present. I shall be in town on the 21st in March, for the remainder of my term, and perhaps at Cambridge before the end of this month; but of my movements you shall be regularly apprized. Your objections I have in part done away by alterations, as far as the matter will allow, but I have sent you two or three additional stanzas for both " Setting." I have been again shocked with a death, and have lost one very dear to me in happier times: but I have almost forgot the taste of grief, and "supped full of horrors" till I have become callous, nor have I tear left for an event which five years ago would have bowed down my head to the earth. It seems as though I were to experience in my youth the greatest misfortune in life.

My friend fall around me, and I shall be left a lonely tree before I am withered. Other men can always take refuge in their families; I have no resource but my own reflections, and I present no prospect here or elsewhere, except the selfish satisfaction of surviving my betters. I am indeed very wretched, and you will excuse my saying so, as you know I am not apt to cant of sensibility.

"Instead of tiring yourself with my concerns, I should be glad to hear of your plans of retirement. I suppose you would not like to be wholly shut out of society? Now I know a large village or small town, about twelve miles off, where your family would have the advantage of very genteel society, without the hazard of being annoyed by mercantile influence; where you would meet with men of information and independence; and where I have friends to whom I should be proud to introduce you. There are besides, a coffee-room, assemblies, &c., &c.,

To question ought, once more with transport leapt,
And hit the devil’s quill again, and aware
With such a piece soon should be kept,
Then burst the blatant beast, and rant and ragged, and—about!!

XXVIII.

Thus unto heaven appealed the people; heaven
Who loves the ignes of our generous king,
Deserved that we our生成 fue were forgiven,
Inquiry should be held about the thing;
But mercy checked the bales beneath her wing;
And so they spared our face so spurned we them.
(Where was the pity of our song for Virgili?)
Yet leaves, not blood, should the law condemn.
Then Sisyphus, ye gallant knaves and bless your judge’s plagues.

XXIX.

But ever more that martial symbol met,
British scions, Chats I at thy name;
And falls in office at the sultan’s awe,
And fate would blush, if blush they could, for shame.
How will posterity the deed proclaim?
Will not our own and fellow nation soon
To view those champions chested of fame,
By foes in fight o’ertrodden, yet victors born,
Where won their finger points through many a cent’ry year.

Originally, the "little page" and "peasant" of Childe Harold, some of these lines were afterward erased:

Of and of that there was a benchman page,
A peasant boy, who served the master well;
And often would his trust none engage Childe Borne’s war when his proud he’s—'At will
With solemn thoughts that he did abstain’t to tend.
Then would be smile on him, and Alway I smiled,

"A blatant beast," a figure for the mock I think first used by Spenser in his "Adventures of an Atom." Homer has the "Beta unius mors luporum." Captain in England, fortunate enough, the illusionist faculty have not been long.

1 In this MS. the names "Robins," and "Report," had been successively inserted here and struck out again.
which bring people together. My mother had a house there some years, and I am well acquainted with the name of Southwark, the name of this little commonwealth. Lastly, you will not be very remote from me; and though I am the very worst companion for young people in the world, this object does not apply to you, whom I may let see frequently. Your expenses, too, would be such as best suit your inclinations, more or less, as you thought proper; but very little would be requisite to enable you to enjoy all the gayeties of a country. Could you not quit a corner or bustling as you liked, and certainly as well situated as on the Lakes of Cumberland, unless you have a particular wish to pictureque.

Tell me, my dear friend in town? You have promised me an introduction.—You mention having consulted some friends on the MSS.—Is not this contrary to our usual way? Instruct Mr. Murray not to allow his shopman to call the work 'Child of Harrow's Pilgrimage'!!! as he has done to some of my a-tonished friends, who wrote to inquire after my sanity on the occasion, as well they might. I have heard nothing of Murray, whom I scolded heartily. I write very facetiously to you, and there is not enough!—Cathorn must be kept back with the Hints.—I hope he is getting on with Hobhouse's quarto. Good evening.

"Yours ever, and—"
LETTERS.

When shall you be at Cambridge? You have anted, I think, that your friend Bland is returned from Holland. I have always had a great respect for his talents, and for all that I have heard of his character; but of me, I believe, he knows nothing, except that he heard my sixth-form repetitions ten months together, at the average of two lines morning, and those never perfect. I remembered him and his ‘Slaves’ as I passed between Capes Matapan, St. Angelo, and his Isle of Cerigo, and I always bewailed the absence of the Anthology.
I suppose he will now translate Vondel, the Dutch Shakespeare, and ‘Gysbert van Amstel’ will easily be accommodated to our stage in its present state;
and I presume he saw the Dutch poem, where the love of Pyramus and Thisbe is compared to the passion of Christ; also the love of Lucifer for Eve, and other varieties of Low Country literature. No doubt you will think me eager to talk of such tings but they are all in black and white and good repute on the boards of every canal from Amsterdam to Alkmaar.

Yours ever,

B.

P. S. My Poesy is in the hands of its various publishers; but the ‘Hints from Horace,’ (to which I have subjoined some average lines on Methodism, and ferocious notes on the vanity of the triple Editory of the Edin. Annual Register,) my ‘Hints,’ I say, stand still; and why? I have not a friend in the world (but you and Drury) who can construe Horace’s Latin, or my English, well enough to adjust them for the press, or to correct the proofs in a grammatical way. So that, unless you have bowels when you return to town, (I am too far off to do it for myself,) this ineffable work will be lost to the world for—I don’t know how many weeks.

‘Child Harold’s Pilgrimage’ must wait till Murray’s is finished. He is making a tour in Mid-dlessex, and is to return soon, when high matter may be expected. He wants to have it in quartos, which is a cursed unsaleable size; but it is pestilent long, and one must obey one’s bookseller. I trust Murray will pass the Paddington Canal without being seduced by Payne and Mackinlay’s example,
—I say Payne and Mackinlay, supposing that the partnership held good. Drury, the villain, has not written to me; I am never (as Mrs. Lumpkin says to Tony,) to be gratified with the monster’s dear wild notes.

‘So you are going (going indeed!) into orders.
You must make your peace with the Eclectic Reviewers—they accuse you of impiety, I fear, with injustice. Demetrius, the ‘Singer of Cities,’ is here, with ‘Gilpin Horner.’ The painter is not necessary, as the portraits he already painted are (by anticipation) very like the new animals.—
Write, and send me your ‘Love Song’—but I want ‘paulo majora’ from you. Make a dash before you are a deacon, and try a dry publisher.

Yours always,

B.”

TO R. C. DALLAS, ESQ.

‘S. St. James street, Oct. 21, 1811.

DEAR SIR,

‘I have already taken up so much of your time that there needs no excuse on your part, but a great many on mine, for the present interruption. I have altered the passages according to your wish. With this note I send a few stanzas on a subject which has lately occupied much of my thoughts. They refer to the death of one to whose name you are stranger, and, consequently, cannot be interested.
I mean them to complete the present volume. They relate to the same person whom I have mentioned in Canto II., and at the conclusion of the poem.

‘I by no means intend to identify myself with Harold, but to deny all connexion with him. If in parts I may be thought to have drawn from myself, believe me it is but in parts, and I shall not own even that. As to the ‘Monastico donce,’ I e., I thought those circumstances would suit him as well as any other, and I could describe what I had seen better than I could invent. I would not be such a fellow as I have made my hero—for the world.

TO MR. MOORE.

"Sir,

"Your letter followed me from Notts. to this place, which will account for the delay of my reply. Your former letter I never had the honor to receive;—be assured, in whatever part of the world it had found me, I should have deemed it my duty to return and answer it in person.

"The advertisement you mention, I know nothing of. At the time of your meeting with Mr. Jeffrey, I had recently entered College, and remember to have heard and read a number of squibs on the occasion, and from the recollection of these I derived all my knowledge on the subject, without the slightest idea of 'giving the lie' to an address which I never beheld. When I put my name to the production which has occasioned this correspondence, I became responsible to all whom it might concern,—to explain where it requires explanation, and where insufficiently or too sufficiently explicit, at all events to satisfy. My situation leaves me no choice; it rests with the injured and the angry to obtain reparation in their own way.

"With regard to the passage in question, you were certainly not the person towards whom I felt personally hostile. On the contrary, my whole thoughts were engrossed by one whom I had reason to consider as my worst literary enemy, nor could I foresee that his former antagonist was about to become his champion. You do not specify what you would wish to have done: I can neither retract nor apologize for a charge of falsehood which I never advanced.

"In the beginning of the week, I shall be at No. 8, St. James's street. Neither the letter nor the friend to whom you stated your intention ever made their appearance.

"Your friend Mr. Rogers, or any other gentleman delegated by you, will find me most ready to adopt any conciliatory proposition which shall not compromise my own honor—or, failing in that, to make the atonement you deem it necessary to require.

"I have the honor to be, sir,

"Your most obedient, humble servant,

TO MR. MOORE.

"Sir,

"I received your letter of the 29th of Oct., and am happy to know that your health is better than I have heard from you for some years. I hope you will not forget me when you return to London, and will visit me at my house in St. James's.

"I have the honor to be, sir,

"Your obedient servant,

"BYRON."
LETTER CVII.

TO MR. MOORE.

8, St. James’s street, Nov. 26, 1811.

SIR,

“As I should be very sorry to interrupt your Sunday’s engagement, if Monday, or any other day of the ensuing week, would be equally convenient to yourself and friend, I will then have the honor of accepting his invitation. Of the professions of esteem with which Mr. Rogers has honored me, I cannot but feel proud, though undeserving. I should be wanting to myself if insensible to the praise of such a man; and should my approaching interview with him and his friend lead to any degree of intimacy with both or either, I shall regard our past correspondence as one of the happiest events of my life. I have the honor to be,

Your very sincere and obedient servant,

BYRON.”

LETTER CVIII.

TO MR. HARNESS.

8, St. James’s street, Dec. 6, 1811.

“My Dear Harness,

“I will write again, but don’t suppose I mean to say such a tax on your pen and patience as to expect regular replies. When you are inclined, write; when silent, I shall have the consolation of knowing that you are better employed. Yesterday, Bland and I called on Mr. Miller, who, on hearing you were out, call on Bland to-day or to-morrow. I shall certainly endeavor to bring them together. You are censorious, child; when you are a little older, you will learn to dislike every body, but abuse nobody.

“With regard to the person of whom you speak, your own good sense must direct you. I never pretend to advise, being an implicit believer in the old proverb. This present frost is detestable. It is the first I have felt these three years, though I longed for one in the oriental summer, when no such thing is to be had, unless I had gone to the top of Hymettus for it.”

“Do read mathematics,—I should think X plus Y at least as amusing as the Curse of Kehama, and much more intelligible. Master S.’s poems are, in fact, what parallel lines might be—viz., prolonged ad infinitum without meeting any thing half so absurd as themselves."

“Coleridge is lecturing. ‘Many an old fool,’ said Hannibal to some such lecturer, ‘but such as this, never.’”

“Ever yours, &c.”
The present ministers are to continue, and his majesty does continue in the same state. So there's folly and madness for you both in a breath.

"I never heard of but one man truly fortunate, and he was Beaumarchais, the author of Figaro, who buried two wives and gained three lawsuits before he was thirty.

"And now, child, what art thou doing? Reading, trust. I want to see you take a degree. Remember, this is the most important period of your life; and don't disappoint your papa and your aunt, and all your kin—besides myself. Don't you know that all male children are begotten for the express purpose of being graduates? and that even I am an A. M., though I became so by the Public Orator only to return. Besides, you are to be a priest; and to con- fuse Sir William Drummond's late book about the Bible, (printed, but not published,) and all other inofficious whatever. Now leave master H.'s gin, and master S.'s Supplies, and becomes as immovable as Cambridge can make you.

"You see, Mio Carissimo, what a pestilent correspondent I am likely to become; but then you shall be as quiet at Newstead as you please, and I won't disturb your studies, as I do now. When do you fix the day, that I may take you up according to contract? Hodgson talks of making a third in our partnership: but we can't do him, inside or out. Positively you shall go with me as was agreed, and don't let me have any of your politeesse to H. on the occasion. I shall manage to arrange for both with a little contrivance. I wish H. was not quite so fat, and we should pack better. Has he left off vicious liquors? He is an excellent soul; but I don't think water would improve him, at least internally. You will want to know what I am doing—cheering tobacco.

"You see nothing of my allies, Scrope Davies and Matthews—they don't suit you; and how does it happen that I—who am a pipkin of the same pottery—continue in your good graces? Good night,—I will go in the morning.

"Dec. 9.—In a morning I am usually aﬄuent, and to-day is as sombre as myself. Rain and mist are worse than a soroce, particularly in a beef-eating and beer-drinking country. My bookseller, Carthorne, has just left me, and tells me, with a most important face, that he is in treaty for a novel of Madame D'Arblay's, for which one thousand guineas are asked; he wants me to read the MS. (if he obtains it,) which I shall do with pleasure; but I should be very cautious in venturing an opinion on her whose Cecilia Dr. Johnson superintended. If he sends it to me, I shall put it into the hands of Rogers and Moore, who are true men of taste. I have filled the sheet, and beg your pardon; I will not do it again. I shall, perhaps, write again, but if not, believe, silent or scribbling, that I am,

"My dearest William, ever, &c."

chest in the preface, and handles the literal interpretation very roughly. I do not think Mr. W. * * has lent it me, and I confess, to me it is worth fifty Watsons.

"You and Harness must fix on the time for the letter. I can command mine at your wish, unless any thing particular occurs in the interim * *; Bland dines with me on Tuesday to meet Moore. Coleridge has attacked the 'Pleasures of Hope,' and all other pleasures whatsoever. Mr. Rogers was present, and heard himself, indirectly named by the lecturer. We are going in a party to hear the new Art of Poetry by this reformed ascetic; and were I one of these poetical luminaries, I should be glad to see any of the public, or the man of lectures, I should not hear him without an answer. For, you know, 'an' man will be beaten with brains, he shall never keep a clean doublet.' Campbell will be desperately annoyed. I never saw a man (and of him I have seen very little) so sensitive:—want a happy temperamental! I am sorry for it; what can he fear from criticism? I don't know if Bland has seen Miller, who was to call on him yesterday.

"To-day is the Sabbath,—a day I never pass pleasantly, but at Cambridge; and, even there, the organ is a sad remembrancer. Things are stagnant just now, as they were retrospectively at tat all very well. Hobhouse writes, and writes, and writes, and is an author. I do nothing but eschew tobacco. I wish parliament were assembled, that I may hear the debates on some day in the week. On this point I am not very sanguine. I have many plans; sometimes I think of the East again, and dearly beloved Greece. I am well, but weakly. Yesterday Kinnaird told me I looked very ill, and sent me home happy.

"You will never give up wine;—see what it is to be thirty; if you were six years younger you might leave off any thing. You drink and repent, you repent and drink. Is Scrope still in error? Do you think your views are invalid? And how does Hinde with his cured chemistry? To Harness I have written, and he has written, and we have all written, and have nothing now to do but write again, till death splits up the pen and the scribbler.

"The Alfred has three hundred and fifty-four candidates for six vacancies. The cook has run away and left us liable, which makes our committee very impatient. Master Brook, our head-steward, has the gown, and our new cook is none of the best. I speak from report,—for what is cookery to a legumino-ous-eating ascetic? So now you know as much of your visit to Newstead as I do; but no doubt all other vacancies are still there, and they may dress their dishes in their own way for me. Let me know your determination as to Newstead, and believe me,

"Yours ever,

"Newstead."
sc. once revised, but for the pleasure of the thing. If my worthy publisher wanted a second opinion, I should be only too willing to give it, for after having read it, I must admit that it was the most idle and unmeaning trash I have seen for a long time. I have had frequent letters from Wm. Harness, and you are silent; certes, you are not a schoolboy. However, I have the consolation of knowing you are better employed, viz. reviewing. You don’t deserve that I should add another syllable, and I won’t.

"Yours, &c.,"

"F. S. I only wait for your answer to fix our meeting."

LETTER CXII.

TO MR. HARNES.

"8, St. James’s street, Dec. 15, 1811.

"I wrote you an answer to your last, which on reflection, pleases me as little as it probably has pleased yourself. I will not wait for your rejoinder: but proceed to tell you, that I had just then been greeted with an epistle of yours, full of his petty grievances, and this at the moment when (from circumstances it is not necessary to enter upon) I was bearing up against recollections to which his imaginary sufferings are as a scratch to a cancer. These things combined, put me out of humor with him and all his kind. That part of my life has been a perpetual struggle against affections which embittered the earliest portion; and though I flatter myself I have in a great measure conquered them, yet there are moments (and this was one) when I am as foolish as formerly. I never said so much before, nor had I said this now, if I did not suspect myself of having been rather savage in my letter, and wish to inform you thus much of the cause. You know I am not one of your dolorous gentlemen: so now let us laugh again.

"Yesterday I went with Moore to Sydenham to visit Campbell. He was not visible, so we jogged homeward, merrily enough. To-morrow I dine with Rogers, and am to hear Coleridge, who is a kind of rage at present. Last night I saw Kemble in Coriolanus: he was glorious, and exerted himself wonderfully. By good luck, I got an excellent place in the best part of the house, which was more than overdoing. Clare and Delaware, who were there on the same speculation, were less fortunate. I saw them by accident,—we were not together. I wished for you, to gratify your love of Shakespeare and of white and fine acting to its fullest extent. Last week I saw an exhibition of a different kind in a Mr. Coates, at the Haymarket, who performed Lohario in a damned and damnable manner.

"I told you of the fate of B. and H. in my last. So much for these sentimentalists, who console themselves in their stews for the loss—the never to be recovered loss—the despair of the refined attachment of a couple of drabs! You censure my life, Harness: when I can bare myself with these men, my elders and my betters, I really begin to conceive myself a monument of prudence—a walking statue —without feeling or failing; and yet the world in general hath given me a proud pretentiousness over them in profusion. Yet I like the men, and, God knows, ought not to condemn their aberrations. But I own I feel grateful when they dignify all this by the name of love—romantic attachments for things marketable for a dollar!

"Dec. 16.—I have just received your letter. I feel a kind of kindness very reply. I wrote yesterday, will, I hope, account for the tone of the former, though it cannot excuse it. I do like to hear from you,—more than like. Next to seeing you, I have no greater satisfaction. But you have duties and greater pleasures, and I should regret to take a moment from either. If it was to call—day, but I have not seen him. The circum stance you mention at the close of your letter is another proof in favor of L. y ou may judge of mankind. Such you will always find them.—selfish, distrustful. I except none. The cause of this is the state of society. In the world, every one is to stir for himself— it is useless, perhaps selfish, to expect any thing from his neighbor. But I do not think we are born of this disposition; for friendship as a schoolboy, and love enough before twenty.

"I went to see a boy; he keeps me in town, where I don’t wish to be at present. He is a good man, but totally without conduct. And now, my dear William, I must wish you good morrow, and remain ever most sincerely and affectionately yours, &c."

LETTER CXIII.

TO MR. MOORE.

December 11, 1811.

"MY DEAR MOORE,

"If you please, we will drop our formal monosyllables, and adhere to the appellations sanctioned by our godfathers and godmothers. If you make it a point, I will withdraw your name; at the same time there is no occasion, as I have this day postponed your election 'sine die,' till it shall suit your wishes to be among us. I do not say this from any awk-wardness the casure of your proposal would occa-sion to me, but simply such is the state of the case; and, indeed, the longer your name is up, the stronger will become the probability of acceptance, and your votes more numerous. Of course you will decide—your wish shall be my law. If my zeal has already outrun discretion, pardon me, and attribute my offensiveness to an excusable motive, and I think you will find the cause of my wish you would go down with me to Newstead. Hodgson will be there, and a young friend, named Harness, the eldest and dearest I ever had, from the third form at Harrow to this hour. I can promise you good wine, and, if you like shooting, a manor of four thousand acres, fires, books, your own free will, and my own very indifferent company. 'Balan tea, vina,' &c. &c. &c.

"Hodgson will plague you, I fear, with verse; for my own part, I will conclude, with Martial, 'nil recitabo tibi,' and surely the last inducement is not the least. Ponder on my proposition, and believe me, my dear Moore, Yours ever,

BYRON"

LETTER CXIV.

TO MR. MOORE.

January 29th.

"MY DEAR MOORE,

"I wish very much I could have seen you; I am in a state of ludicrous tribulation.

"Why do you say that I dislike your poetry? I have expressed no such opinion, either in print or elsewhere. In scribbling, myself, it was necessary for me to find fault, and I fixed upon the trite charge of immorality, because I could discover no other, and was so perfectly qualified, in the innocence of my heart, to pluck that mote from my neighbor’s eye.

"I feel very, very much obliged by your approba-tion, but, at this moment, praise, even your praise, passes by me like the idle wind. I meant and mean to send you a copy the moment of publication; but now, I can think of nothing but damned, deceitful, delightful woman, as Mr. Lis ton says in the Knight of Snowdon.

"Believe me, my dear Moore,

"Ever yours, most affectionately,

BYRON"
LETTER CXV.

TO ROBERT RUSHTON.

"B. St. James's street, Jan. 21, 1812.

"Though I have no objection to your refusal to carry letters to Mealey's, you will take care that the letters are taken by Spearo at the proper time. I have also to observe, that Susan [a servant in the family] is to be treated with civility, and not insulted by any person over whom I have the smallest control, or, indeed, by any one whatever, while I have the power to protect her. I am truly sorry to have any subject of complaint against you; I have too good an opinion of you to think I shall have occasion to repeat it, after the care I have taken of you, and my favorable intentions in your behalf. I see no occasion for any communication whatever, between you and the women, and wish you to occupy yourself in preparing for the situation in which you will be placed. If a common sense of decency cannot prevent you from conducting yourself towards them with rudeness, I should at least hope that your own interest, and regard for a master who has never treated you with unkindness, will have some weight.

"Yours,

BYRON.

P. S.—I wish you to attend to your arithmetic, to occupy yourself in surveying, measuring, and making yourself acquainted with every particular relative to the land of Newstead, and you will write to me one letter every week, that I may know how you go on."

LETTER CXVI.

TO ROBERT RUSHTON.

"B. St. James's street, Jan. 29, 1812.

"Your refusal to carry the letter was not a subject of remonstrance; it was not a part of your business; but the language you used to the girl was (as she stated it) highly improper.

"You say that you also have something to complain of; then state it to me immediately; it would be very unfair, and very contrary to my disposition, not to hear both sides of the question.

"If anything has passed between you before or since my last visit to Newstead, do not be afraid to mention it. I am sure you would not receive me, though she would. Whatever it is, you shall be forgiven. I have not been without some suspicions on the subject, and am certain that, at your time of life, the blame could not attach to you. You will not consult any one, as to your answer, but write to me immediately. I shall be more ready to hear what you have to advance, as I do not remember ever to have heard a word from you before against any human being, which convinces me you would not maliciously assert an untruth. There is not any one who can do the least injury to you while you conduct yourself properly. I shall expect your answer immediately.

"Yours,

BYRON.

LETTER CXVII.

TO MR. HODGSON.

"B. St. James's street, Feb. 18, 1812.

"Dear Hodgson,

"I sent you a proof. Last week I was very ill and confined to bed with stone in the kidney, but I am now quite recovered. If the stone had got into my heart instead of my kidneys, it would have been all the better. The women are gone to their relatives, after many attempts to explain what was already too clear. However, I have quite recovered that also, and only wonder at my folly in expecting my own strumpets from the general corruptions—albeit, a two months' weakness is better than ten years. I have one request to make, which is, never to send a woman again in any letter to me, or even allude to the existence of the sex. I have even read a word of the feminine gender; it must all be propria que maribus.

"In the spring of 1813 I shall leave England for ever. Every thing in my affairs tends to this, and my inclinations and health do not discourage it. Neither my habits nor constitution are improved by your customs or your climate. I shall find employment in making myself a good oriental scholar. I shall retain a mansion in one of the fairest islands, and retrace, at intervals, the most interesting portions of the East. In the mean time, I am adjusting my concerns, which will (when arranged) leave me with wealth—sufficient even for home, but enough for a principality in Turkey. At present they are involved, but I hope, by taking some necessary but unpleasant steps, to clear every thing. Hobhouse will bring me letters every day, which I shall very glad to see him; and, perhaps, you will come up and 'drink deep ere he depart,' if not. Mahomet must go to the mountain; but Cambridge will bring sad recollections to him, and worse to me, though for very different reasons. I believe the only human being that ever loved me in truth and entirely was of, or belonging to, Cambridge, and, in that, no change can now take place. There is one consolation in a death—where he sets his seal, the impression can neither be melted or broken, but endureth for ever.

"Yours always,

"B."

LETTER CXVIII.

TO MASTER JOHN COWELL.

"B. St. James's street, Feb. 12, 1812.

"My dear John,

"You have probably long ago forgotten the writer of these lines, who would, perhaps, be unable to recognize yourself, from the difference which must naturally have taken place in your stature and appearance since he last saw you running through the streets of Portugal, Spain, Greece, &c., &c., for some years, and have found so many changes in your return, that it would be very unfair not to expect that you should have had your share of alteration and improvement with the rest. I write to request a favor of you: a little boy of eleven years, the son of Mr. *, my particular friend, is about to become an Etonian, and I should esteem any act of protection or kindness to him as an obligation to myself; let me beg of you then to take some little notice of him at first, till he is able to shift for himself.

"I was happy to hear a very favorable account o you from a schoolfellow a few weeks ago, and should be glad to learn that your family are as well as I wish them to be. I presume you are in the upper school; as an Etonian, you will look down upon a Homo man; but I never, even in my boyish days, disputed your superiority, which I once experienced in a cricket match, where I had the honor of making one of eleven, who were beaten to their hearts' content by your college in one innings.

"Believe me to be, with great truth, &c., &c.
LETTERS.

LETTER CXIX.

TO MR. ROGERS.

"February 4, 1813.

My Dear Sir,

With my best acknowledgments to Lord Holland, I have to offer my perfect concurrence in the propriety of the question previously to be put to ministers. If their answer is in the negative, I shall, with his lordship's approbation, give notice of a motion for a Committee of Inquiry. I would also gladly avail myself of his most able advice, and any information or documents with which he might be pleased to intrust me, to bear me out in the statement of facts it may be necessary to submit to the House.

From all that fell under my own observation during my Christmas visit to Newcastle, I feel convinced that, if conciliatory measures are not very soon adopted, the most unhappy consequences may be apprehended. Nightly outrage and daily depredation are already at their height, and not only the masters of frames, who are obnoxious to the account of their occupation, but persons in no degree connected with the malcontents or their oppressors, are liable to insult and pillage.

I am very much obliged to you for the trouble you have taken on my account, and beg you to believe me ever your obliged and sincere, &c."

LETTER CXX.

TO LORD HOLLAND.

"St. James's street, Feb. 25, 1813.

My Lord,

"With my best thanks, I have the honor to return the Notts. letter to your lordship. I have read it with attention, but do not think I shall venture to avail myself of its contents, as my view of the question differs in some measure from Mr. Coldham's. I hope I do not wrong him, but his objections to the bill appear to me to be founded on certain apprehensions that he and his coadjutors might be mistaken for the 'original advisers' (to quote him) of the measure. For my own part, I consider the manufacturers as a much injured body of men, and that the efficacy of the bill depends on the parts of artisans who have enriched themselves by those practices which have deprived the frame-workers of employment. For instance,—by the adoption of a certain kind of frame, one man performs the work of seven—six are thus thrown out of business. But it is to be observed that the work thus done is far inferior in quality, hardly marketable at home, and hurried over with a view to exportation. Surely, my lord, however we may rejoice in any improvement in the arts which may be beneficial to mankind, we must not allow mankind to be sacrificed to improvements in mechanism. The maintenance and well-doing of the industrial poor is an object of greater consequence to the community than the enrichment of a few monopolists by any improvement in the implements of trade, which deprives the workman of his bread, and renders the laborer 'unworthy of his hire.' My own motive for opposing the bill is founded on its palpable injustice, and its certain inefficacy. I have seen the state of these miserable men, and it is a disgrace to a civilized country. Their excesses may be condemned, but cannot be subject of wonder. The effect of the present bill would be to drive them into actual rebellion. The few words I shall venture to offer on Thursday will be founded upon these observations, not from my own observations on the spot. By previous inquiry, I am convinced these men would have been restored to employment, and the county to tranquility. It is, perhaps, not yet too late, and is surely worth the trial. It can never or too late to employ force in such circumstances. I believe your lordship does not coincide with me entirely on this subject, and most cheerfully and sincerely shall I submit to your superior judgment and experience, and take some other line of argument against the bill, or be silent altogether, should you deem it more advisable. Condemning, as every one must condemn, the conduct of these wretches, I believe in the existence of grievances which call rather for pity than punishment. I have the honor to be, with great respect, my lord,

"Your lordship's

"Most obedient and obliged servant"

LETTER CXXI.

TO MR. HODGSON.

"St. James's street, March 5, 1812.

My Dear Hodgson,

'We are not answerable for reports of speeches in the papers,—they are always given incorrectly and on this occasion more so than usual. From the debate in the Commons on the same night. The Morning Post should have said eighteen years. However, you will find the speech, as spoken, in the Parliamentary Register, when it comes out. Lords Holland and Grenville, particularly the latter, paid me some high compliments in the course of their speeches, as you may have seen in the papers, and Lords Eldon and Harrowby answered me. I have had many marvellous eulogies repeated to me since, in person and by proxy, from divers persons ministerial—yea ministerial—as well as oppositionists; of them I shall only mention Sir F. Burdett. He says, it is the best speech by a lord since the 'Lord knows when,' probably from a fellow-feeling in the sentiments. Lord H. tells me I shall beat them all if I persevere, and Lord G. remarked that the construction of some of my periods are very like Burke's! And so much for vanity. I spoke very violent sentences with a sort of modest impudence, abused every thing; and every body, and put the Lord Chancellor very much out of humor; and I may believe what I have not lost any character by the experiment. As to my delivery, loud and fluent enough, perhaps a little theatrical, I could not recognize myself of any one else in the newspapers.

"My poesy comes out on Saturday. Hobhouse is here; I shall tell him to write. My stone is gone for the present, but I fear is part of my habit. We all talk of a visit to Cambridge. "Yours ever."

"B."

LETTER CXXII.

TO LORD HOLLAND.

"St. James's street, March 6, 1812.

My Lord,

"May I request your Lordship to accept a copy of the thing which accompanies this note? You

*"Childe Harold. To his sister, Mrs. Leigh, one of the first presentation copies was also sent, with the following inscription in it:—"To Augustus, my dearest niece, and my best friend, who has ever loved me much better than I deserved, this volume is presented by her brother, and most affectionate brother."

* See his first speech.
have already so fully proved the truth of the first line of Pope's complaint,

'Forgive me to the injured dot which belong,'

that I long for an opportunity to give the lie to the verse that follows. If I were not perfectly convinced that anything I may have formerly uttered in the boisterous rashness of my misplaced resentment had much play been hinted at, as it deserved to make, I should hardly have the confidence—perhaps your lordship may give it a stronger and more appropriate application—to send you a quart of the new scribbler. But I am sorry to observe to-day, is troubled with the gout: if my book can produce a laugh against itself or the author, it will be of some service. If it can set you to sleep, the benefit will be yet greater; and as some facetious personage observed half a century ago, that 'poetry is a mere drug,' I offer you mine as an humble assistant to the can medicinae.' I trust you will forgive this and all my other buffooneries, and believe me to be, with great respect,

'Your lordship's obliged and sincere servant,

'BYRON.'

In relation to the following note of Lord Byron, Mr. Moore says:—

'Not long after the publication of Childe Harold, the noble author paid me a visit, one morning, and, putting a letter into my hands, which he had just received, requested that I would undertake to manage for him whatever proceedings it might render necessary. This letter, I found, had been delivered to him by Mr. Leckie, (a gentleman well known by a work on Sicilian affairs,) and came from a once active and popular member of the fashionable world, Colonel Greville. In pursuance of its purport being to require of his lordship, as author of 'English Bards, &c.,' such reparation as it was in his power to make for the injury which, as Colonel Greville conceived, certain passages in that Satire, reflecting upon his conduct, as manager of the Argyle Institution, were calculated to inflict upon his character. In the appeal of the gallant colonel, there were some expressions of rather an angry cast, which Lord Byron, though fully conscious of the length to which he himself had gone, was but little inclined to brook, and on my returning the letter into his hands, he said, 'To such a letter as that there can be but one sort of answer.' I agreed, however, to trust the matter entirely to my discretion, and I had, shortly after, an interview with the friend of Colonel Greville. By this gentleman, who was then an utter stranger to me, I was received with much courtesy, and with every disposition to bring the affair intrusted to us on an amicable issue. On my promising that the tone of his friend's letter stood in the way of negotiation, and that some obnoxious expressions which it contained must be removed before I could proceed a single step towards explanation, he most readily consented to remove this obstacle. At his request I drew a sketch across the parts I considered objectionable, and he undertook to send me the letter, rewritten, next morning. In the mean time, I received from Lord Byron the following paper for my guidance:

"With regard to the passage on Mr. Way's loss, no unfairness was intended by me—referring to the book; and it is expressly added that the managers were ignorant of that transaction. As to the prevalence of play at the Argyle, it cannot be denied that there were billiards and dice,—Lord B. has been a witness to the use of both at the Argyle Rooms. These, it is presumed, come under the denomination of play. If play be allowed, the President of the Institution can hardly complain of being termed the 'Arbiter of Play;'—on what becomes of his authority?

"Lord B. has no personal animosity to Colonel Greville. A public institution, to which he, himself, was a subscriber, he considered himself to have a right to notice publicly. Of that institution Colonel Greville was the avowed director;—it is too late to enter into the discussion of its merits or demerits.

"Lord B. must leave the discussion of the reparation, for the real or supposed injury, to Colonel G.'s friend, and Mr. Moore, the friend of Lord B.—begging them to recollect that, while they consider Colonel G.'s honor, Lord B. must also maintain his own. If the business can be settled amicably, Lord B. will do as much as can and ought to be done by a man of honor towards concealment;—if not, he must satisfy Colonel G. in the manner most conducive to his further wishes."

In the morning I received the letter, in its new form, from Mr. Leckie, with the annexed note.

‘My Dear Sir,

'I found my friend very ill in bed; he has, however, managed to copy the enclosed, with the alterations proposed, and you may wish to see me in the morning; I shall therefore be glad to see you any time till twelve o'clock. If you rather wish me to call on you, tell me, and I shall obey your summons.

'Yours, very truly,

'G. T. Leckie.'

'With such facilities towards pacification, it is almost needless to add, that there was but little delay in settling the matter amicably.'

LETTER CXXIII.

TO MR. WILLIAM BANKES.

'My Dear Bankes,

'I feel rather hurt (not savagely) at the speech you made to me last night, and my hope is that it was only one of your profane jests. I should be very sorry that any part of my behavior should give you cause to suppose that I think higher of myself, or otherwise of you, than I have always done. I can assure you that I am as much the humblest of your servants as at Trin. Coll.; and if I have not been at home when you favored me with a call, the loss was more mine than yours. In the bustle of buzzing, parties, there is, there can be, no rational conversación; but when I can enjoy it, there is nobody's I can prefer to your own.

'Believe me ever faithfully

'And most affectionately yours,'

'BYRON.'

LETTER CXXIV.

TO MR. WILLIAM BANKES.

'My Dear Bankes,

'My eagerness to come to an explanation has, I trust, convinced you that whatever my unlucky manner might inadvertently be, the change was as amicable as (if intended) it would have been ungrateful. I really was not aware that, while we were together, I had evinced such caprices; that we were not so much in each other's company as I could

LETTER CXXV.

TO LORD HOLLAND.

"My Dear Lord,

"I must appear very ungrateful, and have, indeed, been very negligent, but till last night I was so apprized of Lady Holland's restoration, and I shall call to-morrow to have the satisfaction, I trust, of hearing that she is well.—I hope that neither politics nor gout have assailed your lordship since I last saw you, and that you also are 'as well as could be expected.'

"The other night, at a ball, I was presented by order, to our gracious Regent, who honored me with some conversation, and professed a predilection for poetry. I confess it was a most unexpected honor, and I thought of poor Brummell's adventure, with some apprehensions of a similar blunder. I have now great hope, in the event of Mr. Pye's decease, of 'warming truths at court,' like Mr. Mallett, of indifference. —Consider one hundred marks a year! besides the wine and the disgrace; but then remorse would make me drown myself in my own but before the year's end, or the finishing of my first dithyramb. So that, after all, I shall not meditate our late monarch's death by pen or poison.

"Will you present my best respects to Lady Holland, and believe me hers and yours very sincerely,

NOTE S TO MR. MOORE.

"March 25, 1812.

"Know all men by these present, that you, Thomas Moore stand indicted—no—invited, by special and particular solicitation, to Lady Caroline Lamb's, to-morrow even, at half-past nine o'clock, where you will meet with a civil reception and decent entertainment. Pray, come—I was so examined after you: this morning, that I entreat you to answer in person. Believe me, &c."

"Friday noon.

"I should have answered your note yesterday, but I hoped to have seen you this morning. must consult with you about the day we dined with Sir Francis. I suppose we shall meet at Lady Spencer's to-night. I did not know that you were at Miss Berry's the other night, or I should have certainly gone there.

"As usual, I am in all sorts of scrapes, though none, at present, of a martial description. Believe me, &c."

"May 5, 1812.

"I am too proud of being your friend to care with whom I am linked in your separation, and God knows, I want friends more at this time than at any other. I am 'taking care of myself' to no great purpose. If you knew my situation in every point of view, you would excuse apparent and unintentional neglect.* * * I shill leave town. I think; but do not you leave it without seeing me. I wish you, from my soul, every happiness you can wish yourself; and I think you have taken the road to secure it. Peace be with you! I fear she has abandoned me. Ever, &c."

"May 20, 1812.

"On Monday, after sitting up all night, I saw Bingham launched into eternity, and at three the same day I saw * launched into the country.* I believe in the beginning of time, I shall be down for a few days in Notts. If so, I shall best you up 'en passant' with Hobhouse, who is degenerating like you and everybody else, to keep me off to excesses.

"I meant to have written you a long letter, but I find I cannot. If any remarkable occurs, you will hear it from me—if good; if bad, there are plenty to tell it. In the mean time do you be happy, &c. Ever, &c.

P.S. My best wishes and respects to Mrs. Moore.—She is beautiful. I may say so even to you, Sir I never was more struck with a counte-

and Catholic sovereigns, my curiosity was sufficiently allayed, and my politics being as perverse as my rhymes, I had, in fact, "no business there." To be thus praised by your Sovereign must be gratifying to you: and if that gratification is not alloyed by the communication being made through me, the bearer of it will consider himself very fortunately and sincerely yours,

"Your obliged and obedient servant,

"BYRON."

"P. S. Excuse this scrawl, scratched in a great hurry, and just after a journey."

LETTER CXXXVII.

TO LORD HOLLAND.

"Cheltenham, September 10, 1812.

"My dear Lord,

"The lines* which I sketched off on your hint are still, or rather were, in an unfinished state, for I have just committed them to a flame more decisive than that of Drury. Under all the circumstances, I should hardly wish a contest with Philo-drama—Philo-Durty—Aubert, H., and all the anonymous and synonynomes of the Committee candidates. Seriously, I think you have a chance of something much better; for prologuing is not my forte, and, at all events, either my pride or my modesty won't let me incur the hazard of having my rhymes buried in next month's Magazine, under 'Essays on the Murder of Mr. Percival,' and 'Cures for the Bite of a Mad Dog,' as poor Goldsmith complained of the fate of superior performances.

"I am still sufficiently interested to wish to know the successful candidate; and, among so many, I have no doubt some will be excellent, particularly in an age when writing verse is the easiest of all attainments.

"I cannot answer your intelligence with the 'like comfort,' unless, as you are deeply theatrical, you may wish to hear of Mr. , whose acting is, I fear, utterly inadequate to the London engagement into which the manifes of Covent Garden have lately entered. His figure is fat, his features flat, his voice unmanageable, his action ungraceful, and, as Diggory says, 'I defy him to extort that dog-a-muffin face of his into madness.' I was very sorry to see him in the character of the 'Elephant on the slack rope;' for, when I last saw him, I was in raptures with his performance. But then I was sixteen,—an age to which all London then condescended to subside. After all, much better judges have admired, and may again; but I venture to 'prognosticate a prophecy' (see the Courier) that he will not succeed.

"So, poor dear Rogers has stuck fast on 'the brow of the mighty Helvellyn'—I hope not for ever. My best respects to Lady H.—her departure, with that of my other friends, was a sad event for me, now reduced to a state of the most cynical solitude. 'By the waters of Cheltenham I sat down and drank;' when I remember thee, oh, Grecian Cottage! As for our harps, we hange' them upon the willows that grow thereby! Then they said, 'Sing us a song of Drury Lane,' &c.—but I am dum'd and dreary as the Israelites. The waters have disordered me to my heart's content,—you were 'right as you always are.

"Believe me ever your obliged

"And affectionate servant,

"BYRON."

* Address at the opening of Drury-Lane Theatre.

LETTER CXXXVIII.

TO LORD HOLLAND.

"September 22, 1812.

"My dear Lord,

"In a day or two I will send you something which you will still have the liberty to reject if you dislike it, but you shall have had more time, but I will do my best, but too happy if I can oblige you, though I may offend one hundred scribblers and discerning public.

"Ever yours,

"'Keep my name a secret; or I shall be beset by all the rejected, and perhaps damned by a party.'

LETTER CXXXIX.

TO LORD HOLLAND.

"Cheltenham, September 23, 1812.

"Eeco! I have marked some passages with double readings—choose between them—cut out—add reject—or destroy—do with them as you will—leave it to you and the Committee—you cannot say a 'non committendo.' What will they do—and I do) with the hundreds and one rejected Troubadours? 'With trumpets, yes, and with shawms,' will you be assailed in the most diabolical doggerel. I wish my name not to transpire till the day is decided. I shall not be in town, so it won't matter much; but let us have a good deliverer. I think Elliston should be the man, or Pope; not Raymond, I implore you by the love of Rhythms! The passages marked thus — above and below, are for you to choose between epitaphs, and such like poetical furniture. Pray write me a line, and believe me ever, &c.

"My best remembrances to Lady H. Will you be good enough to decide between the various readings marked, and erase the other; or our deliverer may be as puzzled as a commentator, and belike repeat both. If these verses won't do I will hammer out some more endearables.

"P. S. Tell Lady H. I have had sad work to keep out the Phoenix—I mean the Fire-Office of that name. It has insured the theatre, and why not the Address?

LETTER CXXX.

TO LORD HOLLAND.

"September 24.

"I send a recast of the first four lines of the concluding paragraph.

"This greeting o'erre, the ancient rule defy'd,
The drama's homage by her Herald paid,
Receive our solemn kiss, whose every word
Springs from our hearts and lips would win your own.
The curtain rises, &c., &c.

And do forgive all this trouble. See what it is to have to do even with the genteel of us.

"Ever, &c.

LETTER CXXXI.

TO LORD HOLLAND.

"Cheltenham, Sept. 25, 1812.

"Still 'more matter for a May morning.' Having patched the middle and end of the Address, I send one more compleat for a part of the beginning, which, if not too turgid, you will have the goodness..."
to add. After that flagrant image of the Thames (I hope no unlucky wag will say I have set it on fire, though Dryden, in his 'Annis Mirabilis,' and Churchill, in his 'Times,' did it before me,) I mean to insert this:

'As standing for the new Volcano

And sweep the skies with phlegmies not their own,
While thousands throng'd around the burning dome, &c., &c.

I think 'thousands' less flat than 'crowds collected'—but don't let me plunge into the bathos, or rise into Nat. Lee's Bedlam metaphors. By-the-by, the best view of the said fire (which I myself saw from a house-top in Covent Garden) was at Westminster Bridge, from the reflection on the Thames.
'Perhaps the present couplet had better come in after 'trembled for their homes,' the two lines after it, as otherwise the image certainly sinks, and it will run just as well.

'The lines themselves, perhaps, may be better thus: ('choose,' or 'refuse'—but please yourself, and don't mind 'Sir Fretful')

As flesh'd the volumed brain, and ghostly alone,
The sole with lightnings awful as their own.

The last from smoothest, and, I think, best; but you know better than best. 'Lurid' is also a less indistinct epithet than 'livid wave,' and, if you think so, a lash of the pen will do.

'I expected one line this morning; in the meantime, I shall remodel and condense, and if I do not hear from you, I shall send another copy.

'I am ever, &c."

LETTER CXXXII.

TO LORD HOLLAND.

'September 26, 1819.

'You will think there is no end to my villainous amendations. The fifth and sixth lines I think to alter thus:

'Ye who behold—oh sight admir'd and mourn'd!

Who needless mock'd the rule it adorn'd!

because 'night' is repeated the next line but one;
and, as it now stands, the conclusion of the paragraph, 'worthy him (Shakespeare) and you,' appears to apply the 'you' to those only who were out of bed and in Covent-Garden Market on the night of conflagration, instead of the audience or the discerning public at large, of all whom are intended to be comprised in that comprehensive and, I hope compre-sensible pronoun.

'By-the-by, one of my corrections in the fair copy sent yesterday has dived into the bathos some sixty fathoms—'

'When Garrick died, and Bolingbroke ceased to write.

Cesing to write is a much more serious concern, and cught not to be first; therefore I will let the old couplet stand, with its half rhymes 'sought' and 'wrote.' Second thoughts in every thing are best;
but, in rhyme, third and fourth don't come amiss.
I am very anxious on this business, and I do hope that the very trouble I occasion you will plead its own excuse, and that it will tend to show my endeavor to make the most of the time allotted. I wish I had known it months ago, for in that case I had not left one line standing on another. I always scroll in this way, and smooth as much as I can,

''Such are the names that bore your planis subs uron
When Garrick said, and when Bolingbroke wrote.''

At present the couplet stands thus:

'Dear are the days that made our annals bright,

Sir Edward Bud., or Bolingbroke ceased to write.'"

"As glazed the volumed brain, and ghostly alone."

LETTER CXXXIV.

TO LORD HOLLAND.

'September 27, 1819.

'I have just received your very kind letter, and hope you have met with a second copy corrected and addressed to Holland House, with some omissions and this new couplet,

'As glared each rising flash,' and ghostly alone,
The sole with lightnings awful as their own.

As to remarks, I can only say I will alter and acquis-ease in any thing. With regard to the part which Whitbread wishes to omit, I believe the Address will go off quicker without it, though like the agility of the Hottentot, at the expense of its vigor. I leave to your choice entirely the different specimens of stucco-work; and a brick of your own will also improve my Babylonish turret. I should like Ellistone to have it, with your leave. 'Adorn' and 'mourn' are lawful rhymes in Pope's death of the unfortunate Lady—Gray has 'forlorn' and 'mourn'
—and 'torn' and 'mourn' are in Smollet's famous Tears of Scotland.

'As there will probably be an outcry among the rejected, I hope the Committee will testify (if it be needful) that I sent in nothing to the congress whatever, with or without a name, as your lordship well knows. All I have to do with it is with and through you; and though I, of course, wish to satisfy the audience, I do assure you my first object is to comply with your request, and in so doing to show the sense I have of the many obligations you have conferred upon me.

'Yours ever, "B""
of our line" instead. Johnson has 'many-colored life,' a compound—but they are always best avoided. However, it is the only one in ninety lines, but will be happy to give way to a better. I am ashamed to intrude any more reminiscences on Lady H. or letters upon you; but you are, fortunately for me, gifted with patience already too often tried by "Yours, &c., &c."

LETTER CXXXV.

TO LORD HOLLAND.

[September 26, 1792.]

"Will this do better? the metaphor is more complete.

In the first

"Till slowly sob'd the spent volant wave,
And blackening ashes mark'd the Muse's grave."

If not, we will say "burning wave," and instead of "burning clime," in the line some couplets back, have 'glowing.'

"Is Whitbread determined to castrate all my cavalry lines? I don't see why 't other house should be spared; besides, it is the public, who ought to be relieved, and you recoil. Johnson's war against similar buffooneries of Rich's—but, cortes, I am not Johnson.

Instead of 'effects,' say 'labor's'—degenerate will do, will it? Mr. Betty is no longer a babe, therefore the line cannot be personal.

"Will this do?"

the burning

"Till sob'd the love of that molten wave," with 'glowing dome,' in case you prefer 'burning added to th's wave' metaphorical. The word 'fiery pillar was nag's anagrams to the 'pillar of fire in the book of Exodus, which went before the Israelites through the Red Sea. I once thought of saying 'like Israel's pillar,' and making it a simile, but I did not know,—the great temptation was leaving the epithet 'fiery' for the supplementary wave. I want to work up that passage, as it is the only new ground we prologuizers can go upon—

"This is the place, where, if a poet
Shined in description, he might know it.

It I part with the possibility of a future configuration, we lessen the compliment to Shakspeare. However, we will e'en mend it thus:

"Yes, it shall be—the magic of that name,
That sorrow as the symes of Time, the torch of Flame,
On the same sat, &c., &c."

* This, as finally altered, is

† The lines he here substitutes, finally were omitted by the Commissioners they were these:

"Nay, lowest still, the Drums yet deport
That late she dropt to erral upon all four.
When Richard roars in Resurrection for a hope,
If you commenc'd, the sound must come of course.
If you decreed, the Stage must commandewed.
To soothe the stately name we dare not mend.
Bless us, our judgment should we accede,
And greatly you were by showing less.
Oh, shunt your fust stamp of the Drums's bay
To force us with misplaced applause;
That public jests be or se'nr again diagnosed,
Brute to man recall.
From bards and bruses redeem a nation's taste.
That pride should only nerve the sover'ign power;
When Ross's voice is echoed back by ours."

The last couplet but one was again altered, in a subsequent copy thus—

"The past reproach let present senses refute,
Nor shalt from man to bale, from bale to brute.

† The first of this couplet, as printed, is as follows:

"If the burning sage and the lovely will Wear'the'd the M'st real, and mask'd her love."

There—the dience is in it, if that is not an improvement to Whitbread's content. Recollect, it is the "name, and not the 'magic,' that has a noble connotation. If it were the 'magic,' my metaphor would be somewhat of the maddest—so the 'name' is the antecedent. But, my dear lord, your patience is not quite so immortal—therefore, with many and sincere thanks, I am yours ever, most affectionately.

"P. S. I foresee there will be charges of partiality in the papers; but you know I sent in no Address; and glad both you and I must be that I did not, for in that case, their plea had been plausible. I doubt the pit will be testy; but conscious, innocence (a novel and pleasing sensation) makes us bold."

LETTER CXXXVI.

TO LORD HOLLAND.

[September 28.]

"I have altered the middle couplet, so as I hope partly to do away with W.'s objection. I do think, in the present state of the stage, it is most unadvisable to pass over the horses and Miss Mudie, &c. As Betty is no longer a boy, how can this be applied to him? He is now to be judged as a man. If he acts still like a boy, the public will be more ashamed of their blunder. I have, you see, now taken it for granted that these things are reformed. I confess, I wish that part of the Address to stand; but if W. is inexorable, I'll e'en let it go. I have also new cast the lines, and softened the hint of future combustion, and sent them off this morning. Will you have the goodness to add, or insert, the approved alterations as they arrive? They come like shadows, so depart; occupy me, and, I fear, disturb you.

"Do not let Mr. W. put his Address into Elliston's hands till you have settled on these alterations. E. will think it too long—much depends on the speaking. I fear it will not bear much curtail, without chasms in the sense.

"It is certainly too long in the reading; but if Elliston exerts himself, such a favorite with the public will not be thought tedious. I should think it so, if he were not to speak it.

"Yours ever, &c."

"P. S. On looking again, I doubt my idea of having obviated W's. objection. To the other house, allusion is a 'non sequitur.' What I wish to plead for this part, because the thing really is not to be passed over. Many after-pieces at the Lyceum by the same company, have already attacked this 'Augane Noble'—and Johnson, in his prologue against 'Lunn,' (the harlequin-manager, Rich.),—"Hunt,'—Mahomet,' &c., is surely a fair precept.

LETTER CXXXVII.

TO LORD HOLLAND.

[Sept. 1793.]

"Shakespeare certainly ceased to reign in one of his kingdoms, as George III. did in America, and George IV. may in Ireland.† Now, we have nothing to do out of our own realms, and when the monarchy was gone, his majesty had but a barren sceptre. I have cut away, you will see, and altered,

"It had been, originally,

"Though other pikes may stick in future fame,
On the same spot;" &c., &c.

† Some objection, it appears from this, had been made to the passage, "and the impromptu ceased to reign."
LETTER CXXXVIII.

TO LORD HOLLAND.

"Sept. 30, 1812.

"I send you the most I can make of it; for I am not so well as I was, and find I am falling in resolution. I wish much to see you, and will be at Tetbury by twelve on Saturday; and from thence I go on to Lord Jersey's. It is impossible not to allude to the degraded state of the stage, but I have lightened it, and endeavoured to obviate your other objections. There is a new couplet for Sheridan, allusive to his Monody. All the alterations I have marked thus [---], as you will see by comparison with the other copy. I have cudgelled my brains with the greatest willingness, and only wish I had more time to have done better.

"You will find a sort of clap-trap laudatory couplet inserted for the quiet of the Committee, and I have add'd, towards the end, the couplet you were pleased to like. The whole Address is seventy-three lines, still perhaps too long, and, if shortened, you will save time, but, I fear, a little of what I meant for sense also.

"With myriads of thanks, I am ever, &c.

"My sixteenth edition of respects to Lady H. How she must laugh at all this!

"I wish Murray, my publisher, to print off some copies as soon as your lordship returns to town—it will ensure correctness in the papers afterward."

LETTER CXXXIX.

TO LORD HOLLAND.

"Sept. 30, 1812.

"Par be from him that hour which asks in vain
True path as thou in Gavrick in his ears;
Or,

"Par be that hour that vainly asks in turn True voice for him as sweet as Gavrick's urn."

"Will you choose between these added to the lines on Sheridan? I think they will wind up the panegyric, and agree with the train of thought preceding them.

"Now one word as to the Committee—how could they resolve on a rough copy of an Address never sent in, unless you had been good enough to retain in memory, or on paper, the thing they have been good enough to adopt? By the by, the circumstances of the case should make the committee less 'avised glori,' for all praise of them would look plaguy suspicious. If necessary to be stated at all, the simple facts bear them out. They surely had a right to act as they pleased. My sole object is one which, I trust, my whole conduct has shown; viz. that I did nothing insidious—sent in no Address whatsoever—but, when applied to, did my best for them and myself; but above all, that there was no undue partiality, which will be what the rejected will endeavor to make out. Fortunately—most fortunately—I sent no line on the occasion. For I am sure that had they, in that case, been preferred, it would have been asserted that I was known, and owed the preference to private friendship. This is what we shall probably have to encounter, but if once spoken and approved, we shan't be much embarrassed by their brilliant conjectures, and, as to criticism, an old author, like an old bull, grows cooler (or ought) at every baiting.

"The only thing would be to avoid a party on the night of delivery—afterward, the more the better, and the whole transaction inevitably tends to a good deal of discussion. Murray tells me there are myriads of irrational Addresses ready—some, in imitation of what is call'd 'my style.' If they are as good as the Probationary Odes, or Hawkins' Pipe of Tobacco, it will not be bad fun for the uninstructed.

"Ever, &c."

LETTER CXL.

TO LORD HOLLAND.

"October 2, 1812.

"A copy of this still altered is sent by the post, but this will arrive first. It must be 'humble'—yet aspiring' does away the modesty, and, after all, truth is truth. Besides, there is a puff direct altered, to please your plague-ridden. I shall be at Tetbury by twelve or one—but send this for you to ponder over. There are several little things marked thus altered for your perusal. I have dismounted the cavalry, and, I hope, arranged to your general satisfaction. 'Ever, &c.'

"At Tetbury by noon. I hope, after it is sent, there will be no more elisions. It is not now so long—seventy-three lines—two less than allotted. I will alter all committee objections, but I hope you won't permit Elliston to have any voice whatever except in speaking it."

LETTER CXL.

TO MR. MURRAY.

"Cheltenham, Cheltenham, Sept. 9, 1812.

"Pray have the goodness to send those despatches, and a No. of the Edinburgh Review with the rest. I hope you have written to Mr. Thompson, thanked him in my name for his present, and told him that I shall be truly happy to comply with his request. How do you go on? and when is the graven image, 'with boys and wicked rhymes upon,' to grace, or disgrace, some of our tardy editions?

"Send me 'Bobbery.' Who the devil is he?—no matter, he has good connexions, and will be well introduced. I thank you for your inquiries: I am so so, but my thermometer is sadly below the poetical point. What will you give me or wine for a poem of six cantos, (when complete—no rhyme, no recompense,) as like the last two as I can make them? I have some ideas that one day may be embodied, and till winter I shall have much leisure.

"P. S. My last question is in the true style of Grab street; but, like Jeremy Diddler, I only 'ask for information.' Send me Adair on Diet and Regimen, just republished by Ridgway."

LETTER CXLII.

TO MR. MURRAY.

"Cheltenham, Sept. 14, 1812.

"The parcels contained some letters and verses all (but one) anonymous and complimentary, and
BYRON’S WORKS.

very anxious for my conversion from certain infidel-
ities into which my good-natured correspondents conceive me to have fallen. The books were presents of a convertible kind. Also, ‘Christian knowledge’ and the ‘Bioscope,’ a religious Dial of Life explained; and to the author, with the advice (Cedol publisher) beg you will forward my best thanks for his letter, his present, and, above all, his good intentions. The ‘Bioscope’ contained a MS. copy of very excellent verses, from whom I know not, but evidently the composition of some one in the habit of writing, and of writing well. I do not know if he be the author of the ‘Bioscope’ which accompanied them; but whoever he is, if you can discover him, thank him for me most heartily. The other letters were from ladies, who are welcome to convert me when they please; and if I can discover them, and they be young, as tary say they are, I could convince them perhaps of my devotion. I had also a letter from Mr. Walpole on matters of this world, which I have answered.

“So you are Lucien’s publisher? I am promised an interview with him, and think I shall ask you for a letter of introduction, and assure you I have much from his publisher and mine? Is it not somewhat treasoom in you to have to do with thecler and fierce fce, as the Morning
Post calls his brother?”

“But my book on ‘Diet and Regimen,’ where is it?
I thirst for Scott’s ‘Rokeby;’ let me have your first-begotten copy. The Anti-Jacobin Review is all very well, and not a bit worse than the Quarterly, and at least less harmless. By the by, have you secured my books? I want all the Reviews, at least the critiques, quarterly, monthly, &c., Portugeus and English, extracted, and bound up in one volume for my old age; and pray, sort my Roman books, and get the volumes lent to Mr. Hobhouse—he has had them now a long time. If any thing occurs, I will know him with a line, and in winter
we shall be nearer neighbors.”

“P. S. I was applied to, to write the Address for Drury Lane; but the moment I heard of the contest, I gave up the idea of contending against all Grub street, and threw a few thoughts on the subject into the fire. I did this out of respect to you, being sure you would have turned off any of your authors who had entered the lists with such scurvy competitors. To triumph would have been no glory; and to have been defeated—death would have choked myself, like Otway, with a quartem loaf; so, remember I had, and have, nothing to do with it, upon my honor!”

LETTER CXLIII.

TO MR. WILLIAM BANKES.

“My Dear Bankes,

“When you point out to one how people can be imitate at the distance of some seventy leagues, I will plead guilty to your charge, and accept your well, but not wittingly, till you give me some better reason than my silence, which merely proceeded from being listless; and on my own declaration of old, that you hated writing and receiving letters.
Besides, how was I to find out a man of many residences? If I had addressed you now, it had been to be in your hands where I must have been defecuted, that would have been among your constituents. So now, in despite of Mr. N. and Lady W., you shall be as much better
’s as the Hexam post-office will allow me to make you. I do assure you I am much indebted to you for thinking of me at all, and can’t spare you even from among the superabundance of friends with whom you suppose me surrounded.

“You have heard that Newstead is sold—the sum 140,000l.; sixty to remain in mortgage on the estate for three years, paying interest, of course.
I am no more to Rochdale, but return here, where I am quite alone, go out very little, and enjoy in its fullest extent the delicatiae nutice. What you are about, I cannot guess, even from your date; not dancing to the noise of the prisoners in the Halls of the Lowthers—
one of whom is here, ill, poor thing! with a phthisis;
I heard that you passed through here (at the sobrid inn where I first alighted) the very day before I arrived in these parts. We had a very pleasant set here; at first the Jerseys, Melbourne, Cowpers, and Hollands—but all gone; and the only persons
I know are the Rawdons and Ox swords, with some later acquaintances of less brilliant descent.

“But I am not troubled, though as for your rooms and your assemblies, ‘they are not dreamed of in our philosophy!’ Did you read of a bad accident in the Wye? other day?—a dozen drowned, and Mr. Roscoe, a corpulent gentleman, preserved by a boat-hook or an edic-spear, begeged, when he heard his wife was saved—no—lost—to be thrown in again!—as if he could not have thrown himself in, had he wished it; but this passes for a trait of sensibility. What strange beings are men, in and out of Wye!

“I have to ask you a thousand pardons for not fulfilling some orders before I left town; but if you know all the cursed entanglements I had to wade through, it would be unnecessary to beg your forgiveness. When will Parliament (the new one) meet?
in sixty days, on account of Ireland, I presume;
the Irish election will demand a longer period for completion than the constitutional allotment. Yours of course, is safe, and all your side of the question Salamaca is the ministerial watchword, and all will go well with you. I hope you will speak more fre-frequently—I am sure at least you ought, and it will be expected. I see Portman means to stand again
Good night.

“Ever yours most affectionately,

“Yours faithfully,

“Chesterham, Sept. 27, 1812.

“CHETNEHAM, Sept. 30, 1812.

“I sent in no address whatever to the committee;
but out of nearly one hundred, (this is confidential,) none have been deemed worth acceptance; and in consequence of their subsequent application to me,
I have written a prologue, which has been received, and will be spoken. The MS. is now in the hands of Lord Holland.

“I write this merely to say that (however it is received by the audience) you will publish it in the next edition of Child’s Harold; and I only beg you at present to keep my name secret till you hear from me, and as soon as possible I wish you to have a correct copy to do with as you think proper.

“P. S. I should wish a few copies printed off before, that the newspaper copies may be correct after the delivery.”

LETTER CXLV.

TO MR. MURRAY.

"Cheltenham, Oct. 20, 1812.

* I have a very strong objection to the engraving of the portrait, and request that it may, on no account, be prefixed; but let all the proofs be burned, and the plate broken. I will be at the expense which has been incurred; it is but fair that I should, since I cannot permit the publication. I beg, as a particular favor, that you will lose no time in having this done, for which I have reasons that I will state when I see you. Forgive all the trouble I have occasioned you.

* I have received no account of the reception of the Address, but see it is vituperated in the papers, which does not much embarrass an old author. I leave it to your own judgment to add it, or not, to your next edition when required. Pray comply strictly with my wishes as to the engraving, and believe me, &c.

P.S. Favor me with an answer, as I shall not be easy till I hear that the proofs, &c., are destroyed. I hear that the Satirist has reviewed Childe Harold, in what manner I need not ask; but I wish to know if the old personalities are revived? I have a better reason for asking this than any that merely concern myself; but in publications of that kind, others, particularly female names are sometimes introduced.

LETTER CXLVI.

TO LORD HOLLAND.

My Dear Lord,

"I perceive that the papers, yes, even Perry's, are somewhat ruffled at the injudicious preference of the Committee. My friend Perry has, indeed, set the Bute-d'man rather severely, for which I will send him, for the M. C.* the next epigram I scribble, as a token of my full forgiveness.

"Do the Committee mean to enter into no explanation of their proceedings? You must see there is a leaning towards a charge of partiality. You will, at least, acquit me of any great anxiety to push myself before so many older and better anonymous, to whom the twenty guineas (which I take to be about two thousand pounds Bank currency) and the honor would have been equally welcome. "Honour," I see, 'hath no skill in paragraph-writing;

"I wish to know how it went off at the second reading, and whether anyone has had the grace to give it a glimpse of approbation. I have seen no paper but Perry's, and two Sunday ones. Perry is severe, and the others silent. If, however, you and your Committee are not now dissatisfied with your own judgments, I shall not much embarrass myself about the brilliant remarks of the journals. My own opinion is upon it what it always was, perhaps pretty near that of the public.

"Believe me, my dear lord, &c. &c.

P.S. My best respects to Lady H. whose smiles will be very consolatory, even at this distance."

BUSBY's entire) inserted in several of the papers (correctly, and copied correctly; my hand is diff. cult.)—particularly the Morning Chronicle? Tell Mr. Perry I forgive him all he has said, and may say against my address, but he will allow me to deal with the doctor—(cauti alterum partem) and not betray me. I cannot think what has befallen Mr. Perry, for of yore we were very good friends—but no matter, only get this inserted.

*I have a poem entitled 'Waltzing' for you, of which I make you a present; but it must be anonymous. It is in the old style of English Bards and Scotch Reviewers.

"P S. With the next edition of Childe Harold you may print the first fifty or a hundred opening lines of the 'Curse of Minerva, down to the couplet beginning"

Mortal (True thus she spake) &c.

Of course, the moment the Satire begins there you will stop, and the opening is the best part."

LETTER CXLVII.

TO MR. MURRAY.

"Oct. 19, 1812.

"Many thanks, but I must pay the damage, and will thank you to tell me the amount for the engraving. I think the 'Rejected Addresses' by far the best thing of the kind since the Rolland, and wish you had published them. Tell the author 'I forgive him, were he twenty times over a satirist;' and think his imitations not at all inferior to the famous ones of Hawkins Browne. He must be a man of very lively wit, and less scrupulous than wits often are: altogether, I very much admire the performance, and wish it all success. The Satirist has taken a new tone, as you will see: we have now. I think, finished with Childe Harold's critics. I have in hand a Satire on Waltzing,* which you must publish anonymously; it is not long, not quite two hundred lines, but will make a very small broadside pamphlet. In a few days you shall have it.

"P.S. The editor of the Satirist ought to be thanked for his revocation; it is done handsomely after five years' warfare."

LETTER CXLIX.

TO MR. MURRAY.

"Oct. 28, 1817.

"Thanks, as usual. You go on boldly; but have a care of glutino the public, who have by this time had enough of Childe Harold. 'Waltzing' shall be prepared. It is rather above two hundred lines, with an introductory Letter to the Publisher. I think of publishing, with Childe Harold, the opening lines of the 'Curse of Minerva,' as far as the first speech of Pallas,—because some of the readers like that part better than any I have written, and as it contains nothing to affect the sub-

Dr. Busby, entitled a Monologue, of which the Parody was enclosed in the letter. The first four lines of the Doctor's Address are as follows:

"When emerging objects men perceive, What are the prodigies they mount on? A magic soliloquy here survey, There gluts the ruin of the elder day!"

Which verses are thus reflected in the Parody—

"When emerging objects men perceive, The Lord knows what is writ by Lord knows what A modern monologue you here survey, Flaw'd from the theatre the other day!"

LETTER CLI

TO MR. MURRAY.

February 20, 1813.

"In 'Horace in London,' I peculiarly some stanzas on Lord Elgin, in which (waving the kind compliment to myself), I heartily concur. I wish I had the pleasure of Mr. Smith's acquaintance, as I could communicate the curious anecdote you read in Mr. T.'s letter. If he would like it, he can have the substance for his second edition; if not, I shall add it to our next, though I think we already have enough of Lord Elgin.

"What I have read of this work seems admirably done. My praise, however, is not much worth the author's having; but you may thank him in my name for his. The idea is new—we have excellent imitations of the Satires, &c., &c., by Pope; but I think her but one imitative Ode in his works, and none anywhere else. I can hardly suppose that they have lost any fame by the fate of the farce, but even should this be the case, the present publication will again place them on their pinnacle.

would state thus much for me to his lordship. Though the transaction speaks plainly in itself for the borrower's folly and the lender's nery, it never was my intention to quash the demand, as I legally might, nor to withhold payment of principal, or, perhaps, even unlawful interest. You know what my situation has been, and what it is. I have parted with an estate, (which has been in my family for nearly three hundred years, and was never disgraced by being in possession of a lawyer, a churchman, or a woman, during that period,) to liquidate this and similar demands; and the payment of the purchase is still withheld, and may be, perhaps, for years. If, therefore, I am under the necessity of making those persons wait for their money, (which, considering the terms, they can afford to suffer,) it is my misfortune.

"When I arrived at majority in 1809, I offered my own security on legal interest, and it was refused. Now, I will not accede to this. This man I may have seen, but I have no recollection of the names of any parties but the agents and the securities. The moment I can, it is assuredly my intention to pay my debts. This person's case may be a hard one; but, under all circumstances, what is mine? I could not foresee that the purchaser of my estate was to demur in paying for it."

"I am glad it happens to be in my power so far to accommodate my creditors, and that I could do as much for the rest of the Twelve Tribes."

"Ever yours, dear R."

LETTER CLIV.

TO MR. MURRAY.

Westall has, I believe, agreed to illustrate your book, and I fancy one of the engravings will be from the pretty little girl you saw the other day, though without her name, and merely as a model for some sketch connected with the subject. I would also have the portrait (which you saw to-day,) of the friend who is mentioned in the text at the close of Canto first, and in the notes,—which are subjects sufficient to authorize that addition."

Early in the spring he brought out, anonymously, his poem on Westall, which, though full of very lively satire, fell so far short of what was now expected from him by the public, that the disavowal of it, which, as we see by the following letter, he thought right to put forth, found ready credence.

LETTER CLV.

TO MR. MURRAY.

"April 21, 1813.

"I shall be in town by Sunday next, and will call and have some conversation on the subject of Westall's designs. I am to sit to him for a picture at the request of a friend of mine, and as Sanders is not a good one, you will probably prefer the other. I wish you to have Sanders's taken down and sent to my lodgings immediately—before my arrival, I hear that a certain malicious publication on Waltzing is attributed to me. This report, I suppose, you will take care to contradict, as the author, I am sure, will not like that I should wear his cap and bells. Mr. Hobhouse's quarto will be out immedi-ately; pray send to the author for an early copy, which I wish to take abroad with me."

"P. S. I see the Examiner threatens some observations upon you next week. What can you have done to share the wrath which has heretofore been principally expessed upon the Prince? I presume all your Scribleri will be drawn up in battle array in defence of the modern Tonson—Mr. Bucke, for instance. "Send in my account to Bennet street, as I wish to settle it before sailing."

LETTER CLVI.

TO MR. MURRAY.

"Maldenhead, June 13, 1813.

"* * I have read the 'Strictures,' which are just enough, and not grossly abusive, in very fair couplets. There is a note against Massengil near the end, and one cannot quarrel with one's company, at any rate. The author detects some incongruous figures in a passage of English Bards, page 25, but which addition I do not know. In the sole copy in your possession—I mean the fifth edition—you may make these alterations, that I may profit (though a little too late) by his remarks: For 'hellish instinct,' substitute 'bri'dal instinct,' 'harpies' alter to 'felines;' and for 'blood-hounds,' write 'hell-hounds.' These be 'very bitter words, by my troth,' and the alterations not much sweeter; but as I shall not publish the thing, they can do no harm, but are a satisfaction to me in the way of amendment. The passage is only twelve lines. "You do not answer me about H.'s book; I want to write to him, and not to say anything unpleasing. If you direct post-office, Portsmouth, till called for, I will send and receive your letter. You never told me of the forthcoming critique on Columbus, which is not too fair; and I do not think justice quite done to the 'Pleasures,' which surely entitle the author to a higher rank than that assigned him in the Quarterly. But I must not cavil at the decisions of the invisible infallibles; and the article is very well written. The general horror of the 'fragments' makes me not6onl2L' s the 'Gour,' but you would publish it—I presume, by this time, to your repentance. But as I consented, whatever be its fate, I won't now quarrel with you, even though I detect it in my pastry; but I shall not open a pie without apprehension for some weeks. "The books which may be marked G. O., I will carry out. Do you know Clarke's Nautfagia? I am told that he asserts the first volume of Robinson Crusoe was written by the first Lord Oxford, when in the Tower, and given by him to Defoe; if true, it is a curious anecdote. Have you got back Lord Brooke's MS. and what does Heber say of it? Write to me at Portsmouth."

"Ever yours, &c."

LETTER CLVII.

TO MR. MURRAY.

"June 19, 1813.

"Will you forward the enclosed answer to the kindest letter I ever received in my life, my sense of which I can neither express to Mr. Gifford himself nor to any one else."

"Ever yours,"

ductory lines to Child's Harold were afterward addressed.
LETTER CLVIII.
TO W. GIFFORD, ESQ.

"June 16, 1813.

"My dear Sir,

"I feel greatly at a loss how to write to you at all—still more to thank you as I ought. If you knew the vexation with which I have ever regarded you, long before I had the most distant prospect of becoming your acquaintance, literary or personal, my embarrassment would not surprise you.

"Any suggestion of yours, even were it conveyed in the less tender shape of the text of the Bayad, Mr. Monk Mason note in Massinger, would have been obeyed; I should have endeavored to improve myself by your severe judgment then if I should less willing to profit by your kindness. It is not for me to bandy compliments with my elders and my betters: I receive your approbation with gratitude, and will not return my brass for your gold, by expressing more fully those sentiments of admiration, which, however sincere, would, I know, be unwelcome.

"To your advice on religious topics, I shall equally attend, as does the best man you will the paper line them altogether. The already published objectionable passages have been much commented upon,
but certainly have been rather strangely interpreted.
I am no bigot to infidelity, and did not expect that because I doubted the immortality of man, I should be charged with denying the existence of a God.
It was the comparative insignificance of ourselves and our world, when placed in comparison with the mighty whole, of which it is an atom, that first led me to imagine that our pretensions to eternity might be overrated.

"This, and being early disgusted with a Calvan-list Scotch school, when I was cudgelled to church for the first ten years of my life, afflicted me with this malady; for, after all, it is, I believe, a disease of the mind as much as other kinds of hypochondria."

LETTER CLIX.
TO MR. MOORE.

"June 23, 1813.

 help her to a pension.

 Murray, the wag of publishers, the Anaes of stationers, has a design upon you in the paper line

 13 wants you to become the staple and stipendiary editor of a periodical work. What say you? Will you be bound, like "Kit Smart, to write for ninety-nine years in the Universal Visitor?" Seriously, he talks of hundreds a year, and—though I hate pratt-

 ing of the beggarly elements—his proposal may be to your honor and profit, and, I am very sure, will be to our pleasure.

 "I don't know what to say about 'friendship.' I never was in friendship but once, in my nineteenth year, and then it gave me as much trouble as love.

 nevertheless, no one wishes you more friends,

 fame, and felicity, than "Yours, &c."

have you begun or finished a Poem? If you won't tell me what I have done, pray what you have done, or left undone, yourself. I am still in employment for voyaging, and anxious to hear from, or of, you before summer, which anxiety you should remove more readily, as you think I shan't crotigate about you afterward. I shall give

I can only attribute his fears to a pair of new pistols, whereby I had armed him; and he thought it necessary to display his vigilance by calling out to me whenever we passed either thing, whether moving or stationary. Conceive ten miles, with a tremor every furlong. I have scribbled you a fearfully long letter. This sheet must be blank, and is merely a wrapper, to preclude the tabulatures of the post from peeping. You once complained of my not writing—I will heap 'coal of fire upon your head' by not complaining of your not reading. Ever, my dear Moore, your's, (isn't that the Staffordshire termination?)"

"BYROW" LETTER CLXV.

TO MR. CROCKER.

"DEAR SIR,

"I was honored with your unexpected and very obliging letter when on the point of leaving London, which prevented me from acknowledging my obligation as quickly as I felt it sincerely. I am endeavoring all in my power to be ready before Saturday; and even if I should not succeed, I can only blame my own tardiness, which will not the less enhance the benefit I have lost. I have only to add my hope of forgiveness for all my trespasses on your time and patience, and with my best wishes for your public and private welfare, I have the honor to be, most truly,

"Your obliged and most obedient servant,

"BYRON."

The following notes to Mr. Murray, have reference to a fifth edition of the "Giaour," then in press. The poem first appeared in the May preceding, and contained originally but about four hundred lines, and was gradually increased through successive editions to its present number, nearly fourteen hundred. In a note which accompanied the manuscript of the paragraph commencing

"Fair clime, where every season smiles," he says, "I have not yet fixed the place of insertion for the following lines, but will when I see you." The whole portion from the line

"For there the rose o'er clung and vale," was inserted during the revision of the proofs. The passage stood originally thus:

"Fair clime, where careless summer smiles,
   Enchanting, o'er those blushing bays,
   Whose, seen from Colonna's height,
   Make glad the heart that hails the sight,
   And give to lovers' delight,
   Those shrines the bright genii pe seek,
   Like ciphers upon Omer's breast,
   So-sitting round the seacoast line
   Three Edens of the eastern wave,
   Of if, at times, the transient breeze
   Breaks the smooth arras of the seas
   Or brush one blossom from the tree,
   How grateful is the grotto air
   That wakes and warms the fragrance there!"

The several passages beginning—

"He who hath bent him o'er the dead;"
"The cygnet proudly walks the water;"
"My memory now is but the tomb;"
"The verses commencing—

"The browning casque's bells are tinkling;"
"The passage—
"Yes, love indeed is light from heaven;

were inserted in the fifth edition, and subsequently the following—

"She was a form of life and light,
   That, arms, became a part of sight,
   And rose, whom'er I could mine eye,
   The Morning-star of memory!"

"If you send more proofs, I shall never finish this infernal story—Ecce signum—thirty-three lines more enclosed to the utter discomfiture of the, and, I fear, not to your advantage."

LETTER CLXVI.

TO MR. MURRAY.

"August 31, 1813.

"I have looked over and corrected one proof, but not so carefully (God knows if you can read it through, but I can't) as to preclude your eye from discovering some omission of mine or commission of your printer. If you have patience, look it over. Do you know any body who can stop—I mean point—commas, and so forth? for I am, I hear, a sad hand at your punctuation. I have, but with some difficulty, not added any more to this snake of a Poem, which has been lengthening its rattle every month. It is now fearfully long, being more than a canto and a half of Childe Harold, which contains but eight hundred and eighty-two lines per book, with all late additions inclusive.

"The last lines Hodgson likes. It is not often he does, and when he don't, he tells me with great energy, and I fret and alter. I have thrown them in to soften the ferocity of our Infidel, and, for a dying man, have given him a good deal to say for himself."

"I was quite sorry to hear you say you stayed in town on my account, and I hope sincerely you do not mean so superfluous a piece of politeness."

"Our six critiques—they would have made half a Quarterly by themselves; but this is the age of criticism."

The following refer apparently to a still later edition.

LETTER CLXVII.

TO MR. MURRAY.

"Binton, Oct. 3, 1813.

"I have just recollected an alteration you may make in the proof to be sent to Aston.—Among the lines on Hassan's Serai, not far from the beginning, is this—"

"Oft for Solitude to shun.

Now to share, implies more than one, and Solitude is a single gentleman; it must be thus—"

"For many a gilded chamber's cheer,
   Which Solitude might well forbear;
   and so on.—My address is Ashton Hall, Rotherham."

"Will you adopt this correction? and pray accept a Stilton cheese from me for your trouble."

"Ever yours;"

"B."

"If the old line stands, let the other run thus—"

"Nor there will weary traveller halt,
   To bless the sacred bread and salt.

"Note.—To partake of food—to break bread and taste salt with your host, ensures the safety of the guest; even though an enemy, his person from that moment becomes sacred.

"There is another additional note sent yesterday—on the Priest in the Confessional.

* This is written on a separate slip piece of paper enclosed.
LETTER CLXVIII.

TO MR. MURRAY.

"Oct. 12, 1823.

"You must look the 'Giaour' again carefully; there are a few lapses, particularly in the last page. — I have now 'twas false; she could not die; it was, and ought to be—'I knew.' Pray observe this and similar mistakes.

"I have received and read the British Review. I really think the writer in most points very right. The only mortifying thing is the acumen of imitation. Crabbe's passage Letter 12, and Scott's no further meant to follow than in his lyric measure, which is Gray's, Milton's, and any one's who likes it. The 'Giaour' is certainly a bad character, but not dangerous; and I think his fate and his feelings will meet with few voices. You shall be very glad to hear from or of you, when you please; but don't put yourself out of your way on my account."
LETTER CLXXI.

TO MR. MOORE.

"Augst—September, I mean—1823.

"I send you, begging your acceptance, Castellan, three vols. on Turkish Literature, not yet looked into. "The last I will thank you to read, extract what you want, and return in a week, as they are lent me. I am really taking a liberty by talking in this style to my 'elders and my betters;'—pardon it, and don't Rocheouard my motives.

"I have been thinking of a story, grafted on the amours of a Peri and a mortal—something like, only more philantroupical, the hero less Lucien Bonaparte, and the heroine's Diabe Amoreux. 'It would require a good deal of poesy and tenderness is not my forte. For that, and other reasons, I have given up the idea, and merely suggest it to you as a help to your greater work, I think it a subject you might make much of. If you want any more books, there is 'Castellan's Mueurs des Ottomans,' the best compendium of the kind I ever met with, in six small volumes. I am really taking a liberty by talking in this style to my 'elders and my betters;'—pardon it, and don't Rocheouard my motives.

which will let you into the origin of the 'Giaour.'

Write soon.

"Ever, dear Moore, yours most entirely, &c.

P.S. This letter was written to me on account of a different story circulated by some gentle women of our acquaintance, a little to close to the text. They have obtained mere dark, inartistic names, and circumstantial evidence of the girl's detection, not very important or DECOROUS.

LETTER CLXXII.

TO MR. MOORE.

"Sept. 5, 1818.

"You need not tie yourself down to a day with Toderini, but send him at your leisure, having anatomicized him into such anctuations as you want. I do not believe he has ever undergone that process before, which is the best reason for not sparing him now.

"Rogers has returned to town, but not yet recovered of the Quarterly. What fellows these reviewers are! these bugs do fear us all. They made you fight, and me (the milkiest of men) a satirist, and will send by making Rogers madnier than Ajax. I have been reading 'Memory' again, the other day, and 'Hope' together, and retain all my preference of the former. His elegance is really wonderful! There is no such thing as a vulgar line in his book.

"What say you to Bonaparte? Remember, I back against the field, barring Catalpey and the elements. Nay, I almost wish him success against all countries but this,—were it only to choke the Morning Post, and his undutiful father-in-law, with that rebellious bastard of Scandinavian adoption, Berndotte. Rogers wants me to go with him on a crusade to the Lakes, and to besiege you on our way. This last is a great temptation, but I fear it will not be in my power, unless they carry on with one of us somewhere—no matter where. It is too late for Matlock, but we might hit upon some scheme, high life or low,—the last would be much the nearest. I wish I had the presence of mind to name the pudding that I quite sigh for a cider- cellular, or a cruise in a smuggler's sloop.

"You cannot wish more than I do that the Fates were a little more accommodating to our parallel lines, which prolong ad infinitum without coming a jot the nearer. I almost wish I were married too, which is saying much. All my friends, seniors and juniors, are in for it, and ask me to be godfather,—the only species of parentage which, I believe, will ever come to my share in a lawful way; and, in an unlawful one, by the blessing of Lucina, we cannot be certain,—though the parish may. I sup-

"LETTER CLXXIII.

TO MR. MOORE.

"Sept. 8, 1818.

"I am sorry to see Tod again, so soon, for fear your scrupulous conscience should have prevented you from fully availing yourself of his spoils. By this coat I send you a copy of that awful pamphlet, 'the Giaour,' which has never procured me half so high a compliment as your modest alarm. You will (if inclined in an evening), perhaps believe that I have added much in quantity,—a circumstance which may truly diminish your modesty upon the subject.

"You stand certainly in great need of a 'lift' with Mackintosh. My dear Moore, you strangely underrate yourself. I should consider it an affectation in any other; but I think I know you well enough to believe that you don't know your own value. However, 'tis a fault that generally mends; and, in your case, really ought. I have heard him speak of you as highly as your wife could wish; and enough to give all your friends the jaundice.

"Yesterday I had a letter from Ali Pacha, brought by Dr. Holland, who is just returned from Albania. It is in Latin, and begins 'Excellentissime, non Carissimse,' and ends about a gun he wants made for him;—it is signed 'Ali Visir.' What do you think he has been about? If, tells me that, last spring, he took a hostile town, where forty-two years ago, his mother and sisters were treated as Miss Cunigunde was by the Bulgarian cavalry. He takes the town, selects all the survivors of this exploit—children, grandchildren, &c., to the tune of six hundred, and has them shot before his face. Recollect, he spared the rest of the city, and confined himself to the Tarquin pedigree,—which is more than I would. So much for dear friend."

LETTER CLXXIV.

TO MR. MOORE.

"Sept. 9, 1818.

"I write to you from Murray's, and I may say, from Murray, who, if you are not predisposed in favor of any other publisher, would be happy to treat with you, at a fitting time, for your work, I can safely recommend him, as fair, liberal, and attentive, and certainly, in point of reputation, he stands among the first of the trade.' I am sure he would do you justice. I have written to you so much lately that you will be glad to see so little now. Ever, &c., &c."

LETTER CLXXV.

TO MR. MOORE.

"Sept. 27, 1818.

"THOMAS MOORE,

"(Thou wilt never be called 'true Thomas,' like he of Ercildoune), why don't you write to me?—as you won't, I must. I was near you at Aston other day, and hope I soon shall. If so, you must and shall meet me, and go to Matlock and thereafter, and, take what, in flesh dialect, is poetically turned 'a lark,' with Rogers and me for accomplices. Yesterday, at Holland House, I was introduced to Southey—the best looking bard I have seen for some time. To have that poet's head and shoulders, I would almost have written his Sapphics.
He is certainly a prepossessing person to look on,
and a man of talent, and all that, and—there is his colony.

"* * read me part of a letter from you. By the foot of Pharaoh, I believe there was abuse, for he stopped short, so he did, after a fine saying about our correspondence, and blooped—I wish I could revenge myself by attacking you or by telling you that I have had to defend you—an agreeable way which one's friends have of recommending themelves, by saying—'Ay, ay, I gave it Mr. Such-a-one for what he said about your being a plagia, and a rake, and so on.' But do you know that you are one of the very few whom I never have the satisfaction of hearing abused, but the reverse;—and do you know, I will forgive that?"

"I have been in the country, and ran away from the Doncaster races. It is, odd,—I was a visitor in the same house which came to my sire as a residence with Lady Carmarthen (with whom he resided before his majority—by the by, remember, she was not my mamma)—and they thrust me into an old room, with a nauseous picture over the chimney, which I should suppose my papa regarded with due respect, and which, inheriting the family taste, I looked upon with great satisfaction.
I stayed a week with the family, and behaved very well,—though the lady of the house is young, and religious, and pretty, and the master is my party lust. I felt no wish for any thing but a poodle dog, which they kindly gave me. Now, for a man of my course, not even to have coveted is a sign of great amendment. Pray pardon all this nonsense, and don't snub me when I'm in spirits.

"Ever yours,

"B.N."

"Here's an impromptu for you by a 'person of quality,' written last week, on being reproached for low spirits.

"When from the heart where sorrow sits,"

LETTER CLXXXVI.

to Mr. Moore.

"October 2, 1813.

"You have not answered some six letters of mine. This, therefore, is my penultimate. I will write to you once more, but after that,—I swear by all the saints—I am silent and supercilious. I have met Curran at Holland House—he beats every body—he's imagination is beyond human, and his humor (it is difficult to define what is wit) perfect.
Then he has fifty faces, and twice as many voices, when he mimics;—I never met his equal. Now, were I a woman, and eke a virgin, that is the man
I should forsake my Seancar. He is quite fascinating. Remember, I have met him but once; and you, who have known him long, may probably deduct from my panegyric. I almost fear to meet him again, lest the impression should be lowered.
He talked a great deal about a theme next year tiresome to me, nor any body else that I know.
What a variety of expression he conjures into that naturally not very fine countenance of his! He absolutely changes it entirely. I have done—for I can't describe him, and you know him. On Sunday
I return to * * s, where I shall not be far from you.
Perhaps I shall hear from you in the mean time.
Good night.

"Saturday morn.—Your letter has cancelled all my anxieties. I did not suspect you in earnest.
MODesty again! I fell into a very shabby thing; it seems, I 'don't fear your competition.' If it were reduced to an alternative or preference, I should dread you, as much as Satan does Michael.
But is there not room enough in our respective regions? Go on—it will soon be my turn to forgive.
To-day I dine with Mackintosh and Mrs. Stale—as John Bull may be pleased to denominate Corinne—whom you met last night, at Covent Garden, yawning over the humor of Falstaff.

"The reputation of 'gloom,' if one's friends are not included in the "reputants," is of great service;
as it saves one from a legion of imperfections, in the shape of commonalty (for example) acquaintance. But, the knowest I can be a right merry and conceited fellow, and rarely 'larmoyant.' Murray shall re-instate your line fortwith. I believe the blunder in the motto was mine; and yet I have, in general, a memory for you, and am sure it was rightly printed at first.

"I do 'blush' very often, if I may believe Ladies
H. and M. but luckily at present, no one sees me.
Adieu."

LETTER CLXXXVII.

to Mr. Moore.

"Nov. 20, 1813.

"Since I last wrote to you, much has occurred, good, bad, and indifferent,—not to make me forget you, but to prevent me from reminding you of one who, nevertheless, has often thought of you, and to whom your thoughts, in many a measure, have frequently been a consolation. We were once very near neighbors this autumn; and a good and bad neighborhood it has proved to me. Suffice it to say, that your French quotation was confoundedly to the purpose,—though very unexpectedly pertinent, as you may imagine by what I said before, and my silence since. * * * However, 'Richard's himself again,' and, except all night and some part of the morning, I don't think very much about the matter.
All convulsions end with me in rhyime; and to solace my midnights, I have scribbled another Turkish story—not a Fragment—which you will receive

* The motto to the Giaour, which is taken from one of the Irish Melothes, and was quoted by him incorrectly in the first edition of the Poems. He made afterward a similar mistake in the lines from Burns prefixed to the Ride of Albion.

The Bride of Albion. To this poem he made additions, in the course of printing, amounting altogether to near two hundred lines; and the opening lines, "'Come ye to the land,' &c., supposed to have been sung to him by a song of Goethe's—were among the number of these new insertions, as were also those verses, 'Who hath not proved how boastfully easy."

"Mind on her lip and music in her face,"

he afterward altered it to

"The mind of music breathing in her face,"

But, this not satisfying him, the next step of correction brought the line to what it is at present:

"The mind, the music breathing from her face."

The whole passage which follows:

"'Then, my Zobeide, shun and bless my heart,' was sent in successive scraps to the printer, correction following correction.

The line, "And die to-morrow with prophetic ray," was originally written on a slip:

"And die to-morrow with a fondled ray," but the following note being annexed—'Mr. Murray, Choose which of the two epigraphs, 'fondled,' or, 'shun,' may be the best; or, if neither will do at all, I will dream another.' In the long passage just referred to, the six lines beginning 'Hast as the Murab's arms,' &c., having been deeply etched to the printer's last bit for insertion, the other words, which were added, were included in an error page when the first copy, in its original form, being as follows:

"Bust as the Mezzo-Mourin's sister lovely
Has who had journey'd far to join the race."
LETTER CLXXVIII.

TO LEIGH HUNT.

"MY DEAR SIR,

"Few things could be more welcome than your note, and on Saturday morning I will avail myself of your permission to thank you for it in person. My time has not been passed, since we met, either profitably or agreeably. A very short period after my last visit, an incident occurred, with which, I fear, you are not unacquainted, as reported in many mouths and more than one paper, was busy with the topic. That, naturally, gave me much uneasiness. Then I nearly incurred a lawsuit on the sale of an estate; but this is now arranged: next—but why should I go on with a series of selfish and silly details? I merely wish to assure you that it was not the frivolous forgetfulness of a mind occupied by what is called pleasure, (not in the true sense of Epicurus,) that kept me away; but a perception of my, then, unfitness to share the society of those upon whom I value and wish not to displease. I hate being lazymant, and making a serious face among those who are cheerful.

"It is my wish that our acquaintance, or, if you please to accept it, friendship, may be permanent. I have been lucky enough to preserve some friends from a very early period, and I hope, still I love (not, at least now) select them lightly, I shall not lose them capriciously. I have a thorough esteem for that independence of spirit which you have maintained with sterling talent and at the expense of some suffering. You have not, I trust, abandoned the poem you were then (I think the Impostor, when I parted with your hospitality in the summer. I hope a time will come when he and I may be able to repay you in kind for the letter—for the rhyme, at least in quantity, you are in arrears to both.

"Believe me very truly and affectionately yours,

"BYRON"

LETTER CLXXIX.

TO MR. MOORE.

"Dec. 9, 1813.

"Your letter, like all the best, and even kindest things in this world, is both painful and pleasing. But, first, to what sits nearest. Do you know I was actually about to dedicate to you,—not in a formal inscription, as to one's elders,—but through a short prefatory letter, in which I boasted myself your intimate, and held forth the prospect of your Poem, when to the reception of your strict injunctions of secrecy as to the said Poem, more than once repeated by word and letter, dashed upon me, and marred my intents. I could have no motive for repressing my own, or alluding to anything in a day passes that I do not think and talk of you, but an idea that you might, yourself, dislike it. You cannot doubt my sincere admiration, waived personal friendship for the present, which, by-the-by, I have not lessened since we met. I have you by rote and by heart; of which 'eece signum!' When I was at —, on my first visit, I have a habit, in passing my time a good deal alone of,—I won't call it singing, for that I never attempt except to myself—but of uttering, to what I think tunes, your 'Oh breathe not,' 'When the last glimpse,' and 'When he who adores thee,' with others of the same strain;—they are my matins and vespers. I assuredly did not intend them to be overward, but, one morning, in comes, not La Donna, but Il Marito, with a very grave face, saying, 'Byron, I must request you won't sing any more, at least of those songs.' I stared, and said, 'Certainly, but why?' —To tell you the truth, quoth he, 'they make my wife cry, and so melancholy, that I wish her to hear no more of them.'

"Now, my dear Moore, the effect must have been from your words, and not, certainly, from me. I merely mention this foolish story, to show you how much I am indebted to you for even your pastimes. A man may praise and praise, but no one recollects the measure in which that praise is meant. Though I think no one equal to you in that department, or in satire,—and surely no one was ever so popular in both,—I certainly am of opinion that you have not yet done all you can do, though more than enough for any one else. I want, and the world expects, a longer work from you; and I see in you what I never saw in poet before, a strange indifference of your own powers, which I cannot account for, and which must be unaccountable, when a Cowper and Shelley are those to be applauded. Your story I did not, could not, know—I thought only of a Peri. I wish you had confided in me, not for your sake, but mine, and to prevent the world from losing a much better treat than my own, but which, I yet hope, this clashing will not even now deprive them of. Mine is the work of a week, written, why I have partly told you, and partly not less since you mention some day will.

"Go on—I shall really be very unhappy if I at all interfere with you. The success of mine is yet problematical; though the public will probably purchase a certain quantity, on the presumption of 'an own propensity for 'The Giaour' and such horrid mysteries.' The only advantage I have is being on the spot; and that very amounts to saving me the trouble of turning other books, which I had better read again. If your chamber was furnished in the same way, you have no need to go there to describe—I mean only as to accuracy—because I drew it from recollection.

* * * * * * *

"This last thing of mine may have the same fate, and I assure you, I have great doubts about it. But, even if not, its little day will be over before you are ready and willing. Come out—screw your courage to the sticking-place. Except the Post Bag (and surely you cannot complain of a want of success there), you have not been regularly cut out for some years. No man stands higher.—whatever you may think on a rainy day, in your provincial retreat, 'Aucun homme, dans aucune langue, n'a, etc, peut-être, plus complètement le poète du cœur et le poète des femmes. Les critiques lui reprochent de n'avoir représenté le monde ni tel qu'il est, ni tel qu'il doit être; mais les femmes répondent qu'il l'a représenté tel qu'elles le désirent.—I should have thought Simond had written this for you instead of Metastasio.

"Write to me, and tell me of yourself. Do you remember what Rousseaux said to some one?—Have we quarrelled? you have talked to me often, and never once mentioned yourself."

"P. S. The last sentence is an indirect apology for my own egotism,—but I believe in letters it is allowed. I wish it was mutual. I have met with an odd reflection in Grimm; it shall not—at least, the bad part—be applied to you or me, though one of us has certainly an indifferent name—but this it is: 'Many people have the reputation of being wicked, with whom we should be too happy to pass our lives.' I need not add it is a woman's saying—Mademoiselle de Sommery's."

LETTER CLXXX.

TO MR. MURRAY.  "Dec. 4, 1813."

"I have read through your Persian Tales, and have taken the liberty of making some remarks on the blank pages. There are many beautiful passages, and an interesting story; and I cannot give you a stronger proof that such is my opinion than by the date of the hour—two o'clock, till which it has kept me awake without a yawning. The conclusion is not quite correct in costume; there is no Musulman successors. But this matter not. The tale must have been written by some one who has been on the spot, and I wish him, and he deserves, success. Will you apologize to the author for the liberties I have taken with his MS.? Had I been less awake to, and interested in, his theme, I had been less obtrusive; but you know I always take this in good part, and I hope he will. It is difficult to say what will succeed, and still more to pronounce what will not. I am at this moment in that uncertainty, (on our own score,) and it is no small proof of the author's powers to be able to charm and fix a mind's attention on similar subjects and climates in such a predicament. That he may have the same effect upon all his readers is very sincere the wish, and hardly the doubt, of yours truly,

"B."

* Idem, br., by Mr. Knight.

LETTER CLXXXI.

TO MR. MURRAY.  "Nov. 12, 1813."

"My Dear Sir,

"I hope you will consider when I venture on an request, that it is the reverse of a certain Dedication, and is addressed not to 'The Editor of the Quarterly Review,' but to Mr. Gifford. You will understand this, and on that point I need trouble you no farther.

"You have been good enough to look at a thing of mine in MS.—a Turkish story, and I should feel gratified if you would do it the same favor in its probationary state of printing. It was written, I cannot say for amusement, nor 'obliged by hunger and request of friends,' but in a state of mind, from circumstances which occasionally occur to us youth,' that rendered it necessary for me to apply my mind to something, any thing but reality; and under this not very brilliant inspiration it was composed. Being done, and having at least diverted me from myself, I thought you would not perhaps be offended if Mr. Murray forwarded it to you. He has done so, and to apologize for his doing so a second time is the object of my present letter.

"I beg you will not send me any answer. I assure you very sincerely I know your time to be occupied, and it is enough, more than enough, if you read; you are not to be bored with the fatigue of answers.

"A word to Mr. Murray will be sufficient, and send it either to the flames, or

A hundred hawkers' load,
On wings of winds to fly or fall absurd."

It deserves no better than the first, as the work of a week, and scribbled 'stems pede in uno,' (by-the-by, the only foot I have to stand on;) and I promise never to trouble you again under forty cantos, and a voyage between each.

"Believe me ever

"Your obliged and affectionate servant,

"BYRON."

LETTER CLXXXII.

TO MR. MURRAY.  "Nov. 13, 1813."

"Two friends of mine (Mr. Rogers and Mr Sharpe) have advised me not to risk at present any single publication separately, for various reasons. As they have not seen the one in question, they can have no bias for or against the merits (if it has any) or the faults of the present subject of our conversation. You say all the last of the 'Giaour' are gone—at least out of your hands. Now, if you think of publishing any new edition with the last additions which have not yet been before the reader, (I mean distinct from the two-volume publication,) we can add the 'Bride of Abydos,' which will thus steal quietly into the world: if liked, we can then throw off some copies for the purchasers of former 'Giaours;' and, if not, I can omit it in any future publication. What think you? I really am no judge of those things, and with all my natural partiality for one's own productions, I would rather follow any one's judgment than my own.

"P. S. Pray let me have the proofs I sent, all to-night. I have some alterations that I wish to make speedily. I hope the proof will be on separate pages, and not all huddled together on a mile-long ballad-singing sheet, as those of the 'Giaour sometimes are; for then I can't read them distinctly."

* The Bride of Abydos.
LETTER CLXXXIII.

To MR. MURRAY.

"Mr. Hodgson has looked over and stopped, or rather pointed, this revise, which must be the one to print from. He has also made some suggestions, with most of which I have complied, as he has always, for the last ten years, been a very sincere, and by no means (at times) flattering, intimate of mine. He likes it (you will think flatteringly, in this instance) better than the Giaour, but doubts (and so do I) its being so popular, but, contrary to some others, advises a separate publication. On this we can easily decide. I confess I like the double form better. Hodgson says, it is 'better versified than any of the others; which is odd, if true, as it has cost me less time (though more hours at a time) than any attempt I ever made.

"P. S. Do attend to the punctuation: I can't, for I don't know a comma—at least, where to place one."

"That tory of a printer has omitted two lines of the opening, and perhaps more, which were in the MS. Will you, pray, give him a hint of accuracy? I have re-inserted the two, but they were in the manuscript, I can swear."

NOTE TO MR. MURRAY.

"Nov. 13, 1818."

"Will you forward the letter to Mr. Gifford with the proof? There is an alteration I may make in Zuleika's speech, in second canto (the only one of hers in that canto). It is now thus:"

"And, since, if I could, I try with purpose to write your love truly,
That saw my solitary birth, &c."

"Ever yours, A."

"In the last MS. lines sent, instead of 'living heart,' convert to 'quivering heart.' It is in the line 9th of the MS. passage.
"Ever yours again, B."

NOTE TO MR. MURRAY.

"Alteration of a line in canto second.
Instead of—"

"And dime to-morrow with a fisted ray,
And dime to-morrow with prophetic ray.
The evening beam that smiles the clouds away,
And dime to-morrow with prophetic ray;"

"And gilds the hope of morning with his ray;
And gilds to-morrow's hope with heavenly ray."

"I wish you would ask Mr. Gifford which of them is best, or rather not worst."

"Ever, &c."

"You can send the request contained in this to the same time with the revise, after I have seen the said revise."

NOTE TO MR. MURRAY.

"Nov. 13, 1818."

"Certainly. Do you suppose that no one but the Galliwops are acquainted with Adam, and Eve, and Cain, & Noah? Surely, I might have had Solomon, and Abraham, and David, and even Moses. When you know that Zuleika is the Persian poetical name for Potiphar's wife, on whom and Joseph there is a long poem, in the Persian, this will not surprise you. If you want authority, look at Jones D'Herbelot, Vathek, or the notes to the Arabian Nights; and, if you think it necessary, model this into a note."

"Alter, in the inscription, 'the most affectionate respect,' to 'with every sentiment of regard and respect.'"

NOTE TO MR. MURRAY.

"Nov. 14, 1818."

"I send you a note for the ignorant, but I really wonder at finding you among them. I don't care one lump of sugar for my poetry, but for my costume and my correctness on those points, (of which I think the funeral was a proof,) I will combat lustily."

"Yours, &c."

"Nov. 14, 1818."

"Let the revise which I sent just now (and not the proof in Mr. Gifford's possession) be returned to the printer, as there are several additional corrections, and two new lines in it.
"Yours, &c."

NOTE TO MR. MURRAY.

Nov. 26, 1816.

"More work for the Row. I am doing my best to beat the 'Giaour;'—no difficult task for any one but the author."

* Some doubt had been expressed by Mr. Murray as to the propriety of the putting the name of Cain into the mouth of a Mussulman.

† See note 26, to the Bride of Abdyssia.

‡ See note 25, to the Bride of Abdyssia.
NOTE TO MR. MURRAY.

"Nov. 22, 1813.

"I have no time to cross-investigate, but I believe and hope all is right. I care less than you will believe about its success, but I can't survive a single misprint: it chokes me to see words misused by the printers. Pray look over, in case of some eye-core escaping me.

"P. S. Send the earliest copies to Mr. Freere, Mr. Canning, Mr. Heber, Mr. Gifford, Lord Holland, Lord Melbourne (Whitall,) Lady Caroline Lamb (Upton), Mr. Hodgson (Cambridge,) Mr. Meredith, Mr. Ward, from the author."

NOTE TO MR. MURRAY.

"Nov. 26, 1813.

"You wanted some reflections, and I send you per Selim, (see his speech in canto II., page 46,) eighteen lines in dear couples, of a pensive, if not an ethereal tendency. One more revise—positively the last, if decently done—at any rate the penultimate. Mr. Canning's approbation (if he did approve) I need not say makes me proud. As to printing, print as you will and how you will—by itself, if you like; but let me have a few copies in sheets.

"You must pardon me once more, as it is all for your good: it must be thus—

"He makes a solitude, and calls it peace.

'Makes' is closer to the passage of Tacitus, from which the line is taken, and is, besides, a stronger word than 'leaves.'

'Mark where his sausage and his corpulent face,
He makes a solitude, and calls it—peace.'"

LETTER CLXXXV.

TO MR. MURRAY.

"Nov. 27, 1813.

"If you look over this carefully by the last proof, with my corrections, it is probably right; this you can do as well or better—I have not now time. The copies I mentioned to be sent to different friends last night, I should wish to be made up with the new Giaours, if it also is ready. If not, send the Giaour afterward.

"The Morning Post says I am the author of Nourjahad!!! This comes of lending the drawings for their dresses; but it is not worth a formal contradiction. Besides, the criticisms on the supposition will some of them, be quite amusing and furious. The Orientalism—which I hear is very splendid—of the melodrame (whosoever it's, and I am sure I don't know) is as good as an advertisement for your Eastern Stories, by filling their heads with glitter.

"P. S. You will of course say the truth, that I am not the melodramatist—if any one charges me in your presence with the performance."

LETTER CLXXXVI.

TO MR. MURRAY.

"Nov. 28, 1813.

"Send another copy (if not too much of a request) to Lady Holland of the Journal, in your name, when you receive this: it is for Earl Grey—and I will relinquish my own. Also, to Mr. Sarpe, and Lady Holland, and Lady Caroline Lamb, copies of 'The Bride,' as soon as convenient.

"P. S. Mr. Ward and myself still continue our purpose; but I shall not trouble you on any arrangement on the score of the Giaour—and The Bride till our return—or, at any rate, before May, which is, six months from hence: and before that time you will be able to ascertain how far your offer may be a losing one; if so, you can deduct proportionately; and if not, I shall not at any rate allow you to go higher than your present proposals, which is very handsomely, and more than fair.*

*I have had—but this must be entre nous, a very kind note, on the subject of 'The Bride,' from Sir James Macintosh, and an invitation to go there this evening, which it is now too late to accept."

NOTE TO MR. MURRAY.

"Nov. 29, 1813.

"Sunday-Monday morning—I shuck in my pocket and bow, an engraving.

"I send you in time an entire page, containing an omission of mine which must be thus added, as it is too late for insertion in the text. The passage is an imitation altogether from Medea in Ovid, and is incomplete without these two lines. Pray let this be done, and directly: it is necessary for me to add one page to your book (making), and can do no harm, and is yet in time for the public. Answer me, thou oracle, in the affirmative. You can send the loose pages to those who have copies already, if they like; but certainly to all the critical copy-holders.

"P. S. I have got out of my bed, (in which, however, I could not sleep, whether I had amended this or not,) and so good morning. I am trying whether De L'Allemagne will act as an opiate, but I doubt it."
NOTE TO MR. MURRAY.

"Nov. 30, 1813.

"Print this at the end of all that is of the 'Bride of Abydos,' as an errata page."

"BN."

"Omitted, canto II., page 47, after line cccxxix.

Read

"So that some one may know which neck.

"Then if my lip were a marvellous mystery, it must be no sign for safety, but a prayer for thee!"

NOTE TO MR. MURRAY.

"Tuesday evening, Nov. 30, 1813.

"For the sake of correctness, particularly in an errata page, the alteration of the couplet I have just sent (half an hour ago) must take place, in spite of delay or cancel; let me see the proof early to-morrow. I found out murrerm to be a neuter, and have been obliged to alter the line so as to make it a substantive, thus—

"The downmost, murmur of this lip shall be no sign for safety, but a prayer for thee!"

Don't send the copies to the country till this is all right."

NOTE TO MR. MURRAY.

"Dec. 2, 1813.

"When you can, let the couplet enclosed be inserted either in the page, or in the errata page. I trust it is in time for some of the copies. This alteration is in the same part—the page but one before the last correction sent.

"P. S. I am afraid, from all I hear, that people are rather acute in their expectations, which is very unlucky, but cannot now be helped. This comes of Mr. Perry and one of his wise friends; but do not you wind your hopes of success to the same pitch, for fear of accidents, and I can assure you that my philosophy will stand the test very fairly; and I have done every thing to ensure you, at all events, from positive loss, which will be some satisfaction to you.""

NOTE TO MR. MURRAY.

"Dec. 3, 1813.

"I send you a scratch or two, the which shall. The Christian Observer is very savage, but certainly well written—and quite uncomfortable at the naughtiness of book and author. I rather suspect you won't much like the present to be more moral, if it is as good as also the usual fate of your virtuous volumes.

"Let me see a proof of the size before incorporation."

NOTE TO MR. MURRAY.

"Monday evening, Dec. 6, 1813.

"It is very well, except that the lines are not numbered properly, and a diabolical mistake, page 67, which must be corrected with the pen, if no other way remains; it is the omission of 'not' before 'diagnose' in the Augustan rosary. This is really horrible, and nearly as bad as the stumbler of mine at the threshold—I mean the misnomer of Bride. Pray do not let a copy go without the 'not'; it is nonsense and worse than nonsense as it now stands. I wish the printer was saddled with a vampire."

"P. S. It is still hath instead of have in page 29 never was any one so missed as I am by your devilish printers."

"P. S. I hope and trust the 'not' was inserted in the first edition. We must have something—any thing—to set it right. It is enough to arrange for one's own bulls, without other people's."

LETTER CLXXXVIII.

TO MR. MURRAY.

"Dec. 27, 1813.

"Lord Holland is laid up with the gout, and would feel very much obliged if you could obtain, and send as soon as possible, Madame D'Arlay's (or even Miss Edgeworth's) new work. I know they are not out; but it is possible for your Majesty to command what we cannot with much suing purchase, as yet. I need not say that when you are able or willing to confer the same favor on me, I shall be obliged. I would almost fall sick myself to get at Madame D'Arlay's writings.

"P. S. You were talking to-day of the American edition of a certain unquenchable memorial of my younger days. As it can't be helped now, I own I have some curiosity to see a copy of Transatlantic typography. This you will perhaps obtain, and one for yourself; but I must beg that you will not import more, because, seriously, I do wish to have that thing forgotten as much as it has been forgiven.

"If you send to the Globe editor, say that I want neither excuse nor contradiction, but merely a discontinuance of a most ill-grounded charge. I never was consistent in any thing but my politics; and as my redemption depends on that solitary virtue, it is murder to carry away my last anchor.""

LETTER CLXXXIX.

TO MR. ASHE.

"I Bennet street, St. James's, Dec. 14, 1813.

"SIR.

"I leave town for a few days to-morrow; on my return, I will answer your letter more at length. Whatever may be your situation, I cannot but commend your resolution to abjure and abandon the publication and composition of works such as those to which you have alluded. Depend upon it, they amuse few, disgrace both reader and writer, and benefit none. It will be my wish to assist you, as far as my limited means will admit, to break such a bondage. In your answer, inform me what sum you think would enable you to extricate your self from the hands of your employers, and to regain at least temporary independence, and I shall be glad to contribute my mite towards it. At present I must conclude. Your name is not unknown to me, and I regret, for your own sake, *

* Author of a publication relating to the Queen, called "The Book; also of "Travels through America," and other notorious libels. He had written to Lord Byron, alleging poverty as his reason for the books in which he had prostituted his pen, and soliciting the means of "sustaining some honest employment."
that you have ever learnt it to the works you mention. In saying this, I merely repeat your own words in your letter to me, and have no wish whatever to say a single syllable that may appear to insult your misfortunes. If I have, excuse me; it is unintentional. "Yours, &c."

"BYRON."

[In answer to this letter, Ashe mentioned as the sin necessary to extricate him from his difficulties, 1801—and, some short delay having occurred in the reply to this demand, he, in renewing his suit, complained, it appears, of neglect.]

---

LETTER CXC.

TO MR. ASHE. "Jan. 5, 1814."

"Sir, "

"When you accuse a stranger of neglect, you forget that it is possible business or absence from London may have interfered to delay his answer, as has actually occurred in the present instance. But to the point. I am willing to do what I can to extricate you from your situation. Your first scheme I was considering; but your own impatience appears to have rendered it abortive, if not irretrievable. I will deposit in Mr. Murray's hands (with his consent) the sum you mentioned, to be advanced for the time at ten pounds per month."

"P. S. I write in the greatest hurry, which may make my letter a little abrupt; but, as I said before, I have no wish to distress your feelings."

---

LETTER CXCI.

TO MR. OALT. "Dec. 11, 1813."

"My Dear GALT, "

"There was no offence—there could be none.* I thought it by no means impossible that we might have hit on something similar, particularly as you are a dramatist and was anxious to assure you of the truth, viz., that I had not wittingly seised upon plot, sentiment, or incident; and I am very glad that I have not in any respect trespassed upon your subjects. Something still more singular is, that the first part, where you have found a coincidence in some events within your observations on life, was drawn from observation of mine also; and I meant to have gone on with the story, but on second thoughts, I thought myself two centuries at least too late for the subject; which, though admitting of very powerful feeling and description, yet is not adapted for this age, & least this country, though the finest works of the Greeks, one of Schiller's and Alfieri's, in modern times, besides several of our old (and best) dramatists, have been grounded on incidents of a similar cast. I therefore altered it as you perceive, and, in doing so, have weakened the whole by interrupting the train of thought; and, in composition, I do not think second thoughts are the best; though second expressions may improve the first ideas. "I do not know how other men feel towards those they have met abroad, but to me there seems a kind of tie established between all who have met together in a foreign country, as if we had met in a state of preexistence, and were talking over a tale that has ceased; but I always look forward to renewing my travels, and though you, I think, are now stationary, if I can at all forward your pursuits there as well as here, I shall be truly glad in the opportunity. "Ever yours very sincerely, "B."

"P. S. I believe I leave town for a day or two on Monday, but after that I am always at home and happy to see you until half past two."

---

LETTER CXCII.

TO MR. LEIGH HUNT. "Dec. 23, 1814."

"My Dear Sir, "

"I am, indeed, in your debt—and what is still worse, am obliged to follow royal example, [he has just apprized his creditors that they must wait till the meeting, and entreat your indulgence for, I hope, a very short time. The nearest relation, and almost the only friend I possess, has been in London for a week, and leaves it to-morrow, with me, for her own residence. I return immediately; but we meet so seldom, and are so sudden in my absence, that you may be sure I shall have no more and I am glad to see you perform it. Yesterday I had a letter from Moore; you have probably heard from him lately; but if not, you will be glad to learn that he is the same in heart, head, and health."

---

LETTER CXCIII.

TO MR. MERIVALE. "Jan. 1814."

"My Dear Merivale, "

"I have redded Roncevaux with very great pleasure, and, if I were so disposed, see very little room for criticism. There is a choice of two lines in one of the last cantos,—I think 'Live and protect' better, because 'Oh who?' implies a doubt of Roland's power of inclination. I would allow the— нагу that point yourself must determine on—I mean the doubt as to where to place a part of the poem, whether between the actions or no. Only it you wish to have all the success you deserve, never listen to friends, and— as I am not the least troublesome of the number—least of all to me. "I hope you will be out soon. March, sir, March, is the month for the trade, and they must be considered. You have written a very noble poem, and nothing but the detestable taste of the day can do you harm,—but I think you will beat it Your measure is uncommonly well chosen and wielded." * * * * * * "

---

LETTER CXCIV.

TO MR. MURRAY. "Sunday, Jan. 2, 1814."

"Excuse this dirty paper—it is the posthumous half-sheet of a quire. Thanks for your book and th. Ln. Chron. which I return. The Corsair is copied and now at Lord Holland's; but I wish Mr. Giffon to have it to-night. "Mr. Dallas is very peremptory, so that I have of sented both him and you, when I really meant to do good, at least to one, and certainly not to annoy either. But I shall manage him, I hope. I am pretty confident of the Tale itself; but one cannot be sure. If I get it from Lord Holland, it shall be sent. Yours, &c."

LETTER CXCV.

TO MR. MOORE.

Jan. 6, 1814.

"I have got a devil of a long story in the press, entitled 'The Corsair,' in the regular heroic measure. It is a pirate's tale, peopled with my own creatures, and you may easily suppose they do a world of mischief through the three cantos. Now for your Dedication—if you will accept it. This is positively my last experiment on public literary opinion, till I turn my thirtieth year. If so be I flourish until that downwhill period. I have a confidence for you—a perceiving one to me, and, just at present, in a state of abeyance in itself. However, we shall see. In the mean time, you may amuse yourself with my suspense, and put all the justices of the peace in requisition, in case I come into your county with 'hack but bent.'

"Seriously, whether I am to hear from her or him, it is a pause, which I shall fill up with as few thoughts of my own as I can borrow from other people. Any thing is better than stagnation; and now, in the interregnum of my autumn and a strange summer adventure, which I don't like to think of; ('I don't mean,' &c., however, which is laughable only,) the antithetical state of my incumbrations makes me alive, and Macbeth can 'sleep no more:'—he was lucky in getting rid of the drowsy sensation of waking again.

"Pray write to me. I must send you a copy of the letter of Dedication. When do you come out? I am sure we don't clash this time, for I am all at sea, and in action,—and a wife, and a mistress, &c., &c.

"Thomas, thou art a happy fellow; but if you wish us to be so, you must come up to town, as you did last year; and we shall have a world to say, and to see, and to hear. Let me hear from you.

"P. S. Of course you will keep my secret, and don't even talk in your sleep of it. Happen what may, your Dedication is ensured, being already written; and I shall copy it out fair to-night, in case business or amusement—Amant altera Causa.""

NOTE TO MR. MURRAY.

Jan. 7, 1814.

"You don't like the Dedication—very well; there is an other; but you will send the other to Mr. Moore, that he may know I had written it. I send also mottoes for the cantos. I think you will allow that an elephant may be more sagacious, but cannot be more docile.

"Yours, "EN.

"The name is again altered to Medora."

LETTER CXCVI.

TO MR. MOORE.

Jan. 9, 1814.

"As it would not be fair to press you into a Dedication, without previous notice, I send you two, and I will tell you why two. The first, Mr. Murray, who sometimes takes upon him the critic (and I bear it from astonishment) says, may do you harm—God forbid! this alone makes me listen to him. The fact is, he is a damned Tory, and has, I dare say, something of self which I cannot divine, at the bottom of his objection, as it is the allusion to Ireland to which he objects. But he be d—d, though a good fellow enough, (your sinner would not be worth a d—n.)

"Take your choice; no one save he and Mr Dallas, has seen either, and D. is quite on my side, and for the first. If I can but testify to you and the world how truly I admire and esteem you, I shall be quite satisfied. As to prose, I don't know Addison's from Johnson's; but I will try to mend my ecology. Pray perpend, pronounce, and don't be offended with either.

"My last epistle would probably put you in a fidget. But the Devil, who ought to be civil on such occasions, proved so, and took my letter to the right place."

"Is it not odd? the very fate I said she had escaped from *; she has now undergone from the worthy * *. Like Mr. Fitzgerald, shall I not lay claim to the character of 'Vates?' as he did in the Morning Herald for prophesying the fall of Bonaparte, who, by-the-by, I don't think is yet fallen. I wish he would rally and rout your legitimate sovereigns, having a mortal hate to all royal entuis. But I am swarming a treatise. Good night. Ever, &c."

NOTE TO MR. MURRAY.

Jan. 11, 1814.

"Correct this proof by Mr. Gifford's (and from the MSS,) particularly as to the pointing. I have added a section for Gulnare, to fill up the parting and dismiss her more ceremoniously. If Mr. Gifford or you dislike, 'tis but a sponge, and another midnight better employed than in yawning over Miss * *; who, by-the-by, may soon return the compliment.

"Wednesday or Thursday.

"P. S. I have redde *. It is full of praises of Lord Ellenborough!! (from which I infer near and dear relations at the bar,) and "I do not love Madame de Stael, but depend upon it, she beats all your natives hollow as an ane thores, in my opinion; and I would not say this if I could help it.

"P. S. Pray report my best acknowledgements to Mr. Gifford in any words that may best express to a gentleman truly his kindness obliges me. I won't b—re him with lip thanks or notes."

NOTE TO MR. MOORE.

Jan. 13, 1814.

"I have but a moment to write, but all as it should be. I have said really far short of my opinion, but if you think enough, I am content. Will you return the proof by the post, as I leave town on Sunday, and have no other corrected copy. I put 'servant,' as being less familiar before the public, because I don't like presuming upon our friendship to infringe upon forms. As to the other word, you may be sure it is one I cannot hear or repeat too often.

"I write in an agony of haste and confusion—Perdonate.

* The first was the one preferred. The other was as follows:

"My Dear Moore,

"I had written to you a long letter of dedication, which I suppress, because though it contained something relating to you which every one had been glad to hear, yet there was too much about politics, and party, and all things whatsoever, ending with that topic on which most men are floored and most very amusing—one's self. It might have been rewritten but to what purpose? My praise could add nothing to your well-earned and well-meritaed fame; and with my most hearty adoration of your talent, and delight in your conversation, you are already acquainted. In awarding myself a leisure friendly permission to write this poem to you, I can only wish its offering were as worthy your acceptance as your regard is dear to You, most affectionately and kindly,

"BYRON."
LETTER CXCVII.

TO MR. MURRAY.

"Jan. 15, 1814.

"Before any proof goes to Mr. Gifford, it may be as well to revise this, where there are words omitted, faults committed, and the devil knows what. As to the dedication, I cut out the parenthesis of Mr.* but not another word shall I tinker with for a better. Mr. Moore has seen, and decidedly preferred, the part your Toby bile sickness at. If every syllable were a rattlesnake, or every letter a pestilence, they should not be expunged. Let those who cannot swallow, chew the expressions on Ireland; or should even Mr. Croker array himself in all his terror against them, I care for none of you, except Gifford; and he won't abuse me except I deserve it—which will at least reconcile me to his justice. As to the poems in Hobhouse's volume,† the translation from the Romance is well enough; but the best of the other volume (of mine, I mean) have been already printed. But do as you please—only, as I shall be absent when you come out, do, pray, let Mr. Dallas and you have a care of the press.

"Yours, &c."

NOTE TO MR. MURRAY.

[1814. Jan. 16.]

"I do believe that the Devil never created or perverted such a fiend as the fool of a printer. I am obliged to enclose you, luckily for me, this second proof, corrected, because there is an immaturity in his blunders peculiar to himself. Let the press be guided by the present sheet.

"Yours, &c."

"Burn the other.

"Correct this also by the others in some things which I may have forgotten. There is one mistake he made, which, if it had stood, I would most certainly have broken his neck."

LETTER CXCVII.

TO MR. MURRAY.

"Newstead Abbey, Jan. 22, 1814.

"You will be glad to hear of my safe arrival here. The time of my return will depend upon the weather, which is so impracticable that this letter has to advance through more snows than ever opposed the emperor's retreat. The roads are impassable, and return impossible for the present; which I do not regret, as I am much at my ease, and six-and-twenty complete this day—a very pretty age, if it would always last. Our coals are excellent, our fire-places large, my cell full, and my head empty; and I have not yet recovered my joy at leaving London. If any unexpected turn occurs with my purchasers, I believe I should hardly quit the place at all; but shut my door and let my beard grow.

"I forget to mention (and I hope it is unnecessary) that the lines beginning—Remember him, &c.—must not appear with the Corsair. You may slip them in with the smaller pieces newly annexed to Childe Harold; but on no account permit them to be appended to the Corsair. Have the goodness to recollect this particularly.

"The books I have brought with me are a great consolation for the confinement, and I bought more as we came along. In short, I never consult the thermometer, and shall not put up prayers for them, unless I thought it would sweep away the rascally invaders of France. Was ever such a thing as Blucher's proclamation?"

* He had, at first, after the words "Scorn alone, " Inserted, in a pencil, in a parenthesis."
† He will excuse the Mr.—we do not say Mr. Caner."

[See Poems, p. 509.
see Poems, p. 366.]

"Just before I left town, Kemble paid me the compliment of desiring me to write a tragedy; I wish I could, but find my scribbling mood subsiding—not before it was time; but it is lucky to check it at all. If I lengthen my letter you will think it is coming on again; so, good-bye.

"Yours always,

"B."

"P. S. If you hear any news of battle or retreat on the part of the Allies, (as they call them,) pray send it. He has my best wishes to manure the fields of France with an invading army. I hate invaders of all countries, and have no patience with the cowardly cry of exultation over him, at whose name you all turned whiter than the snow to which you are indebted for your triumphs.

"I open my letter to thank you for yours just received. The 'Limes to a Lady Weeping' must go with the Corsair. I care nothing for consequence on this point. My politics are to me like a young mistress to an old man—the worse they grow, the fonder I become of them. As Mr. Gifford likes the Portuguese Translation,† pray insert it as an addition to the Corsair.

"In all points of difference between Mr. Gifford and Mr. Dallas, let the first keep his place; and in all differences between Mr. Gifford and Mr. Murray, I shall abide by the former; if I am wrong, I can't help it. But I would rather not be right with any other person. So there is an end of that matter.

"After all the trouble he has taken about my books, and mine, I should be very ungrateful to feel or act otherwise. Besides, in point of judgment, he is not to be lowered by a comparison. In politics he may be right too; but that with me is a feeling, and I can't terify my nature."

LETTER CXCIX.

TO MR. MURRAY.

"Newstead Abbey, Feb. 4, 1814.

"I need not say that your obliging letter was very welcome, and not the less so for being unexpected.

"It doubtless gratifies me much that our finals has pleased, and that the curtain does hold, for your promptitude and good nature in arranging immediately with Mr. Dallas, and I can assure you that I esteem your entering so warmly into the subject, and writing so soon, very much.

"We shall now part, I hope, satisfied with each other. I was and am quite in earnest in my preface promise not to intrude any more; and this not from any affectation, but a thorough conviction that it is the best policy, and is at least respectful to my readers, as it shows I would not willingly run the risk of forfeiting their favor in future. Besides, I have other views and objects, and think that I shall keep this resolution. Since I left London, though shut up, snow-bound, and thaw-bound, and tempted with all kinds of paper, the dirtiest of ink, and the bluntest of pens, I have not even been haunted by a wish to put them to their combined use, except in letters of business. My rhyming propensity is quite gone, and I feel much as I did at Patras on recovering from my fever—weak, but in health; and only afraid of nothing."

* His translation of the pretty Portuguese song, "Tu mi chama." He was tempted to try another version of this ingenious thought, which is perhaps will have more happiness.

† You will see all your life—ah, I change the word—"Lift's a translation of the "lamentest sight!

"Say, rather, I'm your soul, more just that name.

"Poor, like the soul, my love can never die."—Moore.

‡ It will be recollected that he had announced the Corsair as "one last production with which he should charge the public grudge for seven years."
of a relapse I do most frequently hope I never shall.

"I see by the Morning Chronicle there hath been discussion in the Courier; and I read in the Morning Post a wrathful letter about Mr. Moore, in which some Presbyterians have made a sad confusion about India and Ireland.

"You are to do as you please about the smaller poems; but I think removing them now from the Corsair looks like fear; and if so, you must allow me not to be pleased. I should also suppose that, after the fuss of these newspaper esquires, they would materially assist the circulation of the Corsair; an object I should imagine at present of more importance to yourself than Childe Harold's seventh appearance. Do as you like; but don't allow the withdrawing that poem to draw any imputation of dismay upon me."

"Pray make my respects to Mr. Ward, whose praise I value highly, as you well know; it is in the approbation of such men that fame becomes worth having. To Mr. Gifford I am always grateful, and surely not less so now than ever. And so good night to my authorship.

"I have been sauntering and dozing here very quietly and not unhappily. You will be happy to hear that I have completely established my title deeds as marketable, and that the purchaser has succumbed to the terms, and fulfils them, or is to fulfil them forthwith. He is now here and we go on very amicably together—one in each wing of the Abbey. We set off on Sunday—I for town, he for Cheshire.

"Mrs. Leigh is with me—much pleased with the place, and less so with me for parting with it, to which not even the price can reconcile her. Your parcel has not yet arrived—at least the Maga, &c.; but I have received Childe Harold and the Corsair. I believe both are very correctly printed, which is a great satisfaction.

"I thank you for wishing me in town; but I think one's success is most felt at a distance, and I enjoy my solitary self-importance in an agreeable sulky way of my own, upon the strength of your letter—for which I once more thank you, and am, very truly, &c.

"P.S. Don't you think Bomparte's next publication will be rather expensive to the Allies? Perry's Paris letter of yesterday looks very reviving. What a Hydra and Briareus it is! I wish they would pacify: there is no end to this campaigning."

LETTER CC.

TO MR. MURRAY.

"Newstead Abbey, Feb 5, 1814.

"I quite forgot, in my answer of yesterday, to mention that I have no means of ascertaining whether the Newark Pirate has been doing what you say.† If so, he is a rascal, and a shabby rascal to boot; and if his offence is punishable by law or public opinion, he shall be caught and punished. Do you try and discover, and I will make some inquiry here. Perhaps some other in town may have gone on printing, and used the same deception.

"The false simulation is omitted in Childe Harold, which is very awkward, and there is a note expressly on the subject. Pray replace it as usual.

"On second and third thoughts, the withdrawing the small poems from the Corsair (even to add to Childe Harold) looks like a mistake, after the fuss made upon one of them by the Tories. Pray replace them in the Corsair's appendix. I am sorry that Childe Harold requires some and such abatements to make him move off; but, if you remember, I told you his popularity would not be permanent. It is very lucky for the author that he had made up his mind to a temporary reputation in time. The truth is, I do not think any of the present day (and least of all, one who has not consulted the flattering side of human nature) have much to hope from posterity; and you may think it affectation very probably, but I assure you it is not. I have presented and past success has appeared so very singular, since it was in the teeth of so many prejudices. I almost think people like to be contradicted. If Childe Harold flags, it will hardly be worth while to redeem it by engraving; but do as you please; I have done with the whole concern: and the enclosed lines written years ago, and copied from my skull-cap, are among the last with which you will be troubled. If you like, add them to Childe Harold, if only for the sake of another outcry. You received so long an answer yesterday, that I will not intrude on you further than to repeat myself,

"Yours, &c."

NOTE TO MR. MURRAY.

"Newark, Feb 6, 1814.

"I am thus far on my way to town. Master Ridge† I have seen, and he owns to having reprinted some sheets, to make up a few complete remaining copies! I have now given him fair warning, and if he plays such tricks again, I must either get an injunction, or call for an account of profits, (as I never have parted with the copyright,) or, in short, any thing vexatious to repay him in his own way. If the weather does not relapse, I hope to be in town in a day or two.

"Yours, &c."

LETTER CCLI.

TO MR. HODGSON.

"Feb 28, 1814.

"There is a youngster—and a clever one, named Reynolds, who has just published a poem called 'Safe,' published by Cawthorne. He is in the most natural and fearful apprehension of the Reviewers—and as you and I both know by experience the effect of such things upon a young mind, I wish you would take his production into dissection, and do it gently. I cannot, because it is inscribed to me; but I assure you this is not except in wishing him to be tenderly treated, but because I know the misery, at his time of life, of untoward remarks upon first appearance.

"The printer at Newark.

† To a Lady Weeping."
"Now for self. Pray thank your cousin—it is just as it should be, to my liking, and probably more than will suit any one else's. I hope and trust that you are well, and well doing. Peace be with you. Ever yours, my dear friend."

LETTER CCIII.

TO MR. MOORE.  "Feb. 10, 1814.

"A arrived in town late yesterday evening, having been absent three weeks, which I passed in Notts, quietly and pleasantly. You can have no conception of the uproar the eight lines on the little Royalty's weeping in 1812 (now republished) haveoccasioned. The Regent, who had always thought them yours, chose—God knows why—on discovering them to be mine, to be affected, 'in sorrow rather than anger.' The Morning Post, Sun, Herald, Courier, have all been in hysterics ever since. Murray is in a fit, and wants to shuffle—and if any abuse against me in all directions is vehement, unceasing, loud—some of it good, and all of it hearty. I feel a little cabin'd and I to the Regent's regret—would he had been only angry! but I fear him not.

"Some of these same assailments you have probably seen. My person (which is excellent for 'the nonce') has been denounced in verses, the more like the subject, inasmuch as they half exceedingly. Then, in another, I am an atheist—a rebel—and at last, the devil ('boiteux, I presume.) My demonism seems to be a female's conjecture: if so, perhaps I could convince her that I am but a mere mortal,—if a queen of the Amazons may be believed, who says анъ тъя эйс тёй. I quote from memory, so my Greek is probably deficient; but the passage is meant to mean.

"Seriously, I am in, what the learned call, a dilemma, and the vulgar, a scrape; and my friends desire me not to be in a passion, and like Sir Fretful, I assure them that I am 'quite calm,'—but I am nevertheless in a fury.

"Since I wrote thus far, a friend has come in, and we have been talking and buffooning, till I have quite lost the thread of my thoughts; and, as I won't send them unstripped to you, good morning; and expect me ever, &c.

"P. S. Murray, during my absence, omitted the Tears in several of the copies. I have made him replace them, and am very wroth with his quails—and as the wine is poured out, let it be drank to the dregs.'"

NOTE TO MR. MURRAY.  "Feb. 10, 1814.

"I am much better, and indeed quite well this morning. I have received two, but I presume there are more of the Ana, subsequently, and also something previous, to which the Morning Chronicle replied. You also mentioned a parody on the Skull, I wish to see them all, because there may be things that require notice either by pen or person.

"Yours, &c.

"You need not trouble yourself to answer this; but send me the things when you get them."

NOTE TO MR. MURRAY.  "Feb. 12, 1814.

"If you have copies of the 'Intercepted Letters,' Lady Holland would be glad of a volume, and when you have served others, have the goodness to think of your humble servant.

"You have played the devil by that injudicious suppression, which you did totally without my consent. Some of the papers have exactly said what might be expected. Now I do not, and evil not be supposed to shrunk, although myself and everything belonging to me were to perish with my memory.

"Yours, &c.

"P. S. Pray attend to what I stated yesterday on technical topics."

LETTER CCIII.

TO MR. HUNT.  "Feb. 9, 1814.

"My Dear Sir,

"I have been snow-bound and thaw-swamped (two compound epithets for you) in the 'valley of the shadow' of Newstead Abbey for nearly a month, and have not been four hours returned to London. Nearly the first use I make of my benumbed fingers, is to thank you for your very handsome note in the Morning Post of your volume; it has been followed by others on subjects more worthy your notice than the works of contemporaries. Of myself, you speak only too highly, and you must think me strangely sparing, or perverse, to suspect that any remarks of yours, in the spirit of candid criticism, could possibly prove unpalatable. Had they been harsh, instead of being written as they are, in the indelible ink and friendly admonition, had they been the harshest—as I knew and know that you are above any personal bias, at least, against your fellow-bards, believe me, they would not have caused a remonstrance, nor a moment of ranking on my part. Your, noem I read long ago in the 'Reflector,' and it is not much to say it is the best 'Session' we have, and with a more difficult subject, for we are neither so good nor so bad (taking the best and worst) as the wits of the olden time.

"To your smaller pieces I have not yet had time to do justice by perusal, and I have a quantity of unanswered, and I hope unanswerable, letters to wade through before I sleep, but to-morrow will see me through your volume. I am glad to see you have tracked Gray among the Italians. You will perhaps find a friend or two of yours there also, through not to the same extent; but I have always thought the Italians the most poetical moderns; our Milton and Spenser, and Shakespeare, (the last through translations of their Tales,) are very Tuscan, and surely it is far superior to the French school. You are hardly fair enough to foreigners. Why fear you might surely have given him supper, if only a sandwich. Murray has, I hope, sent you my last hintling, 'The Corsair.' I have been regaled at every inn on the road by lampoons and other merry conceits on myself in the ministerial gazettes, occasioned by the republication of two stanzas, inserted in 1812, in Perry's paper. The hysterics of the Morning Post are quite interesting; and I hear (but have not seen) of something terrific in a last week's Courier: all which I take with the 'calm indifference' of Sir Fretful Plagiary. The Morning Post has one copy of devices upon my deformity, which certainly will admit of no 'historical doubts' like 'Dickon my master's;' another upon my atheism, which is not quite so clear; and another very down rightly says, 'I am a devil,' (boiteux, they might have added,) and a rebel, and what not. My accuser of diabolism may be Rosa Matilda; and if so, it would not be difficult to convince her that I am a mere man. I shall break in upon you in a day or two; distance has hitherto detained me; and I hope to find you well, and myself welcome.

"Ever your obliging and sincere,  "BYRON"
LETTER CCIV.
TO MR. MURRAY.

"Monday, Feb. 14, 1814.

Before I left town yesterday, I wrote you a letter, by which I presume you received it. I have heard so many different accounts of your proceedings, or rather of those of others towards you, in consequence of the publication of these everlasting lines, that I am anxious to hear from yourself the real state of the case. Whatever responsibility, obloquy, or effect is to arise from the publication, should surely not fall upon you in any degree; and I can have no objection to your stating, as distinctly and publicly as you please, your unwillingness to publish them, and my own obstinacy upon the subject. Take any course you please to vindicate yourself, but leave me to fight my own way, and, as I before said, do not compromise me by any thing which may make the best of it."

"Yours,

"BY."

LETTER CCV.
TO MR. ROGERS.

"Feb. 16, 1814.

My DEAR ROGERS,

"I wrote to Lord Holland briefly, but I hope distinctly, on the subject which has lately occupied much of my conversation with him and you. As things now stand, upon that topic my determination must be unalterable.

"I declare to you most sincerely that there is no human being on whose regard and esteem I set a higher value than on Lord Holland's; and, as far as concerns myself, I would concede even to humiliation without any view to the future, and solely from my sense of his conduct as to the past. For the rest, I conceive that I have already done all in my power by the suppression. If that is not enough, they must act as they please; but I will not teach my tongue a most inherent baseness, come what may. You will probably be at the Marquis Lansdowne's to-night. I am asked, but I am not sure that I shall be able to go. Hobhouse will be there. I think, if you knew him well, you would like him."

"Believe me always, yours very affectionately,

"II."

LETTER CCVI.
TO MR. ROGERS.

"Feb. 16, 1814.

"If Lord Holland is satisfied, as far as regards himself and Lady Fd., and as this letter expresses him to be, it is enough.

"As for any impression the public may receive from the revival of the lines on Lord Carlisle, let them keep it—the more favorable for him, and the worse for me—better for all.

"All the sayings and doings in the world shall not make me utter another word of conciliation to any thing that breathes. I shall bear what I can, and what I cannot, I shall resist. The worst they could do would be to exclude me from society. I have never counted it, nor, I may add, in the general sense of the word, enjoyed it—and 'there is a world elsewhere'!

"Any thing remarkably injurious, I have the same means of repaying as other men, with such in interest as circumstances may annex to it.

"Nothing but the necessity of the occasion to regiments prevents me from dining with you to-morrow.

"I am yours most truly,

"BY."

LETTER CCVII.
TO MR. MOORE.

"Feb. 16, 1814.

"You may be assured that the only prickles that sting from the Royal hedgehog are those which possess a torpedo property, and may bannish some of my friends. I am quite silent, and 'hush'd in grim repose.' The fashion of the assault has weakened their effects,—if ever they had any;—and, if they had had much I should hardly have held my tongue, or withheld my fingers. It is something quite new to attack a man for abandoning his remissents. I have been aware that I had prevenged my sub sequence vituperation were rather ungrateful, but I did not know that it was wrong to endeavor to dc justice to those who did not wait till I had made some amends for former and boyish prejudices, but received me into their friendship, when I might still have been their enemy.

"You perceive justly that I must intentionally have made my fortune, like Sir Francis Wronghead. It were better if there were more merit in my independence; but it really is something now-a-days to be independent at all, and the less temptation to be otherwise, the more uncommon the case, in these times of paradoxical servility. I believe that most of our hates and likings have been hitherto nearly the same; but from henceforth, they must, of necessity, be one and indivisible,—and now for it! I am for any weapon,—the pen, till one can find something sharper, which for form, the sword."

"You can have no conception of the ludicrous solemnity with which these two stanzas have been treated. The Morning Post gave notice of an intended motion in the House of my brethren on the subject, and God knows what proceedings besides; and all of this, as Bedridden in theights says, for making a cream tart without pepper. This last piece of intelligence is, I presume, too laughable to be true; and the destruction of the custom-house appears to have, in some degree, interfered with mine;—added to which, the last battle of Bonaparte has usurped the column hitherto devoted to my bulletin.

"I send you this day's Morning Post the best which have hitherto appeared on this impudent doggerel, as the Courier calls it. There was another about my diet, when a boy—not at all bad some time ago; but the rest are but indifferent.

"I shall think about your oratorical hint;—but I have never set much upon 'that cast,' and am grown as tired as Solomon of every thing, and of myself more than any thing. This is being what the learned call philosophical, and the vulgar, lack-a-daisical. I am, however, always glad of a blessing; pray repeat yours soon,—at least, your letter, and I shall think the benediction included.

"Ever, &c."

Mr. Moore had endeavored to persuade him to take a part in public mercy, and to esclude his name for more frequently.

In conducting this letter, Mr. Moore having said "God bless you!" added,—"Last is, if you have no objections."
LETTER CCVIII.

TO MR. DALLAS.

"Feb. 17, 1814.

"This Courier of this evening accuses me of having received and pocketed large sums for my works. I have never yet received, nor wish to receive, a farthing for any. Mr. Murray offered a thousand for the Giaour and Bride of Abydos, which I said was too much, and that if he could afford it at the end of six months he would then direct how it might be disposed of: but neither then, nor at any other period, have I ever availed myself of the profits on my own account. For the republication of the Satire, I refused four hundred guineas; and for the previous editions I never asked nor received a sous, nor for any writing whatever. I do not wish you to do anything disagreeable to yourself; there never was nor shall be any conditions or stipulations with regard to any accommodation that I could afford you; and, on your part, I can see nothing derogatory in receiving the copyright. It was only assistance afforded to a worthy man, by one not quite so worthy.

"Mr. Murray is going to contradict this; but your name will not be mentioned: for your own part, you are a free agent, and are to do as you please. I only hope that now, as always, you will think that I wish to take no unfair advantage of the accidental opportunity which circumstances permitted me of being of use to you.

"Ever, &c."

In consequence of this letter, Mr. Dallas addressed an explanation to one of the newspapers, of which the following is a part:

TO THE EDITOR OF THE MORNING POST.

"Sir,

"I have seen the paragraph in an evening paper, in which Lord Byron is accused of receiving and pocketing large sums for his works. I believe no one who knows him has the slightest suspicion of this kind; but the assertion being public, I think it a justice I owe to Lord Byron to contradict it publicly.

"I take upon me to affirm that Lord Byron never received a shilling for any of his works. To my certain knowledge, the profits of the Satire were left entire to the publisher of it. The gift of the copyright of Childe Harold's Pilgrimage, I have already publicly acknowledged in the dedication of the new edition of my novels; and I now add my acknowledgment for that of the Corsair, not only for the profitable part of it, but for the delicate and delightful manner of bestowing it while yet unpublished. With respect to his two other poems, the Giaour and the Bride of Abydos, Mr. Murray, the publisher of them, can truly attest that no part of the sale of them has ever touched his hands, or been disposed of for his use."

LETTER CCIX.

TO MR. MOORE.

"Feb. 26, 1814.

"Dallas had, perhaps, better have kept silence; but that was his concern, and, as his facts are correct, and his motive not dishonorable to himself, I wished him well through it. As for his interpretations of the lines, he and any one else may interpret them as they please. I have and shall adhere to my taciturnity, unless something very particular occurs to render this impossible. Do not say you a word. If any one is to speak, it is the person principally concerned. The most amusing thing is that every one (to me) attributes the abuse to the man they personally most dislike!—some say Croker, some C—e, others Fitzgerald, &c., &c., &c. I do not know, and have no clue but conjecture. If I discover the clue, but a struggle, baseness left to his wages; if a cavalier, he must 'wink,' and hold out his iron.

"I had some thoughts of putting the question to Croker, but Hobhouse, who, I am sure, would not have been displeased, had I done so, had I done so, had it been right, and I thought it so by it; means not:—'that I had no right to take it upon suspicion,' &c., &c. Whether Hobhouse is correct, I am not aware, but he believes himself so, and says there can be but one opinion on that subject. This I am, at least, sure of, that he would never prevent me from doing what he deemed the duty of a preux chevalier. In such cases—at least, in this country—we must act according to usages. In considering this instance, I dismiss my own personal feelings. Any man will and must fight, when necessary,—even without a motive. Here, I should take it up really without much resentment; for unless a woman one likes is in the way, it is some years since I felt a long anger. But, undoubtedly, could I, or may I, trace it to a man of station, I should and shall do what is proper.
LETTERS.

I was angrily, but tried to conceal it. You are not called upon to award the 'Twopenny,' and would only gratify them by so doing. Do you not see the great object of all these follies is to set him, and you, and me, and all persons whatsoever, by the ears,—more especially those who are on good terms—and nearly succeeded. Lord H. wished me to concede to Lord Carlisle,—concede to the devil! —to a man who used me ill? I told him, in answer, that I would neither concede, nor recede on the subject, but be silent altogether; unless any thing more could be said by Lady H., and himself, who had been since my very good friends;—and there it ended. This was no time for concessions to Lord C.

I have been interrupted, but shall write again soon. Believe me ever, my dear Moore, &c."

LETTER CCXI.

TO W. * W. * W. * ESG. *

Feb. 29, 1814.

"My Dear W.,

"I have but a few moments to write to you. Silence is the only answer to the things you mention; nor should I regard that man as my friend who said a word more on the subject. I care little for attacks, but I will not submit to defences; and I do hope and trust that you have never entertained a serious thought of engaging in so foolish a controversy. Dallas's letter was, to his credit, merely as to the facts which he had a right to state: I neither have nor shall take the least public notice, nor permit any one else to do so. If I discover the writer, then I may set in a different manner; but it will not be in writing.

"An expression in your letter has induced me to write this to you, to entreat you not to interfere in any way in such a business,—it is now nearly over, and you are properly occupied by my silence than they could be by the best defence in the world. I do not know any thing that would vex me more than any further reply to these things. "Ever yours, in haste, "W."

LETTER CCXII.

TO MR. MOORE.

"March 2, 1814."

My Dear Friend,

"I have a great mind to tell you that I am uncomfortable, if only to make you come to town; where no one ever more delighted in seeing you, nor is there any one to whom I would sooner turn for consolation in my most vaporish moments. The truth is, I have a sort of argument, to ponder upon of the most gloomy description, but this arises from other causes. Some day or other, when we are veterans, I may tell you a tale of present and past times; and it is not from want of confidence that I do not —but—but—always a but to the end of the chapter.

"There is nothing, however, upon the spot either to love or hate;—but I certainly have subjects for both at no very great distance, and am besides embarrassed and embarrased. Here are three persons (whose name at least) I do not know. All this would be very well, if I had no heart; but, unluckily, I have found that there is such a thing still about me, though in no very good repair, and also, that it has a habit of attaching itself to one, whether I will or no. 'Divide et impera,' I begin to think, will only do for politics.

"If I discover the 'tawd,' as you call him, I shall 'tread',—and put spikes in my shoes to do it more effectually. The effect of all these fine things, I do not inquire much nor perceive. I believe felt them more than either of us. People are civil enough, and I have had no dearth of invitations,—none of which, however, I have accepted. I went out very little last year, and mean to go about still less.

I have no passion for circles, and have long regretted that I ever gave way to what is called a town life,—which of all the lives I ever saw (and they are nearly as many as Plutarch's) seems to me to leave the least for the past and future.

"How proceeds the Poem? Do not neglect it, and I have no fears. I need not say to you that your fame is dear to me,—I really might say dearer than my own; for I have lately begun to think my things have been strangely overrated; and, at any rate, whether or not, I have done with them for ever. I may say to you, what I would not say to every body, that the last two were written, the Bride in four, and the Corsair in ten days,—which I take to be a most humiliating confession, as it proves my own want of judgment in publishing; and the public might judging this might have stamina for permanent attention. 'So much for Buckingham.'

"I have no dread of your being too hasty, and I have still less of your failing. But I think a year a very fair allotment of time to a composition which is not to be Epic; and even Horace's 'Nonum præmatur' must have been intended for the Millennium, or some longer-lived generation than ours. I wonder how much we should have had of Aion, had he observed his own doctrines to the letter. Peace be with you! Remember that I am always and most truly yours, &c."

P. S. I never heard the 'report' you mention, nor, I dare say, many others. But, in consequence, you, as well as others, have 'dammed good-natured friends,' who do their duty in the usual way. One thing will make you laugh."

LETTER CCXIII.

TO MR. MOORE.

"March 11, 1814."

"Guess darkly, and you will seldom err. At present, I shall say no more, and, perhaps—but no matter. I hope we shall some day meet, and whatever years may precede or succeed it, I shall mark the figure of the 'Don Quixote' in my memory with approbation; but not sure that I shall not soon be in your neighborhood again. If so, and I am alone, (as will probably be the case,) I shall invade and carry you off, and endeavor to stone for sorry fare by a sincere welcome. I know the person absent (baring the 'sect') I should be so glad to see again.

I have nothing of the sort you mention but the lines, (the Weepers,) if you like to have them in the bag. I wish to give them all possible circu tion. The *Vault*ation is downright actionable, and I may be peril to the publisher; but I think the Tears have a natural right to be ragged, and the editor (whoever he may be) might supply a facsimile note or not, as he pleased.

I cannot conceive how the Vault has got about,—but so it is. It is too farouche; but, truth to say, my satire is not very playful. I have the plan of an epistle in my head, at him and to him; and, if they are not a little quieter, I shall embody it. As to mirth and ridicule, that is out of my way; but I have a tolerable fund of sternness and contempt, and, with Juvenal before me, I shall perhaps read him a lecture he has not lately heard in the Court. From particular circumstances, which came to my knowledge almost by accident, I could 'tell him what he is—'I know him well.

"I meant, my dear M., to write to you a long letter, but I am hurried, and time clips my inclination down to yours, &c."

"P. S. Think again before you shelf your poem. There is a younger, (older than me, by-the-by, but a younger poet,) Mr. G. Knight, with a vol. of Eastern Tales, written since his return, for he has been in the countries. He sent to me last summer, and I advised him to write one in each measure, without any intention, at that time, of doing the same thing. Since that, from a habit of writing in fever, I have anticipated him in the variety of measures, but quite unintentionally. Of the stories I know nothing, not having seen them; but he has some lady in a sack, too, like the Giovour—he told me the other day.

"The best way to make the public 'forget' me is to remind them of yourself. You cannot suppose that I would ask you or advise you to publish, if I thought you would fail. I really have no literary envy; and I do not believe a friend's success ever sat nearer another than yours do to my best wishes. It is for elderly gentlemen to 'bear no brother near, and cannot become our disease for more years than we may perhaps number. I wish you to be out before Eastern Subjects are again before the public.

LETTER CCXV.

TO MR. MURRAY.

March 12th, 1814.

"I have not time to read the whole MS., but what I have seen seems very well written, (both prose and verse,) and, though I am and can be no judge, (at least a fair one on this subject,) containing nothing which you ought to hesitate publishing upon my account. If the author is not Dr. Busby himself, I think it a pity, on his own account, that he should dedicate it to his subscribers; nor can I perceive what Dr. Busby has to do with the matter, except as a translator of Lucretius, for whose doctrines he is surely not responsible. I tell you openly, and really most sincerely, that if published at all, there is no worthy reason why you should not on the contrary I should receive it as the greatest compliment you could pay to my good opinion of my candor, to print and circulate that, or any other work, attacking me in a manly manner, and without any malicious intention, from which, so far as I have seen, I must exonerate this writer.

"He is wrong in one thing,—I am no atheist; but if he thinks I have published principles tending to such opinions, he has a perfect right to contro-

TO MR. MOORE.

5, Albemarle, April 9, 1814.

"Viscount Althorp is about to be married, and I have gotten his spacious bachelor apartments in Albany, to which you will, I hope, address a speedy answer to this mine epistle.

"I am but just returned to town, from which you may infer that I have been out of it; and I have been box ing, for exercise, with Jackson for this last month daily. I have also been drinking,—and, on one occasion, with three other friends at the Cocoa Tree, from six till four, yes, unto five in the matin. We claret and champagne till two—then supped, and finished with a kind of regency punch composed of Madeira, brandy, and green tea, no real water being admitted therein. There was a night for you,—without once quitting the table, except to animate home, which, I did alone, and in utter contempt of a hackney-coach and my own vis, both of which were deemed necessary for our conveyance. And so,—I am very well, and they say it will hurt my constancy.

"I have also, more or less, been breaking a few of the favorite commandments; but I mean to pull up and marry,—if any one will have me. In the mean time, the other day I nearly killed myself with a collis of brown, which I swallowed for supper, and undigested for I don't know how long—but that is by-the-by. All this gormandize was in honor of Lent; for I am forbidden meat all the rest of the year,—but it is strictly enjoined me during your solemn fast. I have been, and am very tolerable love—but of that hereafter, as it may be.

"My dear Moore, say what you will in your presence; and quiz any thing, or any body,—me, if you like—sir, I don't see why the old one should rather elderly, school? If one can't jest with one's friends, with whom can we be facetious? You have nothing to fear from * * whom I have not seen, being out of the way when he called. He will be very correct, smooth, and all that, but I doubt whether there will be any grace beyond the reach of art;—and whether there is or not, how long will you base d—d modest? As for Jeffrey, it is a very handsome thing of him to speak well of an old antagonist,—and what a mean mind dared not do. Any one will revoke praise; but—were it not partly my own case—I should say that very few have strength of mind to unray their censure, or follow it up with praise of other things.

"What think you of the review of Lewis? It beats the Bag and my hand-grenade hollow, as an invective, and hath thrown the Court into mysteries, as I hear from very good authority. Have you had from * * * *?

"No more rhyme for—or rather, from—me. I have taken my leave of that stage, and henceforth will mountebank it no longer. I have had my day, and there's an end. The utmost I expect, or even wish, is to have half the British and my countrymen of that I might perhaps have been a poet, had I gone on and amended. My great comfort is that the temporary celebrity I have wrung from the world has been on the teeth of all enemies and prejudices. I have flatter no ruling powers; I have never concealed a single thought that tempted me. They can't say I have trickled to the times, nor to popular topics, (as Johnson, or somebody, said of Cleveland,) and whatever I have gained has been as the expenditure of as much personal favor as possible; for I do believe never was a bard more uncommon, quoad homo, than myself. And now I have, off, off my hand and aliases. Every body may be d—d, as they seem fond of it, and resolved to stickle lustily for endless brimstone.

"Oh—by-the-by, I had nearly forgot. There is a long poem, an 'Anti-Byron,' coming out, to prove the fact of common places. No, I mean, to prove the decay of rhyme, all religion and government, and have already made great progress? It is not very scurrilous, but serious and erethal. I never felt myself important, till I saw and heard of my being such a little Voltaire as to induce such a production.—Murray would not publish it, for he was a fool, and so I told him; but some one else will, doubtless. 'Something too much of this.'

"Your French scheme is good, but let it be Italian; all the Angles will be at Paris. Let it be Rome, Milan, Naples, Florence, Turin, Venice, or Switzerland, and 'egad!' (as Bayes saith) I will conccdate and join you; and will write a new 'I' and 'II,' and 'III,' and 'IV.'—Well, I will really buy a wife and a ring, and say the ceremony, and settle near you in a summer-house upon the Arno, or the Po, or the Adriatic.

"Ah! my poor little paged, Napoleon, has withdrawn. He has abdicated. He has abdicated, they say. This would draw molten brass from the eyes of Zatana. What! 'kiss the ground before young Malcolm's feet, and then be bated, by the rabble's curse!' I cannot hear such a crouching catastrophe. I must stick to Sylia, for my modern favorites don't so,—their resignations are of a different kind. All health and prosperity, my dear Moore. Excuse this lengthy letter. Ever, &c.

"P. S. The Quarterly quotes you frequently in an Article on America; and everybody I know asks perpetually after you and yours. When will you answer them in person?"

NOTE TO MR. MURRAY.

"April 10, 1814.

"I have written an Ode on the fall of Napoleon, which, if you like, I will copy out, and make you a present of. Mr. Merivale has seen part of it, and likes it. You may show it to Mr. Gifford, and print it, or not, as you please—it is of no consequence. It contains nothing in his favor, and no allusion to your own government or the Bourbons. Yours, &c."

"P. S. It is in the measure of my stanzas at the end of Childe Harrold, which were much liked, beginning, 'And thou art dead.' &c. There are ten stanzas of it—ninety lines in all."

NOTE TO MR. MURRAY.

"April 11, 1814.

"I enclose you a lettered from Mrs. Leigh. It will be best not to put my name to our Ode; but you may say as openly as you like that it is mine, and I can inscribe it to Mr. Hobhouse from the author, which will mark it sufficiently. After the resolution of not publishing, though it is a thing of little length and less consequence, it will be better altogether that it is anonymous; but we will incorporate it in the first tone of ours that you find time or the wish to publish."

"Yours alway, "B."

"P. S. I hope you get a note of alterations, sent this matin?"

"P. S. Oh my books! my books! will you never find my books?

"Alter 'potent spell' to 'quickening spell:' the first (as Polonius says) 'is a vile phrase,' and means nothing, besides being common-place and Rosa-Matildaish."

NOTE TO MR. MURRAY.

"April 12, 1814.

I send you a few notes and trifling alterations, and an additional motto from Gibbon, which you will find singularly appropriate. A 'Good-Natured Friend' tells me there is a most scurrilous attack on * * in the Antijacobin Review, which you have not seen. Send it, and inform in that state of language which will derive benefit from getting into a出版. Ever, &c."

LETTER CCXVI.

TO MR. MOORE.

"Albany, April 20, 1814.

"I am very glad to hear that you are to be transient from Mayfield so very soon, and was taken in by the first part of your letter. Indeed, for aught I know, you may be treating me as, Shiloh says, with 'ironing' even now. I shall say nothing of the shock, which had nothing of humour in it; as I am apt to take even a critic, and still more a friend, at his word, and never to doubt that I

1. I had begun my letter in the following manner:—'Have you seen the 'Ode to Napoleon in Malvern' and do you suppose it to be other Fitzgerald or Ross Musgrave's? Those rapid and masterly portraits of all the tyrants that preceded Napoleon have a vigor in them which would incline me to say that Ross Musgrave is the present, but then, on the other hand, those powerful group of history, &c. &c. After a little more of this mock parallel, the letter went on thus—'I should like to know what you think of the master? Some friends of mine here will, indeed, it is the work of the author of Childe Harrold,—but then they are not so well read in Fitzgerald and Ross Musgrave as I am; and besides, they seem to forget that you promised, show smooth or two spoons, not to write any more for years. Respectfully, &c. &c.
have been writing cursed nonsense if they say so. There was a mental reservation in my pact with the public, in behalf of anonymous; and, even had there not been the prohibition as such as to make it physically impossible to pass over this damnable epoch of triumphant tameness. Tis a cursed business; and, after all, I shall think higher of rhyme and reason, and vouch for the skill of our heroic people, till—Elba becomes a volcano, and sends him out again. I can't think it all over yet.

"My departure for the Continent depends, in some measure, on the incontinence of the duchy. I have two country invitations at home, and don't know what to say or do. In the mean time, I have bought a macaw and a parrot, and have got up my books; and I box and fence daily, and go out very little. At this present writing, Louis the Gouty is wheeling in triumph into Piccadilly, in all the pomp and ramblement of royalty. I had an offer of seats to see them pass; but, as I have seen a sultan going to mosque, and been at His reception of an ambassador, the most Christian King hath no attractions for me:—though in some coming year of the Hegira, I should not dislike to see the place where he had reigned, shortly after the second revolution of Leqo, and a happy sovereignty of two months, the last six weeks being civil war.

"Pray write, and deem me ever, &c."

LETTER CCXV.

TO MR. MURRAY.

"Many thanks with the letters which I return. You know I am a jacobin, and could not wear white, nor see the installation of Louis the Gouty. "This is sad news, and very hard upon the sufferers at any, but more at such a time—I mean the Bayonne sortie. "You should urge Moore to come out. "P.S. I want Moreri to purchase for good and all. I have a Bayle, but want Moreri too. "P.S. Perry hath a piece of compliment to-day; but I think the name might have been as well omitted. No matter—be they the old story of inconsistency in my teeth, let them—let me, I mean as to not publishing. However, now I will keep my word. Nothing but the occasion, which was physically irresistible, made me swerve, and I thought an anonymous within my pact with the public. It is the only thing I have or shall set about."

---

LETTER CCXIX.

TO MR. MURRAY.

"Let Mr. Gifford have the letter and return it at his leisure. I would have offered it, had I thought that he liked things of the kind. "Do you want the last page immediately? I have doubt the lines being worth printing; at any rate, I must see them again, and alter some passages, before they go forth in any shape into the ocean of circulation; a very conected phrase, by-the-by: well then—channel of publication will do. "I am not i' the vein, or I could knock off a stanza or two for the Ode, that might answer the purpose better. At all events, I must see the lines again first, as there be two I have altered in my mind's manuscript already. Has any one seen and judged of them? that is the criticism by which I will abide—only give me a fair report, and 'nothing extenuate,' as I will in that case do something else."

"Ever, &c."

"I want Moreri, and an Athenaeus."

---

LETTER CCXX.

TO MR. MURRAY.

"I have been thinking that it might be as well to publish no more of the Ode separately, but incorpore it with any of the other things, and include the smaller poem too (in that case)—which I must previously correct, nevertheless. I can't for the head of me, add a line worth scribbling; my 'vein' is quite gone, and my present occupations are of the gymnastic order—boxing and fencing—and my principal conversation is with my macaw and Bayle, want my Moreri, and I want Athenaeus. "P. S. I hope you sent back that poetical packet to the address which I forwarded to you on Sunday: if not, pray do, or I shall have the author screaming after his Epic."

---

LETTER CCXXI.

TO MR. MURRAY.

"I have no guess at your author,—but it is a noble Poem, and worth a thousand Odes of any body's. I suppose I may keep this copy;—after reading it, I really regret having written my own. I say this very sincerely, albeit unused to think humbly of myself. "I don't like the additional stanzas at all, and they had better be left out. The fact is, I can't do any thing I am asked to do, however gladly I would; and at the end of a week my interest in a composition goes off. This will account to you for my doing no better for your 'Stamp Duty' Post script. "The S. R. is very civil—but what do they mean by Childe Harold resembling Marmion? and the next two, Giaour and Bride, not resembling Scott? I certainly never intended to copy him; but, if there be any copyism, it must be in the two poems, where the same versification is adopted. However, they exempt the Corsair from all resemblance to any thing,—though I rather wonder at his escape. "If ever I did any thing original, it was it. Childe Harold, which I prefer to the other things always, after the first week. Yesterday I read English Bard,—eating the melons, it is the best. "Ever, &c."

LETTER CCXXII.

TO MR. MURRAY.

"G. Albany, April 26, 1814. "Dear Sir, "I enclose a draft for the money: when paid, send the copyright. I release you from the thousand pounds agreed on for the Giaour and Bride, and there's an end. "If any accident occurs to me, you may do them as you please; but, with the exception of two copies of each for yourself only, I expect and request that the advertisements be withdrawn, and the remaining copies of all destroyed; and any expense so incurred, 'I will be glad to defray.' "For all this, it might be as well to assign some reason. I have none to give, except my own caprice, and I do not consider the circumstance of consequence enough to require explanation. "In course, I need hardly assure you that they never shall be published with my consent, directly or indirectly, by any person whatsoever,—that I am perfectly satisfied and have every reason so to be, with your conduct in all transactions between us as publisher and author. "It will give me great pleasure to preserve your acquaintance, and to consider you as my friend. Because I am very truly, and for much attention, Your obliged and very obedient servant, BYRON.

"P. S. I do not think that I have overdrawn at Hammersley's; but if that be the case, I can draw for the superfluous on Hoares. The draft is at short, but that I will make up. On payment—not before—return the copyright papers."

LETTER CCXXIII.

TO MR. MURRAY. "May 1, 1814.

"DEAR MR. MURRAY,

"It your present note is serious, and it really would be inconvenient, there is an end to the matter. tear my draft, and go on as usual: in that case, we will recur to our former basis. That I was perfectly serious, in wishing to suppress all future publication, is true; but certainly not to interfere with the convenience of others, and more particularly your own. Some day, I will tell you the reason of this apparently strange resolution. At present, it may be enough to say that I recall it at your suggestion: and as it appears to have annoyed you, I lose no time in saying so.

"Yours, truly, B."

NOTE TO MR. MOORE. "May 4, 1814.

"Last night we sup'd at R--fe's board, &c. I wish people would not shirk their dinners—ought it not to have been a dinner—and that d—d anchovy sandwich!

"That plaguy voice of yours made me sentimental, and almost fall in love with a girl who was recommending herself, during your song, by pathetic music. But the song is past, and my passion can wait, till the pucello is more harmonious.

"Do you go to Lady Jersey's to-night? It is a large party, and you won't be borne into 'softening rocks,' and all that. Othello is to-morrow and Saturday too. Which day shall we go? When shall I see you? If you call, let it be after three and as near four as you please. Ever, &c."

NOTE TO MR. MOORE. "May 4, 1814.

"DEAR TOM,

"Thou hast asked me for a song, and I enclose you an experiment, which has cost me something more than trouble, and is, therefore, less likely to be worth your taking any in your proposed setting. Now, if it be so, throw it into the fire, without

"Ever yours,

"BYRON."

"I speak not, I trace not, I breathe not thy song, &c."

NOTE TO MR. MOORE. "May 4, 1814.

"Will you and Rogers come to my box at Covent, then? I shall be there, and none else—or I won't be there, if you twain would like to go without me. You will not get so good a place hustling among the publican boxes, with damnable apprentices (six feet high) on a back row. Will you both oblige me and come—or one or neither—or, what you will?

"P. S. An' you will, I will call for you at half past six, or any time of your own dial."

NOTE TO MR. MOORE. "I have gotten a box for Othello to-night, and send the ticket for your friends the R--fe's. I seriously recommend to you to recommend to them to go for half an hour, if only to see the third act—they will not easily have another opportunity. We—at least, I—cannot be there, so there will be no one in the way. Will you give or send it to them? It will come with a better grace from you than me.

"I am in no good plight, but will dine at * * * with you, if I can. There is music and Covent-g. Will you go, at all events, to my box there after ward, to see a 'd'out of a young sixteen,' in the 'Child of Nature?'

NOTE TO MR. MOORE. "Sunday morn.

"Was not Jago perfection? particularly the last look. I was close to him (in the orchestra,) and never saw an English countenance half so expressive. I am acquainted with no inmaterial sensuality so delightful as good acting; and, as it is fitting there should be good plays, now and then, besides Shakespeare's, I wish you or Campbell would write one; the rest of 't month' have not heart enough.

"You were cut up in the Champion—is it not so? this day, so am I—even to shocking the editor. The critic writes well; and, as at present, poesy is not my passion, predominant, and my snake (Aaron has swallowed up all the other serpents, I don't feel fractious. I send you the paper, which I mean to take in for the future. We go to M.'s together. Perhaps I shall see you before, but don't let me bore you, now, nor ever.

"Ever, as now, truly and affectionately, &c."

NOTE TO MR. MOORE. "May 5, 1814.

"Do you go to Lady Cabin's this even? If you do—and whenever we are bound to the same follies—let us embark in the same 'Shippe of Fools.' I have been up till five, and up at nine: and feel heavy with only winking for the last three or four nights.

"I lost my party and place at supper, trying to keep out of the way of * * *. I would have gone away altogether, but that would have appeared a worse affectation than t' other. You are of course engaged to dinner, or we may go quietly together to my box at Covent Garden, and afterward to this assemblage. Why did you go away so soon?

"Ever, &c.

P. S. Ought not R * * fe's supper to have been a dinner? Jackson is here, and I must fatigue myself in spirits."

NOTE TO MR. MOORE. "May 8, 1814.

"Thanks—and punctuality. What has passed at * * * House? I suppose that I am to know, and 'pars ful' of the conference. I regret that your * * * will detain you so late, but I suppose you will be at Lady Jersey's. I am going earlier with Hobhouse. You recollect that to-morrow we sup and see Ron.

"P. S. Two to-morrow is the hour of pugilism."

* See Poems, p. 295.
LETTER CXXXIV.

TO MR. MOORE.  "May 23, 1814.

"I must send you the Java government gazette of July 3 1814, just sent me by Murray. Only think of our (for it is you and I) setting paper warriors in array in the Indian seas. Does not this sound like fame—something almost like posterity? It is something to have scribblers squabbling about five thousand miles off, while we are agreeing so well at home. Bring it with you in your pocket; it will make you laugh, as it hath me.

"Ever yours,

"P. S. Oh, the anecdote! "B.""

LETTER CXXXV.

TO MR. MOORE.  "May 31, 1814.

"As I shall probably not see you here to-day, I write to request that if not inconvenient to yourself, you will stay in town till Sunday; if not to gratify me, yet to please a great many others, who will be very sorry to lose you. As for myself, I can only repeat that I wish you would either remain a long time with us, or not come at all; for these matches of society make the subsequent separations bitterer than ever.

"I believe you think that I have not been quite fair with that Alpha and Omega of beauty, &c., with whom you would willingly have united me. But if you consider what her sister said on the subject, you will less wonder that my pride should have taken the alarm; particularly as nothing but the every-day fluctuation of every-day people now occurred between your heroine and myself. Had Lady * * * appeared to wish it, or even not to oppose it, I would have gone on, and very possibly married (that is, if the other had been equally accordant) with the same indifference which has frozen over the 'Black Sea' of almost all my passions.

"It is that very indifference which makes me so uncertain and apparently capricious. It is not eagerness of new pursuits, but that nothing impresses me sufficiently to fix; neither do I feel disgusted, but simply indifferent to almost all excitaments. The proof of this is, that obstacles, the slightest even, stop me. This can hardly be timidity, for I have done some impudent things too, in my time; and in almost all cases, opposition is a stimulant. In mine, it is not; if a straw were in my way, I could not stoop to pick it up."

"I have sent this long tirade, because I would not have you suppose that I have been trifling designedly with you or others. If you think so, in the name of St. Hubert (the patron of antlers and hunters) let me be married out of hand—I don't care to whom, so that it amuses any body else, and don't interfere with me much in the day-time.

"Ever, &c."

LETTER CXXXVI.

TO MR. MOORE.  "June 14, 1814.

"I could be very sentimental now, but I won't. The truth is, that I have been all my life trying to harden my heart, and have not yet quite succeeded—though there are great hopes—and you do not know how it sunk with your departure. What adds to my regret is having seen so little of you during your stay in this crowded desert where one ought to be able to oar thirst like a camel,—the springs are so few, and most of them so muddy.

"The newspapers will tell you all that is to be told of emperors, &c. They have dined, and supped, and shown their flat faces in all thoroughfares, and several saloons, but with very little success, but rather short in the skirts; and their conversation is a catechism, for which and the answers I refer you to those who have heard it.

"I think of leaving town for Newstead soon. It so, I shall not be remote from your recess, and (unless Mrs. M. detains you at home over the candle-up and a new cradle,) we will meet. You shall come to me, or I to you, as is fitter—and meet well. An invitation from Aston has reached me, but I do not think I shall go. I have also heard of * * *—I should like to see her again, for I have not met her for years; and though 'the light the honor of making his appearance is set, saying that he that 'one dear smile like those of old' might not make me for a moment forget the 'dulness of life's stream.'"

"I am going to R * * *'s to-night—to one of those suppers which 'ought to be dinners.' I have hardly seen her, and never him, since you set out. I told you, you were the last link of that chain. As for the others, the more syllabed one another's names the more I despise them. The post will not permit me to continue my scrawl. More anon.

"Ever dear Moore, &c.

"P. S. Keep the Journal, I care not what becomes of it, and if it has amused you, I am glad that I kept it. 'Lara' is finished, and I am copying it for my third vol. now collecting; but no separate publication."

NOTE TO MR. MURRAY

"I return your packet of this morning. Have you heard that Bertrand has returned to Paris with the account of Napoleon's having lost his senses? It is a report; but, if true, I must, like Mr. Fitzgerald and Jeremiah, (of lamentable memory,) lay claim to a piece of that news; this is to say, that he 'ought to go out of his senses, in the penultimate stanza of a certain Ode,—the which, having been pronounced non sense by several profound critics, has a still further pretension, by its unintelligibility, to inspiration.

"Ever, &c.""

LETTER CXXXVII.

TO MR. ROGERS.  "June 19, 1814.

"I am always obliged to trouble you with my awkwardnesses, and now I have a fresh one. Mr. W. * called on me several times, and I have missed the honor of making his acquaintance, which I regret, but which you, who know my desultory and uncertain habits, will not wonder at; and will, I am sure, attribute to any thing but a wish to offend a person who has shown me much kindness, and possesses character and talents entitled to general respect. My mornings are late, and passed in fencing and boxing, and a variety of most unpoetical exercises, very wholesome, &c., but would be very disagreeable to my friends, whom I am obliged to exclude during their operation. I never go out till the evening, and I have not been fortunate enough to meet Mr. W. at Lord Lansdowne's or Lord Jersey's, where I had hoped to pay him my respects.

"I would have written to him, but a few words from you will go further than all the apologetical excuses I should possibly make on an occasion. It is only to say that, without intending it, I contrive to behave very ill to every body, and am very sorry for it.

"Ever, dear R., &c."

"Mr. Warragulo."

BYRON'S WORKS.
The following undated notes to Mr. Rogers were written about this time.

"Sunday.

"Your non-attendance at Corinne's is very apropos, as I was on the eve of sending you an excuse. I do not feel well enough to go there this evening, and have been obliged to despatch an apology. I believe I need not add one for not accepting Mr. Sheridan's invitation on Wednesday, which I fancy both you and I understood in the same sense,—with him the saying of Mirabeau, that 'words are things,' is not to be taken literally.

"Ever, &c."

"I will call for you at a quarter before seven, if that will suit you. I return you Sir Proteus,* and shall merely add in return, as Johnson said of, and to, somebody or other, 'Are we alive after all this censure?' "Believe me, &c."

Sheridan was yesterday, at first, too sober to remember your invitation, but in the dregs of the third bottle he talked up his memory; The Star out-talked Whitbread, was ironed by Sheridan, con-founded Sir Humphrey, and utterly perplexed your slave. The rest (great names in the red book, nevertheless), were mere segments of the circle. Ma'smelle danced a Russ saraband with great vigor, grace, and expression. "Ever, &c."

NOTE TO MR. MURRAY.

"June 21, 1814.

"I suppose 'Lara' is gone to the devil,—which is no great matter, only let me know that I may be saved the trouble of copying the rest, and put the first part into the fire. I really have no anxiety about it, and shall not be sorry to be saved the copying, which goes on very slowly, and may prove to you that you may speak out—or I should be less sluggish. "Yours, &c."

LETTER CCXXVIII.

TO MR. ROGERS.

"June 27, 1814.

"You could not have made me a more acceptable present than Jacqueline,—she is all grace, and softness, and poetry; there is so much of the last, that we do not feel the want of story which is simple, yet enough. I wonder that you do not oftener unbend to more of the same kind. I have some sympathy with the softer affections, though very little in my way, and no one can depict them so truly and successfully as yourself. I have half a mind to pay you in kind, or rather unkind, for I have just 'supped full of horror' in two cantos of darkness and dismay.

"Do you go to Lord Essex's to-night? if so, will you let me call for you at your own hour? I dined with Holland-House yesterday at Lord Cowper's; my lady very gracious, which she can be more than any one, when she likes. I was not sorry to see them again, for I can't forget that they have been very kind to me. "Ever yours most truly, "BN."

"P. S. Is there any chance or possibility of making it up with Lord Carlisle, as I feel disposed to do anything reasonable or unreasonable to effect it? I would before, but for the 'Courier,' and the possible misconstructions at such a time. Perpend, pronunciation."

* A satirical pamphlet, in which all the writers of the day were smeared. 103

LETTER CCXXIX.

TO MR. MOORE.

"July 8, 1814.

"I returned to town last night, and had some hopes of seeing you to-day, and would have called, but I have beer (though in exceeding distress), and needed good hard liquor a little before receiving, as it is called, and am now at the freezing point of returning sobriety. Of course, I should be sorry that our parallel lines did not deviate into some intersection before you return to the country. After that same nonsuit whereof the papers have told us, but, as you must be much occupied, I won't be afronted, should your time and business militate against our meeting.

"Rogers and I have almost coalesced into a joint invasion of the public. Whether it will take place or not, I do not yet know, and I am afraid Jacqueline (which is very beautiful) will be in bad company. But, in this case, the lady will not be the sufferer.

"I am going to the sea, and then to Scotland; and I have been doing nothing—that is, to good and am very truly, &c."

NOTE TO MR. MURRAY.

"July 11, 1814.

"You shall have one of the pictures. I wish you to send the proof of 'Lara' to Mr. Moore, 35 Bury street, to-night. But he leaves us to-morrow, and wishes to see it before he goes; and I am also willing to have the benefit of his remarks. "Yours, &c."

NOTE TO MR. MURRAY.

"July 18, 1814.

"I think you will be satisfied even to repetition with our northern friends; and I won't deprive you of the longer of what I think will give you pleasure: for my own part, my modesty or my vanity must be silent.

"Lara and Jacqueline, the latter by Mr. Rogers, but otherwise in the same volume.

"Purchase of Newstead Abbey. See Letter call.

LETTER CCXXXI.

TO MR. MURRAY. "July 23, 1814.

"I am sorry to say that the print* is by no means approved of by those who have seen it, who are pretty conversant with the original, as well as with the picture from whence it is taken. I rather suspect that it is from the copy and not the exhibited portrait, and in this dilemma would recommend a suspension, if not an abandonment of the preface to the volumes which you purpose in lithograph upon the public.

"With regard to Lara don't be in any hurry. I have not yet made up my mind on the subject, nor know what to think or do till I hear from you; and Mr. Moore appeared to me in a similar state of indetermination. I do not know that it may not be better to reserve it for the entire publication you proposed, and not adventure in Hardy singleness, or even backed by the fairy Jacqueline. I have been seized with all kinds of doubts, &c., &c., since I left London.

"Pray let me hear from you, and believe me, &c."

LETTER CCXXXII.

TO MR. MURRAY. "July 24, 1814.

"The minority must, in this case, carry it, so pray let it be so, for I don't care sixpence for any of the opinions you mention, on such a subject: and Phillips must be a dupe to agree with them. For my own part, I have no objection at all; but Mrs. Leigh and my cousin must be better judges of the likeness than others; and they hate it; and so I won't have it at all.

"Mr. Hobhouse is right as for his conclusion; but I deny the premises. The name only is Spanish, &c. to the More.

"Waverley is the best and most interesting novel I have read since—I don't know when. I like it as much as I hate * * * * and * * * * and * * * * and all the feminine trash of the last four months. Besides, it is all easy to me, I have been in Scotland so much (though when young enough too,) and feel at home with the people, Lowland and Gael.

"A note will correct what Mr. Hobhouse thinks an error, (about the feudal system in Spain;) it is not Spain. He puts a few words of prose any where, it will set all right.

"I have been ordered to town to vote. I shall disobey. There is no good in so much prating since 'certain issues stocks should arbitrate.' If you have anything to say, let me hear from you.

"Yours, &c."

LETTER CCXXXIII.

TO MR. MURRAY. "Aug. 3, 1814.

"It is certainly a little extraordinary that you have not sent the Edinburgh Review, as I requested, and hence it would not require at him a day to remind you. I see advertisements of Lara and Jacqueline; pray why when I requested you to postpone publication till my return to town."

"This is the most amusing epistle from the Ettrick bard—Hogg; in which, speaking of his bookseller whom he denominates the 'shabbiest' of the trade for not 'lifting his bills,' he adds, in so many words, 'Goddard him and them both.' This is a pretty prelude to asking you to adopt him, (the said Goddard;) but this he wishes; and if you please, you and I will talk it over. He has a poem for the press, (once fund your bills too,) in which he bestows some benedictions on Mr. Moore for his abduction of Lara from the forthcoming Miscellany.

"P. S. Sincerely, I think Mr. Hogg would suit you very well; and surely he is a man of great powers, and deserving of encouragement. I must knock out a tale for him, and you should at all events consider before you reject his suit. Scott is gone to the Orkneys in a gale of wind, and Hogg says that, during the said gale, 'he is sure that Scott is not quite at his ease, to say the best of it.' Ah! I wish these home-keeping bards could taste a Mediterranean white squall, or the Gut in a gale of wind, or even the Bay of Biscay with no wind at all."

LETTER CCXXXIV.

TO MR. MOORE. "Hastings, Aug. 6, 1814.

"By the time this reaches your dwelling, I shall (God willing) be in town again probably. I have here been renewing my acquaintance with my old friend Ocean; and I find his bosom as pleasant a pillow for an hour in the morning as his daughters of Phoebus could be in the twilight. I have been dining and eating turbot, and smoking neat brands and silk handkerchiefs,—and listening to my friend Hodgson's raptures about a pretty wife-elect of his,—and walking on cliffs, and tumbling down hills, and making the most of the 'doleful furniture' for the last fortnight. I met a son of Lord Erskine's, who says he has been married a year, and is the 'happiest of men, and I have met the afore- said Hogg, who is also the 'happiest of men;' so, it is worth while being here, if only to witness the superlative felicity of these foxes, who have cut off their tails, and would persuade the rest to part with their brushes to keep them in countenance.

"It rejences me that you like 'Jeffrey' as the 'triumphant.' I am out with his forty-fifth number, which I suppose you have got. He is only too kind to me, in my share of it, and I begin to fancy myself a golden pheasant, upon the strength of the plumage where with he hath bedecked me. But then, 'surgit amari,' &c.—the gentlemen of the Champion, and Perry, have got hold (I know not how) of the consolatory address to Lady J. on the picture-adjunction by our Regent, and have published them—with my name, too, smack—without even asking leave, or inquiring whether or no. D—n their impudence, and d—n every thing. It has put me out of patience, and so I shall say no more about it.*

"You shall have Lara and Jaque (both with some additions) when out, but I am still demurring and delaying, and in a fuss, and so is Rogers in his way.

"Newstead is to be mine again. Cloughton for feits twenty-five thousand pounds; but that don't prevent me from being very prettily ruined. I mean to bury myself there—and let my beard grow—and hate you all.

"Oh! I have had the most amusing letter from Hogg, the Ettrick minstrel and shepherd. He wants me to be there (in August), and speaking of his present bookseller, whose 'bills are never lifted' he adds, to tidem verba, 'G—d* See Pense, p. 568"
LETTER CCXXXV.

TO MR. MURRAY.

"Aug. 5, 1814.

"The Edinburgh Review is arrived—thanks. Enclose Mr. Hobhouse's letter, from which you will perceive the work you have made. However, I have done: you must now play rhymes to the devil your own way. It seems also that the faithful and spirited likeness is another of your publications. I wish you joy of it; but it is no likeness—that is the agreement. Seriously, if I have drawback from Scotland, I am sorry that you carried your complaisance so far; particularly as upon trifles you have a more summary method:—witness the grammar of Hobhouse's bit of prose, which has put him and me into a fever.

"Hogg must translate his own words: lifting is a quotation from his letter, together with G-d d-n, &c., which I suppose requires no translation.

"I was unaware of the contents of Mr. Moore's letter: I think your offer very handsome, but of that you and he must judge. If he can get more, you won't wonder that he should accept it.

"This item with Lara, since it must be. The tom looks pretty enough—on the outside. I shall be in town next week, and in the mean time wish you a pleasant journey. Yours, &c."

LETTER CCXXXVII.

TO MR. MOORE.

"Aug. 12, 1814.

"I was not alone, nor will be while I can help it. Newstead is not yet decided. Claughton is to make a grand effort by Saturday week to complete; if not, he must give up twenty-two thousand pounds, and the estate, with expenses &c., &c. If I resume the Abbacy, you shall have due notice, and a cell seat apart for your reception, with a plaus welcome. Rogers I have not seen, but Larry and Jackey cannot a few days ago. Of their effect, I know notting.

"There is something very amusing in your being an Edinburgh Reviewer. You know, I suppose, that Thurlow is none of the placidest, and may possibly enact some tragedy on being told that he is only a fool. If, now, Jeffrey were to be slain on account of an article of yours, there might be a fine conclusion. For my part, as Mrs. Winifred Jenkins says, 'he has done the handsome thing by me,' particularly in his last number; so he is the best of men and the abest of critics, and I won't have him killed—though I hope many wish he were, for being so good-humored.

"Before I left Hastings, I got in a passion with an ink-bottle, which I flung out of the window one night with a vengeance;—and what then? why, next morning I was horrified by seeing that it had struck, and split upon, the petticoat of Euterpe's graven image in the garden, and grimed her as if it were on purr see. Only think of my distress, and the epigram that might be engendered on the Muse and her misadventure.

"I had an adventure, almost as ridculous, at some private theatres near Cambridge—though of a different complexion—since saw you last. I quarrelled with a man in the dark, for asking me who I was, (insolent enough, to be sure,) and followed him into the green-room (a stable) in a rage. Among a set of nothing, I never thought it turned out to be a low comedian, engaged to act with the amateurs, and be a civil-spoken man.

* His servant had brought him up a large jar of ink, into which, not supposing it to be full, he had thrust his pen down to the very bottom. Escaped on finding it come out all smeared with ink, he flung the bottle at the window into the garden, where it figured, as been described, upon a second edition of Wordsworth's "Lake Poets," as 'the sixpenny ink-stand of a poet, from which it hitherto the sixth having been, by some accident, left behind—"
BYRON'S WORKS.

"I still think Mr. Hogg and yourself might make cut an alliance. Dobson's was, I believe, the last decent thing of the kind, and his had great success in its day, and lasted several years; but then he had the double advantage of editing and publishing. The Spleen, and several of Orary's odes, much of Shenstone, and many others of good repute, made their first appearance in his collection. Now, with the support of Scott, Wordsworth, Southey, &c., I see little reason why you should not do as well; and if once fairly established, you would have assistance from the youngsters, I dare say. Stratford Canning, (whose Bonaparte is excellent,) and many others, and Moore, and Hitherto, and I would try a fall now and then, (if permitted,) and you might coax Campbell, too, into it. By-the-by, he has an unpublished (though printed) poem on a scene in Germany, (Bavaria, I think,) which I saw last year, that is perfectly magnificent, and equal to himself. I wonder he don't publish it.

"Oh!—do you recollect S's, the engraver's, mad letter about not engraving Phillips's picture of Lord Foley? (as I have it:) well, I have trace it, I think. It seems, by the papers, a preacher of Johanna Southcoote's is named Foley; and I can no way account for the said S's confusion of words and ideas: I don't know what of his head's running on Johanna and her apostles. It was a mercy he did not say Lord Tozer. You know, of course, that S is a believer in this new (old) virgin of spiritual impregnation.

"I long to know what she will produce: her being with child at sixty-five is indeed a miracle, but her getting any one to beget it, a greater.

"If you were not going to Paris or Scotland, I would send you some game: if you remain, let me know.

"P. S. A word or two of 'Lara,' which your enclosure brings before me. It is of no great promise separately; but, as connected with the other tales, it will do very well for the volumes you mean to publish. I would recommend this arrangement—Child Harold, the smaller Poems, Giaour, Bride, Corsair, Lara; the last completes the series, and its very likeness renders it necessary to the others. Cawthorne writes that they are publishing English Barda in Ireland: pray inquire into this; because it must be stopped."

LETTER CCXLI.

TO MR. MOORE.

"Newstead Abbey, Sept. 15, 1814.

"This is the fourth letter I have begun to you within the month. Whether I shall finish or not, or burn it like the rest, I know not. When we meet, I shall explain why I have not written—why I have not asked you here, as I wished—with a great many other why's and wherefores, which will keep cold. In short, you must excuse all my seeming omissions and commissions, and grant me more remission than St. Athanasius will to yourself; if you log off a single shred of mystery from his pious puzzle. It is my creed (and it may be St. Athanasius's too) that your article on T will get somebody killed, and that, on the Saints, get him d—d afterward, which will be quite enough for one number. Oons, Tom! you must not meddle just now with the in comprehensible; for if Johanna Southcote turns out to be

"Now for a little egotism. My affairs stand thus. To-morrow, I shall know whether a circumstance of importance enough to change many of my plans will occur or not. If it does not, I am off for Italy next month, and London, in the mean time, next week. I have got back Newstead, and twenty-five thousand pounds (out of twenty-eight paid already,)—as a 'sacrifice,' the late purchaser calls it, and he may choose his own name. I have paid some of my debts, and contracted others; but I have for a thousand pounds, which I can't spend after my own heart in this climate, and so, I shall go back to the south. Hobhouse, I think and hope, will go with me; but, whether he will or not, I shall hear to see Venice, and the Alps, and Parmesan cheeses, and look at the coast of Greece, or rather Ephesus, from Italy, as I once did— or fancied I did—that of Italy, when off Corfu. All this, however, depends upon an event, which may, or may not, happen. Whether it will, I shall know probably to-morrow, and if it does, I can't well go abroad at present.

"Pray pardon this parenthetical scratch. You shall hear from me again soon.—I don't call this an answer.

"Ever most affectionately, &c.

The "circumstance of importance," to which he alludes in this letter, was his second proposal for Miss Milbanke, of which he was now waiting the result.

LETTER CCXLII.

TO MR. MOORE.

"Newstead Abbey, Sept. 30, 1814.

"Here is her who long
Has wak'd the poet's sigh I
The girl who gave to song
What gold could never buy.

"My dear Moore, I am going to be married—that is, I am accepted, and one usually hopes the rest will follow. My mother of the Gracchi (that are to be) you think too strait-laced for me, although the paragon of only children, and invested with 'golden opinions of all sorts of men,' and full of 'most blessed conditions,' as Dampier calls herself. Miss Milbanke is the lady, and I have her father's invitation to proceed there in my elect capacity,—which, however, I cannot do till I have settled some business in London, and got the boat.

"She is said to be an heiress, but of that I really know nothing certainly, and shall not inquire. But I do know, that she has talents and excellent qualities, and you will not deny her judgment, after having refused six suitors and taken me.

"Now, if you have any thing to say against this, pray do; my mind's made up, positively fixed, determined, and therefore I will listen to reason, be cause now it can do no harm. However, I do not want to break it off, but I will hope not. In the mean time, I tell you (a secret, by-the-by,—at least, till I know she wishes it to be public) that I have proposed and am accepted. You need not be in a hurry to wish me joy, for one is not married for months. I am going to town to-morrow; but expect to be here, on my way there, within a fortnight.

"If this had not happened I should have gone to Italy. In my way thither, perhaps, you will meet me at Nottingham, and come over with me here. I need not say that nothing will give me greater pleasure. I must, of course, reform thoroughly; and, seriously, if I can contribute to her happiness, I shall secure my own. She is so good a person that—that—in short, I wish I was a better.

"Ever, &c."
TO THE COUNTESS OF " **.

"DEAR LADY:" "*

"Your recollection and invitation do me great honor; but I am going to be married, and can't come." My intention is to spend two hundred miles off, and the moment my business here is arranged, I must set out in a great hurry to be happy. Miss Milbanke is the good-natured person who has undertaken me, and, of course, I am very much in love and as silly as all single gentlemen must be in that sentimental situation. I have been accepted there three weeks; but when the event will take place, I don't exactly know. It depends partly upon lawyers, who are never in a hurry. One can be sure of nothing; but, at present, there appears no other interruption to this intention, which seems as mutual as possible, and now no secret, though I didn't tell first—and all our relatives are congratulating away to right and left in the most fatiguing manner.

"I particularly mean the lady. She is niece to Lady Melbourne, and cousin to Lady Cowper, and others of your acquaintance, and has no fault, except being a great deal too good for me, and that I must pardon, if nobody else should. It might have been two years ago, and, if it had, would have saved me a world of trouble. She has employed the interval in refusing about half a dozen of my particular friends, (as she did me once, by the way,) and has taken me at last, for which I am very much obliged to her. I wish it was well over, for I do hate bustle, and there is no marrying without some;—and then I must not marry in a black coat, they tell me, and I can't wear a blue one.

"Pray forgive me for scribbling all this nonsense. You know I must be serious all the rest of my life, and this is a parting piece of buffoonery, which I write with tears in my eyes, expecting to be agitated. Believe most seriously and sincerely your obliged servant,

"BYRON.

"P. S. My best rem. to Lord * * on his return."

TO MR. MOORE.

"Oct. 7, 1814.

"Notwithstanding the contradictory paragraph in the Morning Chronicle which must have been sent by * * or perhaps—I know not why I should suspect Caughef of such a thing, and yet I partly do, because it might interrupt his renewal of purchase, if so disposed; in short, it matters not, but we are all in the road to matrimony—lawyers setting, relations congratulating, my intended as heart could wish, and every one, whose opinion I value, very glad of it. All her relatives, and all mine too, seem equally pleased.

"Perry was very sorry, and has re-contradicted, as you will perceive by this day's paper. It was, to be sure, a devil of an insertion, since the first paragraph came from Sir Ralph's own County Journal, and this in the teeth of it would appear to him and his as my denial. But I have written to do away that, enclosing Perry's letter, which was very polite and kind.

"Nobody hates bustle so much as I do; but there seems a fatality over every scene of my drama, always a row of some sort or other. No matter—Perry, your friend, and all my obligations to her, I hope she will treat me better than she treated the Athenian, who took some merit to himself on some occasion, but (after that) took care. In fact, she, that exquisite goddess, has hitherto carried me through every thing, and will, I hope, now, since I own it will be all her doing.

"Well, now for thee. Your article on * * is perfection itself. You must not leave off reviewing. By Jove, I believe you can do any thing. There is wit, and taste, and learning, and good-humor (though not a whit less severe for that) in every line of that critique. * * *

"Next to your being an E. Reviewer, my being of the same kidney, and Jeffrey's being such a judge to me as yours which, I conceive were not calculated upon in Mr.—what's his name's—Essay on Probabilities.'*

"But, Tom, I say—Oons! Scott menaces the 'Lord of the Isles.' Do you mean to compete? or lay by, till this wave has broke upon the shelves (of booksellers, not rocks—a broken metaphor, by the way.) You ought to be afraid of nobody; but your modersity is really as provoking and unnecessary as a * * *.

"I am very merry, and have just been writing some elegant stanzas on the death of Sir P. Parker. He was my first cousin, but never met since boyhood. Our relations desired me, and I have scribbled and given it to Perry, who will chronicle it to-morrow. I am as sorry for him as one could be for one I never saw since I was a child; but should not have wept melodiously, except 'at the request of friends.'

"I hope to go out of town and be married, but I shall take Newstead in my way, and you must meet me at Nottingham and accompany me to mine Abbey. I will tell you the day when I know it.

"P. S. By the way, my wife-elect is perfection; and I hear of nothing but her merits and her wonders, and that she is 'very pretty.' Her expectations, I am told, are great; but what, I have not asked. I have not seen her these ten months."

TO MR. HUNT.

"My Dear Hunt,

"I send you some game, of which I beg your acceptance. I specify the quantity as a security against the porter; a hare, a pheasant, and two brace of partridges, which I hope are fresh. My stay in town has not been long, and I am in all the agonies of quitting it again next week on business, preparatory to a change of condition, as it is called by the talkers on such matters. I am about to be married: and am, of course, in all the misery of a man in pursuit of happiness. My intended is two hundred miles off, and the efforts I am making with lawyers, &c, &c, to join my future connexions, are for a personage of my single and invertebrate habits, to say nothing of indolence, quite prodigious! I sincerely hope you are better than your paper indicated lately, and that your approaching freedom will find you in full health to enjoy it.

"Yours ever,

"BYRON"

TO MR. MOORE.

"Oct. 15, 1814.

"An' there were any thing in marriage that would make a difference between friends and me, particularly in your case, I would 'none o' 't.' My agent sets off for London next week, and I shall follow him, taking Newstead and you in my way. I certainly did not address Miss Milbanke with these LETTERS.

LETTER CCXLI.

TO MR. COWELL.

"Oct. 29, 1814.

MY DEAR COWELL,

"Many and fervent thanks for your kind letter—the bet, or rather forfeit, was one hundred to Hawke, and fifty to Hay, (nothing to Kelly,) for a guinea received from each of the two former. I shall feel much obliged by your setting me right if I am incorrect in this statement in any way, and have reasons for wishing you to recollect as much as possible of what passed, and state it to Hodgson. My reason is this: some time ago Mr.  required a bet of me which I never made, and of course, refused to pay, and have heard no more of it; to prevent similar mistakes is my object in wishing you to remember well what passed, and to put Hodgson in possession of your memory on the subject.

"I hope to see you soon in my way through Cambridge. Remember me to II., and believe me ever and truly, &c."

LETTER CCL.

TO MR. MOORE.

"Dec. 14, 1814.

MY DEAREST TOM,

"I will send the pattern to-morrow, and since you don't go to our friend (of the keeping part of the town) this evening, I shall send my sister at home over a solitary potation. My self-opinion rises much by your eulogy of my social qualities. As my friend Scope is pleased to say, I believe I am very well for a 'holiday drinker.' Where the devil are you? with Woolridge, I conjecture—for which you deserve another absence. Hoping that the American war will last for many years, and that all the prizes may be registered at Bermoothes, believe me, &c.

"P. S. I have just been composing an epistle to the archbishop for an especial license. Oons! It looks serious. Murray is impatient to see you, and would call, if you will give him audience. Your new coat!—I wonder you like the color, and don't go about, like Dives, in purple."

LETTER CCL.

TO MR. MURRAY.

"Dec. 31, 1814.

"A thousand thanks for Gibbon: all the additions are very great improvements.

"At last, I must be peremptory with you about the print from Phillips's picture: it is pro nounced on all hands the most stupid and disagree able possible; so do, pray, have a new engraving and let me see it first; there really must be no one from the same plate. I don't much care, myls; if; but every one I honor torment me to death about it, and abuses it to a degree beyond repeating. Now, don't answer with excuses; but, for my sake, have it destroyed: I never shall have peace till it is. I write in the greatest haste.

"P. S. I have written this most illegibly: but it is to beg you to destroy the print, and have another by particular desire.' It must be d—d bad, to be sure, since every body says so but the original; and he don't know what to say. But do it: that is, burn the plate, and employ a new etcher from the other picture. This is stupid and sulky."

* He had agreed to send these sums to the persons mentioned, should he ever marry.
LETTER CLII.

TO MR. MURRAY.

"Kiedy, Jan. 8, 1815.

"The marriage took place on the 23 instant; so pray make haste and congratulate away.

"Thanks for the Edinburgh Review and the abolition of the prize. Let the next be from the other of Phillips—I mean (not the Albanian, but) the original one in the exhibition; the last was from the copy. I should wish my sister and Lady Byron to decide upon the next, as they found fault with the last. I have no opinion of my own upon the subject.

"Mr. Kinnaird will, I dare say, have the goodness to furnish copies of the Melodies,* if you state my wish upon the subject. You may have them, if you think them worth inserting. The volumes, in their collected state, must be inscribed to Mr. Hobhouse, but I have not yet mastered the expressions of my inscription; but will supply them in time.

"With many thanks for your good wishes, which have all been realized, I remain very truly,

"Yours,

"BYRON."

LETTER CLIII.

TO MR. NATHAN.

"Jan. 7, 1815.

"Dear Nathan,

"Murray, being about to publish a complete edition of my poetical effusions, has a wish to include the stanzas of the Hebrew Melodies. Will you allow him that privilege without considering it an infringement on your copyright? I certainly wish to oblige the gentleman, but you know, Nathan, it is against all good fashion to give and take back. I therefore cannot grant what is not at my disposal. Let me hear from you on the subject. Dear Nathan,

"Yours truly,

"BYRON."

LETTER CLIV.

TO MR. MOORE.

"Halifax, Darlington, Jan. 10, 1815.

"I was married this day week. The parson has pronounced it—Perry has announced it—and the Morning Post, also, under the head of 'Lord Byron's marriage'—as if it were a fabrication, or the puff-direct of a new stay-maker.

"Now for thine affairs. I have rede thee upon the Fathers, and it is excellent well. Positively, you must not leave off reviewing. You shine in it—you kill in it; and this article has been taken for Sydney Smith's, (as I heard in town,) which proves not only your proficiency in paronomy, but that you have all the airs of a veteran critic at your first visit. So, prithee, go on and prosper.

"Scott's 'Lord of the Isles' is out—'the mail-coach copy' I have, by special license of Murray.

"Now is your time;—you will come upon them newly and freshly. It is impossible to read what you have lately done (verse or prose) without seeing that you have trained on tenfold. * * * has flourished. * * has founded. I have tired the rascals (i.e. the public) with my Harrys and Larrys, Pilgrims and Pirates. Nobody but Southey has done any thing worth a slice of bookseller's pudding; and he has not luck enough to be found out in doing a good thing. Now, Tom, is thy time—Oh joyful day I would not take a knighthood for thy fortune.' Let me hear from you soon, and believe me ever, &c.

"P. S. Lady Byron is vastly well. How are Mrs and Mr Moore and Joe Atkinson's 'Graces?' We must present our women to one another."

LETTER CLV.

TO MR. MOORE.

"Jan. 19, 1815.

"Rgad! I don't think he is 'down;' and my prophecy—like most auguries, sacred and profane—is not annulled, but inverted.

"To your question about the 'dog':—Umm—my 'mother I won't say anything against—that is, about her; but how long a 'mistress' or friend may recollect paramours or competitors (lust and thrust being the two great and only bonds between the amatory or the amicable), I can't say,—or, rather, you know as well as I could tell you. But, a, for canine recollections, as far as I could judge by a cursing Bowesain, the dearest, and alas! the maddest of dogs,) I had one (half a wolf by the side) that doted on me at ten years old, and very nearly ate me at twenty. When I thought he was going to enact Argus, he bit away the backside of my breeches, and never would consent to any kind of recognition, in despite of all kinds of bones which I offered him. So, let Southey blush, and Homer too, as far as I can decide upon it.

"I humbly take it, the mother knows the soul that pays her jointure—a mistress her mate, till he * * * refuses salary—a friend his fellow, till he loses cash and character, and a dog his master, till he changes him.

"So, you want to know about Milady and me? But let me not, as Roderick Random says, 'profane the chaste mysteries of Hymen'—damn the word, I had nearly spelled it with a small h. I like Bell as well as you do (or did, you villain!) Bessy—and that is (or was) saying a great deal.

"Address your next to Seaham, Stockton-on-Tees, where we are going on Saturday (on the way) to see father-in-law, Sir Jacob, and my lady's lady-mother. Write—and write more at length—both to the public:

"Yours ever most affectionately, &c."

LETTER CLVI.

TO MR. MOORE.

"Seaham, Stockton-on-Tees, Feb. 2, 1815.

"I have heard from London that you have left Chatsworth and all the women full of 'enthralling mystery' * * about you, personally and poetically; and in particular, that * * When first I met thee, has been quite overwhelming in her effect. I told you it was one of the best things you ever wrote, though that dog Power wanted you to omit part of it. They

* Mr. Moore had just been reading Mr. Southey's poem of 'Roderick,' and, with references to an incident in it, had put the following question to Lord Byron:—'I should like to know from you, who are one of the Philo-cynics, and whether it is at all probable, that any dog (out of a mulatto race) could recollect a master, whether either his own master or mistress was able to find out. I don't care about Upham's dog, &c.—all I want to know from you, (who are renowned as 'friend of the dog, companion of the beast,' whether such a thing is possible.)

* Don Juan, cano., cana., stanze xiiil., letter xixi.

* The letter H is blotched in the MS.

* It was due that, according to his account, Mr. Brown, the usher, shivered and shone, used frequently to pronounce the word 'enthralling.'
are all regretting your absence at Chatsworth, according to my informant— all the ladies quite, &c., &c., &c. Stop my vitals!

"Well, now you have got home again—which I dare say is as agreeable as a 'draught of cool small beer to the scorched palate of a waking sat'—now you have got home again, I say, probably I shall hear from you. Since I wrote last, I have been transferred to my father-in-law's, with my lady and lady's maid, &c., &c., and the treacle-moon is over, and I am awake, and find myself married. My spouse and I agree to—and in—admiration. Swift says, 'no wise man ever married'; but, for a fool, I think it the most ambrosial of all possible future states. I still think one ought to marry upon lease; but am very sure I should renew mine at the expiration, though next term were for ninety-nine years.

"I wish you would respond, for I am here 'oblitusque meorum obliviscendus et illis.' Pray tell me what is going on in the way of intriguey, and how the w—s and rogues of the upper Beggar's Opera go on—or rather go off—in or after marriage—or who are going to break a particular commandment. Upon this dreary coast, we have nothing but country meetings and shipwrecks; and I have this day dined upon fish, which probably dined upon the crews of several colliers lost in the late gales. But I saw the sea one night in all the glories of surf and foam,—almost equal to the Bay of Biscay, and the interesting white squalls and short seas of Archipelago memory.

"My papa, Sir Ralph, hath recently made a speech at a Durham tax-meeting; and not only at Durham, but here, several times since, after dinner. He is now, I believe, speaking to himself (I left him in the middle) over various decanters, which can neither interrupt him nor fall asleep,—so might possibly have been the case with some of his audience.

"Ever thing, "B."

I must go to tea—damn tea. I wish it was Kin-nauld's brandy, and with you to lecture me about"

LETTER CCLVII.

TO MR. MURRAY.

Godalming, Stockton-on-Tees, Feb. 5, 1815.

You will oblige me very much by making an occasional inquiry at Albany, at my chambers, whether my books, &c., are kept in tolerable order, and how far my old woman* continues in health and industry as keeper of my old den. Your parcels have been duly received and perused; but I had hoped to receive 'Guy Mannering' before this time. I won't intrude further for the present on your avocations, professional or pleasurable, but am, as usual, "Very truly, &c."

LETTER CCLVIII.

TO MR. MOORE.

Feb. 6, 1815.

I enclose you half a letter from , which will explain itself—at least the latter part—the former refers to private business of mine own. If Jeffrey will take such an article, and you will undertake the revision, or, indeed, any portion of the article itself, (for unless you do, by Phœbus, I will have nothing to do with it,) we can cook up, between us three, as pretty a dish of sou-e-crouet as ever tipped over the tongue of a book-maker.*

* Mrs. Mule is a housekeeper.

You can, at any rate, try Jeffrey's inclination. Your late proposal from him made me hint this to , who is a much better prosor and scholar than I am, and a very superior man indeed. Excuse haste—answer this.

"Ever yours most, "B."

P.S. All is well at home. I wrote to you yesterday."

LETTER CCLIX.

TO MR. MOORE.

Feb. 10, 1815.

"My Dear Thom,

Jeffrey has been so very kind about me and my damnable works, that I would not be indirect or equivocal with him, even for a friend. So, it may be as well to tell him that it is not mine; but that, if I did not firmly and truly believe it to be much better than I could offer, I would never have troubled him or you about it. You can judge between you how far it is admissible, and reject it, if not of the right sort. For my own part, I have no interest in the article one way or the other, further than to oblige ; and should the composition be a good one, it can neither hurt partly—mine, indeed, any one, saving and excepting Mr. **."

Curse catch me if I know what H  means, or meant, about the demonstrative pronoun, but I admire your fear of being inoculated with the same. Have you never found out that you have a particular style of your own, which is as distinct from all other people, as Hafiz of Shiraz from Hafiz of the Morning Post?

"So you allowed B  and such like to hum and haw you, or, rather, Lady Jersey, out of her compliment, and me out of mine.† Sunburn me but this was pitiful-hearted. However, I will tell her all about it when I see her.

Bell desires me to say all kinds of civilities, and assure you of her recognition and high consideration. I will tell you of our movements south, which may be in about three weeks from this present writing. By-the-way, don't engage yourself in any travelling expedition, as I have a plan of travel into Italy, which we will discuss. And then, think of the poesy we dare with which we should overshoot that Venice to Vesuvius, to say nothing of Grecce, through all which—God willing—we might perambulate in one twelvemonth. If I take my wife, you can take yours; and if I leave mine, you may do the same. And you stand by me, in either case, Brother Bruin.

"And believe me inveretately yours,

B."

LETTER CCLX.

TO MR. MOORE.

Feb. 21, 1815.

"Yesterday, I sent off the packet and letter to Edinburgh. It consisted of forty-one pages, so that I have not added a line; but in my letter, I mentioned what passed between you and me in autumn, as my inducement for presuming to trouble him either with my own or 's lubrations. I am any thing but sure that it will do; but I have told Jeffrey that if there is any decent raw material in it, he may cut it into what shape he pleases, and warp it to his liking.

* Some remark which had been made with respect to the frequent use of the demonstrative pronoun, both by himself and by Sir W. Scott.

† Verses to Lady Jersey (containing an allusion to Lord Byron), which Mr. Moore had written, while at Chatsworth, but after and destroyed.
LETTER CCLXI.

TO MR. MOORE.

March 5, 1815.

"MY DEAR THOM,

"Jeffrey has sent me the most friendly of all possible letters, and has accepted *'s article. He says he has long liked not only, &c., &c., but my 'character.' This must be your doing, you dog— aren't you ashamed of yourself, knowing me so well? This is what one gets for having you for a father confessor.

"I feel merry enough to send you a sad song.† You once asked me for some words which you would set. Now you may set or not, as you like,—but there they are, in a legible hand, and not in mine, but of my own scribbling; so you may say of them what you please. Why don't you write to me? I shall make you a 'speech' if you don't respond quickly.

"I am in such a state of sameness and stagnation, and so totally occupied in consuming the fruits—and sauntering—and playing dull games at cards—and yawning—and trying to read old Annual Registers and the daily papers—and gathering shells on the shore while watching the growth of stuffed gooseberry bushes in the garden—that I have neither time nor sense to say more than "YOURS ever "B."""

"P. S. I open my letter again to put a question to you. From Mr. Crouch, or Lady Cork, or any of their fashionable Pidcock give, to collect you and Jeffrey and me to one party. I have been answering his letter, which suggested this dainty query. I can't help laughing at the thoughts of your face and mine; and our anxiety to keep the Aristarch in good humor during the early part of a compotation, till we got drunk enough to make him 'a speech.' I think the critic would have much the best of us—of one, at least—for I don't think diffidence (I mean social) is a disease of yours."

POEMS.

"If you won't go abroad, then, with me—but alone. I fully purpose starting much about the time you mention, and alone, too."

"I hope Jeffrey won't think me very impatient in sending *'s only; there was not room for a syllable. I have avowed * as the author, and said that you thought or said, when I met you last, that he (J.) would not be angry at the coalition, (though alas! we have not reconciled,) and so, if I have got into a scrape, I must get out of it—Heaven knows low.

"Your Anacreon* is come, and with it I sealed (its first impression) the packet and epistle to our friend.

"Cure the Melodies, and the Tribes to boot. Graham is to assist—or hath assisted—but will do no more gold than a second physician. I merely interfered to oblige a whim of Rinnard's and all I have got by it was 'a speech,' and a receipt for stewed oysters.

"Not meet—pray don't say so. We must meet somewhere or somehow. Newstead is out of the question, being nearly sold again; or, if not, is uninhabitable for my spouse. Pray write again. I will soon.

"P. S. Pray when do you come out? ever, or never? I hope I have made no blunder; but I can truly think you said to me (after Wordsworth, whom I first pondered upon, was given up that *) and I might attempt . His length alone prevented me from trying my part, though I should have been less severe upon the Reviewers.

"Your seal is the best and prettiest of my set, and I thank you very much therefor. I have just been—or, rather, ought to be—very much shocked by the death of the Duke of Dorset. We were at school together, and there I was passionately attached to him. Since, we have never met—but once, I think; since 1815—and it would be a paltry affection to pretend that I had any feeling for his worth the name. But there was a time in my life when this event would have broken my heart; and all I can say for it now is, that—it is not worth breaking.

"Adieu—it is all a farce."

* A seal, with the head of Anacreon, which Mr. Moore had given him. The verses enclosed were those melancholy one, now printed in his Works.

† There's not a joy the world can give like that it takes away. Poems, p. 548.

 The MS. was in the handwriting of Lady Byron.

†† Those allusions to a "speech" are connected with a little incident, not worth mentioning, which had occurred to both when I was in town. He was at a fact and had been aware, as may be seen in his early letters, of our having, on some conventional phrase or joke.—Moore."

LETTER CCLXII.

TO MR. MOORE.

March 8, 1815.

"An event—the death of poor Dorset—and the recollection of what once felt, and ought to have felt never, but could not—set me pondering, and finally into the train of thought which you have in your hands. I am very glad you like them, for I hate myself they will pass as an imitation of your style. If I could imitate it well, I should have no great ambition of originality—I wish I could make you exclaim with Dennis, 'That's my thunder, by G—dit!' I wrote them with a view to your setting them, and as a present to Power, if he would accept the words, and you did not think yourself degraded, for once in a way, by marrying them to music.

"Sunburn Nathaniel! why do you always twit me with his vile 'Ebrew nasaltices? Have I not told you it was all K.'s doing, and my own exquisite facility of temper? But thou wilt be a wagg Thomas; and see what you get for it. Now for my revenge.

"Depend—and preprend—upon it that your opinion of 's poem will travel through one or other of the quintuple correspondents, till it reaches the ear and the liver of the author. Your adventure, however, is truly laughable; but how could you be such a potato for a brother (of the quill) too near the throne, to confide to a man's own publisher (who has 'bought,' or rather sold, 'golden opinions' about him) such a damnable parenthesis! 'Between you and me,' quotha, it reminds me of a passage in the Heir at Law—Tête-a-tête with Lady Dubery. I suppose—'No—tête-a-tête with five hundred people;' and your confidential communication will doubtless be in circulation to that amount, in a short time, with several additions, and in several letters, all signed L. H. R. O. B. &c., &c., &c.

"We leave this place to-morrow, and shall stop on our way to town (in the interval of taking a house there) at Col. Leigh's, near Newmarket, where any epistle of yours will find its welcome way.

"I have been very comfortable here, listening to that d—d monologue, which elderly gentlemen call"
LETTER CCXIII.

TO MR. MOORE.

I meant to write to you before on the subject of your loss,* but the recollection of the uselessness and worthlessness of any observations on such events prevented me. I shall only now add, that I rejoice to see you recover it so well, and trust that I true time will enable Mrs. M. to sustain it better. Every thing should be done to divert and occupy her with other thoughts and cares, and I am sure all that can be done will.

*To my sister. Napoleon—but the papers will have told you all. I quite think with you upon the subject, and for my real thoughts this time last year, I refer you to the last pages of the Journal I gave you. I can forgive the rogue for utterly falsifying every line of mine Ode, which I take to be the last and uttermost stretch of human magnanimity. Do you remember the story of a certain abbé, who wrote a Treatise on the Swedish Constitution, and proved it indissoluble and eternal? Just as he had corrected the last sheet, news came that Gustavus III. had destroyed this immortal government: 'Sir,' quoth the abbé, 'the king of Sweden may overthrow the constitution, but not my book!' I think of the abbé, but not with him.

Making every allowance for talent and most consummate daring, there is, after all, a good deal in luck or destiny. He might have been stopped by our frigate in her chase, or sunk by the gulf of Lyons, which is particularly tempestuous—or a thousand things. But he is certainly Fortune's favorite, and

You must have seen the account of his driving into the middle of the royal army, and the immediate effect of his pretty speeches. And now, if he don't drub the allies, there is 'tob purchase in money.' If he can take France by himself, the devil's in't, for he don't repulse the invaders, when backed by those celebrated sworders—those boys of the blade, the Imperial Guard, and the old and new army. It is impossible not to be dazzled and overwhelmed by his character and career. Nothing ever so disjointed, pointed me as his abdication, and nothing could have reconciled me to him but some such revival as his recent exploit; though no one could anticipate such a complete and brilliant reversion from its antecedent.

*To your question, I can only answer that there have been some symptoms which look a little detrimental. It is a subject upon which I am not particularly anxious, except that I think it would please her uncle, Lord Wentworth, and her father and mother. The former (Lord W.) is now in town, and in very indifferent health. You perhaps know that his property, amounting to seven or eight thousand a year, will eventually devolve upon Bell.

But the old gentleman has been so very kind to him, and me, that I hardly know how to wish him heaven, if he can more comfortable on earth. Her father is still in the country.

'I don't care what Power says to secure the property of the Song, so that it is not complimentary to me, nor any thing about 'condescending' or noble authorship—blessed phrases,' as Polonius says.

'Pray let me hear from you, and when you mean to be in town. Your continental scheme is impracticable for the present. I have to thank you for a letter, not any longer letter than usual, which I hope will induce you to tax my gratitude still farther in the same way.'

'You never told me about Longman, and 'next winter,' and I am not a 'milestone.'

LETTER CCXIV.

TO MR. COLERIDGE.

'Dear Sir,

'It will give me great pleasure to comply with your request, though I hope there is still taste enough left among us to render it almost unnecessary, sordid and interested as it must be admitted, many of 'the trade' are, where circumstances give them an advantage. I trust you do not permit yourself to be depressed by the temporary partiality of what is called 'the public' for the favorites of the moment; all experience is against the permanency of such impressions. You must have lived to see many of these pass away, and will survive many more—I mean personally, for poetically, I would not insult you by a comparison.

*If I may be permitted, I would suggest that there never was such an opening for tragedy. In Kean, there is an actor worthy of expressing the thoughts of the characters which you have every power of embodying; and I cannot but regret that the part of Oratio was disposed of before his appearance at Drury Lane. We have nothing to be mentioned in the same breath with 'Remorse' for very many years; and I should think that the reception of that play was sufficient to encourage the highest hopes of author and audience. It is to be hoped that you are proceeding in a career which could not but be successful. With my best respects to Mr. Bowles, I have the honor to be,

'Your obliged and very obedient servant,'

*P. S. You mention my 'Satire,' lampoon.' or whatever you or others please to call it. I can only say, that it was written when I was very young and very angry, and has been a thorn in my side ever since; more particularly as almost all the persons animadverted upon became subsequently my acquaintances, and some of them my friends, which is 'heaping fire upon an enemy's head,' and forgiving me too readily to permit me to forgive myself. The part applied to you is pert, and petulant, and shallow enough; but although I have long done everything in my power to suppress the circulation of the whole thing, I shall always regret the wantonness or generality of many of its attempted attacks.'

"April 3, 1815.

"Yours, &c."

LETTER CCLXVI.

TO MR. MOORE.

"April 23, 1815.

"Lord Wentworth died last week. The bulk of his property (from seven to eight thousand pounds) is entailed on Lady Milbanke and Lady Byron. The first is gone to take possession in Leicestershire, and attend the funeral, &c., this day.

"I have mentioned the facts of the settlement of Lord W.'s property, because the newspapers, with their usual accuracy, have been making all kinds of blunders in their statement. His will is just as expected—the principal part settled on Lady Milbanke (now Noel) and Bell, and a separate estate left for sale to pay debts, (which are not great,) and legacies to his natural son and daughter.

"Mrs. *'s tragedy was last night damaged. They may bring it on again, and probably will; but damaged it was,—not a word of the last act audible. I went (malgré that I ought to have staid at home in sackcloth, &c., but I could not resist the first night of any thing) to a private suite, in my private box, and witnessed the whole process. The first three acts, with transient glasses of applause, coozed patiently but heavily on. I must say it was badly acted, particularly by , who was groaned upon in the third act,—something about 'horror—such a horror' was the cause. Well, the fourth act became as muddy and turbid as need be; but the fifth—what Garrick used to call (like a fool) the concoction of a play—the fifth act stuck fast at the King's prayer. You know he says, 'he never went to bed without saying them, and did not like to omit them now.' But he was no sooner upon his knees, than the audience got upon their legs—the damnable pit—and roared, and groaned, and hissed, and whistled. Well, that was choked a little; but the ruffian scene—the pentent penitency—and killing the Bishop and the Princess—oh, it was all over. The curtain fell upon unheard actors, and the announcement attempted by Kean for Monday was equally ineffectual. Mrs. Bartley was so frightened, that, though the people were tolerably quiet, the Epilogue was quite insaudible to half the house. In short, you know all. Iclapped till my hands were skinned, and so did Sir James Mackintosh, who was with me in the box. All the world were in the house, from the Jerseys, Greys, &c., &c. downwards. But it would not do. It is, after all, not an acting play,—good language, but no power.

* * * * *

Women (saving Joanna Baillie) cannot write tragedy; they have not seen enough nor felt enough of life for it. I think Semiramis or Catherine II. might have written (could they have been ungendered) a play.

"It is, however, a good warning not to risk or write tragedies. I never had much bent that way but, if I had; this would have cured me.

LETTER CLXIX.

TO MR. MOORE.

13, Piccadilly, Terrace, June 12, 1815.

"I have nothing to offer in behalf of my late silence, except the most invertebrate and ineffable laziness; but I am too supine to invent a lie, or I certainly should, being ashamed of the truth. Kinnaid, I hope, has appeased your magnanimous indignation at his blunders. I wished and wish you were in committee, with all my heart. It seems so hopeless a business, that the company of yourself and Mr. Peel is of more value to me than I knew of this when we meet. In the mean time, you are entreated to prevail upon Mrs. Esterre to engage herself. I believe she has been written to, but your influence, in person, or proxy, would probably go farther than our proposals. Whose is this, I know not; all my new function consists in listening to the despair of Cavendish Brashaw, the hopes of Kinnaird, the wishes of Lord Essex, the complaints of Whitbread, and the calculations of Mr. Moore— all of which, and whom, seem totally at variance.

C. Brashaw wants to light the theatre with gas, which, may, perhaps, (if the vulgar be believed,) poison half the audience, and all the Dramatis Personae. Essex has endeavored to persuade Keane not to get drunk, the consequence of which is, that he has never been sober since. Kinnaird, with equal success, would have convinced Raymonde that he, the said Raymonde, had too much salary. Whitbread wants us to assess the pit another sixpence,—a most insidious proposition,—which will end in an O. P. combustion. To crown all, Robins, the auctioneer, has the impudence to be displeased, because he has no dividend. The villain is a proprietor of shares, and a long-jungled orator in the meetings. I hear he has prophesied our incapacity,—a foregone conclusion,—whereof I hope to give him signal proofs before we are done.

"Will you give us an Opera? no, I'll be sworn, but I wish you would. • • • •

"To go on with the poetical world,—Walter Scott has gone back to Scotland. Murray, the bookseller, has been cruelly cudgelled of misbegotten knaves, in 'Kendal green,' at Newtoning Butts, in his way home from a purlicue dinner—and robbed—would you believe it?—of three or four bonds of forty pounds apiece, and a seal-ring of his grandfather's, worth a million! This is his version,—but others opine that D'Israeli, with whom he dined, knocked him down with his last publication, 'the Quarrels of Authors,' in a dispute about copyright. Be that as it may, the newspapers have teemed with his 'injury forma,' and he has been embrocated and invisible to all but the apostrophe ever since.

Lady B. is better than three months advanced in her pregnancy, which, I hope, like the weather, will not only go well through with it. We have been very little out this season, as I wish to keep her quiet in her present situation. Her father and mother have changed their names to Nocla, in compliance with Lord Wentworth's will, and in compliance to the property bequeathed by him.

"I hear that you have been gloriously received by the Irish,—and so you ought. But don't let them kill you with claret and kindness at the national dinner in your honor, which, I hear and hope, is in contemplation. If you will tell me the day, I'll get drunk myself on this side of the water, and wait you an applauding hiccup over the Channel."

"Of politics, we have nothing but the yell for war; and Castlerea is preparing his head for the pike, on which we shall see it carried before he has done. The loan has made every body sulky. I hear often from Paris, but in direct contradiction to the home statements of our hirelings. Of domestic doings, there has been nothing since Lady D. • • Not a divorce stirring,—but a good many in embryo, in the shape of marriages."

"I enclose you an epistle, received this morning from I know not whom; but I think it will amuse you. The writer must be a rare fellow."

"P. S. A gentleman named D'Alton (not your Dalton) has sent me a national poem called 'Der- mish.' The same cause which prevented my writing to you operated against my wish to write to him an epistle of thanks. If you see him, will you make all kinds of fine speeches for me, and tell him that I am the laziest and most ungrateful of mortals?"

"A word more,—don't let Sir John Stevenson (as an evidences to the truth of it,) talk about the price of your next poem, or they will come upon you for the Property Tax for it. I am serious, and have just heard a long story of the rascally tax-men making Scott pay for his. So, take care. Three hundred is a devil of a deduction out of three thousand."

LETTER CLXX.

TO MR. MOORE.

July 7, 1815.

"Grata superveniens, &c. &c. I had written to you again, but burnt the letter, because I began to think you seriously hurt at my indolence, and did not know how the buffoonery it contained might be taken. In the mean time I have yours, and all is well.

"I had given over all hopes of yours. By-the-by, my 'grata superveniens' should be in the present tense; for I perceive it looks now as if it applied to this present scrawl reaching you, whereas it is to the receipt of the Kilkenny epistle that I have tacked that venerable sentiment.

"Old Poor Whitehead died yesterday morning,—a sudden and severe loss. His health had been wavering, but so fatal an attack was not apprehended. He dropped down, and, I believe, never spoke afterward. I perceive Perry attributes his death to Drury Lane,—a consolatory encourage"ment to the new committee. I have no doubt that • • • who is of a melancholy habit, will be bled imme"diately; and as I have since my marriage, lost much of my paleness, and,—horresco referens" (for I hate even moderate fat)—that happy slenderness, to which, when I first knew you, I had attained, I by no means sit easy under this dispensation of the Morning Chronicle. Every one must regret the loss of Whitbread; he was surely a great and very good man.

"Paris is taken for the second time. I presume it, for the future, will have an anniversary capture. In the late battle of the world, I have any connexion,—poor Frederick Howard, the best of his race. I had little intercourse of late years, with his family, but I never saw or heard but good of him. Hobhouse's brother was killed the day short, the havock has not left a family but of its tender mercies.

From this, however, Wellington should be excepted. He is a man,—and the Scipio of our Hannibal. However, he may thank the Russian frosts, which destroyed the real elite of the French army, for the successes of Waterloo.

"La! Moore—how you blaspheme about 'Par brought to bed in November. Sir A. and my Lady Mother are to quarter at Kirby—Lord Wentworth's that was. Perhaps you and Mrs. Moore will pay us a visit at Seaham in the course of the autumn. If so, you and I (without our wives) will take a bark to Edinburgh and embrace Jeffrey. It is not much above one hundred miles from us. But all this, and other high matters we will discuss at meeting, which I hope will be on your return. We don't leave town till August.

"Ever, &c."

LETTTER CCXLII.

TO MR. SOTHEBY.

"Sept. 18, 1815. Piccadilly, Terrace.

'Dear Sir,

"I Vian's* is accepted, and will be put in progress on Keen's arrival.

"The theatrical gentlemen have a confident hope of its success. I know not that any alterations for the stage will be necessary: if any, they will be trivial, and you shall be duly apprized. I would suggest that you should not attend any except the latter rehearsals—the managers have requested me to state this to you. You can see them, viz., Dibdin and Gifford. Will you please, and I will do any thing you wish to be done, on your suggestion, in the mean time.

"Mrs. Mardin is not yet out, and nothing can be determined till she has made her appearance—I mean as to her capacity for the part which you mention, which I take it for granted is not in Vian—as I think Vian may be performed very well without her.

But of that hereafter.

"Ever yours, very truly,

"BYRON.

"P. S. You will be glad to hear that the season has begun uncommonly well—great and constant houses

—the performers in much harmony with the community, and as much good-humour as can be preserved in such complicated and extensive interests as the Drury-Lane proprietory."

LETTTER CCXLII.

TO MR. SOTHEBY.

"Sept. 26, 1815.

'Dear Sir,

"I think it would be advisable for you to see the acting managers when convenient, as there must be

* A Tragedy, by Mr. Sokeby.

points on which you will want to confer; the objection I stated was merely on the part of the performers, and is general and not particular to this instance. I thought it as well to mention it a once—and some of the rehearsals you will doubtless see, notwithstanding.

"Rae, I rather think, has his eye on Naritzin for himself. He is a more popular performer than

Bartley, and certainly the cast will be stronger with him in it; besides, he is one of the managers, and will feel doubly interested if he can act in both capacities. Mrs. Bartley will be Petrowna,—as to the Empress, I know not what to say or think. The truth is we are not amply furnished with tragic women; but make the best of those we have—you can take your choice of them. We have all great hopes of the success—on which, setting aside other considerations, we are particularly anxious, as being the first tragedy to be brought out since the old committee.

"By-the-way—I have a charge against you. As the great Mr. Dennis roared out on a similar occasion—'By G—, that is my thunder!' so do I exclaim 'This is my lightning! I allude to a speech of Ivan's, which was put by him last month, and

Dennis and the Empress, where the thought and almost expression are similar to Corrado's in the third canto of the Corsair. I, however, do not say this to accuse you, but to exempt myself from suspicion, as there is a priority of six months' publication, on my part, between the appearance of that composition and of your tragedies.

"George Lambe meant to have written to you.

If you don't like to confer with the managers at present, I will attend to your wishes—so state them."

"Yours very truly,

"BYRON."

LETTTER CCXLIII.

TO MR. TAYLOR.

"Sept. 25, Piccadilly, Terrace.

'Dear Sir,

"I am sorry you should feel uneasy at what has happened. If your editor, his correspondents, and readers, are amused, I have no objection to be the theme of all the jokes he can find room for,—provided his luscinations are confined to me only.

"It is a long time since things of this kind have ceased to fright me from my property: nor do I know any similar attack which would induce me to turn again, unless it involved those connected from me. I hope, are such as to exempt them in the eyes of those who bear no good will to myself. In such a case, supposing it to occur,—to reverse the saying of Dr. Johnson,—what the law could not do for me, I would do for myself; be the consequences what they might.

"I return you, with many thanks, Colman and the letters. The poems, I hope, you intended me to keep; at least, I shall do so, till I hear the contrary."

"Very truly yours."

LETTTER CCXLIV.

TO MR. MURRAY.

more, will you give fifty, or even forty, pounds for the copyright of the said? I have un-

An attack on Lord and Lady Byron, in the Sun newspaper, of which

Mr. Sokeby was proprietor.
LETTER CCLXXV.

TO MR. MURRAY.

"Sept. 27, 1815.

'That's right, and splendid, and becoming a publisher of high degree. Mr. Concannon (the translator) will be delighted, and pay his washervoman: and in reward for your bountiful behavior in this instance, I won't ask you to publish any more for Drury Lane, or any lane whatever again. You will have no tragedy or any thing else from me, I assure you, and may think yourself lucky in having got rid of me, for good and all, without more damage. But I'll tell you what we shall do for you,—act Sotheby's will expedite; and the next impression of the dramas of that dramatic gentleman will be expedited to your heart's content; and if there is any thing very good, you shall have the refusal; but you shan't have any more requests.

'Ve have got a thought, and almost the words, from the third canto of the Corsair, which, you know, was published six months before his tragedy. It is from the storm in Conrad's cell. I have written to Mr. Sotheby to claim it; and as Dennis roared out of the pit, 'By G—d, that's my thunder!' so do I, and will I, exclaim, 'By G—d, that's my lightning!' that electrical fluid being, in fact, the subject of the said passage.

'You will have a print of Fanny Kelly, in the Maid, to prefix, which is honestly worth twice the money you have given for the MS. Pray what did you do with the note I gave you about Mungo Park?"

"Ever, &c."

LETTER CCLXXVI.

TO MR. HUNT.

"13, Terence, Picalecty, Oct. 7, 1815.

'My Dear Hunt,

"I had written a long answer to your last, which I put into the fire, partly, because it was a repetition of what I have already said, and next, because I considered what my opinions are worth, before I made you pay double postage, as your proximity lays you within the jaws of the tremendous 'Two-penny,' and beyond the verge of franking, the only parliamentary privilege, (saving one other,) of much avail in these 'costermonger' days.

'Pray don't make me an exception to the 'Long life King Richard' of your bars in the 'Proprietor,' do allow him* to be 'the prince of the barbs of his time,' upon the judgment of those who must judge more impartially than I probably do. I acknowledge him as I acknowledge the Houses of Hanover and Bourbon, the—not the 'one-eyed monarch of the blind,'—but the blind monarch of the one-eyed. I merely take the liberty of a free subject to vituperate certain of his edicts, and that only in private, I shall be very glad to see you, on your remaining canto; if both together, so much the better.—I am interrupted."
be sorry if I suppressed any farther publication of this kind; and I immediately acquiesced, and with great pleasure, for I had attacked them upon a fancied and false provocation with many others; and neither was, nor am sorry, to have done what I could to strike the credit of that tragedy. This was subsequent to my acquaintance with Lord Holland, and was neither expressed nor understood, as a conclusion of that acquaintance. Rogers told me he thought I ought to suppress it. I thought so too, and did as far as I could, and that's all. I sent you my copy, because I consider your having it much the same as having it myself. Lady Byron has one; I desire not to have any other, and sent it only as a curiosity and a memento."

LETTER CCLXXIX.

TO MR. MOORE.

"You are, it seems, in England again, as I am to hear from every body but yourself; and I suppose you punctually as I did not answer your last Irish letter. When did you leave the 'swate country'? Never mind, I forgive you;—a strong proof—I know not what—to give the lie to—

"'He never pardon's who has done the wrong.'

"You have written to * * *. You have also written to Perry, who intimates hope of an opera from you. Coleridge has promised a tragedy. Now, if you keep Perry's word, and Coleridge keeps his own, Drury Lane will be set up;—and, sooth to say, it is in grievous want of such a lift. We began at speed, and are blown already. When I say 'we,' I mean Kinmaird, who is the 'all in all sufficient,' and can count, which none of the rest of the committee can.

"It is really very good fun, as far as the daily and nightly stir of these strutters and frettors goes; and, if the concern could be brought to pay a shilling in the pound, would do much credit to the management. Mr. — has an accepted tragedy, * * * * *, whose first scene is in his sleep, (I don't mean the author's,) It was forwarded to us as a prodigious favvore of Keam's; but the said Keam, upon interrogation, denies his eulogy, and protests against his part. How it will end, I know not,

"I say Coleridge about the theme, because there is nothing else alive at this season. All the world are out of it, except us, who remain to lie in,—in December or perhaps earlier. Lady B. is very ponderous and prosperous, apparently, and I wish it well over.

"There is a play before me from a personage who signs himself 'Hibernicus.' The hero is Malachi, the Irishman and king; and the villain and usurper, Turgesius, the Dane. The conclusion is fine. Turgesius is chained by the leg (side stage direction) to a pillar on the stage; and 'King Malachi makes him a speech, not unlike Lord Casttleragh's, about the balance of power and the lawfulness of legitimacy, which puts Turgesius into a phrensy—as Castleragh's would, if his audience was chained by the leg. He draws a dagger and rushes at the orator; but, finding himself at the end of his tether, he strikes it into his own carcass, and dies, saying, he has fulfilled a prophecy.

"Now, this is serious, downright matter of fact, and the gravest part of a tragedy which is not intended for burlesque. I tell you for the honor of Ireland. The writer hopes it will be represented—

"but what is Hope? nothing but the paint on the face of Existence; the least touch of Truth rubs it off, and then we see what a hollow-cheeked harlot we have got hold of. I am not sure that I have not said this last superfine reflection before. But never mind;—it will do for the tragedy of Turgesius, to which I can append it.

"Well, but how dost thou do? thou bard, not of a thousand, but three thousand! I wish your friend, Sir John Barrie, may long have the reputation of the unhappy bard. He designed it not. If the play were not made it public at the trial of the song-seller in Dublin. I tell you why; it is a liberal thing for Longman to do, and honorable for you to obtain; but it will set the 'hungry and discontented land-

"saw judges' upon the fortunate author. But they be d—! the 'Jeffrey and the Moore together are confident against the world in ink!' By-the-"way, if you mean 'a long'—who is a man of wonderful talent, and in distress, and about to publish two volums of Poesy and Biography, and who has been worse used by the critics than ever we were—will you, if he comes out, promise me to review him favorably in the B. R.? I praise him, I think you must, but you will also praise him well,—of all things the most difficult. It will be the making of him.

"This must be a secret between you and me, as Jeffrey might not like such a project—nor, indeed, might Coleridge himself like it. But I do think he only wants a pioneer, and a spark to two explode most gloriously.

"Ever yours most affectionately,

"B."

LETTER CCLXXX.

TO MR. HUNT.

"MY DEAR HUNT,

"Many thanks for your books, of which you already know my opinion: their external splendor should not disturb you as inopportune—they have still more within than without. I take leave to differ from you on Wordsworth, as freely as I once agreed with you; at that time I gave him credit for a promise, which is unfulfilled. I still think his capacity warrants all you say of it only, but that his performances since 'Lyrical Ballads' are miserably inadequate to the ability which lurks within him: there is under it all the extraordinary talent spilt over for 'Excursion,' but it is rain upon rocks, where it stands and stagnates, or rain up n sands, where it falls without fertilizing. Who can understand him? Let those who do, make him intelligible. Jacob Behmen, Swedenberg, and J. J. Southcot, are mere types of this arch-apostle of mystery and mysticism. But I have done.—no, I have not done—for I have two petty, and perhaps unworthy, objections in small matter to make to him, which is none of my pretensions to accurate observations, and fury against Pope's false translation of 'the moonlight scene in Homer,' I wonder he should have fallen into those be they.—He says of Greece in the body of his book, that it is a land of

"'Rivers, fertile plains, and sounding shores,

"The rivers are dry half the year, the plains are barren, and the shores still and lifeless as the Mediter-année can make them; the sky is any thing but variegated, being for months and months but darkly, deeply, beautifully blue.'—The next in his notes, where he talks of our 'Monuments crowded together in the busy, &c., of a large town,' as compared with the 'still seclusion of a Turkish cemetery in some remote place.' This is pure stuff; for

"one monument in our churchyards there are ten in the Turkish, and so crowded that you cannot walk between them; that is, divided merely by a path or road; and as to 'remote places,' men never take the trouble, in a barbarous country, to carry their dead very far they must have lived near to where they were buried. There are no cemeteries in 'remote places,' except such as have the cypress and the tombstone still left, where the olive and the habitu-tion of the living have perished. ... These things I was struck with, as coming peculiarly in my own way; and in both of these he is wrong: yet I should have noticed neither, but for his attack on Pope for a like blunder, and a peevish affection about him depriving a popularity which he will never obtain.
I write in great haste, and, I doubt, not much to the purpose, but you have it hot and hot, just as it comes, and so let it go. By-the-way, both he and you go too far against Pope's. 'So when the moon, &c.' It is no translation, I know; but of such false description as asserted. I have read it on the spot; there is a burst, and a lightness, and a glow about the night in the Troad, which makes the 'planets vivid,' and the 'pole glaring.' The moon is, at least the sky is, clearness itself and I know no more appropriate expression for the expasion of such a heaven—o'er the scene—the plain the sea—the sky—I'de—the Helle-spon—Simon—Seaman—and the Isles—than that of a flood of glory.' I am getting horribly lengthy, and must stop to: the whole of your letter I say 'ditto to Mr. Burke,' as the Bristol candidate cried, by way of electioneering harangue. You need not speak of morbid feelings and vexations to me: I have plen-ity; but I must blame partly the times, and chiefly myself: but let us forget them. I shall be very apt do so when I see you next. Will you come to the theatre and see our new management? You shall cut it up to your heart's content, root and branch, afterwards, if you like, but come and see it if not. I must come and see you.

"Ever yours, very truly and affectionately,"

"BYRON.

"P. S. Not a word from Moore for these two months. Pray let me have the rest of Rimini. You have two excellent points in that poem—originality and Italianism. I will back you as a bard against half the followers on whom you have thrown away much good criticism and eulogy; but don't let your bookseller publish in quarto—it is the worst possible for circulation. I say this on bibliopolical authority."

"Again, yours ever,"

"B."

LETTER CCXXXI.

TO MR. MOORE.

"Traverse, Piccadilly, Oct. 11, 1815.

"I have not been able to ascertain precisely the time of duration of the stock market; but I believe it is a good time for selling out, and I hope so.
First, because I shall see you; and, next, because I shall receive certain moneys on behalf of Lady B.,
the, which will materially conduct to my comfort.—
I wanting (as the duns say) 'to make up a sum.'
Yesterday I dined out with a largeish party, where were Sheridan and Colman, Harry Harris of C. G., and his brother, Sir Gilbert Heathcote, Dr.
Kinnaird, and others of note and notoriety. Like other parties of the kind, it was first silent, then larger, then one, then another, then a burst, then minutegible, then altogether, then inarticulate, and then drunk. When we had reached the last step of this glorious ladder, it was difficult to get down again without stumbling;—and to crown all, Kinnaird and I had to conduct Sheridan down in d—d cork-screw staircase, which had certainly been constructed before the discovery of fermented liquors, and to which no legs, however crooked, could possibly accommodate themselves. We deposited him safe at home, where his man, evidently used to the business, waited to receive him in the hall

"Both he and Colman were, as usual, very good;
but I carried away much wine, and the wine had previously carried away my memory; so that all was hiccup and happiness for the last hour or so,
and I am not impregnated with any of the conversation. Perhaps you heard of a late account of Sheridan to the watchman, who furnished him with that 'divine particle of air,' called reason,—

"He, the watchman, found Sherry in the street, fuddled and bewitched, and asked sensible. 'Who are you, sir?'—no answer.

'What's your name?'—a hiccup. 'What's your name?'—Answer, in a slow, deliberate, and impressive tone,—Wilberforce!!! Is not that Sherry all over?—and to my mind excellent. Poor fellow, his very dregs are better than the first sprightly rungings of others.

"My paper is full, and I have a grievous headache.

"P. S. Lady B. is in full progress. Next month will bring to light (with the aid of 'Junio Lucina, for open,' or rather open, for the last are most wanted) the tenth wonder of the world; Gil Blas during the eighth, and he (my son's father) the ninith.'

LETTER CCXXXII.

TO MR. MOORE.

"Nov. 4, 1816.

"Had you not bewildered my head with the 'stocks,' your letter would have been answered directly. Hadn't I to go to the city? and hadn't I to remember what to ask when I got there? and didn't I forgotten it?

"I should have immediately delighted to see you;
but I don't like to urge against your reasons my own inclinations. Come you must soon, for stay won't. I know you of old;—you have been too much leavened with London to keep long out of it.

"Lewis is going to Jamaica to suck his sugar canes. He sails in two days; I enclose you his farewell note. I saw him last night at D. L. T., for the last time previous to his voyage. Poor fellow!
he is really a good man—an excellent man—you shall have me his walking-stick, and a pot of preserved ginger.
I shall never eat the last without tears in my eyes, it is so hot. We have had a devil of a row among our ballerinas; Miss Smith has been wronged about a hornpipe. The committee have interfered; but Byrne, the d—d ball-master, won't budge a step.
I am furious, so is George Lambe. Kinnaird is very glad, because—he don't know why; and I am very sorry, for the same reason. To-day I dine with K—
—we are to have Sheridan and Colman again; and tomorrow, once more at Sir Gilbert Heathcote's.

"Leigh Hunt has written a real good and very original poem, which I think will be a great hit.
You can have no notion how very well it is written, nor should I, had I not redde it. As to us, Tom—eh, when art thou out? If you think the verses worth it, I would rather they were embalmed in the Irish Melodies, than scattered abroad in a separate song; much rather. But when are thy great things out? I mean the Po of Pos; thy Shah Nameh.
It is very kind in Jeffrey to like the Hebrew Melodies. Some of the follow here preferred Sternhold and Hopkins, and said so;—the fiend receive their souls therefor!

"I must go and dress for dinner. Poor, dear
Murat,—what an end! You know, I suppose, that his white plume used to be a rallying point in battle, like Henry the Fourth's. He refused a confessor and a bandage; so would neither suffer his soul or body to be bandaged. I was going to more to-morrow or New Day."

"Ever, &c."

LETTER CCLXXXIII

TO MR. MURRAY.
Nov., 1815.

"When you have been enabled to form an opinion on Mr. Coleridge's MS., you will oblige me by returning it, as, in fact, I have no authority to let it out of my hands. I think most highly of it, and feel anxious that you should be the publisher; but if you are not, I do not despair of finding those who will.

I have written to Leigh Hunt, stating your willingness to treat with him, which, when I saw you, I understood you to be. Terms and time to leave his pleasure and your discernment; but this I will say, that I think it the safest thing you ever engaged in. I speak to you as a man of business; were I to talk to you as a reader or a critic, I should say, it was a very wonderful and beautiful performance, with just enough of fault to make its beauties more remarkable and remarkable.

And now to the last: my own, which I feel ashamed of after the others:—publish or not, as you like, I don't care one damn. If you don't, no one else shall, and I never thought or dreamed of it, except as one in the collection. If it is worth being in the fourth volume, put it there and nowhere else; and if not, put it in the fire.

"Yours,

"N."

LETTER CCLXXXIV.

TO MR. MURRAY.
Nov. 14, 1815.

"I return you your bills not accepted, but certainly not unhonored. Your present offer is a favor which I would accept from you, if I accepted such from any man. Had such been my intention, I can assure you I would have asked you fairly, and as freely as you would give; and I cannot say more of my confidence or your conduct.

"The circumstances which induce me to part with my books,* though sufficiently, are not immediately, pressing. I have made up my mind to them, and there's an end.

"Had I been disposed to trespass on your kindness in this way, it would have been before now; but I am not sorry to have an opportunity of declining it, as it sets my opinion of you, and instead of human nature, in a different light from that in which I have been accustomed to consider it.

"Believe me very truly, &c."

LETTER CCLXXXV.

TO MR. MURRAY.
Dec. 25, 1815.

"I send some lines, written some time ago, and inscribed as an opening to 'The Siege of Corinth.' I had forgotten them, and am not sure that they and not better be left out now: on that, you and your synod can determine.*"  "Yours, &c."

FRAGMENTS OF LETTERS WRITTEN ABOUT THIS TIME TO MR. HUNT.

"With regard to the English Bards and Scotch Reviewers, I have no complete notes, nor desire to have any, from you or yours, the suppression occurred (I am as sure as I can be of any thing) in the manner stated: I have never regretted that, but very often the composition, that is, the blemish of a great deal in it. As to the quotation you allude to, I have no right, nor indeed desire, to prevent it; but, on the contrary, in common with all other writers, I do and ought to take it as a compliment.

"The paper on the Methodists I redde, and agree with the writer on one point, in which you and he perhaps differ; that an addiction to poetry is very generally the result of an unhealthy, an uneasy body; disease or deformity have been the attendants of many of our best. Collins mad—Chatterton, I think, mad—Cowper mad—Pope crooked—Milton blind—Gray (I have heard that) the last was addicted by an incurable and very grievous distemper, though not generally known; and others—I have somewhere read, however, that poets rarely go mad. I suppose the writer means that their insanity effervesces and evaporates in verses—may be so.

"I have not had time to attack your system, which ought to be done, were it only because it is a system. So, by-and-by, have at you.

"Yours ever,

"BYRON."

"Of 'Rimini,' Sir Henry Englesfield, a mighty man in the blue circles, and a very clever man any where, sent to Murray, in terms of the highest eulogy: and with regard to the common reader, my sister and cousin (who are now all my family, and the last since gone away to be married) were in fixed perusal and delight with it, and they are 'not critical,' but fair, natural, unaffected, and understanding persons. Freer, and all the arch-literati, I hear, are also unanimous in a high opinion of the poem."

LETTER CCLXXXVI.

TO MR. MOORE.
Jan. 5, 1816.

"I hope Mrs. M. is quite reestablished. The little girl was born on the 10th of December last: her name is Augusta Ada, (the second a very antique family name) but never used since the reign of King John.) She was, and is, very flourishing and fat, and reckoned very large for her days—squalls and snucks incessantly. Are you answered? Her mother is doing very well, and up again.

"I have now been married a year on the second of this month—heigh-ho! I have seen nobody lately much worth noting, except S, and another general of the Gauls, once or twice at dinner out of doors. S is a fine, foreign, villainous-looking, intelligent, and very agreeable man; his comrade is more of the petit-maître, and younger, but I should think not at all of the same intellectual caliber with the Coriscaian—which S you know is, and a cousin of Napoleon's.

"Are you never to be expected in town again? To be sure, there is no one here of the fifteen hundred friends of last rooms, called the fashionable world. My approaching papa-ship detained us for advice, &c., &c.,—though I would as soon be here as any where else on this side of the straits of Gibraltar."

"I would gladly—or, rather, sorrowfully—comply with your request of a dirge for the poor girl you mention. But how can I write on one I have never seen or known? Besides, you will do much better

* In consequence of his pecuniary embarrassment at this time, he had expressed an intention of parting with his books. On hearing this, Mr. Murray instantly forwarded him 1500l, with an assurance that another sum of the same amount she should do at his service in a few weeks, and that if such assurance should not be sufficient, Mr. Murray was most ready to dispose of the uprightness of all his past works for his use.

* See Poems, p. 669.

yourself. I coul'd not write upon any thing, without some personal experience and foundation; far less on a theme so peculiar. Now, you have both in this case; and, if you had neither, you have more imagination, and would never fail.

"This is but a dull scrawl, and I am but a dull fellow. Just at present, I am absorbed in five hundred contradictory contemplations, though with but little view—which will probably end in nothing, as most things we wish to. But never mind—as somebody says, 'for the blue sky bends over all.' I only could be glad, if it bent over me where it is a little bluer; like the 'skysih top of blue Olympus,' which, by-the-way, looked very white when I last saw it.

"Ever, ec.'"

LETTER CCLXXXVII.

TO MR. HUNT.

"DEAR HUNT,

"I return your extract with thanks for the perusal, and hope you are by this time on the verge of publication. My pencil-marks on the margin of your former manuscripts I never thought worth the trouble of deciphering, but I had no such meaning as you imagine for their being withheld from Murray, from whom I differ entirely as to the terms of your agreement; nor do I think you asked a piastre too much for the poem. However, I doubt not he will deal fairly by you on the whole; he is really a very good fellow, and his faults are merely the leaven of his 'trade'—the trade! the slave-trade of many an unlucky writer."

"The said Murray and I are just at present in no good humor with each other; but he is not the worse for that: I feel sure that he will give your work as fair or a fairer chance in every way than your late publishers; and what he can't do for it, it will do for itself.

"Continual business and occasional indisposition have been the causes of my negligence (for I deny neglect) in not writing to you immediately. These are excuses; I wish they may be more satisfactory to you than they are to me. I opened my eyes yesterday morning on your compliment of Sunday. If you knew what a hopeless and leptargic den of dulness and draving our hospital is during a debate; and what a mass of corruption in its patients, you would wonder, not that I very seldom speak, but that I ever attempted it, feeling, as I trust, I do, independently. However, when a proper spirit is manifested without doors, I will endeavor not to be idle within. Do you think such a time is coming? Methinks there are gleams of it. My forefathers were of the other side of the question in Charles' days, and the fruit of it was a title and the loss of an enormous property.

"If the old struggle comes on, I may lose the me, and shall never regain the other, but no matter; there are things even in this world, better than either.

"Very truly, ever yours, "B.""

TO MR. ROGERS.

"Feb. 8, 1816.

"Do not mistake me—I really returned your rock for the reason assigned, and no other. It is too good for so careless a fellow. I have parted with all my own books and papers, except a Nikolaus, astride dirty, and possibly don't deprive you of so valuable a drop of that immortal man.

"I shall be very glad to see you, if you like to call, though I am at present contending with 'the slain and arrows of outrageous fortune,' some of which have struck me from a quarter whence I did not indeed expect them. But no matter, 'tis a world elsewhere,' and I will cut my way through this as I can.

"Then if you write to Moore, will you tell him that I shall answer his letter the moment I can muster time and spirits?"

"Ever yours, "B.""

LETTER CCLXXXIX.

TO MR. MOORE.

"Feb. 29, 1816.

"I have not answered your letter for a time; and, at present, the reply to part of it might extend to such a length, that I shall delay it till it can be made in person, and then I will shorten it as much as I can.

"In the mean time, I am at war 'with all the world and his wife;' or rather, 'all the world and my wife' are at once with me, and I have yet touched me; I never better knew that in the course of a hair-breadth existence I was ever, at home or abroad, in a situation so completely uprooting of present pleasure, or rational hope for the future, as this. I say this because I think so, and feel it. But I shall not sink under it the more for that mode of considering the question. I have made up my mind.

"By-the-way, however, you must not believe all you hear on the subject; and don't attempt to defend me. If you succeeded in that, it would be a mortal, or an immortal, offence—who can bea refutation? I have but a very short answer for those whom it concerns; and all the activity of myself and some vigorous friends have not yet fixed on any tangible ground or personage, on which or with whom I can discuss matters, in a summary way, with a fair pretext, though I nearly had needed one yesterday, but he evaded by—what was judged by others—a satisfactory explanation. I speak of circulators—against whom I have no enmity, though I must act according to the common code of usage when I hit upon those of the serious order.

"Now for other matters—Poesy, for instance. Leigh Hunt's poem is a devilish good one—quaint, here and there, but with the substratum of originality, and with poetry about it that will stand the test. I do not say this because he has inscribed it to me, which I am sorry for, as I should otherwise have begged you to review it in the Edinburgh. It is really deserving of much praise, and a favorable critic in the B. R. would but do it justice, and set it up before the public eye where it ought to be.

"How are you? and where? I have not the most distant idea what I am going to do myself, or with myself—or what. I had, a few weeks ago, some things to say, that would have made you laugh; but they tell me now that I must not laugh, and so I have been very serious and am.

"I have not been very well with a fever complaint—but better within the last fortnight, though still under medical advice. I have latterly seen a little of... * * * * * *..."

*I must go and dress to dine. My little girl is in the court; she told them as this was a very fine child, and now nearly three months old. Lady Noel (my mother-in-law, or rather, at law) is at present overlooking it. Her daughter (Miss Milbanke that was) is, I believe, in London with her father. A Mrs. Charlont, (now a kind of housekeeper and spy of Lady N.'s) who, in her better days, was a washerwoman, is supposed to be by the learned—very much the occa'st cause of our late..."

LETTER CCXC.

TO MR. HUNT.

"Feb. 29, 1819.

DEAR HUNT,

Your letter would have been answered before, had I not thought it probable that, as you were in town for a day or so, I should have seen you;—I don't mean this as a hint at reproach for not calling, but merely that of course I should have been very glad if you had called in your way, home or abroad, as I always would have been, and always shall be. With regard to the circumstances to which you allude, there is no reason why you should not speak openly to me on a subject already sufficiently rife in the months and minds of what is called 'the world.' Of the fifty reports, it follows that forty-nine must have more or less exaggeration; but I am sorry to say, that on the main and essential point of an intended, and, it may be, an inevitable separation, I can contradict none. At present I shall say no more, but this is not from want of confidence; in the mean time, I shall merely request a suspension of opinion. Your preatory letter to 'Himmie' I accepted as I thought, as a public compliment and a private kindness. I am only sorry that it may perhaps operate against you as an inducement, and, with some, a pretext for attack on the part of the political and personal enemies of both; not that this can be of much consequence, for in the end the worst must be judged by its merits, and, in that respect, you are well armed. Murray tells me it is going on well, and you may depend upon it, there is a substratum of poetry, which is a foundation for solid and durable fame. The objections (if there be objections, for this is a presumption, and not an assumption) will be merely as to the mechanical part, and such, as I stated before, the usual consequences of either novelty or reverse. I desired Murray to forward to you my pamphlet with two things of mine in it, the most part of both of them, and of one in particular, written before others of my composing, which have preceded them in publication; they are neither of them of much pretension, nor intended for any subject, but will perhaps wonder at my dwelling so much and so frequently on former subjects and scenes; but the fact is, that I found them fading fast from my memory; and I was not the same much, so partial to their place, (and events connected with it,) that I have stamped them while I could, in such colors as I could trust to now, but might have confused and misplaced hereafter, had I longer delayed the attempted delineation."

LETTER CCXI.

TO MR. MOORE.

"March 3, 1819.

I rejoice in your promotion as Chairman and Charitable Steward, &c., &c. These be dignities which await only the virtuous. But then, recollect, you are six-and-thirty. (I speak this earnestly—not of your age, but the 'honor—love—obedience—troops of friends,' which accompany it,) and I have eight years good to run before I arrive at such honors, which, perhaps, if I am at all, it will probably be in a state of grace or progressive merits."

"I must set you right in one point, however. The fault was not—no, nor even the misfortune, in my 'choices' (unless in choosing at all) for I don't believe I have, but there is in the drags of all this bitter business, that there ever was a better or even a brighter, a kinder, or a more amiable and agreeable being than Lady B. I never had, nor can have, any reproach to make her, while with me. Where there is blame, it belongs to myself, and, if I cannot redeem, I must bear it.

"Her nearest relatives are a • • •—my circumstances have been and are in a state of great confusion—and your being here has been a good deal of comfort, and my mind ill at ease for a considerable period. Such are the causes (I do not name them as excuses) which have frequently driven me into excess, and disqualified my temper for comfort. Something also may be attributed to the strange and disordered habits which, becoming my own master at an early age, and scrambling about, over and through the world, may have induced. I still, however, think that, if I had had a fair chance, by being placed in even a tolerable situation, I might have gone on fairly. But that seems hopeless, and there is nothing more to be said. At present—except my health, which is better (it is odd, but agitation or contest of any kind has been an encourager of meditations) and up for the time—I have to battle with all kinds of unpleasantnesses, including private and pecuniary difficulties, &c., &c.

"I believe I may have said this before to you,—but I risk repeating it. It is nothing to bear the privations of adversity, or, more properly, ill fortune; but my pride recoils from its indignities. However, I have no quarrel with that same pride, which was, I think, buckler me too much, every thing. If my heart could have been broken, it would have been so years ago, and by events more afflicting than these.

"I agree with you (to turn from this topic to our shop) that I have written too much. The last things were, however, published very reluctantly by me, and for reasons I will explain when I meet. I know not why I have dwelt so much on the same scenes, except that I find them fading, or confining (if such a word may be) in my memory, in the midst of present turbulence and pressure, and I felt anxious to stamp before the die was worn out. I now break with you. With those countries, and events connected with them, all my really poetical feelings begin and end. Were I to try, I could make nothing of any other subject, and that I have apparently exhausted. Who to him," says Voltaire, 'who says all he could say, now there are some on which, perhaps, I could have said still more: but I leave them all, and not too soon.

"Do you remember the lines I sent you early last year, which you still have? I don't wish (like Mr. Fitzgerald, in the Morning Post) to claim the character of 'Vates' in all its translations; but were they not a little prophetic? I mean those beginning: 'This is not the joy the world can,' &c., &c., on which I rather picture myself as being the truest, though the most melancholy, I ever wrote.

"What a scrawl have I sent you! You say nothing of yourself, except that you are a Lancasterian churchwarden, and an encourager of mendicants. When are you out? and how is your family? My child is very well and flourishing, I hear; but I must see also. I feel no disposition to resign it to the control of its own grandmothers, I fear, though I am unwilling to take it from the mother's. It is weaned, however, and something about it must be decided."

"Ever, &c."

"The letter that follows was in answer to one received from Mr. Murray, in which he had enclosed him a draft for a thousand guineas for the copy right of his two poems, the Siege of Corinth and Parisia."

"See Buss, p. 869."
LETTER CCXCVII.

TO MR. MURRAY.

"Jan. 2, 1816.

"Your offer is liberal in the extreme, (you see I see the word to you of and you, though I would not consent to your using it of yourself to Mr. * * * *) and much more than the two poems can possibly be worth; but I cannot accept it, nor will not. You are most welcome to them as additions to the collected volumes, without any demand or expectation on my part whatever. But I cannot consent to their separate publication. I do not like to risk any fame (whether merited or not) which I have been favored with, upon compositions which I do not feel to be at all equal to my own notions of what they should be, (as I flatter myself some have been, here and there,) though they may do very well as things without pretension, to add to the publication with the lighter pieces.

"I am very glad that the handwriting was a favorable omen of the morale of the piece: but you must not trust to that, for my copyist would write out any thing I desired in all the ignorance of innocence—I hope, however, in this instance, with no great peril to either.

"P. S. I have enclosed your draft torn, for fear of accidents by the way—I wish you would not throw temptation in mine. It is not from a disdain of the universal idol, not from a present superficiality of his treasures, I can assure you, that I refuse to worship him; but what is right is right, and must not yield to circumstances."

LETTER CCXCVIII.

TO MR. ROGERS.

"Feb. 8, 1816.

"I wrote to you hastily this morning by Murray, to say that I was glad to do as Mackintosh and you suggested about Mr. * *. It occurs to me now, that as I have never seen Mr. * * but once, and consequently have no claim to his acquaintance, that you or Sir J. had better arrange it with him in such a manner as may be least offensive to his feelings, and so as not to have the appearance of officiousness nor obstruction on my part. I hope you will be able to do this, as I should be very sorry to do any thing by him that may be deemed indelicate. The sum Murray offered and offers was and is one thousand and fifty pounds: this I refused before, because I thought it more than the two things were worth to Murray, and from other objections, which are of no consequence. I have, however, closed with M., in consequence of Sir J.'s and your suggestion, and propose the sum of six hundred pounds to be transferred to Mr. * * in such manner as may seem best to your friend,—the remainder I think of for other purposes.

"As Murray has offered the money down for the copyrights, it may be done directly. I am ready to sign and seal immediately, and perhaps it had better not be delayed. I shall feel very glad if it can be of any use to * *; only don't let him be plagued; nor think himself obliged and all that, which makes people hate one another, &c.

"Yours, very truly, "B."

LETTER CCXCIX.

TO MR. MURRAY.

"Feb. 9, 1816.

"It was large, I admitted and admit; and that made part of my consideration in refusing it, till I knew better what you were likely to make of it. With regard to what is passed or is to pass about Mr. * * the case is in no respect different from the transfer of former copyrights to Mr. Dallas. Had I taken you at your word, that is, taken your money, I might have used it as I pleased; and it could be in no respect different to you whether I paid it to a w—, or a hospital, or assisted a man of talent in distress. The truth of the matter seems this: you offered more than the poems are worth. I said so, and I think so; but you know, or at least ought to know, your own business best; and when you collect what passed between you and me upon pecuniary subjects before this occurred, you will acquit me of any wish to take advantage of your imprudence.

"The things in question shall not be published at all, and there is an end of the matter.

"Yours, &c."

LETTER CCXCV.

TO MR. MURRAY.

"March 5, 1816.

"I sent to you to-day for this reason—the books you purchased are again seized, and, as matters stand, had much better be sold at once by public auction. I wish to see you, to return your bill for them; which, thank God, is neither due nor paid. That part, as far as you are concerned, being settled, (which it can be, and shall be, when I see you to-morrow,) I have no further delicacy about the matter. This is about the tenth execution in as many months; so I am pretty well hardened: but it is fit I should pay the forfeit of my forefather's extravagance and my own; and whatever my faults may be, I suppose they will be pretty well explained in time—or eternity.

"Ever, &c."

"P. S. I need hardly say that I knew nothing till this day of the new seizure. I had released them from former ones, and thought, when you took them, that they were yours.

"You shall have your bill again to-morrow"

LETTER CCXCVI.

TO MR. MURRAY.

"Feb. 3, 1816.

"I sent for 'Marmion,' which I return, because it occurred to me, there might be a resemblance between part of 'Parisina' and a similar scene in canto II. of 'Marmion.' I fear there is, though I never thought of it before, and could hardly wish to imitate that which is imitable. I wish you would ask Mr. Gifford whether I ought to say any thing upon it;—I had completed the story on the passage from Gibbon, which indeed leads to a like scene naturally, without a thought of the kind: but it comes upon me not very comfortably.

"There are a few words and phrases I want to alter in the MS., and should like to do it before you print, and will return it in an hour.

"Yours ever.

LETTER CCXCVII.

TO MR. MURRAY.

"Mar. 20, 1816.

"To return to our business—your epistles are vastly agreeable. With regard to the observations..."
on carelessness, &c. I think, with all humility, that the gentle reader has considered a rather uncommon, and designedly irregular, versification for haste and negligence. The measure is not that of any of the other poems, which (I believe) were allowed to be tolerably correct, according to Bysshe and the fingers—or ears—by which bards write, and readers reckon. Great part of the 'Siege' is (I think) what the learned called Anapaests, (though I am not sure, being heinously forgetful of my metres and my 'Gradus,' and many of the lines intentionally longer or shorter than its rhyming companion; and rhyme also occurring at greater or less intervals of caprice or convenience.

"I mean not to say that this is right or good, but merely that I could have been smoother, had it appeared to me of advantage; and that I was not otherwise without being aware of the deviation, though I now feel sorry for it, as I would undoubtedly rather please than not. My wish has been to try at something different from my former efforts; as I endeavored to make them differ from each other. The versification of the 'Corsair' is not that of 'Lara;' nor the 'Gloamer' that of the 'Bridge.' 'Childe Harold' is again varied from these; and I strove to vary the last somewhat from all of the others.

"Excuse all this—d nonsense and egotism. The fact is, that I am rather trying to think on the subject of this note, than really thinking on it—I did not know you had called: you are always admitted and welcome when you choose.

"Yours, &c., &c.,

P. S. You need not be in my apprehension or grief on my account: were I to be beaten down by the world and its inheritors, I should have succumbed to many things years ago. You must not mistake my not bullying for dejection; nor imagine that because I feel, I am too faint—but enough for the present.

"I am sorry for Sotheby's row. What the devil is it about? I thought it all settled; and if I can do any thing about him or Ivan still, I am ready and willing. I do not think it proper for me just now to be much behind the scenes, but I will see the committee and move upon it, if Sotheby likes.

"If you see Mr. Sotheby, will you tell him that I wrote to Mr. Coleridge, on setting Mr. Sotheby's note, and have, I hope, done what Mr. S. wished on that subject?"

LETTER CCXVIII.

TO MR. ROGERS.

"March 25, 1816.

"You are one of the few persons with whom I have lived in what is called intimacy, and have heard me at times conversing on the untoward topic of my recent family disquietudes. Will you have the goodness to say to me at once, whether you ever heard me speak of her with disrespect, with unkindness, or defending myself at her expense by any serious imputation of any description against her? Did you never hear me say, 'that when there was the right, she had the right?'—The reason I put these questions to you or others of my friends is, because I am said, by her and here, to have resorted to such means of excitation.

"Ever very truly yours,

"B."

LETTER CCXCIX.

TO MR. MURRAY.

"Cheshley, near Lazonbe, June 27, 1816.

"I am thus far (kept by stress of weather) on my run back to Diodati, (near Geneva,) from a voyage in my boat round the lake; and I enclose you a sprig of Gibbon's acacia and some rose leaves from his garden, which, with part of his house, I have just seen. You will find honorable mention, in his Life, made of this 'acacia,' when he walked out on the night of concluding his history. The garden and summer-house, where he composed, are neglected, and utterly decayed; but they still show it as his 'cabinet,' and seem perfectly aware of his memory.

"My route, through Flanders, and by the Rhine, to Switzerland, was what I expected from its rhyming companion; and rhyme also occurring at greater or less intervals of caprice or convenience.

"Three days ago, we were nearly wrecked in a squall off Meillerie, and driven to shore. I ran no risk, being so near the rocks, and a good swimmer; but our party were wet, and incommoded a good deal. The wind was strong enough to blow down some trees, as we found at landing; however, all is righted and right, and we are thus far on our return.

"Dr. Polidori is not here, but at Diodati, left behind in the hospital with a sprained ankle, which he is no doubt acquiring from a wall—he cannot jump.

"I shall be glad to hear you are well, and have received for me certain helms and swords, sent from Waterloo which I rode over with pain and pleasure.

"I have finished a third canto of Childe Harold, (consisting of one hundred and seventeen stanzas,) longer than either of the two former, and in some parts, it may be, better; but of course on that I cannot determine. I shall send it by the first safe-looking opportunity.

"Ever &c.

LETTER CCC.

TO MR. MURRAY.

"Diodati, near Geneva, July 28, 1816.

"I wrote to you a few weeks ago, and Dr. Polidori received your letter; but the packet has not made its appearance, nor the epistle, of which you gave notice therein. I enclose you an advertisement, which was copied by Dr. Polidori, and which assures me he is about the most appearance of the most impudent imposition that ever issued from Grub street. I need hardly say that I know nothing of all this trash, nor whence it may spring,—'Odes to St. Helens,' 'Parewinds to England,' &c. &c.—and which is to be disavowed, or is worth disavowing, you have full authority to do so. I never wrote nor conceived a line on any thing of the kind, any more than of two other things with which I was saddled—something about 'Gaul,' and another about 'Mrs. La Valette,' and as to the 'Lily of France,' I should as soon think of celebrating a turnip. 'On the morning of my daughter's birth,' I Lad other things to think of than verses; and could never have dreamed of such an invention, till Mr. Johnston and his pamphlet's advertisement broke in upon me with a new light on the crafts and subtleties of the demon of imitating, or rather publishing.

"I did hope that some succeeding lie would have superseded the thousand and one which were accumulated.

* See notes to canto iii. of Childe Harold.
† The following was the advertisement enclosed:
‡ Newly printed and hot-pressed, 2x, 6d.
§ Lord Byron's Fares to England, with three other poems Odo to St. Helen, To my Daughter on her Birthday, and To the Lily of France.

Printed by J. Johnson, Cheapside, 263; Oxford, 9.

The above beautiful poems will be read with the most lively interest, as it is probably they will be the last of the author's that will appear in Eng land.—(They were written by a Mr. John Agg.)
unrelated during last winter. I can forgive whatever may be said of or against me, but not what they make me say or sing for myself. It is enough to answer for what I have written; but it were too much for Job himself to bear what one has not. I suppose that all that has been wished that his 'enemy had written a book,' he did not anticipate his own name on the title-page. I feel quite as much bored with this foolishly, as it deserves, and more than I should be if I had not a headache.

"Of Glenarvon.* Madame de Staël told me (ten days ago at Copet) marvellous and grievous things; but I have seen nothing of it but the motto, which promises amably 'for us and for our tragedy.' If such be the poet's wish, what should the ring be—a name to all succeeding,† &c. The generous moment selected for the publication is probably its kindest accompaniment, and—truth to say—the time one well chosen. I have not even a guess at the contents, except from the very vague accounts I have heard.

* "I ought not be ashamed of the egotism of this letter. It is not my fault altogether and I shall be but too happy to drop the subject, when others will allow me.

I am in tolerable plight, and in my last letter told you what I had done in the way of rhyme; I trust that you prosper, and that your authors are in good condition. I should suppose your study has received some increase by what I hear. Bertram must be a good horse; does he run next meeting? I hope you will beat the Row.

"Yours always, &c."

LETTER CCCI.

TO MR. ROGERS.

* Vicissi, near Geneva, July 29, 1816.

"Do you recollect a book, Matheson's Letters, which you lent me, which I have still, and yet hope to return to your library? Well, I have encountered at Copet and elsewhere Gray's correspondent, that same Bonstetten, to whom I lent the translation of his correspondent's epistles for a few days; but all he could remember of Gray amounts to little, except that he was the most 'melancholy and genial' of all possible poets. Bonstetten himself is a fine and very lively old man, and much esteemed by his compatriots; he is also a litterateur of good repute, and all his friends have a mania of addressing him, volumes of letters—Matheson, Muller the historian, &c., &c. He is a good deal at Copet, where I have met him a few times. All there are well, except Rocca, who, I am sorry to say, looks in a very bad state of health. Schlegel is in high force, and Madame as brilliant as ever.

"I came here by the Netherlands and the Rhine route, and Basle, Berne, Morat, and Lausanne. I have circumnavigated the Lake, and go to Chamouni with the first fair weather; but really we have had lately such stupid nasts, fogs, and perpetual density, that one would think Castlereagh had the foreign affairs of the kingdom of Heaven also on his hands. I need say nothing to you of these parts, you having traversed them already. I do not think of Italy before September. I have read Glenarvon, and have also seen Ben. Constant's Adolphe, and his preface, denying the real people. It is a work which leaves an unpleasant impression, but very consistent with the consequences of not being in love, which is perhaps as disagreeable as any thing, except being so. I doubt, however, whether all such please (as he calls them) terminate so wretchedly as his hero and heroine's.

"There is a third canto (a longer than either of the former) of Childe Harold finished, and some smaller things,—among them a story on the Chateau de Chillon. I only want a good opportunity to transmit them to your friend Murray, who, I hope, will publish. Where is Moore? Why is he not out? My love to him, and my perfect consideration and remembrances to all, particularly to Lord and Lady Holland, and to your Duchess of Somerset.

"Ever, &c."

* A novel, by Lady Caroline Lamb: Lord Byron, under another name was one of its principal characters.

† The motto is: "He left a name to all succeeding times, Link'd with one virtue and a thousand crimes."

† Maturin's tragedy.

"P. S. I send you a fac simile, a note of Bonstetten's, thinking you might like to see the hand of Gray's correspondent."

LETTER CCCII.

TO MR. MURRAY.

"Vicissi, Sept. 29, 1816.

"I am very much flattered by Mr. Gifford's good opinion of the MSS. and shall be still more so, if it answers your expectations and justifies his business. I liked it myself, but that must go for nothing. The feelings with which most of it was written need not be envied me. With regard to the price, I fixed none, but let it to Mr. Kinnaird, Mr. Shelley, and yourself, to arrange. Of course, they would do their best; and as to yourself, I knew you would make no difficulties. But I agree with Mr. Kinnaird perfectly, that the concluding few hundred should be only conditional; and for my own sake, I wish it to be added, only in case of your selling a certain number, that number to be fixed by yourself. I hope this is fair. In every thing of this kind there must be risk; and till that be past, in one way or the other, I would not willingly add to it, particularly in times like the present. And pray always recollect that nothing could mortify me more—no failure on my own part—than having made you lose by any purchase of me.

"The Monday† was written by request of Mr. Kinnaird for the theatre. I did as well as I could; but where I have not my choice, I pretend to answer for nothing. Mr. Hoehnse and myself are just returned from a journey of lakes and mountains. We have been to the Grindelwald, and the Jungfrau, and stood on the summit of the Wengel Alp; and seen torrents of nine hundred feet in fall, and glaciers of all dimensions; we have heard shepherd's pipes, and avalanches, and looked on the clouds foaming up from the valleys below us, like the spray of the ocean of hell.† Chamouni, and that which it inherits, we saw a month ago; but, though Mont Blanc is higher, it is not equal in wildness to the Jungfrau, the Eiger, the Shreckhorn, and the Rose Glaciers.

"We set off for Italy next week. The road is within this month infested with bandits, but we must take our chance and such precautions as are requisite."

"Ever, &c.

"P. S. My best remembrances to Mr. Gifford Fray say all that can be said from me to him.

"I am sorry for Mr. Maturin. Maturin is not like Philip's picture. I thought it reckoned a good one. If he had made the speech on the original, perhaps he would have been more readily forgiven by the proprietor and the painter of the portrait."
LETTER CCCIII.

TO MR. MURRAY.

"Diederc, Sept. 30, 1816.

"I answered your obliging letters yesterday; to-day the Monody" arrived with its title-page, which is, I presume, a separate publication. 'The request of a friend:

'Obiged by hunger and request of friends.'

will request you to expunge that same, unless you, please to add, 'by a person of quality,' or 'a wit and humor about town.' Merely say, 'written to be spoken at Drury Lane.' To-morrow I dine at Copet. Saturday I strike tents for Italy. This evening, on the lake in my boat with Mr. Hobhouse, the pole which sustains the mainsail, slipped in tacking, and struck me so violently on one of my legs, (the worst, luckily,) as to make me do a foolish thing, viz., to false—a downstream swoon; the thing must have jolted some nerves or others; for the bone is not injured, and hardly painful, (it is six hours since,) and cost Mr. Hobhouse some apprehension and much sprinkling of water to recover me. The sensation was a very odd one; I never had but two such before, once from a cut on the head from a stone, several years ago, and once (long ago also) in falling into a great wreath of snow;—a sort of gray giddiness first, then nothingness and a total loss of memory on beginning to recover. The last part is not disagreeable, if one did not find it again. You want the original MSS. Mr. Davies has the first fair copy in my own hand, and I have the rough composition here, and will send or save it for you, since you wish it.

"With regard to your new literary project, if any thing falls in the way which will, to the best of my judgment, suit you, I will send you what I can. At present I must lay by a little, having pretty well exhausted myself in what I have sent you. Italy or Dalmatia and another summer may, or may not, set me off again. I have no plans, and am nearly as indifferent what may come as where I go. I shall take Felicia Hemans' Restoration, &c., with me; it is a good poem—very.

'Pray repeat my best thanks and remembrances to Mr. Gifford for all his trouble and good nature towards me.

'Do not fancy me laid up, from the beginning of this scrawl. I tell you the accident for want of better to say; but it is over, and I am only wondering what the deuce was the matter with me. I have lately been over all the Bernese Alps and their lakes. I think many of the scenes (some of which were not those usually frequented by the English) finer than Chamouni, which I visited some time before. I have been to Clarens again, and crossed the mountains behind it; of this tour I kept a short journal for my sister, which I sent yesterday in three letters. It is not all for pupils; but if you like to hear about the romantic part, she will, I dare say, show you what touches upon the rocks, &c.

'Christabel—I want have any one sneer at Christabel: it is a fine, wild poem.

'Madame de Stael wishes to see the Antiquary, and I am going to take it to her to-morrow. She was made Copet as agreeable as society and talent can make any place on earth. 'Yours ever, "N.""

LETTER CCCIV.

TO MR. MURRAY.

"Diederc, Oct. 4, 1816.

"Save me a copy of 'Buck's Richard III.' republished by Longman; but do not send out more books—I have too many.

'The Monody" is in too many paragraphs, which makes it unintelligible to me; if any one else understands it in the present form, they are wiser; however, as it cannot be rectified till my return, and has been already published, even publish it on in the collection—it will fill up the place of the omitted epistle.

'Strike out 'by request of a friend,' which is sad trash, and must have been done to make it ridiculous.

'Be careful in the printing the stanzas beginning "Though the day of my destiny, &c.," which I think well of as a composition.

'The Antiquary' is not the best of the three, but much more above all the last twenty years, saving its older brothers. His Memoirs are valuable, as showing the strength of endurance in the man, which is worth more than all the talent in the world.

'And so you have been publishing 'Margaret of Anjou' and an Assyrian tale, and refusing W.W.'s Waterloo and the 'Buck's GRE,' I know not which most to admire, your rejections or acceptances. I believe that prose is, after all, the most putable; for certes, if one could foresee—but I won't go on—that is, with this sentence, but poetry is. I fear, incurred. God help me! If I proceed in this scribbling, I shall have frustrated away my mind before I am thirty; but it is at times a real relief to me. For the present—good evening"

LETTER CCCIV.

TO MR. MURRAY.

"Marburg, Oct. 9, 1816.

"Thus far on my way to Italy. We have just passed the 'Pisse Vache' (one of the first torrents in Switzerland) in time to view the iris which the sun flings along it before noon.

'I have written to you twice lately. Mr. Davies, I hear, is arrived. He brings the original MS. which you wished to see. Recollect that the printing is to be from that which Mr. Shelley brought; and recollect also that the concluding stanzas of Childe Harold (those to my daughter) which I had not made up my mind whether to publish or not when they were first written, (as you will see marked on the margin of the first copy,) I had (and have) fully determined to publish with the rest of the canto, as in the copy which you received by Mr. Shelley, before I sent it to England.

'Our weather is very fine, which is more than the summer has been. At Milan I shall expect to hear from you Address either to Milan, poste restante, or by way of Geneva, to the care of Mons. Bentche, Banquier. I write these few lines in case my other letter should not reach you; I trust one of them will.

'P.S. My best respects and regards to Mr. Gifford. Will you tell him, it may perhaps be as well to put a short note to that part relating to Clarens, merely to say, that of course the description does not refer to that particular spot so much as to the LETTER CCCVI.

TO MR. MURRAY.

"I hear that Mr. Davies has arrived in England, but that of some letters, &c., committed to my care, by Mr. Hobhouse, only half have been delivered. This intelligence naturally makes me feel a little anxious for mine, and among them for the MS. which I wished to have compared with the one sent by me through the hands of Mr. Shelley. I trust that it has arrived safely, and indeed not less so, than some little samples, &c., from Mont Blanc, for my daughter and my nieces, have reached their addresses in the good unprecedented manner from Mr. Davies that no accident (by custom house or loss) has befallen them, and satisfy me on this point at your earliest convenience.

If I recollect rightly, you told me that Mr. Gifford had kindly undertaken to correct the press (at my request) during my absence—least I hope so. It will add to my many obligations to that gentleman.

I wrote to you, on my way here, a short note, dated Martigny. Mr. Hobhouse and myself arrived here a few days ago, by the Simplon and Lago Maggiore route. Of course we visited the Borromean Islands, which are fine, but too artificial. The Simplon is magnificent in its nature and its aspect—both God and man have done wonders—to say nothing of the devil, who must certainly have had his hand (or a hoof) in some of the rocks and ravines through and over which the works are carried.

"Milan is striking—the cathedral superb. The city altogether reminds me of Seville, but a little inferior. We had heard divers bruits, and took precautions on the road, near the frontier, against some 'many worthy fellows (i.e. fellows) that were out,' and had ransacked some preceding travellers, a few weeks ago, near Neuchatel, I forget which, of cash and raiment, besides putting them in bodily fear, an I lodging about twenty slugs in the retreating part of a courier belonging to Mr. Hope. But we were not molested, and, I do not think, in any danger, except of making mistakes in the way of cooking and priming whenever we saw an old house, or an ill-looking thickset, and now and then suspecting the 'true men,' who have very much the appearance of the thieves of another country. What the thieves may look like, I know not, nor desire to know, for it seems they come upon you in bodies of thirty ("in buckram and Kendal green") at a time, so that voyagers have no great chance. It is something like poor Turkey in that respect, but not so bad; for there you can have as great a body of rogues to match the regular banditti; but here the gens d'armes are said to be no great things, and as for what you have heard, poor Mr. W. and Mr. M. and the rest of the other literati."

"I have been to the Ambrosian library—it is a fine collection—full of MSS. edited and unedited. I enclosed you a list of the former recently published; these are matters of great force. For me, in my simple way, I have been most delighted with a correspondence of letters, all original and amatory, between Lucretia Borgia and Cardinal Bembo, preserved there. I have poured over them and a long hair, the prettiest and fairest imaginable—I never saw fairer—and shall go repeatedly to read the epistles over and over; and if I can obtain some of the hair by fair means, I shall try. I have already persuaded the librarian to promise me copies of the best letters, and I hope he will not disappoint me. They are short, but very simple, sweet, and to the purpose; there are some copies of verses in Spanish also by her; the rest of her hair is long, and as I said before, beautiful. The Brera gallery of paintings has some fine pictures, but nothing of a collection. Of painting I know nothing; but I like a Guercino—a picture of Abraha, in Fagar and Ishmael—which seems to me natural and goodly. The Flemish school, such as I saw it in Flanders, I utterly detested, despised, and abhorred; it might be painting, but it was not nature; the Italian is pleasing, and their ideal very noble."

"The Italians I have encountered here are very intelligent and agreeable. In a few days I am to meet Monti. By the way, I have just heard an anecdote of Becarría, who published such admirable things against the punishment of death. As soon as his book was out, his servant (having read it, I presume) stole his patch. and his master, while correcting the press of a second edition, did all he could to have him hanged by way of advertisement."

"I forgot to mention the triumphal arch begun by Napoleon, as a gate to this city. It is unfinished. But the part that is worthy of a Roman and the same country. The society here is very odd, and carried on,—at the theatre, and the theatre only,—which answers to our opera. People meet there as at a rout, but in very small circles. From Milan I shall go to Venice. If you write, I shall go to Geneva, as before—the letter will be forwarded."

"Yours ever"

LETTER CCCVII.

TO MR. MURRAY.

"I have recently written to you rather frequently, but without any late answer. Mr. Hobhouse and myself set out for Venice in a few days; but you had better still address me at Mr. Hentsch's, Banquier, Geneva; he will forward your letters."

"I do not know whether I mentioned to you, some time ago, that I had parted with the Dr. Poli's Divan to a few very friends in London, but I know no great harm of him; but he had an alacrity of getting into scrapes, and was too young and heedless; and having enough to attend to in my own concerns, and without time to become his tutor, I have not thought it necessary to watch his career. I arrived at Milan some weeks before Mr. Hobhouse and myself. About a week ago, in consequence of a quarrel at the theatre with an Austrian officer, in which he was exceedingly in the wrong, he has contrived to get sent out of the territory, and is gone to Florence. I was not present, the pit having been the scene of altercation; but on being sent for from the Cavalier Breme's box where I was quietly sitting at the ballet, I found the man of medicine begirt with grenadiers, arrested by the guard, conveyed into the guard-room, where there was much swearing in several languages. They were going to keep him there for the night; but on giving my name, and answering for his apparition next morning, he was permitted egress. Next day he had an order from the government to be gone in twenty-four hours, and accordingly gone he is, some days since. I do not think we could have done, for to no great purpose; and indeed he brought it upon himself, as far as I could learn, for I was not present at the squabble itself. I believe this was the real state of his body of literature, and I tell you it because I believe, and sometimes reach you in England in a false or exaggerated form. We found Milan very polite and hospitable, and have the same hopes of Verona and Venice. I have finished my paper."

Ever yours, &c.
LETTER CCCCIII.

TO MR. MOORE.

Vernon, Nov. 6, 1819.

"My dear Moore," your letter, written before my departure from England and addressed to me in London, only reached me recently. Since that period, I have been over a portion of that part of Europe which I had never visited. About the middle of August, I crossed the Alps from Switzerland to Milan, which I left a few days ago, and am thus far on my way to Venice, where I shall probably winter. Yesterday I was on the island of San Giorgio, where the Florissus with fremitu. Catullus's Sirmium has still its name and site, and is remembered for his sake; but the very heavy autumnal rains and mists prevented our quitting our route (that is, Hobhouse and myself, who are at present voyaging together,) as it was better not to see it all than to a great disadvantage.

"I found on the Benacus the same tradition of a city still visible in calm weather below the waters, which you have preserved of Lough Neagh, 'When the clear, cold eve's declining.' I do not know that it is authorized by records; but they tell you such a story, and say that the city was swallowed up by an earthquake. We moved to-day nearer to the frontier to Verona, by a road suspected of thieves—'the wise convoy it call,'—but without molestation. I shall remain here a day or two to gaze at the usual marvels—opera, theatres, paintings, and all that time-tax of travel—though Catullus, Claudian, and Shakespeare have done more for Verona than it ever did for itself. They still pretend to show, I believe, the 'tomb of all the Capulets'—we shall see.

"Among many things at Milan, one pleased me particularly, viz., the correspondence (in the prettiest love-letters in the world) of Lucretia Borgia with Cardinal Bembo, (who, you say, made a very good cardinal), and very fond of art, and songs, and Spanish verses of hers.—the lock very fair and beautiful. I took one single hair of it as a relic, and wished sorely to get a copy of one or two of the letters; but it is prohibited: 'that I don't mind,' but it was impracticable; and so I only got some of them by heart. They are kept in the Ambrosian Library, which I often visited to look them over—to the scandal of the librarian, who wanted to enlighten me with sundry works of MSS., the bibliographical, and pious. But I stick to the Pope's daughter, and wish myself a cardinal.

"I have seen the finest parts of Switzerland, the Rhone, and the Swiss and Italian lakes, and the beauties of which I refer you to the guide-book. The north of Italy is tolerably free from the English; but the south swarms with them, I am told. Madame de Stael I saw frequently at Copet, which she renders remarkably pleasant. She has been particularly kind to me. I was for some months her neighbour, in a country-house called Diodati, which I had on the Lake of Geneva. My plans are very uncertain; but it is probable that you will see me in England in the spring. I have some business there. If you write to me, will you address to the care of Mons. Hentsch, Banquier, Geneva, who receives and forwards my letters. Remember me to Rogers, who wrote to me lately, with a short account of your poem, which, I trust,ns near the light. He speaks of it most highly.

"I am very endurable; not that I am subject to casual giddiness and faintness, which is so like a fine lady, that I am rather ashamed of the disorder. When I sailed, I had a physician with me, whom, after some months of patience, I found it expedient to part with, before we left Geneva with safety. On arriving at Milan, I found this gentleman in very good society, where he prospered for some weeks; but, at length, at the theatre, he quarrelled with a gentleman, and was left out by the government in twenty-four hours. I was not present at his squabble; but on hearing that he was put under arrest, I went and got him out of his confinement, but could not prevent his being sent off which, indeed, he partly deserved, being quite it, the wrong, and having begun a row for row's sake. It had been his custom to take the Austrian months myself, in giving him his congé from Geneva. He is not a bad fellow, but very young and hot-headed, and more likely to incur diseases than to cure them. His manners and my conduct found it useless to intercede for him. This happened some time before we left Milan. He is gone to Florence.

"At Milan I saw, and was visited by, Monti, the most celebrated of the living Italian poets. He seems now about 65, but of a damp constitution, and only capable of delivering his verse, as the actor. His frequent changes in politics have made him very unpopular as a man. I saw many more of their literati; but none whose names are well known in England, except Rogers. I lived much with the Italians, particularly with the Marquis of Brome's family, who are very able and intelligent men, especially the Abate. There was a famous impresario who held forth while I was there. His scenery astonished me; but although I understand Italian, and speak it, (with more readiness than accuracy,) I could only carry off a few very common-place mythological images, and one line about Artemisia, and another about Algiers, with sixty words of an entire tragedy about Etiocles and Polyynes. Some of the Italians liked him—others called his performance 'seccatura' (a devilish good word, I must say)—and all Milan was in controversy about him.

"The state of morals in these parts is in some sort lax. A mother and son were pointed out at the theatre, as being pronounced by the Milanese the world to be of the Theban dynasty—but this was all. The narrator (one of the first men in Milan) seemed to be not sufficiently scandalized by the taste or the tie. All society in Milan is carried on at the opera; they have private boxes, where they play at cards, or talk, or any thing else; but (except at the cassino) there are no open houses, or balls, &c., &c.

"The peasant girls have all very fine dark eyes, and many of them are beautiful. There are also two dead bodies in fine preservation—one Saint Carlo Borromeo (which is in the church) and but a chief, named Visconti, at Monza—both of which appeared very agreeable. In one of the Baromese isles, (the Isola bella,) there is a large temple of Apollo, and a noble palace. I am staying there just before the battle of Marengo, carved with his knife the word 'Battaglia.' I saw the letters, now half worn out and partly erased.

"Excuse this tedious letter. To be tiresome is the privilege of old age and absence. I am myself of the latter, and the former I have anticipated. If I do not speak to you of my own affairs, it is not from want of confidence, but to spare you and myself. My day is over; what then?—I have had it. To be sure, I have shortened it;* and if I had done as much by this letter, it would have been as well. But you will forgive that, if not the other faults of an old man.

Yours, ever and most affeetionately yours, B."

* P. S. I have been over Verona. The amphitheatre is wonderful—heats even Greece. Of the truth of Juliet's story, they seem tenacious to a degree, insisting on the fact—giving a date, (1903,) and showing a tomb. It is a plain, open, and partly decayed structure, with whitewashed leaves in it, in a wild and desolate conventual garden, once a cemetery, now ruined to the very graves. The situation struck me as very appropriate to the legend, being lighted as their love. I have brought away a few pieces of the granite, to give my daughter and my nieces. Of the other marvels of this city, of the palaces, &c., excepting the tombs of the Scaliger princes, I have no pretensions to judge. The Gothic monuments of the Scaligers pleased me, but 'a poor virtuo am I,' and "Ever yours."

LETTER CCCIX

TO MR. MOORE.

"Venice, Nov. 17, 1816.

I wrote to you from Verona the other day in my progress hither, which letter I hope you will receive. Some three years ago, or it may be more, I recollect your telling me that you had received a letter from our friend Sam, dated 'On board his gondola.' My gondola is, at this present, waiting for me on the canal; but I prefer writing to you in the house, it being autumn—and rather an English autumn than otherwise. It is my intention to remain at Venice during the winter, probably, as it has always been (next to the East) the greenest island of my imagination. It has not disappointed me; though the evident decay would, perhaps, have been felt upon others. But I have been familiar with ruins too long to dislike desolation. Besides, I have fallen in love, which, next to falling into the canal, (which would be of no use, as I can swim,) is the best or the worst thing I could do. I have got some extremely good apartments in the house of a 'Merchant of Venice,' who is a good deal occupied with business, and has a wife in her twenty-second year. Marion (that is her name,) is in her appearance altogether like an antelope. She has large, black, oriental eyes, with that peculiar expression in them which is seen rarely among Europeans—especially the Italians—and which many of the Turkish women give themselves by tinging the eye-lid,—an art not known out of the country, I believe. This expression she has naturally—and something more than this. In short, I cannot describe the effect of this kind of eye,—at least upon me. Her features are regular, and rather aquiline—mouth small—skin clear and soft, with a kind of hectic color—forehead remarkably good; her hands as big as gloves, and her voice as sweet as that of Lady Martha's: her figure is light and pretty, and she is a famous songstress—scientifically so: her natural voice (in conversation, I mean) is very sweet; and the naïveté of the Venetian dialect is always pleasing in the mouth of a woman.

"Nov. 23.

"You will perceive that my description, which was proceeding with the minuteness of a passport, has been interrupted for several days. In the mean time,"

"Dec. 5.

"Since from my former dates, I do not know that I have much to add on the subject, and, luckily, nothing to take away from it; for I am not so much impressed than any Venetian, and begin to feel very serious on that point,—so much so, that I shall be silent.

"By way of diversion, I am studying daily, at an Armenian monastery, the Armenian language; I found that my mind wanted something craggly to break upon; and this—as the most difficult thing I could discover here for an amusement—I have chosen, to torture me into attention. It is a rich language, however, and would amply repay any one the trouble of learning it. I try, and shall go on; but I answer for nothing, least of all for my intentions or my success. There are some very curious MSS. in the monastery, as well as books; translations also from Greek originals, now lost, and from Persian and Syriac, &c.; besides works of their own people. Four years ago the French instituted an Armenian professorship. Twenty pupils presented themselves on Monday morning, full of noble ardor, ingenuous youth, and improppable industry. They persevered, with a courage worthy of the nation, and of universal conquest, till Thursday; when fifteen of them succumbed to the sixteenth and twentieth letter of the alphabet. It is, to be sure, a Waterloo of an alphabet—that must be said for them. But it is so like these fellows, to do by it as they did by their sovereigns—abandon both to parody the old rhymes. 'Take a thing and give a thing!' 'Take a king and give a king.' They are the worst of animals, except their conquerors.

"I hear that Hodgson is your neighbor, having a living in Derbyshire. You will find him an excellent-hearted fellow, as well as one of the cleverest; a little, perhaps too much, japauned by preference in the church, and the tuition of youth, as well as inoculated with the disease of domestic felicity, besides being overrun with fine feelings about woman and constancy, (that small change of love, which people exact so rigidly, receive in such couterier coin, and repay in baser metal;) but, otherwise, a very decent fellow, who has a daughter, his wife, and (I suppose) a child by this time. Pray remember me to him, and say that I know not which to envy most—his neighborhood, him, or you.

"Of Venice there is said little, as if there have been seen many descriptions; and they are most of them like. It is a poetical place; and classical, to us, from Shakespear and Otway.* I have not yet sinned against it in verse, nor do I know that I shall do so, having been tuneless since I crossed the Alps, and feeling, as yet, no renewal of the 'estro.' By-the-way, I suppose you have seen 'Glenarvon.' Madame de Stael lent it to me to read. Copet last night. It seems to me, that if the authores had written the truth, and nothing but the truth—the whole truth—the romance would not only have been more romantic, but more entertaining. As for the likeness, the picture can't be good—I did not sit long enough. When you have leisure, let me hear from and of you, believing me ever and truly yours, most affectionately, "B.

"P. S. Oh! your poem—is it out? I hope Longman has paid his thousands: but don't you do as Horace Twiss's father did, who, having made money by a quarat tour, became a vinegar merchant; when lo! his vinegar turned sweet (and he d—d to it) and ruined him. My last letter to you (from Verona) was enclosed to Murray—have you got it? Direct to me here, poste restante. There are no English here at present. There were several in Switzerland—some women; but, except Lady Dalrymple Iam Iton, most of them as ugly as virtue—at least, those that I saw."

LETTER CCX.

TO MR. MOORE.

"Venice, Dec. 24, 1816.

"I have taken a fit of writing to you, which portends postage—once from Verona—once from Venice, and again from Venice—three is that. For this you may thank yourself, for I heard that you complained of my silence—so, here goes for a gabulity.

"I trust that you received my other twain of letters. My 'way of life' (or 'May of life,' which is, according to another denomination, 'May of pot life') is fallen into great regularity. In the mornings I go over in my gondola to hobble Armenian with the friars of the convent of St. Lazarus, and to help one of them in correcting the English of an

BYRON'S WORKS.

English and Armenian grammar which he is publishing. In the evenings I do one of many nothingseither at the theatres, or some of the conversations, which are like our routs, or rather worse, for the women sit in a semi-circle by the lady of the mansion, and then stand up when the room is full. But be sure, there is one improvement upon ours instead of lemonade with their ice, they hand about stiff um-punch—punch, by my palate! and this they think English. I do not disfigure them of so agreeable an error,—no, not for Venice.'

"Last night I was at the Count Governor's, which, of course, comprises the best society, and is very much like other gregarious meetings in every consequence, but the hospitable and the ninte of the bishop of Winchester, you have the patriarchy of Venice; and a motley crew of Austrians, Germans, noble Venetians, foreigners, and, if you see a quiz, you may be sure he is a consul. Oh, by-the-way, I forgot, when I wrote from Verona, to tell you that at Milan I met with a countryman of yours—a Colonel
*, a very excellent, good-natured fellow, who knows and shows all about Milan and is, as it were, a native there. He is particularly civil to strangers, and this is his history,—at least, an episode of it.

"Six-and-twenty years ago Col. , then an enfant being in Italy, fell in love with the Marchesa
, and she with him. The lady must be, at least, twenty years his senior. The war broke out;
he returned to England, to serve— not his country,
for that's Ireland, but England, which is a different thing; and she—heaven knows what she did. In the year 1814, the first announcement of the definitive treaty of peace (and tyranny) was developed to the astonished Milanese by the arrival of Col. *, who, flinging himself full length at the feet of Madame , murmured forth, in half-forgotten
Irish Italian, eternal vows of indelible constancy.
The lady screamed and exclaimed, 'Who are you?'
The Colonel cried, 'What, don't you know me? I am so and so,' &c., &c., &c.; till, at length, the Marchesa, mounting from reminiscence to reminiscence, through the lovers of the intermediate twenty-five years, arrived at last at the recollection of her povero sub-lieutenant. She then said, 'Was there ever such virtue? ' (that was her very word, and, being now a widow, gave him apartments in her palace, reinstated him in all the rights of wrong, and held him in the most admiring world, as a miracle of incontinent fidelity, and the unshaken Abdell of absence.

"Methinks this is as pretty a moral tale as any of Marmontel's. Here is another. The same lady, several years ago, made an escapade with a Swede, Count Fersen, (the same whom the Stockholmb mob quarter'd and lapsed not very long since,) and they arrived at an ostelia on the road to Rome, or thereabouts. It was a summer evening, and, while they were at supper, they were suddenly regaled by a symphony of fiddles in an adjacent apartment, so prettily played, that, wishing to hear them more distinctly, the Count rose, and going into the musical society, said, ' Gentlemen, I am sure that, as a company of gallant cavaliers, you will be delighted to show your skill to a lady, who feels anxious,' &c.
&c. The men of harmony were all acquaintance—every instrument was tuned and toned, and, striking up one of their most ambrosial airs, the whole band followed the Count to the lady's apartment. At their head was the first fiddler, who bowing and fiddling at the same moment, headed his troop and advanced up the room. Death and discord—it was the Marquis himself, who was on a scandling party in the court, while his sponsor had run away from the town. The rest may be imagined—but, first of all, the lady tried to persuade him that she was there on purpose to meet him, and he acquiesced in this method of an harmonic surprise So much for this gossip, which amused me when I heard it, and I send it to you, in the hope it may have the like effect. Now we I return to Venice.

"The day after to-morrow (to-morrow being Christmas day) the Carnival begins. I dine with the Countess Albornizi and a party, and go to the opera. On that day the Phoenix (not the insurance office but the theatre of that name) opens: I have got me a box there for the season, for two reasons, one of which is, that the music is remarkably good
The Conte a Alberti, of whom I have made mention, is the De Stael of Venice, not young, but a very learned, unaffected, good-natured woman, very polite to strangers, and, I believe, not at all dross, late, as most of the women are. She has written very well on the politics of Carneval, and also a volume of characters, besides other printed matter. She is of Corfu, but married a dead Venetian—that is, dead since he married.

"My name (my ' Donna ') whom I spoke of in my former epistle, my Marianna, and I her—what she pleases. She is by far the prettiest woman I have seen here, and the most lovable I have met with anywhere—as well as one of the most singular. I believe I told you the rise and progress of our liaisons in my former letter. Lest that should not have reached you, I will merely repeat that she is a Venetian, two-and twenty years old, married to a merchant well to do in the world, and that she has great black oriental eyes, and all the qualities which her eyes promise. Whether being in love with her has steeled me or not, I do not know; but I have not seen many other Venetians who seemed pretty. The nobility, in particular, are a sad-looking race—the gentry rather better. And now, what art thou doing?

"What are you doing now?
Oh, Thomas Moore?
What are you doing now,
Oh, Thomas Moore?
Ringing or swinging now,
RHYMING or wooling now,
Billing or cooing now.
Which, Thomas Moore?

Are you not near the Luddites? By the Lord! If there's a row, but I'll be among ye! Ho! How go the weavers—the breakers of frames—the Lutherans of politics—the reformers?

"As the liberty lies over the sea
Bought their freedom, and cheaply, with blood,
So we, boys, we,
Will die fighting, or live free,
And down with all kings but king Ludd!

"When the web that we weave is complete,
And the shuttle exchanged for the sword,
We will sing the winding-sheet
Over the dead at our feet,
And lie it deep in the grave he has pour'd.

"Though black as his heart is he base,
Since his veins are corrupted to mud,
Yet, this is the jewels
Which the tree shall renew,
Of liberty, planted by Ludd!

There's an amiable chanson for you—all impromptu.
I have written it principally to shock your neighbor
Hodgson, who is all clergy and loyalty—mirth and innocence—milk and water.

"But the Carnival's coming,
Oh, Thomas Moore
The Carnival's coming,
Oh, Thomas Moore
Masking and humming,
Filing and drumming,
Guttaeering and strumming,
Oh, Thomas Moore.

and regret theattle of hackney coaches, without which they can sleep.

I have got remarkably good apartments in a private house; I see something of the inhabitants, having had a good many letters to some of them; I have got my gondola; I read a little, and luckily could speak Italian (more fluently than correctly) long ago. I am studying out of curiosity, the Venetian dialect, which is very native, and soft, and peculiar, though not at all classical; I go out frequently, and am in very good contentment.

'The Helen of Canova (a bust which is in the House of Madame the Countess d'Alberti, whom I know), is without exception, to any mind, the most perfectly beautiful of human conceptions, and far beyond my ideas of human execution.

Talking of the 'heart' reminds me that I have fallen in love, which, except falling into the canal (and that would be useless, as I swim,) is the best (or worst) thing I could do. I am therefore in love—fathomless love; but lest you should make some splendid mistake, and envy me the possession of some of those princesses or countesses with whose affections your English voyagers are apt to invest themselves, I beg leave to tell you that my goddess is only the voice of a merchant (Merchant of a Merchant, as the saying is) and that she is very plain, and not twenty years old, has the large, black, oriental eyes, with the Italian countenance, and dark glossy hair, of the curl and color of Lady Jersey's. Then she has the voice of a late, and the song of a seraph (though not quite so sacred,) besides a long postscript of graces, virtues, and accomplishments, enough to furnish out a new chapter of Solomon's Song. But her great merit is in finding out mine, for there is nothing so amiable as discernment. Our little arrangement is completed, the usual oaths having been taken, and every thing fulfilled according to the 'understood relations' of such liaisons.

'The general race of women appear to be handsomely in Italy, as on almost all the continent, The highest orders are by no means a well-looking generation, and indeed reckoned by their countrymen very much otherwise. Some are exceptions, but most of them are as ugly as Virtue herself.

'If you write, address to me here, poste restante, as I shall probably stay the winter over. I never see a newspaper and know nothing about England, except in a letter now and then from my sister. Of the MS. sent you, I know nothing, except you have received it, and are to publish it, &c., &c.; but when, where, and how, you leave me to guess; but it doesn't much matter.

'I suppose you have a world of works passing through your process for next year? When does Moore's Poem appear? I sent a letter for him, addressed to your care the other day.'
your publication anticipated by the 'Cambridge,' or other Chronicles. In the next place—I forget what was next; but, in the third place, I want to hear whether you have yet published, or when you mean to do so, or why you have not done so, because your friend, (Sept. 28—you may be ashamed of the date,) you talked of this being done immediately.

"From England I hear nothing, and know nothing of anything or any body. I have but one correspondent, Mr. Kinnaird, on business now (and then,) and her a female; so that I know no more of your island, or city, than the Italian version of the French papers chooses to tell me, or the advertisements of Mr. Collurn tagg'd to the end of Mr. Quarterly Reviews for the year ago. I wrote to you at some length last week, and have little to add, except that I have begun, and am proceeding in, a study of the Armenian language, which I acquire, as well as I can, at the Armenian convent, where I go every day to take lessons of a learned friar, and have gained some singular and not useless information with regard to the language and customs of that oriental people. They have an establishment here—a church and a convent of ninety monks—very learned and accomplished men, some of them. They have also a press, and make great efforts for the enlightening of their nation. I find the language (which is twin, the literal and the vulgar) difficult, but not invincible, (at least, I hope not,) I shall go on. I found it necessary to twist my mind round some severe study, and this, as being the hardest I could devise here, will be a file for the serpent.

"I mean to remain here till the spring, so address to me directly to Venice, poste restante.—Mr. Hobhouse, for the present has gone to Rome, with his brother, brother's wife, and sister, who overtook him here; he returns in two months. I should have gone too, but I fell in love, and must stay that over. I should think that and the Armenian alphabet will last the winter. The lady has, luckily for me, been less obdurate than the language, or, between the two, I should have lost my remains of sanity. By-the-way she is not an Armenian but a Venetian, as I believe I told you in my last. As for Italian, I am fluent enough, even in its Venetian modification, which is something like the Somersetshire version of English; and as for the more classical dialects, I had not forgot my former practice much during my voyaging.

"Yours, ever and truly,

"P. S. Remember me to Mr. Gifford."

...so say) he left it on, and she got up and sang a trio with the two Consuls, the Senate in the back ground being chorus. The ballet was distinguished by nothing remarkable, except that the principal shepherdess, a lady of her age, came on the first act, being applauded on her first appearance; and the manager came forward to ask if there was ' ever a physician in the theatre.' There was a Greek in my box, who remarked, 'It makes no matter, they have but to order the service, being sure that in this case these would have been the last convulsions which would have troubled the ballants; but he would not. The crowd was enormous, and in coming out, having a lady under my arm, I was obliged, in making way, as almost to 'beat a Venetian, and traduce the state,' being compelled to regale a person with an English punch in the guts, which sent him as far back as the squeeze and the passage would admit. He did not ask for another, but with great signs of disapprobation and dismay, appealed to his compatriots, who laughed at him.

I am going on with my Armenian studies in a morning, and assisting and stimulating in the English portion of an English and Armenian grammar, now publishing at the convent of St. Lazarus.

'The superior of the friars is a bishop, and a fine old fellow, with the board of a meteor. Father Paschal is also a learned and pious soul. He was two years in England.

I am still dreadfully in love with the Adriatic lady whom I spoke of in a former letter (and not to this) — I add, for fear of mistakes, for the only one mentioned in the first part of this epistle is elderly and bookish, two things which I have ceased to admire, and love in this part of the world is no shewere. This is also the season when every body make up their intrigues for the ensuing year, and cut for partners for the next deal.

And now, if you don't write, I don't know what I won't say or do, for what I will. Send me some rows — good rows.

"Yours, very truly, &c., &c., &c.,"

"P. S. Remember me to Mr. Gifford, with all my love.

I hear that the Edinburgh Review has cut up Coleridge's Christabel, and me for praising it, which, I think, bodes no great good to your forth-coming or coming canto and Cato (of Chillon.) My run of luck within the last year, has taken a turn every way; but never mind, I will bring myself through in the end—if not, I can be but where I began. In the mean time, I am not displeased to be where I am—I mean at Venice. My Adriatic my love is not diverted here, and I must therefore repose from this letter."

LETTER CCCXV.

TO MR. MURRAY.

"Venice, Jan. 9, 1817.

"Your letter has arrived. Pray, in publishing the third canto, have you omitted any passages? I hope not; and indeed wrote to you on my way over the Alps to prevent such an incident. Say in your next whether or not the whole of the canto (as sent to you) has been published. I wrote to you again the other day, (twice I think,) and shall be glad to hear of the receipt of those letters.

To-day is the 2d of January. On this day three years ago, the Corinna's publication is dated, I think in my letter to Moore. On this day two years I married (Whom the Lord love he chasteneth)—I shan't forget the day in a hurry, and it is odd enough that I this day received a letter from you announcing the publication of Child Harold, &c., &c., on the day of the date of the Corinna; and I also received one from my sister, written on the 10th of December, my daughter's birth-day, and relative chiefly to my daughter, and arriving on the day of my marriage, this present 2d of January, the month of my birth, and various other astrologers matters, which I have no time to enumerate.

By the way, you might as well write to Hentsch my Geneva banker, and inquire whether the two packets consigned to his care were or were not delivered to Mr. St. Aubyn, or if they are still in his keeping. One contains papers, letters, and the other the original MSS. &c., which I was compelled to send in fragments; and the other some bones from the field of Morat. Many thanks for your news, and the good spirits in which your letter is written.

"Venice and I agree very well; but I do not know that I have anything new to say except of the last new opera, which I sent in my late letter. The Carnival is commencing, and there is a good deal of fun aere and there—besides business; for all the worst have made up their intrigues for the season, changing, or going on upon a renewed lease. I am very well off with Marianna, who is not at all a person to tire me; firstly, because I do not expect that tire of a meteor. Father Paschal is also a learned and pious soul. He was two years in England.

I am still dreadingly in love with the Adriatic lady whom I spoke of in a former letter (and not to this) — I add, for fear of mistakes, for the only one mentioned in the first part of this epistle is elderly and bookish, two things which I have ceased to admire, and love in this part of the world is no shewere. This is also the season when every body make up their intrigues for the ensuing year, and cut for partners for the next deal.

and France - French the res. I still pursue my lessons in the language without any rapid progress, but advancing a little daily. Padre Paschal, with some little help from me, as translator of his Italian into English, is also proceeding in a MS. grammar for the English acquisition of Armenian, which will be printed also when finished.

"We want to know if there are any Armenian types and letter-press in England, at Oxford, Cambridge, or anywhere else? You know, I suppose, that, many years ago, the two Whistons published in England an original text of a history of Armenia, with their own Latin translation? Do those types still exist, and where? Pray inquire among your learned acquaintance.

"When this grammar (I mean the one now printing) is done, will you have any objection to take forty or fifty copies, which will not cost in all above five or ten guineas, and try the curiosity of the learned with a sale of them? Say yes or no, as you like. I can assure you that they have some very curious books and MSS., chiefly translations from Greek originals now lost. They are, besides, a much-respected and learned community, and the study of their language was taken up with great ardor by some literary Frenchmen in Bonaparte's time.

"I have not done a stitch of poetry since I left Switzerland, and have not at present the estro upon me. The truth is, that you are afraid of having a fourth canto before me, and I fear not my copy right, but I have at present no thoughts of resume-ing that poem, nor of beginning any other. If I write, I think of trying prose, but I dread introducing living people, or applications which might be made to living people. Perhaps one day or other
I may attempt some work of fancy in prose, descriptive of Italian manners and of human passions;
but at present I am preoccupied. As for poesy, mine is before me, and I have not passion for it
when they are awake, I cannot speak their language, only in their somnambulism, and just now they are not dormant.

"If Mr. Gifford wants carte blanche as to the Siege of Corinth, he has it, and may do as he likes with it.

"I sent you a letter contradictory of the Cheapside man (who invented the story you speak of) the other day. I have not heard from him for some time, and such of my friends as you may see at your house.
I wish you all prosperity and your new year's gratula-
tion, and am,

"Yours, &c."

LETTER CCCXVI.

TO MR. MOORE.

Venice, Jan. 26, 1817.

Your letter of the 8th is before me. The repredy for your plethora is simple - abstinence. I was obliged to have recourse to the like some years ago,
I mean in point of diet, and, with the exception of some convivial weeks and days, (it might be months now and then,) I have kept to Pythagoras ever since.
For all this, let me hear that you are better. You must not indulge in "filthy beer," nor in porter, nor eat suppers - the last are the devil to those who swallow dinners.

"I am truly sorry to hear of your father's misfortune - cruel at any time, but doubly cruel in advanced life. However, you will, at least, have the satisfaction of doing your duty by him, and, depend upon it, it will not be in vain. Fortune be sure, is a female, but not such a b - as the rest (always excepting your wife and my sister from such sweeping terms); for she generally has some justice in the long run. I have no spite against her, though, between her and Nemesis, I have had some sore gauntlets to run - but then I have done my best to deserve no better. But to you, she is a good deal in arrear, and she will come round - mind if she don't: you have the vigor of life, of independence, of talent, spirit, and character, all with you. With you, I suppose, that you will do and will; and surely there are some others in the world who would not be sorry to be of use, if you would allow them to be useful, or at least attempt it.

"I think of being in England in the spring. If there is a row, by the sceptre of King Ludd, but:
I'll be one; and if there is none, and only a connexion of 'this weak, piping time of peace,' I will take a grand sweep in my hundred yard of your abode, and become your neighbor; and we will compose such canticles, and hold such dialogues, as shall be the terror of the Times, (including the newspaper of that name,) and the wonder, and honor, and praise of the Morning Chronicle and posterity.

"I rejoice to hear of your forthcoming in February - though I tremble for the magnificence which you attribute to the new Childe Harold. I am glad you like it; it is a fine, indistinct piece of poetical desolation, and my favorite. I was half mad during the time of its composition, between metaphysics, and mountains, and nights, and unutterable, and the nightmare of my own delinquences. I should, many a good day, have blown my brains out, but for the recollection that it would have given my sister her due, and to her even then, if I could have been certain to haunt her, and fling the shattered scalp of my sinicup and oeciput in her frightful face - but I don't dwell upon these trifling family matters.

"Venice is in the estro of her Carnival, and I have been up these last two nights at the ridotto and the opera, and all that kind of thing. Now for an adventure. A few days ago a gondolier brought some conversations; when I was writing a wish on the part of the writer to meet me either in gondola, or at the island of San Lazaró, or at a third rendezvous indicated in the note. 'I know the country's disposition well,' - in Venice
they do let heaven see those tricks they dare not show,' &c., &c.; so for all response, I said that neither of the three places suited me; but that I would either be at home at ten at night alone, but that I might meet me masked. At ten o'clock I was at home and alone, (Marianna was gone with her husband to a conversazione,) when the door of my apartment opened, and in walked a well-looking and (for an Italian) bionda girl of about nineteen, who informed me that she was married to the brother of my amoro, and wished to have some conversation with me. I made a decent reply, and we had some talk in Italian and Romaine, (her mother being a Greek of Corfu;) when lo! in a very few minutes in marchese, to my very great astonishment, Marianna 5 * 5, in propria persona and, after making a most polite curtsey to her sister-in-law and to me, without a single word, seizes her said sister-in-law by the hair, and cestows upon her some sixteen slaps, which would have made your ear ache only to hear their echo.
I need not describe the screaming which ensued.
The luckless visiter took flight. I seized Marianna, who, after several vain efforts to get away in pursuit of the enemy, fairly went into fits in my arms; and, in spite of knocking, eau de Cologne, vinegar, half a pint of water, and God knows what other water.
besides, continued so till past midnight.

After damning my servants for letting people in without a signal (which is done by me, Marianna in the morning had seen her sister-in-law's gondolier on the stairs; and, suspecting that his apparition boded her no good, had either returned of her own accord, or was snatched away by her maid, who spyed her people to the conversazione, from whence she returned to perpetrate this piece of pugilism
LETTER CCXCVII.

TO MR. MURRAY.

"Venice, Jan. 34, 1817.

"I have been requested by the Countess Albrizzi here to present her with 'the Works;' and wish you therefore to send me a copy, that I may comply with her requisition. You may include the last published, of which I have seen and know nothing, but only your letter of the 15th of December last.

"Mrs. Leigh tells me that most of her friends prefer the first two cantos. I do not know whether this be the general opinion or not, (it is not here;) but it is natural it should be so. I, however, think differently. I consider it natural, as it is right, or who is wrong, is of very little consequence.

"Dr. Polidori, as I hear from him by letter from Pisa, is about to return to England, to go to the Brazils on a medical speculation with the Consul. As you are in the favor of the powers that be, could you not get him some letters of recommendation from some of your government friends to some of the Portuguese settlers? he undoubtedly is in want of general talents; his faults are the faults of a pardonsable vanity and youth. His remaining with me was out of the question: I have enough to do to manage my own scrapes; and as precepts without example are not the most gracious homilies, I thought it better to give him your congé: but I know no great harm of him, and some good. He is clever and accomplished, and accounts, well; and is honorable in his dealings and not at all malevolent. I think, with luck, he will turn out a useful member of society, (from which he will profit, and the College of Physicians. If you can be of any use to him, or know any one who can, pray be so, as he has his fortune to make. He has kept a medical journal under the eye of Vvecce, (the first surgeon on the continent,) and Vvecce is a very valuable man; and it must contain some valuable hints or information on the practice of this country. If you can aid him in publishing this also, by your influence with your brethren, do; I do not ask you to publish it yourself, because that sort of request is too personal and embarrassing. He has also a tragedy, of which, having seen nothing, I say nothing: but the very circumstance of his having made these efforts (if they are only efforts), at one-and-twenty, to gain his favor, and proves him to have good dispositions for his own improvement. So if, in the way of commendation or recommendation, you can aid his objects with your government friends, I wish you success. For besides my own, I fear he on his part, who was such a member of the Charity Board might be likely to have it in their power."

LETTER CCXCVIII.

TO MR. MURRAY.

"Venice, Feb. 15, 1817.

"I have received your two letters, but not the parcel you mention. As the Waterloo spoils are arrived, I will make you a present of them, if you choose to accept of them; pray do.

"I do not exactly understand from your letter what has been omitted, or what not, in the publication; but I shall see probably some day or other I could not attribute any but a good motive to Mr. Gifford or yourself in such omission; but as our politics are so very opposite, we should probably differ as to the passages. However, if it is only a note or notes, or a line or so, I cannot signify, You say 'a poem,' what poem? You can tell me in your next.

"Of Mr. Hobhouse's quarrel with the Quarterly Review, I know very little except *'s an article itself, which was certainly harsh enough: but I quite agree that it would have been better not to answer—particularly after Mr. W. W., who never more will trouble you, trouble you. I have been uneasy, because Mr. H. told me that his letter or preface was to be addressed to me. Now, he and I are friends of many years; I have many obligations to him, and he none to me, which have not been cancelled and more than repaid; but Mr. Gifford and I are friends also, and he has moreover cut us really so close, and thin, in despite of difference of years, morals, habits, and even politics: and therefore I feel in a very awkward situation between the two. Mr. Gifford and my friend Hobhouse, and can only wish that they had no difference; tip that such as they have were accommodated. The answer I have not seen, for—"it is odd enough for people so intimate—Mr. Hobhouse and I are very sparing of our literary confidence, and from the example of the Danish, I wished to have a MS. of the third canto to read over to his brother, &c., which was refused; and I have never seen his journals, nor he mine.—(Only kept the short one of the mountains for my sister)—nor do I think they have ever been published, or his other's productions previous to their publication.

"The article in the Edinburgh Review on Coleridge I have not seen; but whether I am attacked in it or not, or in any other of the same journal, I shall never think ill of Mr. Jeffrey on that account, nor forget that his conduct towards me has been certainly most handsome during the last four or more years.

I forgot to mention to you that a kind of poem in dialogue* (in blank verse) or drama, from which the Inquisition is an extract, begun last summer in Switzerland, is finished; it is in three acts; but of a very wild, metaphysical, and inexplicable kind. Almost all the persons—three or three—a-spirits of the earth and air, or the waters; the scene is in the Alps; the hero a kind of magician, who is tormented by a species of remorse, the cause of which is left half unexplained. He wanders about jokkering these spirits, which appear to him, at are of no use; he at last goes to the very abode of the Evil Principle, in propria persona, to evoke a ghost, which appears, and gives him an ambiguous and disagreeable answer; and in the third act he is found by his attendants dying in a tower where he had studied his art. You may perceive by this outline that I have no great opinion of this piece of phantasy; but I have at least endeavored it quite impossible for the stage, for which my intercourse with Drury Lane has given me the greatest contempt.

I have not even copied it off, and feel too lazy at present to attempt the whole; but when I have, I will send it you, and you may either throw it into the fire or not.

LETTER CCCXIX.

TO MR. MURRAY.

Venice, Feb. 26, 1817.

I wrote to you the other day in answer to your letter; at present, I would trouble you with a commission, if you would be kind enough to undertake it.

You perhaps know Mr. Love, the jeweller, of Old Bond street. In 1813, when in the intention of returning to Turkey, I purchased of him, and paid (argent comptant) about a dozen snuff-boxes, of more or less value, as presents for some of my Musulman acquaintance. These I have now with me. The other day, having occasion to make an alteration in the lid of one, (to place a portrait in it,) it has turned out to be silver gilt instead of gold, to which last it was sold and paid for. This was discovered by the workman in trying it, before taking off the hinges and working upon the lid. I have of course recalled and preserved the box in statu quo. What I wish you to do is, to see the said Mr. Love, and inform him of this circumstance, adding from me, that I will take care he shall not have done this with impunity.

If there is no remedy in law, there is at least the equitable one of making known his guilt,—that is, his silver gilt, and be d—d to him.

I will carefully preserve all the purchases I made of him on that occasion for my return, as the plague in Turkey is a barrier to travelling there at present, or rather the endless quarantine which would be the consequence before one could land in the country. Pray state the matter to him with due ferocity.

I sent you the other day some extracts from a kind of drama which I had begun in Switzerland and finished here; you will receive them as I have already copied them, and preserved them in a letter. I have not yet had energy to copy it out, or I would send you the whole in different covers.

The Carnival closed this day last week.

Mr. Hobhouse is still at Rome, I believe. I am at present a little unwell; sitting up too late and some subsidiary dissipations have lowered my blood a good deal; but I have at present the quiet and temperance of Lent before me.

P. S. Remember me to Mr. Gifford. I have not received your parcel or parcels. Look into Moore's (Dr. Moore's) View of Italy for me; in one of the volumes you will find an account of the Doxe Valiere (it ought to be Falleri) and his conspiracy, or the motives of it. Get it transcribed for me, and send it in a letter to me soon. I want it, and cannot find so good an account of that business here; though the veiled patriot, and the place where he was crowned, and afterwards decapitated, still exist, and are shown. I have searched all their histories; but the policy of the old aristocracy made their writers silent on his motives, which were a pitiful grievance against one of the patriots.

I mean to write a tragedy on the subject, which appears to me very dramatic; an old man, jealous, and conspiring against the state, of which he was the actually reigning chief. The last circumstance makes it the most remarkable and only feet of the kind in all history of all nations.

LETTER CCCXXX.

TO MR. MOORE.

Venice, Feb. 26, 1817.

You will, perhaps, complain as much of the frequency of my letters now, as you were wont to do of their rarity. I think this is the fourth within as many moons. I feel anxious to hear from you, even more than usual, because your last indicated that you were unwell. At present, I am on the invalid regimen myself. The Carnival—that is, the latter part of it—and sitting up late one night, had knocked me up a little. But it is over,—and it is now Lent, with all its abstinance and sacred music.

The mumming closed with a masked ball at the Fenice, where I went, as also to most of the Ridottas, &c., &c.; and though I did not dissipate much upon the whole, yet I found the sword wearing out the seaboard, though I have but just turned the corner of twenty-nine.

So we'll go no more a roving, Though the heart be still as loving, Though the moon be still as bright, For the sword of passion is sheath'd, And the soul wears out the breast, And the heart must pause to breathe, And love half lost have rest.

Though the night was made for loving, And the day returns too soon, Yet we'll go no more a roving By the light of the moon.

I have lately had some news of literature, as I heard the editor of the Monthly pronounce it once upon a time. I heard that W. W. has been publishing and responding to the attacks of the Quarterly, in the learned Perry's Chronicle. I read his poems last autumn, and, among other epistles, found an epithalam on his bull-dog, and another on myself. But I beg leave to assure him (like the astrologer Partridge) that I am not only alive now, but was alive also at the time he wrote it.

Hobhouse has (I hear, also) expectorated a letter against the Quarterly, addressed to me. I feel awkwardly situated between him and Gifford, both closed the Quarterly last week.

And this is your month of going to press—by the body of Diana! (a Venetian oath,) I feel as anxious—but not fearful for you—as if it were myself coming out in a work of humanities which would, you know, be the antipodes of all my previous
I don't think you have anything to dread but your own reputation. You must keep up to that.

To Murray.

"Venice, March 8, 1817.

"In acknowledging the arrival of the article from the Quarterly, which I received two days ago, I cannot express myself better than in the words of my sister Augusta, who (speaking of it) says, that it is "in the spirit of the Rush (as) of kind nature. It is, however, something more: it seems to me (as far as the subject of it may be permitted to judge) to be very well written as a composition, and I think will do the journal credit, because even those who condemn its partiality must praise its generosity. The temptations to take another and a less favorable view of the question have been so great and numerous, that what with public opinion, politics, &c., he must be a gallant as well as a good man, who has ventured in that place, and at this time, to write such an article even anonymously. Such things are, however, the best revenge, and I even flatter myself that the writer, whoever he may be, and I have no guess, will not regret that the perusal of this has given me so much gratification as any composition of that nature could give, and more than any other has given, and I have had a good many in my time of one kind or the other. It is not the mere praise, but there is a tacit and a delicacy throughout, not only with regard to me, but to others, which, as it had not been observed elsewhere, I had till now doubted whether it could be observed any where.

"Perhaps some day or other you will know or tell me the writer's name. Be assured, had the article been a harsh one, I should not have asked it.

"I have lately written to you frequently, with extracts, &c., whether I have received, or will receive, with or becure this letter. Ever since the conclusion of the Carnival I have been unwell, (do not mention this, on any account, to Mrs. Leigh: for it is a great horse, should I recover, and if I get better, there is no occasion that she should know it at all,) and have hardly stirred out of the house. However, I don't want a physician, and if I did, very likely those of Italy are the worst in the world, so that I should still have a chance. They have, I believe, one famous surgeon, Vacca, who lives at Pisa, who might be useful in case of dissection—but he is some hundred miles off. My malady is a sort of slow fever, originating from what my 'pastor and master,' Jackson, would call 'taking too much out of one's self.' However, I am better within this day or two.

"I missed seeing the new Patriarch's procession to St. Mark's on Monday, (owing to my indisposition,) with six hundred and fifty priests in his rear—a 'goody army.' The admirable government of Vienna, in its edict from thence, authorizing his Holiness to remit, or not remit, his coat of arms, &c., &c., the grandeur, the mass of installation, in short, will puzzle the philosophers of all ages. But I doubt whether my constitution will hold out. I have, at intervals, exercised it most devilishly.

"I have not yet fixed a time of return, but I think of the spring. I shall have been away a year in April next. You never mention Rogers, nor Hodgson, your clerical neighbor, who has lately got a living near you. Has he also got a child yet? his desideratum when I saw him last.

"Pray, let me hear from you, at your time and leisure, believing me ever and truly, and affectionately, &c."

LETTER CCXXI.

TO MR. MURRAY.

"Venice, March 9, 1817.

"In remedy the third act of the sort of dramatic poem, of which you will by this time have received the first two, (at least I hope so,) which were sent within the last three weeks, I have little more to observe, except that you must not suppose that the author of the Rush (as) of kind nature. It is, however, something more: it seems to me (as far as the subject of it may be permitted to judge) to be very well written as a composition, and I think will do the journal credit, because even those who condemn its partiality must praise its generosity. The temptations to take another and a less favorable view of the question have been so great and numerous, that what with public opinion, politics, &c., he must be a gallant as well as a good man, who has ventured in that place, and at this time, to write such an article even anonymously. Such things are, however, the best revenge, and I even flatter myself that the writer, whoever he may be, and I have no guess, will not regret that the perusal of this has given me so much gratification as any composition of that nature could give, and more than any other has given, and I have had a good many in my time of one kind or the other. It is not the mere praise, but there is a tacit and a delicacy throughout, not only with regard to me, but to others, which, as it had not been observed elsewheres, I had till now doubted whether it could be observed any where.

"Perhaps some day or other you will know or tell me the writer's name. Be assured, had the article been a harsh one, I should not have asked it.

* A's article in number xxvi. of this Review, written, as Lord Byron afterward discovered, by Sir Walter Scott.
LETTER CCXXXIII.

TO MR. MOORE.

[Venice, March 16, 1817.]

"I wrote again to you lately, but I hope you won't be sorry to have another epistle. I have been unwell this last month, with a kind of slow and low fever, which fixes upon me at night, and goes off in the morning; but, however, I am now better. In spring it is probable we may meet; at least I intend for England, where I have business, and hope to meet in your restored health and additional laurels.

"Murray has sent me the Quarterly and the Edinburgh. When I tell you that Walter Scott is the author of the article in the former, you will agree with me that such an article is still more honorable to him than to myself. I am perfectly pleased with Jeffrey's also, which I wish you to tell him, with my remembrances—not that I suppose it is of any consequence to him, or ever could have been, whether I am pleased or not,—but simply in my private relation to that your poem is unjust, and in the name of to-day, as his acquaintance. I wish you would also add,—what you know,—that I was not, and, indeed, am not even now, the misanthropical and gloomy gentleman he takes me for, but a facetious companion, well to do with those with whom I am intimate, and as loquacious and laughing as if I were a much cleverer fellow.

"I suppose now I shall never be able to shake off my sables in public imagination, more particularly since my moral clove down my fame. However nor that, nor more than that, has yet extinguished my spirit, which always rises with the rebound.

"At Venice we are in Lent, and I have not lately moved out of doors,—my feverishness requiring quiet,—and by way of being more quiet—here is the Signora Marianna just come in and seated at my elbow.

"I have seen * * *'s book of poetey and, if you have seen it, are you not delighted with it? And have you—I really cannot go on. There is a pair of great black eyes looking over my shoulder, like the angel leaning over St. Matthew's in the old frontispiece to the Evangelists,—so that I must turn and answer them instead of you.

"Ever, etc."

LETTER CCXXXIV.

TO MR. MOORE.

[Venice, March 25, 1817.]

"I have at last learned, in default of your own writing, (or not writing—which should it be?) for I am not very clear as to the application of the word default,) from Murray, two particulars of (are belonging to) you; one, that you are removing to Hornsey, which is, I presume, to be nearer London; and the other, that you are contracted to have a booth in my 'Persian Tales,' not that I suppose you want either dog or tail. Talking of tail, I wish you had not called it a 'Persian Tale.' Say a 'poem' or 'romance,' but not 'tail.' I am very sorry that I called some of my own things tail because I think that they are something better. Besides, we have had Arabian, and Hindoo, and Turkish, and Assyrian Tales. But, after all, this is frivolous in me; you would, however, mind my sentence.

"Really and truly, I want you to make a great hit, if only out of self-love, because we happen to be old cronies, and I have no doubt you will— I am sure you can. But you are, I'll be sworn, in a devil of a pucker; and I am not at your elbow, and Rogers is. I curvily (which is the air, because they does not curvily any body. Mind you send to me —that is, make Murray send—the moment you are.

I have been very ill with a slow fever, which at last, after some days fighting, I became
But, at length, after a week of half delirium, burning skin, thirst, hot headache, horrible pulsation, and no sleep, by the blessing of barley water, and refusing to see any physician, I recovered.

In the epidemic of smallpox, which is annual, and visits strangers. Here follow some versicles, which I made one sleepless night:

"I read the 'Christian';
Very well;
I read the 'Miscellany';
Pretty well;
2 tried at 'Milton';
Alms
I read a sheet of 'Margaret of Anjou'
Char. gen.? I turn'd a page of 'A Winter's;
Foot! Foot!
Looked at Wordsworth's milk-white 'Rylstone Doe';
Ville!
I read another 'too, by * * * God bless you!"

"I have not the least idea where I am going, or what I am to do. I wished to have gone to Rome; but at present it is pestilent with English, a parcel of staring boobies, who go about gaping and wishing to be at once cheap and magnificent.
A man is a fool who travels now in France or Italy,
and this tribe of wretches is swept home again.
In two or three years the first rush will be over, and the Continent will be roomy and agreeable.

"I stayed at Venice chiefly because it is not one of their 'dens of thieves;' and here they but pause and pass. In Switzerland it was really noxious.
Luckily, I was early, and had got the prettiest place on all the lake before they were quickened into motion with the rest of reptiles. But they crossed me every where. I met a family of children and old women half way up the Weingen Alp (by the Jungfrau) upon males, some of them too old and others too young to be the least aware of what they saw.

"By-the-way, I think the Jungfrau, and all that region of Alps, which I traversed in September—going to the very top of the Weingen, which is now the highest, (the Jungfrau itself is inaccessible), but the best point of view—much finer than Mont Blanc and Chamouni, or the Simplon. I kept a journal of the whole for my sister Augusta, part of which she copied and let Murray see.

"I wrote a sort of mad drama, for the sake of introducing the Alpine scenery in description; and this I sent lately to Murray. Almost all the dramas purs. are spirits, ghosts, or magicians, and the scene is in the Alps and the other world; so you may suppose what a heraldic tragedy it must be: make him show it you. I sent him all three acts piecemeal, by the post, and suppose they have arrived.

"I have now written to you at least six letters, or letterets, and all I have received in return is a note about the length you used to write from Bury street to St. James's street, when we used to dine with Rogers, and talk lastly, and go to parties, and bear the poor Sheridan now and then. Do you remember one night he was so tipsy that I was forced to put his cocked hat on him—for he could not, and—I let him do what his brother's, much as he must shun have been let down into his grave. Heigh ho! I wish I was drunk—but I have nothing but this d—barley water before me.

"I am still in that which is a dreadful drawback in quitting a place, and I can't stay at Venice much longer (but I shall do on this point I don't know. The girl means to go with me, but I do not like this for her safety, and so many conflicts in my own mind on this subject, that I may not at all sure they did not help me to the fever I mentioned above. I am certainly very much attached to her, and I have cause to be so, if you knew all. She is a child, and needs the care of all the 'children of the sun,' she consults nothing but passion, it is necessary I should think for both;
and it is only the virtuous, like * * *, who can afford to give up husband and child, and live happy ever after.

"The Italian ethics are the most singular ever met with. The perversion, not only of action, but of reasoning, is singular in the women. It is not that they do not consider the thing itself as wrong, and very wrong, but love (the sentiment of love) is not merely an excuse for it, but makes it an actual virtue, provide, it is disinterested, and not a caprice, and is confined to one object. They have awful notions of constancy; for I have seen some ancient figures of eighty pointed out as amorous of forty, fifty, and sixty years' standing. I can't say I have ever seen a husband and wife so coupled.

"P. S. Marianna, to whom I have just translated what I have written on our subject to you, says—
"If you loved me thoroughly, you would not make so many fine reflections, which are only good for
"Avert i scarpe, what is, 'to clean shoes with,'
"Venetian proverb of appreciation, which is applicable to reasoning of all kinds.'"

LETTER CCCXV

TO MR. MURRAY.

"Venice, March 25, 1817.

"Your letter and enclosure are safe; but 'English gentlemen' are very rare—at least in Venice. I doubt whether there are at present any save the consul and vice-consul, with neither of whom I have the slightest acquaintance. The moment I can pounce upon a witness, I will send the deed properly signed: but must he necessarily be gentile? Venice is not a place where the English are gracious;
their pigeon-houses are Florence, Naples, Rome,
&c.; and to tell you the truth, this was one reason why I stayed here till the season of the purgation of Rome from these people, which is infected with them at this time, should arrive. Besides, I abhor the nation, and the nation me; it is impossible for me to describe my own sensation on that point, but it may suffice to say, that, if I met with any of the race in the beautiful parts of Switzerland, the most distant glimpse or aspect of them poisoned the whole scene; and I do not choose to have the Pantheon, and St. Peter's, and the Capitol, spoiled for me too. This feeling may be probably owing to recent events; but it does not exist the less, and while it exists, I shall conceal it as little as any other.

"I suppose I have been seriously ill with a fever, but it is gone. I believe or suppose it was the indigenous fever of the place, which comes every year at this time, and of which the physicians change the name annually, to despatch the people sooner. It is a kind of typhus, and kills occasionally. It was pretty smart, but nothing particular, and has left me some debility and a great appetite. There are a good many ill at present, I suppose of the same.

"I feel some for Fortune, if there is any thing in the world to make him like it: and still more sorry for his friends, as there was much to make them regret him. I had not heard of his death till after your letter.

"Some weeks ago I wrote to you my acco ledgments of Walter Scott's article. Now I know
BYRON'S WORKS.

"And mind you do not let cases
These rhymes to Morning Post or Petty,
What would be for very touching—very,
And get me into such a scrape?
For, firstly, I should have to sadly,
All in a little box, against a Galaxy;
And should I chance to say the Assyrian night,
Have next to combat with the female knight,
And, pitch'd to death, expire upon her score—
A sort of end which I should take indeed ill.

"You may shew these matters to Moore and the select, but not to the profane; and tell Moore, that wonder he don't write to one now and then.""

LETTER CCXXXVI.

TO MR. MOORE.

"Vendoe, March 31, 1817.

"You will begin to think my epistolary offerings (to whatever altar you please to devote them) rather prodigal. But until you answer I shall not abate, because you deserve no better. I know you are well, and that you have nothing on your voyage. Romance? I feel as anxious for Moore as I could do for myself, for the soul of me, and I would not have him succeed otherwise than splendidly, which I trust he will do.

"With regard to the 'Whit' Drama,' I sent all the things I have so far written, we expect a week, within this last month. I repeat that I have not an idea if it is good or bad. If bad, it must, on no account, be risked in publication; if good, it is at your service. I value it at three hundred guineas, or less, if you like it. Perhaps, if published, the best way will be to add it to your winter volume, and not publish separately. The price will show you I don't pique myself upon it. I speak out. You may put it in the fire, if you like, and Gifford don't like.

"The Armenian Grammar is published—that is, one; the other is still in MS. My illness has prevented me from moving this month past, and I have done nothing more with the Armenian.

"Of Italian or rather Lombard manners, I could tell you little or nothing: I went two or three times to the governor's conversations, (and if you care you may always go there,) but I saw very plain women, a formal circle, in short, a worst sort of rout, I did not go again. I went to Academie and to Madame Albrizzi's, where I saw pretty much the same thing, with the addition of some little gossip, as was the same for every other over the world. I fell in love the first week with Madame *, *, and I have continued so ever since, because she is very pretty and pleasing, and talks Venetian, which amuses me, and is naive. I have seen all their spectacles and sights; but I do not know any thing very worthy of observation, except that the women kiss better than those of any other nation, which is notorious, and attributed to the worship of images, and the early habit of osculation induced thereby. Very truly, &c.

P. S. Pray send the red tooth-powder by a sole kid, and speedily."

Mr. Galley Knight, the author of 'Elibraria.'
LETTER CCCXXVII.

TO MR. MURRAY.

"Venice, April 2, 1817.

I sent you the whole of the drama at three several times, act by act, in separate covers. I hope that you have, or will receive, some or the whole of it.

So Love has a conscience. By Diana! I shall make him take back the box, though it were Pandora's. The discovery of its intrinsic silver occurred on sending it to have the lid adapted to admit of Marianne's portrait. Of course I had the box remitted to stato quo, and had the picture set in another, which suits it (the picture) very well. The defaulting box is not touched, hardly, and was not in the man's hands above an hour.

I am aware of what you say of Otway; and am a very great admirer of his—allexcept of that mandarin b— of chaste lewdness and blubbering curiosity, Belvidera, whom I utterly despise, abhor, and detest. But the story of Marino Faliero is different, and, I think, so much finer, that I wish Otway had taken it instead: the head conspiring against the body for refusal ofredress for a real injury, jealousy, treason, with the more fixed and invertebrate passions (mixed with policy), he are old or elderly man—the devil himself could not have a finer subject, and he is your only tragic dramatist.

There is still, in the Doge's palace, the black wall painted over Faliero's picture, and the staircase, whereon he was first crowned Doge, and subsequent decapitated.† This was the thing that most struck my imagination in Venice—more than the Rialto, which I visited for the sake of Shylock: and more, too, than Schiller's 'Armenian,' a novel which took a great hold of me when a boy. It is also called the 'Ghost Seer,' and I never walked down St. Mark's by moonlight without thinking of it, and 'at nine o'clock, he died!'—But I have things all fiction; and therefore The Merchant and Othello have no great associations to me: but Pierre has. There should always be some foundation of fact for the most airy fabric, and pure invention is out the talent of a liar.

Marian's tragedy. By your account of him last year to me, he seemed a bit of a coxcomb, personally. Poor fellow! I must be sure, he had had a long wearing adversary, which is not hard to him as 'tis other thing. I hope this won't throw him back into the 'slough of despond.'

You talk of marriage: ever since my own funeral, the word makes me giddy, and throws me into confusion, so don't repeat it.

You should close with Madame de Staël. This will be her best work, and permanently historical; it is on her father, the Revolution, and Bonaparte, &c. Bonstetten told me in Switzerland it was very great. I have not seen it my self out on the other side, nor often. She was very kind to me at Copet.*

"There have been two articles in the Venice papers, one a review of Glenaron,* * *, and the other a review of Childe Harold, in which it proclaims me the most rebellious and unconformable admirer of Bonaparte now surviving in Europe. Both these articles are translated from the Literary Gazette of German Jean. * * *

Tell me W. Scott is better. I would not have him * * the world. I suppose it was by sympathy that I had my fever at the same time.

I joy in the success of your Quarterly, but I must still stick by the Edinburgh; Jeffrey has done so by me, I must say, through everything, and this is more than I deserve from him. I have more than once acknowledged to you by letter the 'Article' (and articles;) say that you have received the said letters, as I do not otherwise know what letters arrive.—Both Reviews came, but nothing more. M.'s play and the extract not yet come.* * *

Write to say whether my Magician has arrived, with all his scenes, spells, &c.

Yours ever, &c.

LETTER CCCXXVIII.

TO MR. ROGERS.

"Venice, April 4, 1817.

"It is a considerable time since I wrote to you last, and I hardly know why I should trouble you now, except that I think you will not be sorry to hear from me now and then. You and I were never correspondents, but always some thing better, which is, very good friends.

"I saw your friend Sharp in Switzerland, or rather in the German territory, (which is and not Switzerland,) and we have Holden a good route for the Bernese Alps; however, we took another from a German, and went by Clares, the Dent de Jaman to Montbovier and through Simmental to the Rhone at a good and such countrymen except that from thence to the Grindelwald instead of round about, we went right over the Wener Alps' very summit, and being close under the Jungfrau saw it, its glaciers, and heard the avalanches in all their glory, having famous weather thereby. We of course went from the Grindelwald over the Sheidech to Brients and its lake; past the Reichs enbach and all that mountain road, which reminded me of Albanis, and Estolia, and Greece, except that the people here were more civilized and rascally. I did not think so very much of Chamouni (except the source of Arveron, to which we went up to the teeth of the ice, where we looked into and touch the cavity, against the warning of the guides, only one of whom would go with us so close), as of the Jungfrau, and the Pisavache, and Simpion, which are quite out of all mortal comprehension.

"I was at Milan about a moon, and saw Monti and some other living curiosities, and thence on to Verona, where I did not forget your story of the assassination between your soyen there, but brought away with me some fragments of Juliet's tomb and a lively recollection of the amphitheatre. The Countess Goetz (the governor's wife here), told me that there is still a ruined castle of the Montecchi between Verona and Vicenza. I have been at Venice since November, but shall proceed to Rome shortly. For my deers here, are they not written in parings? I mention Thomas Moore? to him I refer you: he has received them all, and not answered one.

* * * Will you remember me to Lord and Lady Holly? I shall not. I am a book whisperer. I have not yet received, but expect to repurpose with great pleasure on my return, viz., the second edition of Lopez de Vega. I have heard of Moore's forthcoming poem: he cannot wish himself more success than wish and sugar for him. I have also heard great things of 'Tales of my Landlord,' but I have not yet received them; by all accounts they beat even Waverly, &c., and are by the same author. Maturin's second tragedy has, it seems, failed, for which I should think any body would be sorry. My health was very victorious till within the last month, when I had a fever. There is a typhus in these parts, but I don't think it was that. However, I got well without a physician or drugs.

* * * I forgot to tell you that last autumn, I furnished Lewis with 'bread and salt' for some days at Maynooth (besides his conversation) he translated 'Goethe's Faust' to me by word of mouth, and I set him by the ears with Madame de Stael about the slave trade. I am indebted to many, and I will express it to Mr. Leo, of Copet, and I now love her as much as I always did her works, of which I was and am a great admirer. When are you to begin with Sheridan? what are you doing, and how do you do? * * * Ever very truly, &c.*

LETTER CCCCX.

TO MR. MURRAY.

* * * Venice, April 8, 1817.

Your letters of the 18th and 20th are arrived. In my own I have given you the rise, progress, decline, and fall of my recent malady. It is gone to the devil; I won't pay so bad a compliment as to say it came from him—he is too much of a gentleman. It was nothing but a slow fever, which quickened its pace towards the end of its journey. I had been bored with it some weeks—with nocturnal ferment and morning perspirations; but I am quite well again, which I attribute to having had neither medicine nor doctor therefor.

In a few days I set off for Rome: such is my purpose, or I manage it very well before Monday next, but do you continue to direct and address to Venice, as heretofore. If I go, letters will be forwarded: I say 'If,' because I never know what I shall do till it is done; and as I mean most firmly to set out for Rome, it is not unlikely I may find myself at St. Petersburg.

You tell me to 'take care of myself,' faith, and I will. I won't be posthumous yet, if I can help it. Nowwithstanding, only think what a 'Life and Adventures,' while I am in full scandal, would be worth, together with the rememba of my writing desk, the sixteen beginnings of poems never to be finished! Do you think I would not have shot myself last year, had I not luckily recollected that Mrs. Chalmont, and Lady Nocl, and all the old women in England would have been delighted—besides the 'Globe' 'Lyceum,' the 'Crown's Quest,' and the regrets of two or three or half a dozen? * * * * I assure that I would have for two reasons, or more;—there are one or two people whom I wish to put out of the world, and as many into it, before I can depart in peace; or, if I do so before, I have not fulfilled my mission. Besides, when I turn thirty, I will turn devout; I feel a great vocation that way in Catholic churches, and when I hear the organ.

* * * So * * is writing again! Is there no bedan in Scotland? nor thumb-screw? nor gag? nor handcuff? I went to him to kiss him almost some years ago, to prevent him from publishing a political pamphlet, which would have given him a livelier idea of 'Habas Corpus' than the world would have derived from a book wherein I have not yet received, but expect to repurpose with great pleasure on my return, viz., the second edition of Lopez de Vega. I have heard of Moore's forthcoming poem: he cannot wish himself more success than wish and sugar for him. I have also heard great things of 'Tales of my Landlord,' but I have not yet received them; by all accounts they beat even Waverly, &c., and are by the same author. Maturin's second tragedy has, it seems, failed, for which I should think any body would be sorry. My health was very victorious till within the last month, when I had a fever. There is a typhus in these parts, but I don't think it was that. However, I got well without a physician or drugs.

* * * I forgot to tell you that last autumn, I furnished Lewis with 'bread and salt' for some days at Maynooth (besides his conversation) he translated 'Goethe's Faust' to me by word of mouth, and I set him by the ears with Madame de Stael about the slave trade. I am indebted to many, and I will express it to Mr. Leo, of Copet, and I now love her as much as I always did her works, of which I was and am a great admirer. When are you to begin with Sheridan? what are you doing, and how do you do? * * * Ever very truly, &c.*

LETTER CCCCXX.

TO MR. MOORE.

* * * Venice, April 11, 1817.

I shall continue to write to you while the fit on me, by way of romance upon you, or former complaints of long silence. I dare say you would blush, if you could, for not answering. Next week I set out for Rome. Having seen Constantinople, I should like to look at t'other follow. Besides I want to see the Pope, and shall take care to tell him that I vote for the Catholics and no Veto.

* * * I shan't go to Rome. It is but the second best sea-view, and I have seen the first as a third LETTERS.

63.

CONSTANTINO's and Lisbon, (by-Gee-way, the last is but a review; however, they reckon it after Stamboul and Naples, and before Genoa,) and Venice, and of the goodness to the Duke of St. Julians. I shall e'en return to Venice in July; and if you write, I pray you adores to Venice which is my head, or rather my heart-quarters.

"My late physician, Dr. Polidori, is here, on his way to Exeter, where the present Lord Guilford and the widow of the late earl. Doctor Polidori has, just now, more patients, because his patients are no more. He had lately three, who are now dreading "to be afflicted by the present Lord Guilford."

Thomps Hose's are 'inter'd at Fisa and Rome. Lord Guilford died of an inflammation of the bowels; so they took them out, and sent them (on account of their discrepancies), separately from the sarcas, to England. Conceive a man going one way, and his intestines another, and his immortality a third!—was there ever such a distribution? One certainly has a soul; but how it came to allow itself to be enclosed in a body is more than I can imagine. I only know if once mine gets out, I will have a bit of a tussle before I let it get in again to that or any other.

"Rogers, a most learned man, has just been at the library, where he has united Titian's poems—immortal already. You and I must wait for it."

"I hear nothing—know nothing. You may easily suppose that the English don't reck me, and I avoid them. To be sure, there are but a few or none here, save passengers. Florence and Naples are their Margate and Ramage, and much the same sort of company too, by all accounts, which has been, perhaps, a disappointment.

"I want to hear of Lalla Rookh—are you out? Death and diseases! why don't you tell me where you are, what you are, and how you are? I shall go to Bologna by Ferrara, instead of Mantua; because I would rather see the cell where they caged Tasso, and where he became mad and , (than his own MSS. at Modena, or the Mantuan birthplace of that harmonious plagiary and miserable fatterer, whose cursed hands were privileged into me at Harrow) I saw Verona and Vicenza on my way here—Padua too."

"I go alone—but alone, because I mean to return here—I only want to see garment and a bit of old curiosity about Florence, though I must see it for the sake of the Venus, &c., &c.; and I wish also to see the Fall of Terni. I think to return to Venice by Ravenna and Rimini of both of which I mean to take notes for Leigh Hunt, who will be glad to hear of the scenery of his Poem. There was a devil of a review of him in the Quarterly, a year ago, which he answered. All answers are impudent; but, to be sure, poetical flesh and blood must have the last word—that's certain. I thought and think, very highly of his Poem; but I warned him of the row his favorite antique phraseology would bring him.

"You have taken a house at Hornsey; I had much rather you had taken one in the Apenines. If you think of coming out for a summer or so, tell me, that I may be upon the hover for you."

"Ever, &c."
BYRON'S WORKS.

LETTER CCCCXXII.

TO MR. MURRAY.

"Venice, April 14, 1817.

"The present proofs * (of the whole) begins only at the 17th page; but as I had corrected and sent back the first act, it does not signify.

"The thing I am certainly afraid of—and, like the Archbishop of Grenada's homily, (which savored of the pulpy,) has the dregs of my fever, during which it was written. It must on no account be published in its present state. I will try and rewrite it altogether; but the impulse is gone, and I have no chance of making any thing out of it. I would not have it published as it is on any account. The speech of Manfred to the sun is the only part of this act I thought good myself; the rest is as bad as bad can be, and I wonder what the devil possessed me.

"I am very glad indeed that you sent me Mr. Gifford's opinion without deduction. Do you suppose me such a booby as not to be very much obliged to him? or that in fact I was not, and am not, convinced and convicted in my conscience of this same overt act of nonsense? * * * * * * * * *

"I shall try it at last; in the mean time lay it upon the shelf, (the whole drama, I mean;) but pray correct your copies of the first and second act from the original MS.

"I am not coming to England; but going to Rome in a few days. I return to Venice in June; so, pray, address all letters, &c., to me here, as usual, that is, to Venice. Dr. Pulidori this day left this city with Lord Guilford for England. He is charged with some books to your care (from me), and two miniatures also to the same address, both for my sister.

"Recollect not to publish, upon pain of I know not what, until I have tried again at the third act. I am not sure that I shall try, and still less that I shall succeed if I do; but I am very sure, that (as it is) it is unfit for publication or perusal; and unless I can make it out to my own satisfaction, I won't have any part published.

"I write in haste, and after having lately written very often.

Yours, &c."

LETTER CCCCXXXIII.

TO MR. MURRAY.

"Palermo, April 26, 1817.

"I wrote to you the other day from Florence, enclosing a MS. entitled 'The Lament of Tasso.' It was written in consequence of my having been lately at Ferrara. In the last section of this MS. but one (that is, the penultimate), I think that I have omitted a line in the copy sent you from Florence, viz., after the line—

And woo comprision to a blighted name, insert,

Beating the sentence which my foes proclaim.

The context will show you the sense, which is not clear in this quotation. Remember, I write this in the supposition that you have received my Florence packet.

"At Florence I remained but a day, having a hurry for Rome, to which I am thus far advanced. However, I went to the two galleries, from which one returns drunk with beauty. The Venus is more for admiration than love: but there are sculpture and painting, which for the first time at all gave me an idea of what people mean by their cast and what Mr. Braham calls 'enthusiasm' (i.e. enthusiasm,) about those two most artificial of the arts. What struck me most were, the mistress of Raphael, a portrait; the mistress of Titian, a portrait; a Venus of Titian in the Medici gallery—the Venus; Canova's Venus also, in the other gallery; Titian's mistress is also in the other gallery (that is, in the Pitti Palace gallery;) the Farcce of Michael Angelo, a picture; and the Antinoo, the Alexander, and one or two not very decent groups in marble; the Genius of Death, a sleeping figure, &c., &c.

"I also went to the Medici Chapel—the fine frippery, in great slabs of various expensive stones, to commemorate fifty rotten and forgotten carcasses. It is unfinished and will remain so.

"The tomb of Croce contains much illustrious nothing. The tombs of Machiaveli, Michael Angelo, Galileo Galilei, &c., Alfieri, make it the Westminster Abbey of Italy. I did not admire any of these tombs—beyond their contents. That of Alfieri is heavy, and all of them seem to me overloaded. What is necessary but a bust and a name? and perhaps a date? the last for the uncharologial, of whom I am one. But all your acumen and eulogy is infernal, and worse than the long wigs of English mumskulls upon Roman bodies in the statue of the reign of Charles II, William, and Anna.

"When you write, write to Venice, as usual; it is mean to return there in a fortnight. I shall not be in England for a long time. This afternoon I met Lord and Lady Jersey, and saw them for some time: all well; children grown and healthy; she very pretty, but sunburnt; he very sick of travelling; bound for Paris. There are not many English on the move, and those who are, mostly homewards. I shall not return till business makes me, being much better where I am in health, &c., &c.

"For the sake of my personal comfort, I pray you send me immediately to Venice—mind, Venice—viz., Waite's tooth-powder, red, a quantity; calcined magnesia, of the best quality, a quantity; and all this by safe, sure, and speedy means; and, by the Lord I do it.

"I have done nothing at Manfred's third act. You must wait; I'll have at it in a week or two, or so.

"Yours ever, &c."

LETTER CCCCXXXIV.

TO MR. MURRAY.

"Rome, May 5, 1817.

"By this post (or next at farthest) I send you in two other covers, the new third act of 'Manfred.' I have re-written the greater part, and returned what is not altered in the proof you sent me. The Aabot is become a good man, and the Spirits are brought in at the death. You will find, I think, some good poetry in this new act, here and there; and if so, print it, without sending me farther proofs, under Mr. Gifford's correction, if he will have the goodness to overlock it. Address all answers to Venice, as usual; I mean to return there in ten days.

"The Lament of Tasso,' which I sent from Florence, has, I trust, arrived: I look upon it as these be good rhymes," as Pope's papa said to him when he was a boy. For the two—it and the Drama—you will disburse to me (viz. Kinnaird) six hundred guineas. You will perhaps be surprised that I set the same price upon this as upon the drama; but, besides that I look upon it as good, I won't take less than three hundred guineas for anything. The two together will make you a larger publication than the 'Sage,' &c. So you may think yourself let off very easy: that is to say, if these poems are good for anything, which I hope and believe.

"I have been some days in Rome the Wonderful I am seeing sights, and have done nothing else, ex kept the new third act for you. I have this morning seen a live post-card from Roman Catholic — Piz Vit has been burying Cardinal Bracchi, whose body I saw in state at the Chiesa Nuova. Rome has delighted me beyond every thing, since Athens and Constantinople. But I shall not remain long this visit. Address to Venice.

"Ever, &c.

"P. S. I have got my saddle-horses here, and have ridden, and am riding, all about the country."

LETTER CCCCCXV.

TO MR. MURRAY.

"Rome, May 9, 1817.

"Address all answers to Venice; for there I shall return in fifteen days, God willing.

"I sent you from Florence 'The Lamont of Tasso,' and from Rome, the third act of Manfred, both of which I find duly arrived. The terms of these two are mentioned in my last, and will repeat in this: it is three hundred for each, or six hundred guineas for the two—that is, if you like, and they are good for any thing.

"The last one of the parcels is arrived. In the notes to Childe Harold there is a blunder of yours or mine: you talk of arrival at St. Gingo, and immediately after, add—'on the height is the chateau of Clarac.' This is bad work; Clarac is on the other side of the lake, and it is quite impossible that I should have so bungled. Look at the MS; and, at any rate, rectify.

"The 'Tales of my Landlord' I have read with great pleasure. Alas! it is only true. The juste De Noy really why my sister and aunt are so very positive in the very erroneous persuasion that they must have been written by me. If you knew me as well as they do, you would have fallen, perhaps, into the same mistake. Some day or other, I will explain to you why—when I have time; at present it does not much matter; but you must have this blunder of theirs very odd, and so did I, till I had read the book. Croker's letter to you is a very great compliment; I shall return it to you in my next.

"I perceive you are publishing a life of Rafael d'Urbino: it may perhaps interest you to hear that a set of German artists here allow their hair to grow, and trim it into his fashion thereby drinking the cummin of the disciples of the old philosopher; if they would cut their hair, convert it into brushes, and paint like him, it would be more 'german' to the matter.

"I'll tell you a story: the other day, a man here—an English—mistaking the statues of Charlemagne and Constantine, which are 'equestrian,' for those of Peter and Paul, asked another très-bas Paul of these same horsemen — to which the reply was—'I thought, sir, that St. Paul had never got on horseback since his accident!'

"I'll tell you another: Henry Fox, writing to some one from N. of the Lord Lansdowne, after an illness, adds—'and I am so changed, that my oldest creditors would hardly know me.'

"I am delighted with Rome—as I would be with a bandbox—that is, if it is a fine thing to see, finer than Greece; but I have not been here long enough to affect it as a residence, and I must go back to Lombardy, because I am wretched at being away from Marianna. I have been riding my saddle-horses every day, and to Albano; I have visited to the top of the Alban Mount, and to Frescati, Ariccia, &c., &c., with an &c, &c, &c, about the city, and in the city: for all of which—vide guide-book. As a whole, pleasant, and modelly, but works (grown) Constantinople, every thing—at least that I have ever seen. But I can't describe, because my first impressions are always strong and confused, and my memory selects and reduces them to order, like distance in the landscape, and blends them better, although they may be less distinct. There must be sense or two more than we have, us mortals; for * * * * where there is much to be grasped we are always at a loss, and yet feel that we ought to have a higher and more extended comprehension.

"I have had a letter from Moore, who is in some alarm about his poem. I don't see I have had another from my poor dear Augusta, who is in a sad fuss about my late illness; do pray, tell her, (the truth,) that I am better than ever, and in imported health, growing (if not grown) large and ruddy, and very much congratulated by impertinent per sons on my robustous appearance, when I ought to be pale and interesting.

"You tell me that George Byron has got a son, and Augusta says, a daughter; which is it? It is no great matter: the father is a good man, an excellent officer, and has married a very nice little woman, who will bring him more babies than incomes however, she has a handsome dowry, and is a very charming girl—but he may as well get a ship.

"I have no thoughts of coming among you yet awhile, so that I can fight off business. If I could but make a tolerable sale of Newstead, there would be no occasion for my return; and I can assure you very sincerely, that I am much happier (or, at least, have been so), out of your island than in it.

"Yours ever.

"P. S. There are few English here, but several of my acquaintance: among others, the Marquis of Lansdowne, with whom I dine to-morrow. I met the Jerseys on the road at Foligno—all well.

"Oh—l'I forgot—the Italians have printed Chil de, &c, a 'privy'—a pretty little poem, prettier than yours—and published, as I found to my great astonishment on arriving here; and what is odd, is, that the English is quite correctly printed. Why they did it, or who did it, I know not; but so it is:

"I suppose, for the English people. I will send you a copy."

LETTER CCCCCXVI.

TO MR. MOORE.

"Rome, May 12, 1817.

"I have received your letter here, where I have taken a cruise lately; but I shall return back to Venice in a few days, so that if you write again, and address there, as usual, I am not for returning to England so soon as you imagine; and by no means at all as a residence. If you cross the Alps in your projected expedition, you will find me somewhere in Lombardy, and very glad to see you. Only give me a word or two beforehand, for I would really diverge some leagues to meet you.

"Of Rome I say nothing: it is quite indescribable, and the guide-book is as good as any other. I dined yesterday at the Lord Lansdowne, who is on his return. But there are few English here at present: the winter is their time. I have been on horseback most of the day, all days since my arrival, and have taken it as I did Constantinople. But Rome is the elder sister, and the finer. I went some days ago to the top of the Alban Mount, which is superb. As for the Colosseum, Pantheon, St. Peter's, the Vatican, Palestine, &c, &c, &c—as I said, vide guide-book. They are indefinitely good, and must be seen. The Apollo Belvidere is the image of Lady Adelaide Forbes—I think I never saw such a likeness.

"I have seen the Pope-alive, and a cardinal dead,—both of whom looked very well indeed. The latter was in state in the Chiesa Nuova, previous to his interment."
Your poetical alarms are groundless; go on and prosper. He is Hobhouse just come in, and my horses at the door, so that I must mount and take the field in the Campus Martius, which, by-the-way, is all built over by modern Rome.

"Yours very and ever, &c."

P. S. Hobhouse presents his remembrances, and is eager, with all the world, for your new poem."

LETTER CCCCXVII.

TO MR. MURRAY.

"Venice, May 30, 1817.

"I returned from Rome two days ago, and have received your letter; but no sign nor tidings of the parcel sent through Sir G. Stuart, which you mention. After an interval of months, a packet of 'Tales,' &c., found me at Rome; but this is all, and may be all that ever will find me. The post seems to be belaboured, and conveyance, and that only for letters. From Florence I sent you a poem on Tasso, and from Rome the new third act of 'Manfred,' and by Dr. Polidori two portraits for my sister. I left Rome and made a rapid journey home. You will continue to direct here, as usual. Yours, &c."

"The day before I left Rome, I saw three robbers guillotined. The ceremony—including the masked priests; the half-naked executioners; the bandaged criminals; the black Christ and his banner, the scaffold; the soldiery; the slow procession, and the quick rattle and heavy fall of the axe; the splash of the blood, and the ghastliness of the exposed heads—is altogether more impressive than the vulgar and ungentlemanly dirty 'new drop,' and dog-like agony of infliction upon the sufferers of the English sentence. Two of these men behaved calmly enough, but the first of the three died with great terror or reluctance. What was very horrible, he would not lie down; then his neck was too large for the aperture, and the priest was obliged to drown his exclamations by still louder exhortations. The head was off before the eye could trace the blow; but from an attempt to draw back the head, notwithstanding it was held forward by the hair, the first head was cut off close to the ears: the other two were taken off more cleanly. It is better than the oriental way, and I (should think) than the axe of our ancestors. The pain seems little, and yet the effect to the spectator, and the preparation to the criminal, is very striking and chilling. The first turned me quite hot and thirsty, and made me shake so that I could hardly hold the opera glass; (I was close enough to see, as one should see everything, once, with attention;) the second and third, (which shows how dreadfully soon things grow indifferent,) I am ashamed to say, had no effect on me as a horror, though I would have saved them if I could. Yours, &c."

"RomE, which I sent soon after my arrival there. My date will apprise you of my return home within these few days. For me, I have received none of your packets, except, after long delay, the 'Tales of my Landlord,' which I before acknowledged. I cannot quite understand the signification, but so it is;—no Manuel, no letters, no tooth-powder, no extract from Moore's Italy concerning Marino Faliero, for nothing—as a man haled out at one of Burdett's elections, after a long oration of 'No Bastille!—and every authority! No,—and my receipts of your packages amount to about his meaning. I want the extract from Moore's Italy very much, and the tooth-powder, and the magnesia; I don't care so much about the poetry, or the letters, or Mr. Maturin's by-Jesus tragedy. Most of the things sent by the post have come—I mean the packets and letters; therefore, send me Marino Faliero by the post, in a letter.

"I was delighted with Rome, and was on horseback all road it many hours daily, besides in the rest of my time, bothering over its marvels. I excused myself to the Countess, Tivoli, Frescari, Licenza, &c., &c.; besides I visited twice the Fall of Terni, which beats everything. On my way back, close to the temple by its banks, I got some trout of the prettiest little stream in all poetry, near the first post from Foligno and Spoleto.† I did not stay at Florence, being anxious to get home to Venice, and having already seen the galleries and other sights. I left my commissary letters the evening before I went; so I saw nobody.

"To-day, Pindemonte, the celebrated poet of Verona, called on me; he is a little, thin man, with acute and pleasing features; his air was good and gentle; his appearance altogether very philosophical; his age about sixty, or more. He is one of their best going. I gave him Forsyth, as he speaks, or reads rather, a little English, and will find there a favorable account of himself. He inquired after his old Cruscan friends, Parsons, Greaterhead, Mrs. Piozzi, and Mory, all of whom he had known in his youth. I gave him as bad an account of them as I could, answering, as the false Solomon Lob does to 'Totterton in the face, 'all gone dead,' and damned by a satire more than twenty years ago; that the name of their extingusher was not kept, that they were not allowed to write, nor to scribes after all, and no great things in any other way. He seemed, as was natural, very much pleased with this account of his old acquaintances, and went away greatly gratified with that and Mr. Forsyth's second edition, (I was obliged to put up with his own (Pindemonte's) favor. After having been a little libertine in his youth, he is grown devout, and takes prayers, and talks to himself, to keep off the devil; but for all that, he is a very nice little old gentleman."

"I am sorry to hear of your row with Hunt; but suppose him to be exasperated by the Quarterly and your paper to deal; and when one is angry and edits a paper, I should think the temptation too strong for literary nature, which is not always human. I can't conceive in what, and for what, it abuses you: what have you done? you are not an author, nor a politician, nor a public character; I know no scruple that you have tumbled into. I am the more sorry for this because I introduced you to Hunt, and because I believe him to be a good man; but till I know the particulars, I can give no opinion.

"Let me know about Lalla Rookh, which must be out by this time.

"I received no proofs, but the punctuation should be corrected. I feel too lazy to have it at myself; so beg and pray Mr. Gifford for me.—Address to † Childe Harold, canto iv., stanza 16., line 118., and note.

‡ Childe Harold, canto iv., stanza 16., line 63., and note.
VENICE. In a few days, I go to my villegiatura, in a casino near the Brenta, a few miles only on the main land. I have determined on another year, and many years of residence, if I can compass them. Marianna is with me, hardly recovered of the fever, which has been attaching all Italy this winter. I am afraid she is a little hectic; but I hope the best.

"Ever, &c."

"P. S. Thowalden has done a bust of me at Rome for Mr. Hobhouse, which is reckoned very good. He is, I believe, better after Canova, and by some preferred to him."

"I have had a letter from Mr. Hodges. He is very happy, has got a living, but not a child: if he had stuck to a curacy, babes would have come of course, because he could not have maintained them."

"Remember me to all friends, &c., &c."

"An Austrian officer, the other day, being in love with a Venetian, was ordered, with his regiment, into Hungary. Distracted between love and duty, he purchased a deadly drug, which, dividing with his mistress, both swallowed. The ensuing pains were terrific, but the pills were purgative, and not poisonous, but the privation of contact, to say the least, a sensational apothecary; so that so much suicide was all thrown away. You may conceive the previous confusion and the final laugh; but the intention was good on all sides."

LETTER CCXXXIX.

TO MR. MURRAY.

"Venice, June 8, 1817

"The present letter will be delivered by you, my dear sir, to my friend, Mr. Hodges, at Marona. They will also convey some copies of the grammars, which I think you agree to take. If you can be of any use to them, either among your naval or East Indian acquaintances, I hope you will so far oblige me, as they and their order have been remarkably attentive and friendly towards me since my arrival at Venice. Their names are Father Sukiras, Syrian, and Father Sarkis, Theodosian. They were, I am assured, of Greek, and probably French, or a little English. Repeating earnestly my recommendatory request, believe me very truly yours,

"BYRON"

"Perhaps you can help them to their passage, or give or get them letters for India."

LETTER CCXL.

TO MR. MURRAY.

"La Mira, near Venice, June 14, 1817.

"I write to you from the banks of the Brenta, a few miles from Venice, where I have colonized for six months to come, as at Venice."

"Three months after date, (17th March.),—like the unnoted bill despondingly received by the reluctant tailor,—your despatch has arrived, containing the extract from Moore's Italy, and Mr. Maturin's bankrupt tragedy. It is the absurd work of a clever man. I think it might have done upon the stage if he had made Manuel (by some trickery, in a mask or visor), fight his own battle instead of employing Molineux as his champion; and, after the defeat of Torrismond, have made him spare the son of his enemy, by some revulsion of feeling, not incompatible with a character of extravagant and disturbed emotions, that with the Justiza, and the ridiculous conduct of the whole dran. pêra (for they are all as mad as Manuel, who surely must have had more interest with a corrupt bench than a distant relation and heir presumptive, somewhat suspected of homicide,) I do not wonder at its failure. As it plays, it is impracticable; as a poem, no great things. Who was the 'Greek that grappled with glory naked' the Olympian wrestlers? or Alexander the Great, when he ran stark naked round the tomb of 'other fellow' or the Spartan who was fined by the Ephori for fighting with his own sword? And as to 'flying off life like a garment,' helas! that's in Tom Thumb—""King Arthur's soliloquy:

"'Life's a mere rag, not worth a prince's wearing; I'll cast it off.'"

"And the stage-directions — 'Staggers among the bodies;' the siren are too numerous, as also the blacksmoor knights-penitent being one too many: and De Zoles is such a shabby Mommouth-street villain, without any redeeming quality—Stap my vitals! Maturin seems to be declining into Nat. Lee. But let him try again; he has talent, but not much sense. I shall not try, or hope, that Sotbeby after all is to realize Excalibur. As for to Mr. Shiel be really worthy his success. The more I see of the stage, the less I would wish to have any thing to do with it; as a proof of which, I hope you have received by the third act of the play, which will at least prove that I wish to steer very clear of the possibility of being put into scenery. I sent it from Rome."

"I returned the proof of Tasso. By-the-way have you never received a translation of St. Paul, which I sent you, not for publication, before I went to Rome?"

"I am at present on the Brenta. Opposite is a Spanish mansion, ninety years old; next to it is a Frenchman's,—besides the natives; so that, as somebody said the other day, we are exactly one of Goldoni's comedies, (La Vedova Scaltra,) where a Spaniard, English, and Frenchman are introduced: but we are all very good neighbors, Venetians, &c., &c.

"I am just getting on horseback for my evening ride, and a visit to a physician, who has an agreeable family, of a wife and four unmarried daughters, all under eighteen, who are friends of Signora S * &c., and enemies to nobody. There are, and are to be, besides, conversations and I know not what, at a Countess Labro, I know not whom. The weather is mild; the thermometer 10° in the sun this day, and 80 odd in the shade."

"Yours, &c.,

LETTER CCXLI.

TO Mr. MURRAY.

"La Mira, near Venice, June 11, 1817.

"It gives me great pleasure to hear of Moore's success, and to more so than that, I hope he is as happy in his family relations as I wish him to be; for I know no one who deserves both more— if any so much.

"Now to business; ••••• I say unto you, verily, it is not so; or, as the forefather said to the hater, after asking him to bring a glass of water, to which the man answered, 'I will, sir,'—'You will!—G—d d—n,—I say you must!' And I will submit this to the decision of any person or persons to be appointed by both of us, on a fair examination of the circumstances of this compared with the preceding publications. So, there's for you. There is always some row or other previously to all our publications: it should seem that, on approximating, we can never quite get over the natural antipathy of author and book-seller, and that more particularly the serene nature of the latter must break forth.

"You are out about the third canto: I have not done, nor designed a line of continuation to that poem. I was too short a time at Rome for it, and have no thought of recommencing."

"I cannot well explain to you by letter what I conceive to be the origin of Leigh's notion about 'Tales of My Landlord;' but it is some points of the characters of Sir E. Manley and Burley, as well as one or two of the jocular portions, on which it is founded, probably."

"If you have received Dr. Polidori, as well as a parcel of books, and you can be of use to him, be so. I never was much disgusted with any human production than with the eternal nonsense, and truacies, and emptiness, and ill humor, and vanity of that young person; but he has some talent, and is a man of honor, and has dispositions of amendment, in which he has been aided by a little subsequent experience, and may turn out well. Therefore use your government interest for him, for he is improved and improvable."

"Yours, &c."

LETTER CCCXLII.

TO MR. MURRAY.

June 16, near Venice, June 15, 1817.

Enclosed is a letter to Dr. Holland from Pindone. Not knowing the doctor's address, I am desired to inquire, and perhaps, being a literary man, you will know or discover his haunt near some populous churchyard. I have written to you a scolding letter, I believe, upon a misapprehended casus in your letter—but never mind: it will do for next time, and you will surely deserve it. Talking of doctors reminds me once more to recommend to you one who will not recommend himself—the Doctor Polidori. If you can help him to a publisher, do; or, if you have any sick relation, I would advise his advice: all the patients he had in Italy are dead—Mr. *'s son, Mr. Horner, and Lord Guildford, whom he embalmed with great success at Pisa."

"Remember me to Moore, whom I congratulate. How is Rogers? and what is become of Campbell and all other fellows of the Druid order? I got Maturin's Jedda at last, but no other parcel; I am in fits for the tooth-powder, and the magnesia. I want some of Burkitt's Soda powers. Will you tell Mr. Kinnaird that I have written him two letters on pressmg business, (about Newstead, &c.,) to which I humbly solicit his attendance. I am just returned from a gallop along the banks of the Brenta—time sunset."

"B."

LETTER CCCXLIII.

TO MR. MURRAY.

June 1, near Venice, July 1, 1817.

"Since my former letter, I have been working up my impressions into a fourth canto of Childre Har- rold, of which I have roughened off about rather better than thirty stanzas, and mean to go on; and probably to make this 'Pity' the concluding one of the poem, so that you may propose against the autumn to draw out the conception for 1818. You must provide moneys, as this new resumption boxes you certain disbursements. Somewhere about the end of September or October I propose to be under way, (i.e. in the press;) but I have no idea yet of the probable length or calibre of the other canto, or what it will be good for; but I mean to be as mercenary as possible, an example (I do mean of any individual in particular, and least of all any person or persons of our mutual acquaintance,) which I should have followed in your youth, and I might still have been a prosperous gentleman."

"No tooth-powder, no letters, no recent tidings of you."

"Mr. Lewis is at Venice, and I am going up to stay a week with him there—as it is one of his enthusiasms also to like the city."

"I stood in Venice on the 'Bridge of Sighs,' &c., &c."

The 'Bridge of Sighs' (i.e. Ponte del Sospiri,) is that which divides, or rather joins, the palace of the Doge to the prison of the state. It has two passages; the criminal went by the one to judgment, and returned by the other to death, being strangled in a chamber adjoining, where there was a mechanical process for the purpose.

"This is the first stanza of our new canto; and now for a line of the second:

"In Venice, Tasso's executors are no more, And in the gorgeous gondolier,
Her palace, &c., &c."

"You know that formerly the gondoliers sung always, and Tasso's Gierusalemme was their ballad. Venice is built on seventy-two islands. "There! there's a brick of your new Babel! and now, sirrah! what say you to the sample?"

"Yours, &c."

"P. S. I shall write again by-and-by."

LETTER CCCXLIV.

TO MR. MURRAY.

La Mira, near Venice, July 8, 1817.

If you can convey the enclosed letter to its address, or discover the person to whom it is directed, you will confer a favor upon the Venetian creditor of a deceased Englishman. This epistle is a sum to his executor, for house-rent. The name of the insolvent defunct is, or was, Porter Valter, according to the account of the plaintiff, which I rather suspect ought to be Walter Porter, according to our modern pronunciation. If you are acquainted with any dead man of the like name a good deal in debt, pray dig him up, and tell him that 'a pound of his fair flesh' or the ducats are required, and that if you deny them, lie upon your law!"

"I hear nothing more from you about Moore's poem, Rogers, or other literary phenomena; but tomorrow being post-day, will bring perhaps some tidings. I write to you with people talking Venetian all about, so that you must not expect this letter to be all English.

"The other day, I had a squabble on the highway, as follows: I was riding pretty quickly from Dolo home about eight in the evening, when I passed a party of people in a hired carriage, one of whom, pok[ing his] head out of the window, began bawling to me in an inarticulate but insolent manner. I wheeled my horse round, and overtaking, stopped the coach, and said, 'Signor, have you any commands for me?' He replied, impudently as to manner, 'No.' I then asked him what he meant by that unseemly noise, to the discomfiture of the passengers by. He replied by some piece of impertinence, to which I answered by giving him a violent slap in the face. I then dismounted, (for this passed at the window, I being on horseback still,) and opening the carriage, desired him to walk out, or I would give him another. But the first had settled him except as to words, of which he poured forth as a profusion in blasphemies, swearing that he would to the police and avouched a battery sans provocatión. I said he lied, and was a * *, and if he did not hold his tongue, should be dragged out and beaten anew. He then held his tongue. * I of course told him my name and residence, and defied him to the death, if he were a gentleman, or not a gentleman, and had the inclination to be gêntel in the way of combat. He went to the police, but there having been bystanders in the road,— particularly a soldier who had seen the business,— as well as my servant, notwithstanding the oaths of the coachman and five insides besides the plaintiff, and a good deal of paying on all sides, his complaint was dismissed, he having been the aggressor; and I was subsequently informed that, had I not given him a blow, he might have been had into durance.

"So set down this,— that in Aleppo once I 'beat a Venetian;' but I assure you that he deserved it, for I am a quiet man, like Candide, though with somewhat of his fortune in being forced to forego my natural meekness every now and then.

"Yours, &c.

LETTER CCCXLV.
To MR. MURRAY.

"Venice, July 5, 1817.

"I have got the sketch and extracts from Lalla Rookh,— which I humbly suspect will knock up * *, and show young gentlemen that something more than having been across a camel's hump is necessary to write a good oriental tale. The plan, as well as the extracts I have seen, please me very much indeed, and I feel impatient for the whole.

"With regard to the critique on 'Manfred,' you have been in such a devil of a hurry that you have only sent me the half: it breaks off at page 294. Send me the rest; and also page 270, where there is an account of the supposed origin of this dreadful story,—in which, by the way, whatever it may be, the conjecturer is out, and knows nothing of the matter. I had a better origin than he can devise or divine, for the soul of him.

"You say nothing of 'Manfred's luck in the world; and I care not. He is one of the best of my misbegotten, say what they will.

"I got at last an extract, but no parcels. They will come, I suppose, some time or other. I am come up to Venice for a day or two to bathe, and am just going to take a swim in the Adriatic; so, good evening—the post waits. "Yours, &c.
"B.

"P.S. Pray was Manfred's speech to the sun still retained in act third? I hope so: it is one of the best in the thing and better than the Colosseum. I have done fifty-six of canto fourth, Childe Harold; so down with your dues.

LETTER CCCXLVI.
To MR. MOORE.

"La Mina, Venice, July 10, 1817.

"Murray, the Mokanna of booksellers, has contrived to send me extracts from Lalla Rookh by the post. They are taken from some magazine, and contain a short outline and quotations from the first two poems. I am very much delighted with what is before me, and very thirsty for the rest. You have caught the colors as if you had been in the rainbow, and the tone of the East is perfectly preserved; so that * * * and its author must be some what in the back-ground, and learn that it requires something more than to have been upon the hands of a dramatery to compose a good oriental story. I am glad you have changed the title from 'Persian Tale.'

"I suspect you have written a devilish fine composition, and I rejoice in it from my heart; because the Douglas and the Percy both together are con fident against a world in arms. * I hope you won't be affronted at my, looking on us as 'birds of a feather;' though on whatever subject youa a writ ten, I should have been very happy in your success of it.

"There is a simile of an orange tree's 'flowers and fruits,' which I should have liked better, if I did not believe it to be a reflection on

"Do you remember Thunlow's poem to Sans.* When Rogers, and that d—d supper of Hanchiffe's, that ought to have been a dinner? 'Ah, Master Shallow, we have heard the chimes at midnight.' But

"This should have been written fifteen moons ago—the first stanza was. I am just come out from an hour's swim in the Adriatic; and I write to you with a black-eyed Venetian girl before me, reading Boccaccio.

"Last week I had a row on the road (I came up to Venice from my campo, a few miles off the Pordun road, this blessed day to bathe) with a fellow in a carriage, who was impudent to my horse. I gave him a swinging box on the ear, which sent him to the police, who dismissed his complaint, and said, that if he did not thumped him, they would have trounced him for being impertinent. Wits hes had seen the transaction. He first shouted in an unseemly way, to frighten my palfrey. I wheeled round, rode up to the window, and asked him what he meant. He grinned, and said some theory which produced him an immediate slap in the face to his utter discomfiture. Much blasphemy ensued, and some menace, which I stopped by dismounting and opening the carriage-door, and intimating an intention of mending the road with his immediate remains, if he did not hold his tongue. He held it.

"The fellow went sneakingly to the police: but a soldier, who had seen the matter, and thought me right, went and counter-oathed him; so that he had to retire—and cheap too:— I wish I had hit him harder.

"Monk Lewis is here—how pleasant! He is a very good fellow, and very much yours. So is Sam—so is everybody—and among the number.

"Yours ever, "B.

"P.S. What think you of Manfred?
"If ever you see * * * ask him what he means by telling me, 'Oh, my friend, invent portum?'—What 'portum?' Port wine, I suppose—the only port he ever sought or found, since I knew him.'

LETTER CCCXLVII.
To MR. MURRAY.

"La Mina, near Venice, July 13, 1817.

"I have finished (that is, written—the file comes afterward) ninety and eight stanzas of the fourth canto, which I mean to be the concluding one, It will probably be about the same length as the third, being already of the dimensions of the first or second cantos. I look upon parts of it as very good, that is, if the three former are good, but this we shall see; and at any rate, good or not, it is rather a different style from the last—less meta-physic, and at any rate, will be a variety. I sent you the shaft of the column as a specimen the other day, i.e. the first stanza. So you may be thinking of its arrival towards autumn, whose winds will not be the only ones to be raised; if so be as how that it is ready by that time.

"I lent Lewis, who is at Venice (in or on the Canalcecco, the Grand Canal), your extracts from Lalla Rookh and Manuel, and, of course, like the last, and is not much taken with the first, of these performances. Of Manuel
I think, with the exception of a few capers, it is as heavy a nightmare as was ever bestowed by indu-gence.
"Of the extracts I can but judge as extracts, and I prefer the 'Peri' to the 'Silver Veil.' He seems not so much at home in his versification of the 'Silver Veil,' and a little embarrassed with his horrors; but the conception of the character of the impostor is fine, and the plan of great scope for his genius, and I doubt not that, as a whole, it will be very Arabesque and lusty enough.
"Your late epistle is not the most abundant in information, and has not yet been succeeded by any other; so that I know nothing of your own concerns or of any concerns, and as I never hear from anybody but yourself who does not tell me something as disagreeable as possible, I should not be sorry to hear from you: and as it is not very probable,—if I can, by any device or possible arrangement with regard to my personal affairs, so arrange it,—that I shall return soon, or reside ever in England, all that you tell me will be all I shall know or inquire after, as our beloved realm of Grub street, and the black bureten and blue sisterhood of that extensive suburb of Babylon. Have you had any new babie of literature sprung up to replace the dead, the distast, the tired, and the retired? no prose, no verse, no nothing!"

 LETTER CXCXLIX.

TO MR. MURRAY.

"Venice, July 28, 1817.

I write to give you notice that I have completed the fourth and ultimate canto of Childo Harold. It consists of one hundred and twenty-six stanzas, and is consequently the longest of the four. It is yet to be copied and polished; and the notes are to come, of which it will require more than the third canto, as it necessarily treats more of works of art than of nature. It shall be sent towards autumn;
and now for our barter. What do you bid? eh?
you shall have samples, an' it so please you: but I wish to know what I am to expect (as the saying is) half its value. If you are disposed to do what Mrs.
Winifred Jenkins calls 'the handsomely,' I may perhaps throw you some odd matters to the lot,— translations, or slight originals; there is no saying what may come between this and the book-season. Recollect that it is the last canto, and completes the work; whether as good as the others,
I cannot judge, in course—least of all as yet, but it shall be the best as I can help. I may perhaps, give some little gossip on the notes as to the present state of Italian litterati and literature, being acquainted with some of their capi—men as well as books; and that depends upon your humor at the time. So, now, pronounce: I say nothing.
"When you have got the whole four cantos, I think you might venture on an edition of the whole poem in quarto, with spare copies of the last two for the purchasers of the old edition of the first two.
LETTER CCCL.
TO MR. MURRAY.

"La Mina, near Venice, Aug. 21, 1817.

I take you at your word about Mr. Hansan, and will feel obliged if you will go to him, and request Mr. Davies also to visit him by my desire, and repeat that I trust that neither Mr. Kinnaird’s absence nor mine will prevent his taking all proper steps to accelerate and promote the sale of Newstead and Rochdale, upon which the whole of my future personal comfort depends. It is impossible for me to express how much any delays upon these points would inconvenience me; and I do not know a greater obligation that can be conferred upon me than the pressing these things upon Hansan, and making him act according to my wishes. I wish you would speak out, at least to me, and tell me what you allude to by your cold way of mentioning him. All my mysteries at such a distance are not merely tormenting but mischievous, and may be prejudicial to my interests; so pray expound, that I may consult with Mr. Kinnaird when he arrives; and remember that I prefer the most disagreeable certainties to hints and innuendos. The devil take every body; I never can get any person to be explicit about any thing or any body, and my whole life is passed in conjectures of what people mean; you will talk with the style of Caroline Lamb’s novels.

"It is not Mr. St. John, but Mr. St. Aubyn, son of Sir John St. Aubyn. Polidoro knows him, and introduced him to me. I have not seen him, and do not yet got my parcel. The doctor will ferret him out, or ought. The parcel contains many letters, some of

"Dear Doctor, I have read your play,
Which is a good one in its way;
Furges the eyes, and moves the bowels,
And drenches Handel’s ink toivts
With tears, that, in a flood of gore,
Afford hystorical relief
To shatter’d nerves and quaken’d pulses,
Which your catastrophe convives.
I like your moral and machinery:

LETTER CCCLII.
TO MR. MURRAY.

"Your letter of the 15th has conveyed with its contents the impression of a seal, to which the 'Saracen's Head' is a seraph, and the 'Bull and Mouth' a delicate device. I knew that calumny had assailed me for many years, but not that it had given me the features as well as complexion of a negro. Poor August is not less, but rather more, shocked than myself, and says 'people seem to have recollection strangely,' whether they engraved such a 'black Moor.' Pray don't tease (at least to me) with such a caricature of the human muskull altogether; and if you don't break the seal-cutter's head, at least crack his libel (or likeness, if it should be a likeness) of mine.

"Mr. Kinnaird is not yet arrived, but expected. He has lost by the way all the tooth-powder, as a letter from Spa informs me.

"By Mr. Rose I received safely, though tardily, magnesia and tooth-powder, and * * * * * * Why do you send me such trash—worse than trash, the Sublime of Mediocrity? Thanks for Lalli, however, which is good, and thanks for the Edinburgh and Quarterly, both very amusing and well-written. Paris in 1816, &c.—good. 'Modern Greece'—good for nothing; written by some one who has never been there, and not being able to manage the Spenser stanza, has invented a thing of its own, consisting of two elegiac stanzas, a heroic line, and an Alexandrine, twisted on a string. Besides, why modern? You may say modern Greeks, but surely Greece itself is rather more ancient than ever it was—Now for business.

"You offer fifteen hundred guineas for the new canto: I won't take it. I ask two thousand five hundred guineas for it, which you will either give or not, as you think proper. It concludes the poem, and consists of one hundred and forty-four stanzas. The notes are numerous, and chiefly written by Mr. Houbourne, whose researches have been indefatigable, and who, I will venture to say, has more real knowledge of Rome and its environs than any Englishman who has been there since Gibbon. By-the-way, to prevent any mistakes, I think it necessary to state the fact that he, Mr. Houbourne, has not interest whatever in the price or profit to be derived from the copyright of either poem or notes directly or indirectly; so you are not to suppose that it is by, for, or through him, that I require more for this than the price of the poem. No: but if Mr. Eustace was to have had two thousand for a poem on Education; if Mr. Moore is to have three thousand for Lalli, &c.; if Mr. Campbell is to have three thousand for his prose on poetry—I don't mean to disparage these gentlemen in their labors—but I ask the aforesaid price for mine. You will tell me that their productions are considerably longer: very true, and when they shorten them, I will lengthen mine, and ask less. You shall submit the MS. to Mr. Gifford, and any other two gentlemen to be named by you, (Mr. Frere, or Mr. Croker, or whoever you please except such fellows as your * * * and * * * * *) and if they pronounce this canto to be inferior as a whole to the preceding, I will not appeal from their award, but burn the manuscript, and leave things as they are.

"You are very true."

"P. S. In answer to a former letter, I sent you a short statement of what I thought the state of our present copyright account, viz., six hundred pounds still (or lately) due on Childe Harold, and six hundred pounds on the Morte, making a total of twelve hundred and thirty pounds. If we agree about the new poem, I shall take the liberty to reserve the choice of the manner in which it should be published, viz., a quarto, certes." * * *

LETTER CCCLIII.
TO MR. HOFFNER.

"I set out yesterday morning with the intention of paying my respects, and availing myself of your permission to walk over the premises. On arriving at Padua, I found that the march of the Austrian troops had engaged so many horses, that those I could procure were hardly able to crawl: and their weakness, together with the prospect of finding none at all at the post-house of Morello, and consequently either not arriving that day at Este, or so late as to be unable to return home the same evening, induced me to turn aside in a second visit to Arqua, instead of proceeding onwards; and even thus I hardly got back in time.

"Next week I shall be obliged to be in Venice to meet Lord Kinnaird and his brother, who are expected in a few days. And this interruption, together with that occasioned by the continued march of the Austrians for the next few days, will not allow me to fix any precise period for availing myself of your kindness, though I should wish to take the earliest opportunity. Perhaps, if absent, you will have the goodness to permit one of your servants to show me the grounds and house, or as much of either as may be convenient; at any rate, I shall take the first occasion possible to go over, and regret very much that I was on yesterday prevented.

"I have the honor to be your obliged, &c"

LETTER CCCLIV.
TO MR. MURRAY.

"I enclose a sheet for correction, if ever you get to another edition. You will observe that the blunder in printing makes it appear as if the Chateau was over St. Gingko, instead of being on the opposite shore of the Lake, over Clares. So, separate the paragraphs, otherwise my topography will seem as inaccurate as your typography on this occasion.

"The other day I wrote to convey my proposition with regard to the fourth and concluding canto. I have gone over and extended it to one hundred and fifty stanzas, which is almost as long as the first two were originally, and longer by itself than any of the smaller poems except the 'Corsair.' Mr. Houbourne has made some very valuable and accurate notes, of considerable length, and you may be sure that I will do for the text all that I can to finish with decency. I look upon Childe Harold as my best; and as I began, I think of concluding with it. But I make no resolutions on that head, as I broke my former intention with regard to the 'Corsair.' However, I fear that I shall never be better; and yet, not being thirty years of age, for some moons to come, one ought to be progressive, as far as intellect goes, for many a good year. But I have had a devilish deal of tear and wear of mind and body in my time, besides having published too often and much already. God grant me some judgment to do what may be most fitting in that and every thing else, for I doubt my own exceedingly.

"I have seen Mr. Cobbett, I think it was, a few days ago. A very very diligent attention yet, for I ride about, and lounge, and ponder, and—two or three other things; so that my reading is very desultory, and not so attentive as it used to be. I am very glad to hear of its popularity, for Moore is a very noble fellow in all

"A country-house on the English hills, near East, which Mr. Hoffner was then the English consul-general at Venice, had for some time occupied, and which Lord Byron afterward rented. I am sure never read" respects, and will enjoy it without any of the bad feelings which success—good or evil—sometimes engenders in the men of rhyme. Of the poem itself, I will tell you my opinion when I have mastered it; I say of the poem, for I don't like the prose at all, at all: and in the meantime, the Fire-Worshippers is the best, and the Veiled Prophet the worst, of the volume.

With regard to poetry in general, I am convinced the more I think of it, that he and all of us love the Italian. I, — are all in the wrong, one as much as another; that we are upon a wrong revolutionary poetical system, or systems, not to say a damn in itself, and from which none but Rogers and Crabbe are free; and that the present and next generations will finally be of this opinion. I am the more confirmed in this by having lately gone over some of our classics, particularly Pope, whom I tried in this way: — I took Moore's poems and my own and some others, and went over them side by side with Pope's, and I was really astonished (I ought not to have been so) and mortified at the ineffable distance in point of sense, learning, effect, and even imagination, passion, and invention, between the little Queen Anne's man, and us of the lower empire. Depend upon it, it is all Horace then, and Claudian now among us; and if I do not mould myself accordingly. Crabbe's the man, but he has got a coarse and impracticable subject, and Rogers is retaken upon half-pay, and has done enough, unless he were to do as he did formerly.

LETTER CCCLV.

TO MR. MURRAY. Sept. 17, 1817.

"Mr. Hobhouse purposes being in England in November; he will bring the fourth canto with him, notes and all; the text contains one hundred and fifty stanzas, which is long for that measure.

"With regard to the Ariost of the North," surely their themes, chivalry, war, and love, were as like as can be; and as to the compliment, if you knew what the Italian thinks of Ariosto, you would not hesitate about that. But as to their measures, you forget that Ariosto's is an octave stanza, and Scott's anything but a stanza. If you think Scott will dislike it, say so, and I will expunge. I do not call him the Scotch Ariosto, which would be said provincial eulogy, but the Ariosto of the North, meaning of all countries that are not the South.

"As I have recently troubled you rather frequently, I will conclude, repeating that I am yours ever, &c."

LETTER CCCLVI.

TO MR. MURRAY. Oct. 12, 1817.

"Mr. Kinnaird and his brother, Lord Kinnaird, have been here, and are now gone again. All your missives came, except the tooth-powder, of which I require five boxes; the supplies, at all convenient opportunities; as also of magnesia and soda-powders, both great luxuries here, and neither to be had good, or indeed hardly at all, of the natives."

"In Coleridge's Life, I perceive an attack upon the then committee of D. L. Theatre for acting Bertram, and an attack upon Maturin's Bertram for being acted. Considering all things, this is not very grateful; so, in general, I think the autobiographer; and I would answer, if I had not obliged him: Putting my own pains to forward the views of Coleridge out of the question, I know that there was every disposition, on the part of the sub-committee, to bring forward any production of his if it was feasible. The play he offered, though poetical, did not appear at all practicable, and Bertram did; — and hence this long tirade, which is the last chapter of his vagabond life.

"As for Bertram, Maturin may defend his own, begotten, if he likes it well enough; I leave the Irish clergyman and the new orator Henley to battle it out between them, satisfied to have done the best I could for both. I may say this to you, as I know it.

"Mr. Coleridge may console himself with the fervor,—the almost religious fervor of his and Wordsworth's disciples, as he calls it. If he means that they are not in any proof, they will think it their own; and the fervor in behalf of Richard Brothers and Joanna Southcote as ever gathered over his pages or round his fireside.

"I my answer to your proposition about the fourth canto you will have received, and I await yours: — perhaps we may not agree. I have since written a poem* (of eighty-four octave stanzas), humorous, in or after the excellent manner of Mr. Whistlecraft (whom I take to be Freere), on a Venetian anecdote which amused me: — but till I have your answer, I can say nothing more about it.

"Mr. Hobhouse does not return to England in November, as he intended, but will winter here; and as he is not going the poetry the winter, there may perhaps be more than the two mentioned (which, by-the-way, I shall not perhaps include in the same publication or agreement) — I shall not be able to publish so soon as expected; but I suppose there is no harm in the delay.

"I have signed and sent your former copyrights by Mr. Kinnaird, but not the receipt, because the money is not yet paid. Mr. Kinnaird has a power of attorney to sign for me, and will, when necessary.

"Many thanks for the Edinburgh Review, which is very kind about Manfred, and defends its originality, which I did not know that any body had attacked. I am sure, and do not ever saw the Faustus of Marlowe, and had, and have, no dramatic works by me in English, except the recent things you sent me; but I heard Mr. Lewis translate verbally some scenes of Goethe's Faust (which were, some good and some bad) last summer—which is all I know of the history of that magical personage; and as to the germ of Manfred, they may be found in the Journal which I sent to Mrs. Leigh (part of which you saw) when I went over first the Dent de Jaman, and then the Wengen or Wengelberg Alp and Scheideck, and made the giro of the Jungfrau, Shreckhorn, &c., &c., shortly before I left Switzerland. I have the whole scene of Manfred before me, as if it was written on sand, and could point it out, spot by spot, torrent and all.

"Of the Prometheus of Eschylus I was passionately fond as a boy (it was one of the Greek plays we read thrice a year at Hall's); indeed that the 'Prometheus' and the 'Medea' were the only ones, except the Seven before Thebes, which ever much pleased me. As to the Faustus of Marlowe, I never read, never saw, nor heard of it,—at least, thought of it, except that I think Mr. Goldsmith mentioned it, in a note of his which you sent me, something about the catastrophe; but not as having anything to do with mine, which may or may not resemble it, for anything I know.

"The Prometheus, if not exactly in my plan, has" always been so much in my head, that I can easily conceive its influence over all or any thing that I have written;—but I deny Marlow and his progeny, and beg that you will do the same, whose country-house at Este I have taken for two years. If you comes out next summer, let me know in time. Love to Gifford.

"Yours ever truly.

Crabbe, Malcolm, Hamilton, and Chaucer,
Are all partakers of my penny.

These two lines are omitted in your letter to the doctor, after—

"All dear men who make their way."

LETTER CCCLVII.

TO MR. MURRAY.

Venice, Oct. 29, 1817.

"Your two letters are before me, and our bargain is so firm coo-ched. How sorry I am to hear that Gifford is unwell! Pray tell me he is better; I hope it is nothing but cold. As you say his illness originates in cold, I trust it will get no farther.

"Mr. Whistler has been in the country, but till the 15th of March here at evening, he lived with the greater admiring than myself: I have written a story in eighty-nine stanzas, in imitation of him, called Beppo (the short name for Giuseppe, that is, the Joe of the Italian Joseph), which I shall throw you into the balance of the fourth canto, to help you round to your money; but you perhaps had better publish it anonymously: but this we will see to by-and-by.

"In the notes to canto fourth, Mr. Hobhouse has pointed out several errors of mine, which you may depend upon H.'s research and accuracy. You may print it in what shape you please.

"With regard to a future large edition, you may print all, or any thing, except 'English Bard,' to the republication of which at no time will I consent. I would not reprint them on any consideration. I don't think them good for much, even in point of poetry; and as to the other things, you are to recollect that I gave up the publication on account of the Hollands, and I do not think that any time or circumstances can neutralize the suppression. Add to which, that, after being on terms with almost all the bards and critics of the day, it would be savage at any time, but worst of all now, to revive this foolish lampoon.

"The review of Manfred came very safely, and I am much pleased with it. It is odd that they should say (that is, somebody in a magazine whom I do not find, I mean the Edinburgh Review) that it was taken from Marlow's Faust, which I never read nor saw. An American, who came the other day from Germany, told Mr. Hobhouse that Manfred was taken from Goethe's Faust. The devil may take both the Faustuses, German and English—I have taken neither.

"Will you send to Hanson, and say that he has not written since 9th September?—at least I have not heard since, to my great surprise.

"Will you desire Messrs. Morland to send out whatever additional sums he or may be paid in credit immediately, always, to their Venice correspondents? I am to have the five hundred pounds which they sent me out an additional credit for one thousand pounds. I was very glad of it, but I don't know how the devil it came; for I can only make out five hundred of Hanson's payment, and I had thought the other five hundred came from you; but it did not, it seems, as by yours of the 7th instant, you have only just paid the 1230l. balance.

"Mr. Kinnaird is on his way home with the assignments. I hear of the six days' arrival of canto fourth, which depends on the journey of Mr. Hobhouse home; and I do not think that this will be immediate.

"Yours, in great haste, and very truly,

B.

"P. S. Morlands have not yet written to my bankers, apprising the payment of your balances: pray desire them to do so.

"Ask them about the previous thousand—of which I know five hundred came from Hanson's—and make out the other five hundred—that is, whence it came."

LETTER CCCLVIII.

TO MR. MURRAY.

Venice, Nov. 15, 1817.

"Mr. Kinnaird has probably returned to England by this time, and will have conveyed to you any tidings you may wish to have of us and ours. I have come back, for the winter, Mr. Hobhouse will probably set off in December, but what day or week, I know not. He is my opposite neighbor at present.

"I wrote yesterday in some perplexity, and no very good humor to Mr. Kinnaird, to inform me about Newstead and the Hansons, of which and whom I hear nothing since his departure from this place, except in a few unintelligible words from an unintelligible woman.

"I am as sorry to hear of Dr. Polidori's accident as one can be for a person for whom one has a dislike, and something of contempt. When he gets well, tell me, and how he gets on in the sick line. Poor fellow! how came he to fix there?"

"I fear the doctor's still at Norwich. Will hardly suit the doctor's pursuits.

Methought he was going to the Brazils, to give the Portuguese physick (of which they are fond to desperation), with the Danish counsel.

"Your new canto has expanded to one hundred and sixty-seven stanzas. It will be long, you see; and as for the notes by Hobhouse, I suspect they will be of the heroic size. You must keep Mr. H. in good humor, for he is devilish touchy yet about your Review and all which it inherits, including the editor, the Admiralty, and its bookseller. I used to think that I was a good deal of an author in amour propre and nait me tangere; but these poor fellows are worst, after all, about their little comforts.

"Do you remember my mentioning, some months ago, the Marquis Moxeada—a Spaniard of distinction and warsconversaries, my summer neighbor at La Mira? Well, about six weeks ago, he fell in love with a Venetian girl of family, and no fortune or character: took her into his mansion! quarrelled with all his former friends for giving him advice (except me who gave him none), and installed her present concubine and future wife and mistress of himself and furniture. At the end of a month, in which she demeaned herself as ill as possible, he found out a correspondence between her and some former keeper, and after nearly strangling, turned..."
...out of the house, to the great scandal of the keeping part of the town, and with a prodigious eclat, which has occupied all the canals and coffee-houses in Venice. He said she wanted to poison him; and she says—God know what—but between them they have made a great deal of noise. I know a little of both the parties: Moncada seemed a very sensible old man, a character which he has not quite kept up on this occasion; and the woman is rather shame than pretty. For the licence of religion, she was bred in a convent, and for the credit of Great Britain, taught by an Englishwoman.

"Yours, &c."

 LETTER CCCLX.
 TO MR. MURRAY.

"Venice, Dec. 8, 1837.

"A Venetian lady, learned and somewhat stricken in years, having, in her intervals of love and devotion, taken upon her to transcribe the letters, and write the life of Lady Mary Wortley Montagu,—to which undertaking there are two obstacles, firstly, ignorance of English, and, secondly, a total dearth of information on the subject of her project—has applied to me for facts, or falsities upon this promising project. Lady Montagu lived the last twenty or more years of her life in or near Venice, I believe; but here they know nothing, and remember nothing, for the story of to-day is succeeded by the scandal of to-morrow; and the wit, and beauty, and gallantry, which might render your countrywoman notorious in her own country, must have been here no great distinction—because the first is in no request, and the two latter are common to all women, or at least the last of them. If you can therefore tell me any thing, or get any thing told, of Lady Wortley Montagu, I shall take it as a favor, and will transfer and translate it to the 'Dama' in question. And I pray you besides to send me, by some quick and safe voyager, the edition of her letters, and the stupid life, by Dr. Dallaway, published by her proud and foolish family.

"The death of the Princess Charlotte has been a shock even here, and must have been an earthquake at home.* The Courier's list of some three hundred and the crown (including the house of Wirtemberg, with that * * * P— of, of disputable memory, whom I remember seeing at various balls during the visit of the Muscovites, &c., &c., 1814), must be very consolatory to all true lovers, as well as foreigners, except Signor Travis, a rich Jew merchant of this city, who complains grievously of the length of British mourning, which has countermanded all the silks which he was on the point of transmitting for a year to come. The death of this poor girl is melancholy in every respect, dying at twenty or so, in childbed—of a boy, too, a present princess and future queen, and just as she began to happy, and to enjoy herself and the hopes which she inspired. * * * * * * "I think, as far as I can recollect, she is the first royal defunct in childbed upon record in our history. I feel sorry in every respect—for the loss of a female reign, and a woman hitherto harmless; and all the lost rejoicings, and addresses, and drunkenness, and disbursements of John Bull on the occasion.

"The Prince will marry again, after divorcing his wife, and Mr. Southey will write an elegy now, and an ode then; the Quarterly will have an article against the press, and the Edinburgh an article 'half and half', about reform and right of divorce; * * * the British will give you Dr. Chalmers's sermon much commended, with a place in the stars for deceased royalty; and the Morning Post will have already yelled forth its 'sly, ladies, &c.'

"We, we, Neilliey I—the young Neilliey!"

"It is some time since I have heard from you, are you in bad humor? I suppose so. I have been so myself, and it is your turn now, and by-and-by mine will come round again. * * * Yours truly, B."

"P. S. Countess Albrizzi, come back from Paris, has brought me a medal of herself, a present from Denon to look like a likeness of Mr. Rogers (belonging to her), by Denon also."

 LETTER CCCLXI.
 TO MR. MURRAY.

"Venice, Jan. 8, 1819.

"My dear Mr. Murray,

"You're in a damned hurry
To set up this ultimate article;
But if they don't read it,
You'll see me Hobhouse
Will bring it safe in his portmanteau.

For the Journal you blot of,
As ready to print off,
No doubt you do right to command it;
But as yet I have writ off
The devil a bit of
Our 'Frape'—when copied, I'll send it.

"Then you're * * * 'a Tour,—
No great things, to be sure,—
You could hardly begin with a less work
For the pompous rascal
Who don't speak Italian
Nor French, must have scribbled by gross work,
* * * * * * "You can make any loss up
With 'Bespone' and his gospal,
A work which must surely succeed;
Then Queen Mary's Epistle-craft,
Then the new 'Fyne' of 'Vigo's Discards',
Must make people purchase and read.

"Then you're General Gordon,
Who girded his sword on,
To serve with a Muscovite mane,
And help him to polish
A notion so foolish,
They thought sharing their bread a Shamrock.
LETTER CCLXII.
TO MR. MURRAY.

"Venice, Jan. 18, 1818.

"I send you the story in three other separate parts. It won't do for your Journal, being full of political allusions. Print alone, without name; after nothing; get a scholar to see that the Italian phrases are correctly published (your printing, by the way, always makes me ill with its eternal blunders, which are incessant), and God speed you. Hobhouse left Venice a fortnight ago, saving two days. I have heard nothing of or from him. "Yours, &c.

"He has the whole of the MSS.; so put up prayers in your back shop, or in the printer's chapel."

LETTER CCLXIII.
TO MR. MURRAY.

"Venice, Jan. 27, 1818.

"My father—that is, my Armenian father, Padre Pasquali—in the name of all the others of our convent, sends you the enclosed, greeting:

"Inasmuch as it has pleased the translators of the long-lost and lately-found portions of the text of Eusebius to put forth the enclosed prospectus of which I send six copies, you are hereby implored to obtain subscribers in the two universities, and among the learned, and the unlearned, who would unlearn their ignorance. This they (the convent request, I request, and do you request.

"I sent you Beppo some weeks ago. You must publish it alone; it has politics and ferocity, and won't do for your isthmus of a Journal.

"Mr. Hobhouse, if the Alps have not broken his neck, is, or ought to be, swimming with my commentaries and his own coat of mail in his teeth and right hand, in a cork jacket, between Calais and Dover.

"It is the height of the Carnival, and I am in the extreme and agonies of a new intrigue with I don't exactly know whom or what, except that she is insatiable of love, and won't take money, and has light hair and blue eyes, which are not common here, and that I met her at the masque, and that when her mask is off, I am as wise as ever. I shall make what I can of the remainder of my youth."

LETTER CCLXIV.
TO MR. MOORE.

"Venice, Feb. 2, 1818.

"Your letter of Dec. 8, arrived but this day, by some delay, common, but inexplicable. Your domestic calamities are very grievous, and I feel with you as much as I dare feel at all. Throughout life, your loss must be my loss, and your gain my gain;

"'Tis your letter,"

and, though my heart may ebb, there will always be a drop for you among the dregs.

"I know how to feel with you, because (selfish ness being always the substratum of our darkness) I am quite estranged in my own children. Besides my little legitimate, I have made unto myself an illegitimate (to say nothing of one before); and I look forward to one of these as the pillar of my old age, supposing that I ever reach—which I hope I never shall—that desolating period. I have a great love for my little Ada, though perhaps she may torture me, like—"

"Your offered address will be as acceptable as you can wish. I don't much care what the wrinkles of the world think of me—all that's past. But I care a good deal what you think of me, and so, what you like. You know that I am not sullen; and, as to being savage, such things depend on circumstances. However, as to being in good humor in your society, there is no great merit in that, because it would be an effort, or an insanity, to be otherwise.

"I don't know what Murray may have been saying or quoting. I called Crabbe and Sam the fathers of present poetry; and said, that I thought—except them—"all of 'us youths' were on a wrong tack. But I never said that we did not sell well. Our fame will be hurt by admiration and imitation. When I say our, I mean all (lakers included), except the postscript of the Augustans. The next generation (from the quantity and facility of imitation) will tumble and break their necks off our Pegasus, who runs away with us; but we keep the audacie, because we broke the nacelle, and can ride. But though easy to mount, he is the devil to guide; and the next fellows must go back to the riding-school and the manage, and learn to ride the great horse.

"Talking of horses, by-the-way, I have transported my own, four in number, to the Lido, (beach, in English,) a strip of some ten miles along the Adriatic, a mile or two from the city; so that I not only get a row in my gondola, but a spanking gallop of some miles daily along a firm and solitary beach, from the fortress to Malamocco, which contributes considerably to my health and spirits.

"I have hardly had a wink of sleep this week past. We are in the agonies of the Carnival's last days, and I must be up all night again, as well as to-morrow. I have had some curious masking adventures this Carnival, but, as they are not yet over, I shall not say on. I will work the mine of my youth to the last veins of the ore, and then—good night. I have lived, and am content.

"Hobhouse went away before the Carnival began, so that he had little or no fun. Besides, it requires some time to be thorough-going with the Venetians; but of all this anon, in some other letter.

"I must dress for the evening. There is an opera, ridotta, and I know not what, besides balls; and so, ever and ever yours,

"P. S. I send this without revising, so excuse errors. I delight in the fortunate and tame of Lalla, and again congratulate you on your well-merited success."

LETTER CCLXV.
TO MR. MURRAY.

"Venice, Feb. 20, 1818.

"I have to thank Mr. Croker for the arrival, and you for the contents, of the parcel which came last week, much quicker than any before, owing to Mr. Croker's kind attention and the official exterior of thef thebag; and all safe except much friction among magnesia; of which only two bottles came entire: but it is all very well, and I am exceedingly obliged to you.

"The books I have read, or rather am reading. Prov. 1:19. The Saxage fort, of whose goddess is very amusing! Many of his sketches I recognize, particularly Gifford, Mackintos., Drummond, Duttens, H. Walpole, Mrs. Inchbald, Obie, &c., with the Scotts, Loughborough, and most of the divines and lawyers, and save one or two a few a few short hints of authorship, and a few lines about a certain 'noble author,' characterized as malignant and sceptical, according to the old story, 'as it was in the beginning, is now, and will be for evermore.' Do you know such a person, Master Murray? eh?—And pray, of the booksellers, which be you? the dry, the dirty, the honest, the opulent, the finical, the splendid, or the coxcomb booksellers? Strop my vitals, but the author grows scurrilous in his grand climactic.

"I remember to have seen Porson at Cambridge, in the hall of our college, and in private parties, but not frequently; and I never can recollect him except as a poet; and generally I mean an evening, for in the hall, he dined at the Dean's table, and I at the Vicemaster's, so that I was not near him; and he then and there appeared sober in his demeanour, nor did I ever hear of excess or outrage on his part. In public,—in the college, or chapel; but I have seen him in a private party of undergraduates, many of them freshmen and strangers, take up a poker to one of them, and heard him use language as blackguard as his action.
I have seen Sheridan drunk, too, with all the world; but his intoxication was that of Bacchus, and Porson's that of Silenus. Of all the disgusting brutes, sulky, abusive, and intolerable, Porson was the most hateful, and so far as the few Kings that I saw him went, which were only at William Bankes's
(the Nubian discoverer's) rooms. I saw him once so away in a rage, because nobody knew the name of the 'Cobbler of Messina,' insulting their ignorance with the most vulgar terms of reprobaion.
He was tolerated in this state among the young men for his talents, as the Turks think a madman inspired, and bear with him. He used to recite or rather vomit pages of all languages, and could speak Greek like a Helot; and certainly Sparta never shook her children with a grosser exhibition than this man's intoxication.

"Perceive, in the book you sent me, a long account of him, which is very savage. I cannot judge, as I never saw him sober, except in hall or combination-room; and then I was never near equal to, and hardly to see him. Of his drunken deportment, I can be sure, because I saw it.

"With the Reviews, I have been much entertained. It requires to be as far from England as I am to relish a periodical paper properly: it is like soda-water in an Italian summer. But what cruel work you make with Lady Morgan! You should recollect that she is a woman; though, to be sure, they are now and then very fine and still as an-cessories they can do no great harm; and I think it is a pity so much good invective should have been laid out upon her, when there is such a fine field of us, Jacobin gentlemen, for you to work upon. This being, as it was, a very serious and injured person, that it is as good for her as a dose of karthison.'

"I heard from Moore lately, and was sorry to be made aware of his domestic loss. Thus it is—medio de fonte leporum—short in the case of his fame and happiness comes a drawback as usual.

"Mr. Hoppner, whom I saw this morning, has been made the father of a very fine boy. —Mother and child doing very well indeed. By this time
Hobhouse should be with you, and also certain packets, letters, &c., of mine, sent since his departure
I am not at all well in health within this last eight days. My remembrances to Gifford and all friends.

"Yours, &c.,

"B.

"P. S. In the course of a month or two, Hanson will have probably to send off a clerk with conveyances to show the thing, by some Italian, who had sent it to you last for ninety-four thousand five hundred pounds, in which case I suplicate supplies of articles as usual, for which, desire Mr. Kinnaird to settle from funds in their bank, and deduct from my account with him.

"P. S. To-morrow night I am going to see
'Othello,' an opera from our 'Othello,' and one of Rossini's best, it is said. It will be curious to see in Venice the Venetian story itself represented, besides to discover what they will make of Shakespeare in music.

LETTER CCCLXVI.

TO MR. HOPPNER.

"MY DEAR SIR,

"Our friend, il Conte M., threw me into a cold sweat last night, by telling me of a menaced version of Manfred (in Venetian I hope, to complete the thing), by some Italian, who had sent it to you for correction, which is the reason why I take the liberty of troubling you on the subject. If you have any means of communication with the man, should you permit me to convey to him the offer of any price he may obtain, or think to obtain, for his project, provided he will throw his translation into the fire, and promise not to undertake any other of that or any other of my things: I will send him his money immediately on this condition.

"As I did not write to the Italians, nor for the Italians, nor of the Italians, (except in a poem not yet published, where I have said all the good I know or do know of them and none of the harm,) I confess I wish that they would let me alone, and not drag me into their arena as one of the gladiators, in a silly contest which I neither understand nor have ever interfered with, having kept the peace of all their literary parties, both here and at Milan, and elsewhere,—I came into Italy to feel the climate and be quiet if possible. Mossi's translation I would have prevented if I had known it, or could have done so; and I trust that I shall yet be in time to stop
